severest and most useful labor, are proud to obtain for them selves and their families, though a very humble, an honest living. All this refuse is transported to places appropriated for its deposit, where it remains until it is decomposed, and is then sold to the farmers for manure. —[Coleman's European Agriculture.

SAMUEL BAMFORD'S MARRIAGE.

THE banns had been duly published, the day agreed upon, and all was ready. So I made an appointment with my friend Booth to rise early on Sunday morning, and take a good swim in the river before I went to meet my bride and her friends. Booth and I were up betimes, and as speedily in the water at Sandy well, luxuriating in the cool element most gleefully, when what should start us from our enjoyment but the sound of the old church bell ringing seven o'clock, within a quarter of an hour of the very time at which we should have met Mima and her company at Harpurhey? We had been mistaken in the time an hour. So we put on our clothes, and hastened towards the place appointed; but before we arrived there we espied the party coming on the road, and meeting them, we all came to Manchester, in a very good humor, as wedding folks ought to be. After breakfasting at my sister's in Greengate, where I lodged, we proceeded to the old church, and lo! when the ring was produced, the bride's finger was so swollen with walking, that the ring could not be passed over the joint. The minister, who was the Reverend Joshua Brooks, seeing that the ring was not placed according to custom, began, as he read the service, to thumb it with his nail, in order to force it over. I was afraid he would hurt the dear little woman, and was about to remonstrate, when he suddenly quitted us, and hastening to one side of the communion rails, he gave a boy who stood leaning upon them a smart box on the ear, and then, without saying a word, he returned to us. Meantime, in order to prevent his further annoyance, I had taken hold of the whole of the finger, and held it, with the ring on, in my hand. But he now attempted to thrust my hand away, and tried to commence forcing the ring up again.

"Let the ring go over," he said.

"It can't go further," I replied, "her finger is swelled."

"It can go further, and it shall go further," said the irritable little being.

"It shan't go further," said I quickly, almost as irritable.

"Oh, very well," then observed he, "stand down; you are not man and wife until I have bestowed the benediction."

"Benediction, indeed!" thought I; "a blessed benediction it must be that has to pass those lips."

However, we stood back, and as he had finished the ceremony for us, except the benediction, he went through the same form with four or five other couples, after which the clerk ordered us all to kneel down; we, of course, kneeled with the others, and the benediction have been bestowed indiscriminately, we rose from our knees, and I suppose each bridegroom did as I did, for there was a sound of kisses in the place.

"How stupid you were!" said the revered personage, when we went into the vestry to sign the registers, and to pay the fees. No, I had forgotten, the fees were paid beforehand.

"How stupid you were," said he, "not to let the ring go on the finger."

"The ring was on the finger," I said.

"Yes, but not properly; not over the joint."

"That is not required," I said. "Besides, the finger was swollen, and it was painful."

"But the ring is over the joint now," said he.

"Yes, but not through your endeavors; and whether it were or not, you had no right to interfere in the manner you did. The ring was on the finger, and the form of solemnisation does not require more."

"Pho, pho, man," said he; "sign the book; sign the book."

Both Mima and I signed the book. Thus we were married, and I was happy.—[Early Days, by Samuel Bamford.

THE BLUE BIRDS.

THE Blue Bird's song we soon shall hear,
Sweet harbinger of Spring!
Its notes are welcome to my ear,
I love to hear it sing!

It comes the soonest of its race,
And flies with gentle wing;
It seeks the old frequented place,
And there it loves to sing.

Come, gentle bird, and let us hear
Thy early notes of Spring;
And may thy mate, as wont, be near,
To share the joy ye bring.

Come, build the nest, the hollow rail
Is where it used to be;
The food ye want, it shall not fail,
And we will welcome thee!

The Blue Bird's song we love to hear,
Sweet harbinger of Spring!
Its notes are welcome to my ear,
I love to hear it sing!

ANECDOTE OF BEAU NASH.

THE Bath General Hospital was originated by Beau Nash, in 1738. There is a presence about the building which always strikes the stranger in his rambles about the city. Charity covereth a multitude of sins; and we suppose that Beau, in its erection considered that he should expiate the crime of passing a life in foolishness and utter vanity. His position enabled him to command the pockets of a great number of persons—in fact, as king, he could dip into his subjects' pockets with almost as much impunity as other monarchs, and the sums he collected for this institution were accordingly great. An anecdote is told of the art with which he managed to make indifferent people "bleed," that is worth repeating.

While in Wiltshire Rooms (a celebrated gaming house of the day) one morning, collecting money for the hospital, a lady entered the room, who was more remarkable for her wit than her charity; and not being able to pass by him unobserved, she gave him a pat with her fan, saying:

"You must put down a trifle for me, Nash, for I have no money in my pocket."

"Yes, madam," said he, "that I will, with pleasure, if your grace will tell me when to stop;" then taking a handful of guineas out of his pocket, he began to tell them into his white hat: "One, two, three, four, five—"

"Hold, hold," said the duchess, "consider what you are about."

"Consider your rank and fortune, madam," cried Nash, "and don't interrupt the work of charity; 'eleven, twelve, thirteen, fourteen, fifteen—"

Here the duchess stormed, and caught hold of his hand.

"Peace, madam," replied Nash; "you shall have your name written in letters of gold, madam; sixteen, seventeen, eighteen, nineteen, twenty—"

"I won't pay a farthing more," said the duchess.

"Charity hides a multitude of sins," replied Nash; "twenty-one, twenty-two, twenty-three, twenty-four, twenty-five—"

"Nash!" at length broke out the lady, "I protest you frighten me out of my wits; Lord, I shall die!"

"Madam, you will never die doing good; and if you do it will be better for you;" and was about to proceed, but perceiving that her grace had lost all patience, a parley ensued; when he, after much altercation, agreed to stop his hand, and compound with her for thirty guineas.

The duchess, however, seemed displeased the whole evening, and when he came to the table where she was playing, she bade him stand further off for an ugly devil, for she hated the sight of him. (This, it appears, was the wit of the last century.) But her grace afterwards having a run of good luck, called Nash to her:

"Come," said she, "I will be friends with you, though you are a fool; and to let you see that I am not angry, there are ten guineas more for your charity. But this I insist on, that neither my name nor the sum shall be mentioned."

Anecdotes.

SHORT MEMORIES.—A good deacon, returning from church one Sabbath afternoon, was accosted by a man. "Sir did you see a boy on the road, driving a cart, with a bag of wool in it?" "I think I did," said the deacon, musingly, "a boy with a short memory, wasn't he?" The man looked confused, and said, "Why do you think he has a short memory, sir?" The deacon seemed to enjoy his confusion, and even determined to increase it. "I think so; and I think, moreover, that he must belong to a family who have short memories." "What in the world makes you say that?" said the man, more and more perplexed. "Why, simply this, said the old gentleman, assuming all of a sudden, a very grave and solemn manner, "because God Almighty has proclaimed from Mount Sinai, in a most solemn manner, amongst other things, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy;' and the boy has forgotten all about it. His memory must be very short, indeed—very."

A GAME HARE.—A person shooting last winter on Mount Lebanon, when near the summit, on the side of a deep declivity, put up a hare which took a downward course, and which he immediately shot; but the impetus of running caused her to roll over several times. The snow stuck to the skin, and formed a ball, which increased every turn. Dragged down by its own weight, which kept augmenting, it rolled to the foot of the mountain, and was so large and so hard, that the chasseur was obliged to call some peasants to "cut it open with their axes and spades, to get puss out of her shroud."

AN African preacher, speaking from "What is a man profited if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" mentioned among other things, that they lost their souls by being too charitable! Seeing the congregation astonished beyond measure at his saying, he very emphatically repeated it, and then proceeded to explain his meaning. "Many people," said he, "attend meeting, hear the sermon, and, when it is over, they proceed to divide it among the congregation—this part was for that man, and that part for that woman; such denunciations for such persons, these threats for you sinners—and so," continued the shrewd African, "they give away the whole sermon, and keep none for themselves."

A COMPARISON.—A clergyman on one occasion stepped into a public garden, in which old Adam, its keeper, was diligently engaged in grubbing up a plentiful crop of weeds, which had overrun a portion of the ground. Clericus condoled with the old man on the trouble the operation occasioned him; while the latter, after clawing his causality for a moment said, "When ane thinks on't, after a',—'whatever is, is right;' for weeds are like sinners; and if it were na for weeds and sinners, there would be nae need for gardeners or ministers. Nae use for you or I, sir."

Professor Cockerell, in a lecture on architecture, lately related an anecdote of Rennie, who, having repaired the wheel of a stage-coach, in which he and an aristocratic fellow-traveler had previously been on colloquial terms, found himself, as a workman, treated with great reserve and hauteur, and described the amusing discomfiture of the same traveler, on finding next day that the most honored guest of the noble lord with whom he had to dine, was his companion, the workman, who now treated him with corresponding distance.

It is starting on a false principle to suppose that a man can escape from his own deed, be it good or bad. As soon as he has committed it he has given it an existence, an individuality, which he can never destroy; it becomes independent of him, and goes into the world to deal its influence in widening circles far beyond his view.

SOMETHING of sadness lurks beneath the pleasure founded on a knowledge of mankind; the most truly inoffensive gaiety is that which is purely imaginative.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1849.

I. O. OF O. F.

Office of the Grand Secretary Grand Lodge State of New-York:

ODD FELLOW'S HALL, CITY OF NEW-YORK, }
March 13, 1849.

To District Deputy Grand Masters, Officers of Lodges, and Brethren:

In consequence of the many complaints made to this Office of the failure of Deputies, Officers of Lodges and Members to receive communications which have been issued from this Office, and of the failure to receive many communications which have been intended to reach this Office, for several months last past, and which have been transmitted by Deputies, Lodges and individuals, you are therefore notified and requested to address all communications intended for the Grand Lodge, Grand Master, or Grand Secretary, to BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Box No. 838, Post Office, New-York, and in all cases to be particular that Letters and Documents are properly mailed, in order that a failure of papers intended for this, or sent from this Office, to reach their destination, may be traced to the proper cause.

Fraternally yours,

BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Grand Secretary.

LECTURES.

THE EDITOR will deliver a Lecture in Philadelphia, before the members of Decatur Lodge, on Wednesday evening next. He will also deliver a Lecture before the Order, in Baltimore, on Friday evening next; and in Wilmington, (Del.) on the following Monday evening.

PUBLIC LECTURE BEFORE THE I. O. O. F., AT FINESVILLE, NEW-JERSEY.—A public Lecture will be delivered before the Order in this place, on the first Thursday evening in April. The Address will be given by the Editor of this journal.

LECTURE IN BROOKLYN.—The Editor will address the Order in Brooklyn, and the members of Magnolia Lodge, on Tuesday evening next.

LECTURES IN LODGES.

THERE is nothing more beneficial to the Order than frequent lectures in Lodge rooms, either on subjects pertaining to Odd-Fellowship, or such as would be of general interest. Many Lodges understand this, and provide every autumn for their lectures during the winter, and we have no doubt that this practice would become more general were it not that an opinion has generally obtained, that the R. W. Grand Lodge of the United States prohibits all lectures, as well private as public, before the Lodges, unless permission is first asked and received from the State Grand Lodge. Now this is an error. There is no such prohibitory law. Public processions and lectures are forbidden, it is true, without special permission, but not so are private lectures. On the contrary, they are encouraged and invited, and come into the regular order of business. Any Lodge in the United States has full liberty, at any time, to have a lecture "for the good of the Order," in private. Such is the obvious intention of the G. L. U. S., and no State Grand Lodge we believe has ever attempted to establish a different law—with the exception of that of Ohio. In that jurisdiction we learn that all lectures are forbidden, but for what reason we have not been informed.

THE LIBRARY, BOOKS, READING.

THE Library Convention mentioned in our last, met according to notice on Wednesday evening. So far as we can learn, this great enterprise of our Order is progressing successfully and rapidly; and as the Lodges of the city in all probability will soon be called on for their subscriptions, we wish to call the attention of the brethren to the subject, and to ask them to give it the consideration it deserves. We suppose that the subscription—i. e. the entrance fee of one dollar each—will amount to nearly ten thousand dollars, which sum will give the institution an excellent start; while the annual assessment of fifty cents on each member will be ample for the future exigencies of the Library.

We cannot but hope, nay, we believe that every brother in this city will become a member of this Library, and thus be entitled to all its privileges. The price of admission is exceedingly small, and the annual tax still less, so that the poorest of our members can have access to it. It will be to them an intellectual treasure, more valuable than silver or gold, at which they can always apply, and whence they can draw a fund of enjoyment, and solid peace, of which no reverses can rob them.

Libraries are of great public utility, and this one, in particular, will be productive of immense good. The age in which we live is peculiar. The general diffusion of knowledge among all classes has overturned the old order of things, and gives promise of a more equitable social condition in the future. Formerly, books were for the favored few, and were locked in the cases of the rich and great. The mechanic and the laborer pursued their occupations without any intelligent comprehension of them—as the beaver constructs his dwelling by instinct, or as the ox draws the plow, as he is driven by the master. The very name of mechanic sounded plebeian, and grated harshly on aristocratic ears. But to day it is no more so. Mechanics may walk among princes, and sit in the high places of power. Science has glorified every occupation, and invested with sublime dignity every trade. Every mechanical occupation now is considered honorable, because the laborer has carried with him to his toil the light of science, and the force of intellect. The carpenter, the farmer, and all other workers, need, therefore, more than ever before, the aid of books. A library, extensive and cheap, like the one we propose, will be invaluable to the class for which it is designed. A great majority of the Odd-Fellows of this city are young men, and not a few of them are mechanics, who need the means of intellectual culture. The library, with its books and popular lectures, is precisely what will supply this need. Its rooms will be a favorite place of resort. Hundreds, and perhaps thousands, who now have no connection with any library, and no taste for reading at all, will here acquire a relish for intellectual pursuits, and become ambitious of obtaining those mental treasures, which abide for ever.

A man who has the ability to read and access to a well-selected library, has within his reach the sources of substantial happiness, and all necessary means of intellectual progress. For who so happy as he who, through the proper use of books, has stored his mind with rich thoughts, and adorned it with beautiful conceptions? He may meet with reverses, the world may frown upon him, and poverty and the hovel may come to him in exchange for vast wealth, and a splendid mansion, and friends may forsake him in the dark hour of his need; but with books as his companions he cannot feel solitary or miserable, or weak. Books give him freedom, strength, companionship. They speak, and the ancient sepulchers heave, the tomb of the past opens, and the wise, and great and good of all times come forth and speak to him words of love, sympathy and hope. They visit him in his solitude, and sit with him at his fire-side. Homer, Milton, Dante, and Shakspeare, are there, and envelop him in a golden drapery of song—the sages and philosophers are there, with their celestial precepts, and lofty wisdom; and the seers, and prophets and apostles, with their revelations of nature, the soul, and God. What a glorious companionship is his!

The ancient Egyptians, impelled by gratitude, adored as a god, the Nile, that great river, which flowing down from the unknown depths of Lybia, deposited upon their thirsty soil the beauty and fertility of a hundred lands. But how much more ought we to prize books, which bring down to us from remote times the wisdom and virtue, and beauty of a hundred ages. They bind the past to the present, and to all the future, so that through them the mighty tide of universal being is for ever rushing past or whirling around us, leaving with us what ever we have the desire to appropriate to ourselves, of wisdom, of virtue, or goodness.

CEMETERIES.

THE earnestness with which the Lodges of this city and vicinity, have entered into the project of establishing a Cemetery for the Order, gives assurance of its speedy accomplishment; and the Odd-Fellows of New York are no longer to form an exception, among the numerous benevolent associations, of providing a suitable, yea, creditable repository, for the remains of departed brothers.

Many have entered within the sacred temple of our Order, influenced entirely by pecuniary motives—of securing to themselves, in case of sickness or accident, a sufficient weekly sum to keep them from want. And it is to be regretted, that in despite of the many precepts and examples they have had to the contrary, their narrow ideas have not been enlarged, and they are yet far from comprehending all the exalted and ennobling duties Odd-Fellowship enjoins.

The Order in New York, though outnumbering far, and paying more for benefits and donations than any other city in the Union, is far behind them all in public spirit. It is true that we have erected a Hall, that is second to none, and that we all may be justly proud of, for the correct and beautiful design of its exterior, as well as the elegance and appropriateness of its interior. But nearly all the principal cities in the different States had preceded us. So has it been in reference to an Odd-Fellow's Cemetery. I would here recommend to the whole Brotherhood the careful perusal of the very interesting account of the "Consecration of the Odd-Fellow's Rest, at New Orleans," and published in the Golden Rule of last week. Bro. LARUE's eloquent address, on that interesting occasion, will receive the hearty approbation of every good Odd-Fellow.

The Convention of Delegates from the Lodges of this city and neighborhood, who have the subject of establishing an Odd-Fellow's Cemetery entrusted to them, (and of which a notice was published in your journal, two weeks since,) held an adjourned meeting, in Grand Lodge Room, on Wednesday evening, the 14th inst., to hear the report of a special committee, to whom the subject of location and the price of grounds had been referred. At this meeting there were over forty Lodges represented, and a general desire manifested of having the object under consideration, accomplished in as short a time as its importance would allow of. The committee were unable to make a final report, on account of not having had time enough to attend to the many proposals received from associations, and individuals having suitable grounds to dispose of. They therefore reported progress, and asked for further time, which was granted them, and the Convention adjourned, to meet again at the call of the committee.

Persons owning ground suitable for a Cemetery, in the vicinity of the city, wishing to dispose of the same, can address a note to the chairman of the committee, W. D. Kennedy, No. 211 Greenwich-street. S. R. W.

A GLANCE AT EUROPE.

THE awakening of Nature is approaching, our mother Earth will be dressed again with her green and flourishing mantle, and the peaceful American farmer will start soon for the field to till the ground for a new and abundant harvest. Here are liberty, unity and independence; everything is in a state of progress and of civilization, and, thanks to the creators of this glorious commonwealth, the present generation is enjoying the fruits of the noble deeds performed by its ancestors. Since the Declaration of American Independence, this vast hemisphere has increased in population, in wealth, and in extension. It has acquired a vast territory, and stands as large and strong as any of the largest powers of Europe. All this is the consequence of the blessings of a free government and sovereign people; and all the gigantic institutions of this country are merely derived from an industrious and intelligent nation, taught at the school of Republicanism.

But if we pass from this Continent to the Old World, we are sure to meet with a very different state of things. No public industry nor social order—on one side there is anarchy struggling with despotism, true republicanism crushed by kings, or by men called liberals of la veille. In one word, it seems that Europe is threatened at the present time by a general revolution, in which tyranny or freedom must acquire the ascendancy, and dictate to the world. Only a year ago the French made a revolution, glorious in its birth, and great for its Democratic principles; a re-action followed that bloodless insurrection, caused by the wants of the poor classes, and originated by the amalgamation of parties. Next came a Dictatorship, and now a Napoleonic Republic, which will end in a Constitutional Monarchy, or with a new and bloody revolution.

The present commonwealth of France has abjured either its institutions or principles. In May, 1848, it was decided that all nations struggling for freedom should receive the support and sympathies of the Gallic people; and at the present time we see the Assembly in Paris almost deciding to put down another Republic—to interfere in favor of the Pope against the will of the Romans. If France should send an army to protect the Pontiff in his hostile way to the eternal city, this treacherous policy would condemn to an everlasting infamy the government and the people, who permitted such an infamous step against their Republican brethren. There is no nation more indebted to Italy than France. Many thousand children of this unfortunate land were slaughtered for the glory or that country, during the consulship and empire of Napoleon. The Italians fought bravely for France, and at present we are to see this same nation throw her bayonets and cannons against the modern Italians, who attempted to return to a democratic life, and acquire a rank among other powers. The Republic of Rome is as sacred as that proclaimed in Paris—it was created by the majority of the Assembly, and voted by the whole population. The Pope is deposed, de facto et de jure, only of his temporal sovereignty, while the Roman Government has promised to respect and protect his sacred dignity of chief of the Roman Church. Pius IX in accepting a foreign intervention to reconquer his throne, would be the cause of many evils to his country, of christian blood shed for his temporal cause, and the Church of Rome would fall to pieces like a dead body exposed to the air. The leaders of the young Roman Republic are decided to fight to the last drop of their blood to defend their rights and country, and would sooner bury themselves under the ruins of modern Rome, than to see foreigners triumph over their liberty.

In 1831, when Louis Napoleon was a simple private citizen, of the Roman States, he with his elder brother, (dead in the revolution of that country,) took up arms and marched with other liberals against the troops of Pope Gregory XVI. Now that he is the President of France, instead of protecting the Romans, he goes against their Government, and forgets his just conduct in so noble a cause.

Tuscany has followed the example of Rome. The Duke has gone to the land of exile, because he feared the excommunication of the Pope, and would not recognise the Roman Constituent. Leopold was a good prince, but of Austrian blood, enough to be hated by the Italians, who could see in him but a tool of their enemies. The Republic was proclaimed at Florence, and will unite with Rome and with other parts of Italy to form a Federative Republic composed of several States.

G. Mazzini, the chief of young Italy, the man hated by all the despots of Europe, for his Republican principles, arrived at Leghorn, and was received with the greatest honors. The church bells rang, and all the people hastened out upon the road through which he was to pass. Hundreds of banners waved, the windows were all ornamented with tapestry, and the National Guard, with the mass of the people, cried, "God and Italy," "Mazzini and the Republic." In Lombardy, Gen. Radetzki can get no Milanese to value the property that he proposes to confiscate by heavy taxation.

Vienna, in Austria, is as disturbed as ever. We shall soon hear of another revolution. The cruel Gen. Welden has issued a proclamation against the citizens, and forbids them to carry arms or to keep them concealed in their houses. The Hungarians have obtained three glorious victories over the Imperialists. The insurgents of Pest, under the Polish General Bem, are still masters of the important fortress of Essey.

Prince Waldemar, of Prussia, who fought in the East Indies under Gen. Gough, died on the 17th ult. at Munster. He was a brave soldier, and only 32 years of age. The Germanic Empire is not settled, in spite of all the efforts made by the Frankfurt Assembly. Austria is jealous of Prussian ascendancy, and is opposed to German unity. The difficulties between Denmark and Prussia will soon be settled with those States of Germany which thought fit to interfere by arms, in the dispute relative to the Duchies of Schleswig and Holstein.

Spain has sent some vessels and 3000 soldiers to Naples, and put them at the disposal of His Holiness, Pius IX. Thus there will be a crusade of barbarians of all nations to attack a population of less than three millions of inhabitants, who refuse to pay the Pope the annual salary of six hundred thousand crowns, besides many extra expenses. What heroism for those vandals who shall strike the first blow—what shame for the Church, and what scandal for all Christendom.

Enough with the Christians. Let us give to our patient readers some news about the Jews of Jerusalem. Mr. Simeon Abraham, in his report to the Jewish Chronicle, says, the number of his people in the holy city is about 5000, most of them in a very abject and impoverished state; this number is much larger than has been there at any one time, for many years. The causes of their great poverty are various. First, there is no business there to be done. Second, there are large numbers of old pious men and women, who come to finish their days and repose in holy ground. This class is numerous. Another cause of trouble is that they have no hospitals to go to, except the one belonging to the English Missionaries, which, to the pious Israelite, is worse than death itself.

The official information received from the East Indies gives the important notice of the invasion of Scinde by the Affighans—14,000 strong. There will be a long war between the English and the natives, who are decided to maintain their freedom.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP AND MASONRY.

MR. EDITOR: I am one of your constant readers, and one of the many admirers of your excellent sheet, and have recently become a member of that noble Order whose interests you advocate. In Odd-Fellowship I am young, and consequently have but little knowledge, and less experience of its principles and bearings upon the great interests of man. But in the exercise of my first love, I propose to offer through you some thoughts on Odd-Fellowship, embracing its principles, character and bearings. Having been a member of that venerable old Order (the Masonic,) for years, I could readily understand and appreciate much that I have found interwoven and incorporated with Odd-Fellowship. That venerable institution has long stood like the Pillars of Hercules, bidding defiance to the ravaging hand of time, and all the winds and storms of Revolution. It has stood erect and unmoved by the lashing surges of the ocean of strife among nations, and its principles are destined to survive the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds. It has been the parent of most of those Orders, in different ages and countries, whose object has been the relief of human want and woe. But the last daughter (of this aged parent, who has grown gray with age and laden with rich experience,) has come into existence at a time when the fostering genius of this country could train and mould her principles to bear most happily upon the wants, woes and ills of human life. Odd-Fellowship stands confessedly one of the most efficient of her progeny. The evidence of which will appear most clear in an exposition of its principles, as they are made to bear upon the practical wants of Society. These cardinal principles are Friendship, Love and Truth.

Take them from among us, strike these from the circle of society, and what a dark and gloomy aspect would be presented to every eye. What beings would we be without Friendship in this alienated world. How cold, dreary, and cheerless would be our abodes—and how vast the solitude of social life if Friendship was no more. Conceive if you can the real condition of things in the entire absence of Friendship. Man would be in dread reality man's worst enemy—selfishness, hatred, revenge, and sordid avarice would stalk rampant in all the circles and dwellings of human beings. Every interest would be assailed, every right invaded, and every design, however benevolent, would be frustrated—in short, its absence would make our world a universal arena of conflict, one vast aceldama or field of blood. Take next from man Truth and Love, and the very elements of all Governments, and the essential principles of social life would at once be destroyed. Every word spoken—every promise made, and every note or bond would alike be disbelieved, broken, and rendered void, and all the contracts and relations, whether political, civil, moral or social, would at once be severed for ever. The absence of these would necessarily provide the moral elements of that wretchedness which constitutes the world of woe, "where hope that comes to all living could never come to them." Yes, it would make our world (beautiful, and adorned as it is by the hand of our benevolent Creator,) the very Vestibule of Hell. But the existence of these principles in their legitimate operations and bearings on our world, (but partially carried out,) constitutes all the happiness that is found here, and in exact proportion to their exercise in any society, or their absence, is the happiness or misery of men.

Now, can it be questioned by any one, that those principles do lie at the foundation of, and are the native elements of our Order? And can it be doubted that, as an Order, we carry out those principles more fully than any other human society of the age. Our next will embrace the development of those principles, as they are presented and enforced in the initiation and subsequent degrees.

Yours, in F., L. & T.

A NEW ENCAMPMENT INSTITUTED.

Hudson, March 14, 1849.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE GAZETTE AND RULE: D. D. G. P. James Batchelor, of Columbia District, assisted by P. C. Ps. Henry Ary, E. H. Roberts, and several other Patriarchs of Union Encampment No. 17, assembled in Odd-Fellows' Hall, in the town of Coxsackie, County of Greene, and organized Mt. Gerisim Encampment No 67, I. O. of O. F.

The following officers were duly elected and installed into their respective stations, for the term ending June 30th, 1849—viz: Joseph Nelson, C. P.; Alex. Reed, H. P.; Wm. H. Martin, S. W.; Geo. Raymond, Scribe; Stuart Austin, Treas.; James Wilson, J. W.

After installation, fifteen applicants for membership were received and elected, and five being in readiness, were duly initiated into the Patriarchal branch of the Order.

At this stage of the proceedings we adjourned to the hotel kept by Bro. Livingston, who is a member of Kempton Lodge No. 187, and I presume before long will be of Mt. Gerisim Encampment, where a sumptuous repast was served up in Bro. Livingston's best style, which the brethren did ample justice to, I can assure you. The Coxsackie brethren showed the true spirit of hospitality, in providing for the comforts and wants of the visiting brethren. They know how to do up things of this kind in the right way; they are not to be surpassed in kindness and hospitality.

This Encampment starts with very fair prospects—everything looks bright and fair for her. Her officers and members are men of sterling merit—of firm and unbending integrity; they are good men and true Odd-Fellows. Thine, as ever,

AMICUS.

THE ORDER IN CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

CHICAGO, Ill., Feb. 28, 1849.

SIR AND BROTHER: Excelsior Lodge No. 22, located at this place, is in a very healthy condition. After having paid all expenses in procuring our regalia, (which exceeds all other in the city, as to beauty and worth,) and other incidental expenses, we have a good fund on hand. It numbers now 85 contributing members. The officers for the current term are as follows: John S. Reed, N. G.; James F. Jillson, V. G.; Amos Grannis, Sec.; T. C. Hoag, P. S.; A. B. Wheeler, Treas.

These names alone (save your humble servant,) are a sufficient guarantee that Excelsior Lodge is at her post. The members exhibit an unusual interest in the Order, by their regular attendance at the meetings, and their interest in all its deliberations. Our Lodge is composed wholly of that class of men who take no little pains to reason and investigate, that they may come to the true character of all matters concerning the Order generally; that its hallowedness and purity may be extended unprejudiced to all those who worship at honor's shrine. We can truly say that the Dispenser of all good has favored us extremely, here in Chicago, as a body. Our ranks have been broken by death but a very few times, while prosperity has always been a light to our path.

There is an unusual interest exhibited in our sister Lodges at present, they having plenty of initiations to keep them warmly interested, and constantly at their posts. Truly,

"Honor here asserts her sway."

May the God of Heaven and Justice spread the principles of our Order, until every true lover of Truth, Love and Friendship shall have gone to that R. W. Immortal Lodge which never adjourns.

Yours, in F., L. & T. A. GRANNIS, Sec.

ODD-FELLOWS' LEEVEE AT DOVER, N. H.

THE following interesting account of this festival we find in the Dover Gazette, an excellent journal, published and edited by Bro. J. T. Gibbs. We wish we could give our readers Bro. Gibbs' report entire, but our limits will not permit it. We only wish we had been there.

The Odd-Fellows' Levee which came off in the Town Hall on Thursday evening, the 22d inst., was a most magnificent and imposing display. In all its arrangements and results we never saw anything equal to it, and we venture to say that it surpassed anything of the kind which ever took place in this ancient and time-honored town. We can only give a running description of it at this time. It was a delightful evening. The occasion—the spontaneous coalition of the two Lodges in this town, to fit and adorn a burial place for their dead—the time—the anniversary of the birth of the great, the immortal Washington, combined to render the whole exhibition attractive and interesting. From the whole front of the Hall there flashed a hundred brilliant lights, yet soft and mellow they cast their reflection upon the brows of the smiling multitude of fair ones and their friends who were joyously approaching the entrance.

The whole entertainment passed off most pleasantly, and was most creditable to all who aided in getting it up. About 11 o'clock, the Brothers, after singing the closing ode, retired in the same order as they entered.

It was completely successful, and in its results far exceeded, we learn, the expectations of its friends. It must also have had a most salutary influence upon our citizens generally who attended, and we were glad to see a great number of them there. The social blessings of Odd-Fellowship were most happily exhibited by constant practical illustrations throughout the evening. All who were there will remember the occasion as a memorable era in their lives. It will be associated with Odd-Fellows' charity through all coming time.

REGULAR TOASTS.

The Occasion.—With deep respect for our departed Brothers, their memory and worth we will ever cherish.

The day we Celebrate.—The birth day of the great Father and Founder of Brotherhood in America—may we always practice the virtues by him inculcated.

Odd-Fellow.—A name synonymous with all that is beautiful in virtue, correct in morals, pure in feelings. Monuments of goodness the world over.

The Institution.—A true Republic, embracing all orders and conditions among men, the only test being merit.

Our Principles.—Are heaven born, for what is deeper than Friendship, purer than Love, more sacred than Truth.

Our Success.—The world is our vineyard, nations the growth, whose fruit is seen in misery relieved, vice reformed, and orphans cared for.

Our Present Condition.—In a healthy state, the result of principles as beautiful in construction, as are its benefits wide spread.

Wecohamet and Mt. Pleasant Lodges.—Twin Sisters in the principles of Friendship, Love and Truth—may they always remain so.

Quochecho Encampment.—May its altar fires be replenished by Subordinate Lodges, till the perfume of its incense shall cover all.

Antiquity of the Order.—It was born of Adam, and will never die till the last rib of man be taken from him.

Past Grand Sire Wilsey.—Father and founder of Odd-Fellowship in America—may his last days be as peaceful as his first have been honorable.

Our Visiting Brethren.—We extend to you the Grip of Friendship. We give you the Sign of Brotherly Love and Truth, as our "Token" for ever.

Woman.—The good old Saxon word for beauty of person and goodness of heart. With these qualifications she cannot fail to make the Odd even.

VOLUNTEER TOASTS.

By H. G. Tasker, N. G. of Wecohamet Lodge. Odd-Fellows.—Like the Good Samaritan, always found ready and willing to administer the balm to their sick brethren.

By Wm. Howeroft, Sec. of Wecohamet Lodge. The Day we Celebrate.—The birth day of George Washington, a true Odd-Fellow in principle, friendly to all mankind, love to God and true to his country.

By T. E. Sawyer, P. G. of Mt. Pleasant Lodge. The Decorations of this Hall.—They reflect great credit on the taste of the excellent artist and worthy Brother under whose superintendence they were made.

By S. H. Parker, P. G. M. of the Grand Lodge. The opposition to Odd-Fellowship in this community.—"It has sung its last song, it has fought its last battle."

By John H. Wiggins, P. G. of Mount Pleasant Lodge. Friendship, Love and Truth.—These constitute the triple linked chain that holds together in inseparable union our common brotherhood. He who excels in the practice of these virtues, approaches nearest to the character of a true Odd-Fellow, and the highest dignity of Man.

By John T. Gibbs, P. G. of Mount Pleasant Lodge. The last Grand Pass Word.—May we not be without it when at last we are examined by the Supreme Grand Master of the Universe.

By Henry Heap, Sec. of Wecohamet Lodge. The Order.—May its members everywhere be distinguished by their acts of benevolence and charity.

By John W. Tuttle, of Wecohamet Lodge. Charity.—An odd virtue, rarely found in purity at the present day; but Odd-Fellows claim it and strive to practice it, however odd it may appear.

By Andrew M. Paul, C. P. of Quochecho Encampment. The Patriarchal branch of the Order.—May she spread the wings of her tents wide enough to contain the whole brotherhood.

By Thomas Bickford, Jr., of Wecohamet Lodge. The Members of Mount Pleasant Lodge.—We cherish them as brothers, and honor them as men; their Hale (hall) of brotherly love will ever be recognized with emotions of strong regard by every Odd-Fellow in the land.

Bro. Hale responded with a few remarks, and in conclusion said, in his peculiar position he would give the following: The Ladies.—Their opposition to Odd-Fellows is natural. May they be even with them, and assist in initiating them into the Grand Lodge of Matrimony.

By W. T. Prescott, P. G. of Wecohamet Lodge. The Ladies.—However much they may be opposed to the principles of our Order, they are always on the lookout for an Odd-Fellow.

By James Farnsworth, P. G. of Wecohamet Lodge. The only correct expose of the secrets of Odd-Fellowship published.—It may be found in the charities and good deeds of the Order.

By Edward Cockings, Patriarch of Quochecho Encampment. Odd-Fellows.—They are scattered from Passamaquoddy Bay to the gold regions of California; the whole boundless continent is theirs.

By D. L. Norris, of Mt. Pleasant Lodge. The principles of our beloved Order.—As pure as the mountain streams, and as eternal as the hills of the old Granite State.

By John D. Parker, P. G. of Suffolk Lodge, Boston. Our bachelor brethren.—May they take one degree more; the degree of matrimony, and be prepared to receive all the little honorary degrees that may follow.

The following are a few of the many Conundrums that were fired:

Why is Odd-Fellowship like an old pewter plate? Because the more it is rubbed the brighter it shines.

Why is the audience like like an assemblage of Mormons? Because a Joe Smith stands at the head.

Why is a good Odd-Fellow like a man smoking a cigar? Because he enjoys his Regalia.

Why is the Order in this town like a forest? Because it has green wood, (Greenwood.)

Why is a Telegraph like a pistol? Because it sends a bullet-in, (Bulletin.)

Why is Mount Pleasant Lodge like a saw mill? Because it has a Sawyer.

Why is our fancy table like Wecohamet Lodge? Because it has an excellent heap, (Heap.)

Why is Olive Branch Lodge like a Scotchman with an apron on? Because it has a Mac-in-tire, (Macintire.)

REV. THEODORE PARKER delivers the oration before the literary societies of Waterville College, Me., at the Commencement in August next.

SPRING MUSINGS.

THE bland and beautiful Spring is again approaching, with all its train of dew and incense, and birds and flowers—with all its rich and abiding memories, stored away in the heart, till a gleam of sunshine, a breath of the zephyr, the twitter of the birds, the blue eye, perchance of the violet shall awaken them from their slumber, and breathe into them the vigor and life of olden times. There is an eloquence in the early voice of Spring, which thrills the heart and brings tears to the eyes; which awakens all sad, and all blissful thoughts; which makes us think of the friends of early life, and which irresistibly attracts us nearer and nearer to those of the present. But oh! more potent than Spring's deep, yet gentle voice, is the voice of Love: eloquent at all times and seasons: in the budding Spring, the fervid heat of Summer, among the bleak winds of Autumn, and the snow-covered mountains and valleys of Winter. There is an unfading and unfailing verdure in the heart, when Love, the divine, nestles, warms, and diffuses itself through every word and action to other hearts; when it speaks gently to the afflicted and erring children of earth, and entreats noble schemes for the amelioration of the human race. It has visited the dark cell of the criminal, and let in a flood of light and bliss; and has breathed in low, earnest tones that dear word, brother. The forms of Friendship, Love and Truth are everywhere, though often unperceived, and though often roughly denied a home in the heart. Not that sickly sentimentality disguised under the name of friendship; not that cunning hypocrisy which enrobes itself in the vestments of truth; not that selfish passion which dignifies itself with the name of love. Ah, no; Love, pure and abiding; Truth, firm and unchangeable; and Friendship, deep and perpetual, are still the heritage of mortals; making green and luxuriant the moral desert of earth, and ripening the flowers and foliage of the heart for the garden of the "better land." May they ever abide with us, above the din and storm of battles, and the confusion of revolutions and changes. May they cheer the night-laborers of the student, illuminate the studio of the artist, gild the work-shop of the artisan, and shed a ray of divine effulgence in many homes, where poverty and unrequited labor have sickened the heart and made life a weariness; for "The poor have but few friends,

But oh! they love the better far
The few our Father sends."

And when the ministrations of Friendship, Love and Truth shall be ended here on earth, there is a bright home from whence they emanated, where they shall ever flourish in immortal verdure, where death, pain and sorrow cannot intrude to mar the holy anthems of joy and gladness, flowing from the lips of the ransomed and blessed. LOUISA.
MILLINGTON, CONN.

GOLD STORIES.—The Tribune has a couple of new letters, though of old date, from California, which are more extravagant in their descriptions of the richness of the gold diggings than any that have before appeared. In one locality the precious metal is said to be "so abundant that there is no necessity for washing the earth; $700 per day being the amount obtained by each man." We wonder some of the precious stuff does not reach the Atlantic, where it is so much needed!

THE IRIS.—This journal, we perceive, has been much enlarged and improved. It looks as if it were in the enjoyment of very excellent health. Wm. Stuart, Esq., is Editor. He is a gentleman whom we well know, having formerly been associated with the editorial department of the Gazette of the Union. He is an able and ready writer, and will no doubt make his sheet interesting.

GEN. SHIELDS.—The Senate have decided that Gen. Shields is ineligible to a seat in that body, not having been a citizen the Constitutional period.

THE ORDER OF THE S. OF T. AND THE SECRET PRINCIPLE.

WE have before us an address upon this subject, delivered before a Lodge at the West. It contains many thoughts worthy of consideration. We are a Son of Temperance, and love the Order; but we do believe that it needs many additions, in the way of ceremonial interest, to give it permanency and efficiency.

"In passing at once to my subject, I cannot deem it necessary that I should give in detail to such an audience as this, the minutiae of that Order's history. They are matters of record—some of which are but too plainly and deeply written upon the hearts of many of its members. It is sufficient to say, that the repeated efforts which the philanthropy of the preceding as well as the present age, had suggested as a remedy for a most vicious and ruinous custom, had failed, and in their failure the producing cause thereto, was finally disclosed. The fact was at last made manifest, that those efforts—wise, and pure and good, as they certainly were—were of no effect, because of the absence of all restraining influence that was tangible, effective and continuous in its character upon the mind of the inebriate after he was made to see the danger with which he was threatened. They saw that something more was needed than to probe the festering wound, and lay its soreness open to the gaze of the world—a balsam was necessary which should close the wounded part, and restore it at once, effectually, to health and to vigor. They discovered that they not only had to call the attention of the suffering wretch to the sword suspended over him by a hair, but had also to teach him how he might avoid the dreadful death to which the slightest indiscretion on his part, would inevitably doom him.

"Desponding, but not disheartened by these repeated failures, the more active friends to the cause still hoped yet to find a plan which would meet the full measure of their wishes, and in casting about for this purpose, their attention was arrested by the time-honored and revered institutions of Odd-Fellowship and Free-Masonry. Familiar, as they doubtless were, with the workings of these two handmaids to religion—appreciating the admirable harmony and beauty of their workings—venerating them for the sublime and beautiful lessons of charity which they each impress upon the minds of their members—recollecting the clearness and certainty of the means of mutual recognition entrusted to all within their folds, and keeping in mind the material fact, that the elect had a positive and unquestionable guarantee of assistance in the hour of his necessities, it was at once determined to institute a third institution which should contain some features in common with those two, but sufficiently dissimilar in all its chief features to protect themselves from the charge of improperly exposing the trusts reposed in them. This was done, and the "Order of the Sons of Temperance" was formed. Yet this was not attained without its difficulties. In accomplishing this task, it became more necessary to exercise the greatest care and prudence, lest, on the one side, they should render themselves open to censure at the hands of these older Orders, while on the other hand there was great danger that they should incur the displeasure, and arouse the settled opposition of that portion of the community around them, (then forming a decided majority of the more earnest and influential friends to the cause in that region,) who were hostile to everything approximating to the character of a secret society. It was under these circumstances that the present workings of the Order were established; and we find in them a sufficient excuse for the manifold errors and imperfections with which we, who are without the influence of those crude and pur-blind prejudices, feel it is justly chargeable. The fact that the workings of the Order need remodeling, is now, I believe, generally conceded; and a disposition, but only a disposition to that effect has recently been manifested in a section from which we were least prepared to expect it. I allude to the Eastern States.

"The two chief imperfections, and, indeed, the only two, in the workings of the Order, whence all the evils under which we labor originate, are the absence of Degrees, and the want of proper Grips, Signs and Tokens, which would enable the member to make himself known as such at any and every point—in any, and under every circumstance, night or day. To the initiated within this room, these imperfections must have been felt most grievously. With me, there does not rest a doubt, but that when these features shall have been grafted on the Order, we shall witness a state of affairs totally unlike that which surrounds us at present. Instead of the meager and lifeless quorums, which we have difficulty in assembling now, our Division Rooms will regularly be filled with members—in lieu of our empty and impoverished purses, our Treasury will be full to overflowing—instead of promises to the elect which are now but as sounding brass and tinkling symbols, we shall be prepared to extend ready and effective relief, both pecuniary and social, to all who need it—and better still—instead of that bitter and heartless system of vituperation and slander with which the Order is now disgraced, we shall find a broad and deep current of fraternal love, running along the whole line of the Order, which will link heart to heart in chains of steel so strong that we may laugh to scorn the strongest efforts of the enemy to break it. Nor is this all. The chief effect will be felt in the elevated character which will be given to the Order, and thus the sphere of usefulness will be extended a thousand fold. The "Order of the Sons of Temperance" will cease to be an asylum for worn-out drunkards, and will take rank, side by side, with that of the Odd-Fellows and the Masons—both of which are known to demand the respect and confidence even of those who are most bitterly opposed to them.

And who is there, I ask, that can estimate in advance, the incalculable amount of good which this simple change in its character will effect? Does any one doubt—dare any one attempt to cheat himself into the belief, that the stigma—I love strong words—the stigma, I say, which attaches itself to the Order, has not kept from its folds many of the best and valuable members of society around us—has palsied its influence with that very class for whose benefit it seems to have been peculiarly and purposely designed? How many of your acquaintances—young men just ripening into usefulness, and whose characters for good or for evil are now—even now, while I am speaking—being molded for life, are there, who would be happy co-workers with you this night, were it not for the fact, that they are unwilling to incur the imputation that this pledge is necessary to save them from ruin! It may be that the fact has escaped your attention, but I tell you it requires no small effort of moral courage for a young man thus to place himself before the public as a mark for carping innuendo and remark. I grant you that this is all wrong, and that an act is either good or bad of itself and in itself, irrespective of any—whatever opinion the public, as such, may place upon it. Highly as we may appreciate the opinion of the world around us, and willing, as we may be, to bow in submission to its judgments, yet we must not forget that man is fallible, and that we are permitted a more elevated and impassioned tribunal before which the relative merits of vice and virtue may be tested. Yet we must bear in mind, that he who confines himself to his single social glass of wine, is not a whit less sensitive or jealous on that score, than the more thorough drinker, who is always more or less under the influence of his cups. They are alike jealous, sensitive and irritable—each requiring that his prejudices should be respected, else, all chance for saving him is gone. It is with such that this prejudice has such deadly weight, and it is for the sake of such that the Order owes it to itself, that this prejudice should be removed."

GRAND LODGE OF NEW YORK.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON BY-LAWS.

THE Committee on By-Laws recommend dividing the State in Districts, as below. The amendment will be acted upon at the next meeting of the G. L.

To the R. W. Grand Lodge of New York:

GAMBLING IN NEW YORK.—The "Scorpion" of last week, a spirited and stinging paper, conducted by our neighbor, C. G. Graham, contains an account of not less than ten of those haunts of satan, where so many of our young men are dishonored and destroyed. We hope the Scorpion will go on chastising and scorching these villains who keep such places, and that all the press will join in the holy war, until they are exterminated from the face of the earth they have cursed too long.

CON. CREGAN, THE IRISH GIL BLAS. No. 1. London: W. S. Orr & Co. This is the first part of a new serial tale, with an amount of fun and humor, which bespeaks it a true product of the Green Isle; and we may add, entitles it to the use of the second portion of the respectable name we find on the title-page. As a specimen of the author's powers in description, we take this droll account of the personation of a dead man, in order to get a will framed, suited to the wishes of a rascally son:

CON. CREGAN'S LAST BEQUEST.—I think I see the whole scene this instant before my eyes, as I sat on a little widow with one pane, and that a broken one, and surveyed the proceedings. It was a large room, at one end of which was a bed, and beside it a table, with physic bottles and spoons, and tea-cups; and a little further off was another table, at which sat Billy Scanlan, with all manner of writing materials before him. The country people sat two, sometimes three-deep, around the walls, all intently eager and anxious for the coming event. Peter himself went from place to place, trying to smother his grief, and occasionally helping the company to whiskey, which was supplied with more than accustomed liberality. A low, faint cough, from the dark corner where the bed stood, seemed to cause even a deeper stillness; and then in a silence, where the buzzing of a fly would have been heard, my father said: "Where's Billy Scanlan? I want to make my will." "He's here, father," said Peter, taking Billy by the hand and leading him to the bedside. "Write what I bid ye, Billy, and be quick, for I hav'n't a long time afore me here. I die a good Catholic, though father O'Rafferty won't give me the rites." A general chorus of muttered "Oh! musha, musha," was now heard through the room; but whether in grief over the sad fate of the dying man, or the unflinching severity of the priest, it is hard to say. "I die in peace with all my neighbors, and all mankind." Another chorus of the company seemed to approve these charitable expressions. "I bequeath unto my son Peter the whole of my two farms of Killmucknoony and Knocksheboora, with the fallow meadow behind Lynch's house; the forge, and the right of turf on the Dooran bog. I give him, and much good may it do him, Lanty Ca-sarn's acre and the Luary field, with the lime-kiln; and that reminds me that my mouth is just as dry; let me taste what ye have in the jug." Here the dying man took a very heavy pull, and seemed considerably refreshed by it. "Where was I, Billy Scanlan?" says he. "Oh, I remember, at the lime-kiln; I leave him—that's Peter, I mean—the two potatoe gardens at Noonan's Well; and it is the elegant fine crop grows there." "An't you gettin' wake, father darlin'?" said Peter, who began to be afraid of my father's loquaciousness; for, to say the truth, the punch got into his head, and he was greatly disposed to talk. "I am, Peter, my son," says he, "I am gettin' wake; just touch my lips again with the jug. Ah, Peter, Peter, you watered the drink!" "No, indeed, father, but its taste its leavin' you," says Peter; and again a low chorus of compassionate pity murmured through the cabin. "Well, I'm nearly done now," says my father, "there's only one little plot of ground remaining—and I put it on you, Peter—as ye wish to live a good man, and die with the same easy heart as I do now—that ye mind my last words to ye here. Are ye listening? Are the neighbors listening? Is Billy Scanlan listening?" "Yes, sir. Yes, father, we're all minding," chorused the audience. "Well, then, its my last will and testament, and may—give me over the jug"—here he took a long drink—"and may this blessed liquor poison me if I'm not as eager about this as every other part of my will; I say, then, I bequeath the little plot at the cross-roads to poor Con. Cregan; for he has a heavy charge, and is as honest and hard-working a man as I ever knew. Be a friend to him, Peter, dear; never let him want while ye have it yourself; think of me on my death-bed whenever he asks ye for any trifle. Is it down Billy Scanlan? the two acres at the cross to Con. Cregan and his heirs in secla sectorum. Ah, blessed be the saints, but I feel my heart lighter after that," says he, "a good work makes an easy conscience; and now I'll drink all the company's good health, and many happy returns—" What he was going to add there's no saying; but Peter, who was terribly frightened at the lively tone the sick man was assuming, hurried all the people away into another room, to let his father die in peace. When they were all gone, Peter slipped back to my father who was putting on his brogues in a corner: "Con," says he, "ye did it all well, but sure that was a joke about the two acres at the cross." "Of course it was, Peter," says he; "sure it was all a joke for the matter of that; won't I make the neighbors laugh hearty to-morrow, when I tell them all about it?" "Ye wouldn't be mean enough to betray me," says Peter, trembling with fright. "Sure ye wouldn't be mean enough to go against your father's dying words?" says my father: "the last sentence ever he spoke;" and here he gave a low, wicked laugh, that made myself shake with fear. "Very well, Con.," says Peter, holding out his hand, "a bargain's a bargain, yer a deep fellow, that's all," and so it ended; and my father slipped quietly home over the bog, mighty well satisfied with the legacy he left himself. And thus we became the owners of the little spot known to this day as Con's Acre.

THE STEAMER CRESCENT CITY sailed for Chagres on the 18th inst., with 347 passengers. Among them were Mrs. Capt. J. C. Fremont.

METEOR.—A remarkable meteor exploded at Baton Rouge, La., on the 24th ult. The noise shook the houses and alarmed the citizens. It was very brilliant.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH MONOPOLY.—Judge Cranch of Washington has decided against Morse's monopoly, and in favor of the right of Bain to a patent for his system of telegraphing.

THE GOLD MANIA.—"Turn again, Whittington." Poor Dick, when he left his native village, expecting to find the streets of London paved with gold, did not make such a grievous blunder as his countrymen who are now shipping themselves for California under the influence of a kindred hallucination. For Dick came to a place where, even in his own day, there were cook-shops and wine-vaults for such as had money, and rich merchants with shoes to clean, from whom scraps of meat and the shelter of a roof might be earned, though accompanied by the drawback of cross words and fisticuffs from crabbed old Cicely, the cook. Our modern Whittingtons will find nothing of the kind in California. We will not belie the country: it is healthy enough; "barren; beggars all; marry good air." But men cannot live on a wholesome atmosphere alone; they require shelter from the night dews, and food to eat. And in both these indispensable, more especially the last, the modern El Dorado is scandalously ill-provided. The true and only way of getting a share of the California gold is to stay at home and make the articles which those who gather it must buy with it. We may, and most likely will, miss the gold if we go in search of it; but if we remain at home, and work steadily and honestly, the gold is sure to come to us.—[English Paper.]

REMARKABLE TRACE OF ANTIQUITY.—The perfect skeleton of an Indian woman was found last Wednesday afternoon in the sand-bank excavation adjoining Niagara River, immediately back of Major Whitney's new residence. We understand that it rested in a sitting posture with its head facing the North, (true Indian style,) about four feet below the surface. Immediately above grew a large hickory, two feet in diameter, at least 200 years old, whose huge roots encircled the skeleton on every side. Owing to the frost in the sand, and the number of roots to be removed, it was obtained with great difficulty. Rumor says Indian relics were found with it.—[Niagara Falls Iris.]

NO LICENSE IN VERMONT.—The people of Vermont have determined that no licenses to sell liquor shall be issued in that State for the year to come. Last year they voted just the other way. The returns have not yet been all received, but the No License majority will not be less than 10,000 or 12,000. Twenty towns give 3000.

It is stated that three millions of bushels of wheat will be at Chicago at the opening of navigation, ready to go forward from Lake Michigan.

Gold and silver mines, said to yield from 75 to 80 per cent. have been discovered in Benton county, Tenn.

In the New Jersey Legislature a supplement to the act regulating the practice of the law, has passed the House, the principal feature of which is, that parties in a suit may call upon their adversaries in the same suit to give testimony.

A lead mine yielding ninety per cent. pure ore, has been discovered at Moose Head Lake, Me.

In Montreal, Ca., during the year 1848 there were 424 marriages, 2282 baptisms, and 1,661 burials.

There were 576 marriages in Cuyahoga county, Ohio, during the year 1848.

A bill before the Ohio Legislature, to annex Mill Creek township to the city of Cincinnati was lost on the 28 ult.

CONSOLATIONS IN AFFLICTION.

THOUGH bitter tears and frightful woes
My life for years assail:
Though friends desert, time yield me foes,
'Neath fate I'll never quail;
A day shall speed, a holy day,
With peace my soul to calm,
To Heaven's high portal point the way,
Diffuse the sacred balm.

Delight to sorrow soon succeeds,
In this all-priceless hour;
No more the heart in torment bleeds,
Afflictions lose their power:
How sweetly shines this clinging hope,
Of consolation's aid;
When virtues with temptations cope,
The latter fly dismayed.

Why then despond, thou weeping man?
Hath Heaven no charms for thee?
Hope on, hope on, life's shortest span
From trouble ne'er was free:
Bright joys await thee, should'st thou bear,
In peace all evils here—
Wan misery afflicts not THERE,
Nor ills, nor pains appear.

CREATION.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY J. WATSON DUNHAM.

THE creation of this planet on which we live, and the others composing our solar system, will ever afford subjects for sublime contemplation. How interesting is the formation of the earth to every student of nature; and how many questions naturally occur to the mind in viewing the curious machinery of the universe.

For information upon this subject in vain do we examine the works of Philosophy, or the pages of Science. Time, the volume of inspiration, sheds a faint light upon this subject; but, with this exception, we are left to gather our information from the book of Nature, as it appears written by the pencil of God, in the brilliant sparkling of the distant stars, the pale glimmering of the moon, and the splendor of the midday sun.

From whence came this planet on which we tread; and on which millions of animate beings dwell? To this interrogation sages are silent, and our imagination can only make a reply. Sacred history informs us, that previous to the separation of the land from the water, all was in disorder, and wild confusion reigned. There was no sun to cheer the face of Nature, and vanish the surrounding gloom; but amid the apparent wreck of all things, the Great First Cause moved in silent, solemn stillness, determining in His own infinite wisdom the proper arrangement of the different planets, and laying the deep foundation of worlds. By the volition of that invisible agency the sun is placed in the distant space, blazing forth in all his glory, and by the cheering influence of his rays, penetrating even to this part of the creation, driving back the black darkness and damp vapors, which chaos had occasioned.

Magnificent must that moment have been when light was first created—quicker than the vivid lightning's course it traversed the wide space around, proclaiming to the powers of darkness, that the period of their universal sway was at an end. At a change so sudden, that the cherubim and seraphim nearest the eternal throne, must have looked with wonder and admiration at that Omnipotent Being, who spake and it was done; who commanded and it stood fast; and if the leader of the fallen angels then cherished the spirit of rebellion against the God of heaven, he must have trembled with fear in view of that power which could turn darkness into light, and from nothing create a world.

But the work of creation was not yet finished; the sun from its aerial throne looked upon the face of the globe, and saw the deep waters roll their muddy waves. An invisible agency formed the dry land, and covered the face of the earth with verdure. The firmament is spread out like a curtain; the stars are made and suspended as lamps in the upper region, to dispel the gloom of midnight, to cheer the benighted traveler. The waters are filled with fish, and the land covered with animals. Here it would seem as though Jehovah paused, while He might view the work of His hands; and after surveying matters, animate and inanimate, He pronounced it good; yet, amid all that was created nothing yet bore the image of the Almighty, or resembled His likeness. Then it was that He determined to make man—to impart to him a soul that should never die, but survive all other things created, and outlive the final conflagration of the universe. At this eventful period man took the place assigned him by his Creator, superior to all else created, and inferior only to his Creator. To have dominion over the fish of the sea, the birds that fly in the air, and the cattle that feed on a thousand hills. The earth began to turn upon its axis, and perform its revolutions around the sun; thus giving day and night and all the seasons of its annual round, with that regularity and order which the Great First Cause had designed. Then the morning stars sang together, and the sons of God shouted for joy, while Jehovah, from the circle of heaven, looked with complacency upon all the works of His hands. All things animate united together in acts of adoration and songs of praise to their Creator. Man in the Garden of Eden drank of every pleasure that angels taste; walked on the banks of living water, sat beneath the refreshing shades, and was fanned by the heavenly breezes. From that time to the present these subjects have afforded themes for delightful contemplation, and although our knowledge of them is vague, yet our imagination

"Loves to rove at the setting sun,
And view the planets as they run;
To gaze upon the orbs above,
And feel and know that God is Love!"

SCHENECTADY, March 6th, 1849.

THE CONSCIENTIOUS YOUTH.—There is no moral object so beautiful to me as a conscientious young man. I watch him as a star in the heavens; clouds may be before him, but we know that his light is behind them, and will beam again; the blaze of others' popularity may outshine him, but we know that though not seen he illuminates his own true sphere. He resists temptation not without a struggle for that is not a virtue; he hears the sarcasm of the profligate, and it stings him, for it is the trial of virtue, but he heals the wound with his own pure touch. He heeds not the watchword of fashion, it leads to sin; the atheist, who says not only with his heart but with his lips, "there is no God," controls him not; he sees the hand of a creating God, and rejoices in it.

Woman is sheltered by fond arms and loving council; old age is protected by its experience, and manhood by its strength; but the young man stands amid the temptations of the world like a self-balanced tower. Happy indeed is he who seeks and gains the prop and shelter of morality.

Onward, then, conscientious youth! raise thy standard and nerve thy goodness. If God has given thee intellectual power, awaken in that cause; never let it be said of thee, he helped to swell the tide of sin by pouring his influence into its channels. If thou art feeble in mental strength throw not that drop into a polluted current. Awake, arise, young man—assume the beautiful garb of virtue! It is fearfully easy to sin; it is difficult to be pure and holy. Put on thy strength, then, let truth be the lady of thy love—defend her!

THE FREE WILL OF MAN.—Let any man dive into his own heart, and observe himself with attention. If he have the power to look, and the will to see, he will behold, with a sort of terror, the incessant war waged by the good and evil dispositions within him—reason and caprice, duty and passion; in short, to call them all by their comprehensive names, good and evil. We contemplate with anxiety the outward troubles and vicissitudes of human life; but what should we feel if we could behold the inward vicissitudes, the troubles of the human soul? If we could see how many dangers, snares, enemies, combats, victories, and defeats, can be crowded into a day—an hour? I do not say this to discourage man, nor to humble or undervalue his free will. He is called upon to conquer in the battle of life, and the honor of the conquest belongs to his free will. But victory is impossible and defeat certain, if he has not a just conception and a profound feeling of his dangers, his weaknesses, and his need of assistance. To believe that the free will of man tends to good, and is of itself sufficient to accomplish good, betrays an immeasurable ignorance of his nature. It is the error of pride; an error which tends to destroy both moral and political order; which enfeebles the government of communities no less than the government of the inward man.—[Democracy in France, by M. Guizot.]

DR. MILLER, Senior Professor in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, has announced his intention to resign that important post at the next meeting of the Presbyterian General Assembly. Advanced age is probably the cause which prompted him to this step.

GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE.

THE ORGAN OF THE ORDER,
Published under the auspices of the M. W. Grand Sir!

It will contain, from week to week, the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of the State of New-York, and also of other States; accounts of Celebrations, Institutions of new Lodges, and occasionally, a complete Directory of all the Lodges in the Union.

Its Literary department will be filled with Original Tales of the highest excellence, prepared by the most eminent writers in our country—Popular Tales; Choice Miscellany; the rarest Gems of Poetry from the English Poets; Sketches of Travel; Anecdotes, &c., &c.; and occasionally illustrated with beautiful Wood Engravings. Being equal in its Literary character to any Weekly in the country, and being thus perfect in its Odd-Fellowship department, it will be worthy of a place on the table of every brother of the Order.

The Gazette and Rule is published every Saturday, at 44 Ann-street, New-York, by Bro. J. R. CRAMPTON, and is under the Editorial Superintendence of Rev. Bro. AUG. C. L. ARNOLD, P. C. P.

¶ All Communications should be addressed to J. R. CRAMPTON, 44 Ann-street, New-York.

¶ We hope our Traveling Agents will be punctual in making returns to us every week, and not compel us to notice any one individually.

GOURAUD'S LIBRARY OF ROMANCE.

JULIA WRIGHT—CANTO III.

The brow of Julia Wright was most commanding, Though dark; like Pallas' it was broad and high. Telemachus, when on Calypso landing, Could not have seen such brow without a sigh! 'Tis strange that, speaking of her understanding, My thoughts glide to her foot—I know not why; That petite foot, by sailors called a "clipper," To small for even Cinderella's slipper!

It may be asked, why, if Julia had such a dark skin, she did not use GOURAUD'S Italian Medicated Soap, which, it is well known, will remove Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Saltiness, Ringworm, or any other skin deformity? For an answer to this query, the reader is referred to the sequel. GOURAUD'S Poudres Subtiles will infallibly eradicate superfluous hair from any part of the frame. GOURAUD'S Grecian Hair Dye has the singular property of changing the color of red, light or gray hair to a magnificent black. GOURAUD'S Liquid Rouge imparts a permanent rose tint to pale cheeks.

Dr. GOURAUD'S renowned preparations can only be procured genuine at his depot, 67 Walker-street, 1st storey FROM Broadway. Boston, Bates & Jordan, 129 Washington-st. [To be continued.]

Is the best article for the hair in use. The following speaks for itself. A letter from the Rev. Mr. Chapman, Sandwich, Mass., late of the "Olive Branch."

Boston, April 6th, 1846—Mr. Bogle—Sir: I consider it a duty I owe you as well as to those who may be troubled with their hair and head as I have been, to acknowledge the efficacy of your Hyperion Fluid, by the use of which I have derived so much benefit. For twelve years I was troubled with a disease on the head, the skin of which was covered with a thick coat of scaly humor, (or dandruff in its worst form,) which entirely covered the pores of the skin, caused severe headache, and entirely unfitted me for study; my hair also grew dry and dead, and at last began to turn bald and gray; to cure which I tried all the advertised articles of the day, (and their name is legion) without deriving any benefit. I heard of your Hyperion Fluid, and although it was highly praised by those who had used it, yet I was afraid it was but another humbug of the day, but was induced by you to give it a trial upon the system of no cure no pay; and I am glad to say it has entirely succeeded. The skin of my head is now clear from humor or dandruff, my hair is daily growing thicker, and is in a fine healthy state. It is therefore with the utmost confidence I recommend your Hyperion Fluid to be all you represent it. I am, yours truly,

SAMUEL CHAPMAN.

THE NEW-YORK SUN'S ART UNION!

A SPLENDID ENGRAVING, AND

THE NEW-YORK WEEKLY SUN one Year for One Dollar, besides One Thousand Magnificent Prizes distributed among those who subscribe.—BEACH, BROTHERS, Publishers of the Weekly Sun, as a testimonial of their appreciation of the vast and rapidly increasing patronage bestowed upon that Dollar Newspaper, will make a gratuitous present of a large and elegant full length engraving, beautifully printed on fine paper, of General Zachary Taylor, President of the United States, to every subscriber, (whether a new one or one who renews an old subscription,) whose name is entered upon the subscription books between the first day of January, 1849, and January, 1850. They will also distribute among the subscribers ONE THOUSAND PRIZES, varying in value from $25 to $1—the total value amounting to two thousand dollars! The very great expense attendant on this liberal distribution of prizes and splendid Portraits of President Taylor, in full military uniform, &c., renders it imperatively necessary that only one name should be entered for each dollar sent. Those who subscribe in clubs will please designate the names of such as are to be entered upon the books as candidates for the prizes, &c.

THE ONE THOUSAND PRIZES

To be distributed among the subscribers to the Weekly Sun, will comprise a rich selection of costly and valuable works in the several departments of Literature, History, Biography, Voyages, and Travels, Domestic and Moral Economy, Essays, Belles Lettres, &c., including most of the well known publications of Harper and Brothers.

Those who draw prizes will have the privilege of making their own selections from the catalogue which is furnished to each subscriber. To insure the fullest advantages of the above prize distribution, subscribers should send in the amount of their subscriptions without delay, as the names are registered in rotation, and those first in order will be entitled to the early impressions of the engravings of General Taylor, &c.

For a more detailed account of the above plan, the reader is referred to the Extra Sun's Art Union, which may be obtained free of charge by any person addressing (postpaid) the proprietors.

THE NEW-YORK WEEKLY SUN

is the best as well as the cheapest family newspaper ever presented to the American public.

In addition to its usual features of interest, beautiful Engravings, &c., the Weekly Sun for 1849 will be enriched by a succession of written by eminent American authors expressly for this paper, for the premiums of $250.

The subscription price being

any person may receive a copy, at any time, by sending the direction and enclosing the money by mail. (Postmasters will frank the letters.)

CLUB SUBSCRIPTIONS, when sent to one address, are received at the following rates: Five copies for $4—eleven copies for $8—twenty-five for $18—and seventy-five copies for $50. When an order is sent for copies requiring them to be forwarded to more than one address, one dollar will be charged for each subscription.

Letters and Communications (always postpaid,) should be addressed to BEACH, BROTHERS, Sun Establishment, New York.

BOLESTIC MEDICAL AND SURGICAL OFFICE.

No. 127 Chambers-st., New-York.

I. ALL CASES OF DISEASE in any part of the HUMAN SYSTEM, INTERNAL or EXTERNAL, whether in MEN, WOMEN or CHILDREN, will be EXAMINED, and COUNSEL or ADVICE given freely to all, by the Physicians in attendance.

WITHOUT CHARGE.

II. Patients will find our EXAMINATIONS, and the mode by which we arrive at a knowledge of their diseases—as also our TREATMENT, unlike those of any others which they may have heretofore known or tried.

III. Our REMEDIES or TREATMENT will be found the most pleasant, safe, simple, and efficacious that can be used. No confinement to the sick room—no hindrance from business,—no danger from colds,—and no injury to the constitution,—but, on the contrary, IMPROVEMENT at once.

IV. All the Medicines we prescribe are made in our own CHEMICAL LABORATORY, as we cannot rely on the Drugs sold in the shops, in consequence of almost universal ADULTERATIONS. Our remedies being prepared in the most pure and concentrated form, but little is used or needed to cure the worst cases.

V. We claim, by our UNUSUAL SUCCESS, to be masters over all curable diseases—particularly in all SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS—the DISEASES PECULIAR TO WOMEN—the HEREDITARY DISEASES OF CHILDREN—and all those most HOPELESS and DESPERATE cases in male or female which have defeated the best efforts of the most distinguished medical practitioners, as the more than ten thousand cases, whom we have successfully treated, can testify.

VI. THOSE DISEASES which are almost invariably treated in the first stage with Balsam of Copiava, Capsules, Cubes,—with injections of solutions of Nitrate of Silver, Borax, Alum, Sugar of Lead, Sulphate of Zinc,—with Bougies, Catheters, and Caustics—and in the second stage with Yellow or Black Washes, Blue or Mercurial Ointment, Blue Stone or Lunar Caustic, externally—and with Calomel, Blue Pill, Red Precipitate, Corrosive Sublimate, Hydriodate of Potassa, Sarsaparilla Syrup, and other like cheats and slops, internally—we say before Heaven and Earth what we know and can demonstrate by hundreds of cases, that by such treatment and means these diseases have never, and can never, be healed—they deceive the patient, disguise the disease by driving it into the system to other and more important parts,—they produce Strictures; Abscesses in the Kidneys; Piles; Fistulas; Catarrhs; Gravel; Diseases of the Eyes; Loss of Hair and Hearing; Rheumatic Pains; Decay of the Flesh and Bones; Ulcers in the Limbs, Throat, Head, Neck, Nose and Palate; Disease of the Liver and Stomach; with CONSUMPTION OF THE LUNGS, or WHOLE SYSTEM; and thus render either the whole life of the patient miserable, or hurry him to a premature grave.

Without using any of the above named Quackish, Swindling and Murderous Remedies, we PROMISE to every case we treat a PERMANENT and RADICAL cure FOR LIFE, by a very simple medicine, which is without taste or smell, which neither purges nor vomits, nor hinders from business, nor exposes the patient in any way whatever. Testimonials to these Facts we can furnish from persons who were carried out of the Broadway Hospital to die as hopeless cases, and many others of like character, whom we have cured.

VII. FISTULAS cured invariably WITHOUT AN OPERATION. Of the hundreds of cases of this disease which we have known, we have never seen one which had been cured with cutting with the knife—though nearly all had been cut once, twice, or more times. Cutting never cured a case—it is false, delusive and cruel. References will be given to cases in this city which have been successfully treated of the most terrible forms of Fistula ever known.

VIII. Cases of SURGERY, MIDWIFERY and DENTISTRY attended to in all their departments—Tumors, Cancers, Dislocation, Fractures, Wounds, and Injuries of every kind, treated with safety and success.

IX. ALL DISEASES OF THE EYES and EARS treated without PAIN or PERIL, and with UNEQUALLED SUCCESS.

We invite all the afflicted, however hopeless their cases may appear, or whatever their disease may be, or however many physicians or remedies they may have tried, to put our knowledge and skill to the test in an examination of their case,—it will cost them nothing,—and then they will be prepared to know whether we can treat them successfully or not—for if we do not find, to their satisfaction, the cause or origin of all the difficulties in the case, we will own that the cure is not in our power, and hence put them to no expense. Most physicians treat symptoms—we go to the root, and thus succeed where others fail.

NEVER DESPAIR till you have given our Remedies and Treatment an honest trial.

Patients visited at their residences when required.

IN QUART BOTTLES,

For Purifying the Blood, and for the Cure of

SCROFULA, RHEUMATISM, STUBBORN ULCERS, DYSPEPSY, SALT RHEUM, FEVER SORES, ERYSIPELAS, PIMPLES, BILES, MERCURIAL DISEASES, CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS, LIVER COMPLAINT, BRONCHITIS, CONSUMPTION, FEMALE COMPLAINTS, LOSS OF APPETITE, GENERAL DEBILITY, &c.

THE PROPRIETORS having spent much time in bringing this preparation of SARSAPARILLA to its present state of perfection; and the experience of fourteen years has furnished them the most ample opportunity to study, in their various forms, the diseases for which it is recommended, and to adapt it exactly to their relief and cure. Patients who wish a really good Medicine are invited to give it a trial, and satisfy themselves of its superiority, and the invaluable property it possesses of arresting and curing disease. The bottle has been enlarged to hold one Quart, and in its present improved form may safely claim to be the best and cheapest medicine of the age. Its progress to the fame it has attained may be traced by a long line of facts and cures, that stand as landmarks and beacons for the invalid, pointing the way to the haven of health; and what it has already done for the thousands who have used it, it is capable of doing for the millions still suffering and struggling with disease. It purifies, cleanses, and strengthens the fountain springs of life, and infuses new vigor throughout the whole animal frame.

DYSPEPSY CURED.

The following testimonial, from a gentleman so well known as Mr. Cox, requires no comment, and recommends itself to all similarly afflicted. NEW-ORLEANS, Dec. 15, 1848.

Messrs. A. B. & D. SANDS—Gentlemen: Having experienced the most beneficial effects from the use of your Sarsaparilla, it gives me pleasure to add my testimony to the numerous spontaneous effusions of grateful hearts which you continually are receiving.

My case was dyspeptic, or rather I may term it a weakness of the digestive organs. For more than a year, I was troubled with wind upon my stomach and its frequent eructation, together with producing a spasmodic contraction of the heart, often gave me much annoyance. After trying various remedies without avail, I commenced with your Sarsaparilla. Before I had used half a bottle, almost every symptom of this disagreeable complaint had vanished, and in a few weeks its continued use effected a complete cure. I therefore confidently recommend it to all persons affected in the same manner, and have reason to believe that many who are suffering under a supposed disease of the heart, if they would take your Sarsaparilla, in a few weeks would find themselves restored to health in both mind and body. I remain yours, very truly,

JOHN V. COX, 93 Lexington Avenue.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA IN PRUSSIA.

The Proprietors of this valuable Medicine have just received an order from our esteemed friend and correspondent, Theodore S. Fay, Secretary of Legation to the Court of Prussia, for the use of a member of the Royal Family—a copy of which we herewith lay before our readers.—[Home Journal. "U. S. LEGATION, BERLIN, Nov. 30, 1848.—Gentlemen: I wish you to send two dozen bottles of your Sarsaparilla, for the use of his Royal Highness Prince Waldimir of Prussia, to this Legation, as soon as possible. It is necessary that he should receive it immediately; therefore, please send it by first steamer. The bill can be made out in the name of the Prince, and sent with it. Your obedient servant,

"THEO. S. FAY."

SCROFULOUS AFFECTION OF THE EYES.

SOUTH KINGSTON, (R. I.) Oct. 11, 1847.—Messrs. SANDS—Gentlemen: My little daughter, when one year old, was attacked with a scrofulous humor on her face, which soon after extended into her eyes, causing almost total blindness in one of them, and disfiguring her whole face. I employed two physicians to attend her, who exhausted their utmost skill to give her relief, but it all proved useless, and finally one of them remarked to me that he had known of some striking cures effected by Sands' Sarsaparilla, and advised me to try it. I obtained one bottle, which she commenced using, and before it was all used up it had effected an entire cure. It is now over four years since she was cured, and there has been no reappearance of the disease, and we are satisfied that it is a perfect cure. It gives me great pleasure to add that I can recommend it to any sufferer from a similar complaint.

Respectfully yours,

GEORGE ROBINSON.

OLD Jacob Townsend, THE ORIGINAL OF THE TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA.

Old Dr. Townsend is now about 70 years of age, and has long been known as the AUTHOR and DISCOVERER of the GENUINE ORIGINAL "TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA." Being poor, he was compelled to limit its manufacture, by which means it has been kept out of market, and the sales circumscribed to those only who had proved its worth and known its value. It had reached the ears of many, nevertheless, as those persons who had been healed of sore diseases, and saved from death, proclaimed its excellence and wonderful HEALING POWERS.

Grand and Unequaled Preparation

is manufactured on the largest scale, and is called for throughout the length and breadth of the land.
 Unlike young S. P. Townsend's, it improves with age, and never changes, but for the better; because it is prepared on scientific principles by a scientific man. The highest knowledge of Chemistry, and the latest discoveries of the Art, have all been brought into requisition in the manufacture of the OLD DR. TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA. The Sarsaparilla root, it is well known, is the basis of many medicinal properties, and some properties which are inert or useless; and others, which, if retained in preparing it for use, produce fermentation and acid, which is injurious to the system. Some of the properties of Sarsaparilla are so volatile, that they entirely evaporate and are lost in the preparation, if they are not preserved by a scientific process, known only to those experienced in its manufacture. Moreover, these volatile principles, which fly off in vapor, or as an exhalation, under heat, are the very essential medical properties of the root, which give to it all its value. The

Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's Sarsaparilla

is so prepared, that all the inert properties of the Sarsaparilla root are first removed, every thing capable of becoming acid or of fermentation, is extracted and rejected; then every particle of medical virtue is secured in a pure and concentrated form; and thus it is rendered incapable of losing any of its valuable and healing properties. Prepared in this way, it is made the most powerful agent in the

Cure of Innumerable Diseases.

Hence the reason why he has commendations on every side in its favor by men, women, and children. We find it doing wonders in the cure of CONSUMPTION, DYSPEPSIA, and LIVER COMPLAINT, and in RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA, and PILES, GOUT, and OBSTINATE CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, and all affections arising from

Impurity of the Blood.

It possesses a marvellous efficacy in all complaints arising from Indigestion, from Acidity of the Stomach; from unequal circulation, determination of blood to the head, palpitation of the heart, cold feet and cold hands, cold limbs and hot flashes over the body. It has not had its equal in scouring the system, and promotes easy expectation, and gentle perspiration, relaxing the bowels, the lungs, throat, and every other part. But in nothing is its excellence more manifestly seen and acknowledged than in all kinds and stages of

Female Complaints.

It works wonders in cases of fluor albus or whites, Falling of the Womb, Obstructed, Suppressed, or Painful Menstruation, irregularity of the menstrual periods, and is effectual in curing all forms of the Kidney Disease.

By removing obstructions, and regulating the general system, it gives tone and strength to the whole body, and cures all forms of

and thus prevents or relieves a great variety of other diseases, as Spinal Irritation, Neuralgia, St. Vitus Dance, Swooning, Epileptic Fits, Convulsions, &c.

It is not possible for this medicine to fail to do good; it has nothing in it which can ever harm; it can never sour or spoil, and therefore, can never lose its curative properties. It cleanses the blood, excites the liver to healthy action, tones the stomach, and gives good digestion, relieves the bowels of torpor and constipation, allays inflammation, purifies the skin, equalizes the circulation of the blood, producing gentle warmth equally over the body, and the insensible perspiration; relaxes all strictures and tightness, removes all obstructions, and invigorates the entire nervous system. Is not this, then, the

The Medicine you Pre-eminently Need?

But can any of these things be said of S. P. Townsend's inferior article? This young man's liquid is not to be

Compared with the Old Dr.'s,

because of one GRAND FACT, that the one is INCAPABLE of DETE-RIORATION and

Never Spoils,

while the other DOES; it sours, ferments, and blows the bottles containing it into fragments; the sour, acid liquid exploding, and damaging those who use it. Must not this article composed of so poisonous to the system?

What! put acid into system already diseased with acid! What causes Dyspepsia but acid? Do we not all know, that when food sours in our stomachs, what mischief it produces?—flatulence, heartburn, palpitations of the heart, liver complaint, diarrhoea, dysentery, colic, and corruption of the blood! What is Scrofula but an acid humor in the body! What produces all the humors which bring on Eruptions of the Skin, Scald Head, Salt Rheum, Erysipelas, White Swellings, Fever-Sore, and all ulcerations, internal and external? It is nothing under heaven but an acid substance, which sours, and then spreads all the evils of the body, more or less. What causes Rheumatism, but a sour acid fluid, which infiltrates itself between the joints and elsewhere, irritating and inflaming the tender and delicate tissues upon which it acts? So of nervous diseases, of impurity of the blood, of deranged circulation, and nearly all the ailments which afflict human nature.

Now, is it not horrible to make and sell, and infinitely worse to use this

Souring, Fermenting, Acid "Compound"

OF S. P. TOWNSEND!

and yet he would fain have it understood that Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's GENUINE ORIGINAL SARSAPARILLA, is an IMITATION of his inferior preparation!!
 Heaven forbid that we should deal in an article which would bear the most distant resemblance to S. P. Townsend's article! and which should bring down upon the Old Dr. such a mountain load of complaints and criminalizations from Agents who were so credulous and purchasers who have used S. P. Townsend's FERMENTING COMPOUND.

We wish it understood, because it is the absolute truth, that S. P. Townsend's article and Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's Sarsaparilla are heaven-wide apart, and infinitely dissimilar; that they are unlike in every particular, but not one single thing in common.

As S. P. Townsend is no doctor, and never was, no chemist, no pharmacist—knows no more of medicine or disease than any other common, unscientific, unprofessional man, what guarantee can the public have that they are receiving a genuine scientific medicine, containing all the virtues of the article used in preparing it, and which are incapable of changes when might render them the AGENTS OF DISEASE instead of health!

It is to arrest frauds upon the unfortunate, to pour balm into wounded humanity, to kindle hope in the despairing bosom, to restore health and cheerfulness to the broken and broken heart, and to banish infirmity—that OLD DR. JACOB TOWNSEND HAS SOUGHT and FOUND the opportunity and means to bring his

within the reach, and to the knowledge of all who need it, that they may learn and know, by joyful experience, its

and thus to have the unexpressed satisfaction of having raised thousands and millions from the bed of sickness and misery to home, health, and a new life, vigor and usefulness to themselves, their families and friends.

SONG.

BY MRS. H. S. DE GROVE.

Why so fast? I prithee tell me.
"Love hath wings," the maid replied—
"And my grand-mama forbade me Flower-gathering on road-side."
Why so fast, my pretty maiden?
"Love hath wings, I've heard them say."
'Tis Irish love—In flying toward me,
Choosing just the backward way.
Why so fast, my darling Mary—
Mind you not your Jamie's tone?
Fear, that made the maiden wary,
Vanish'd as love's voice was known.

NIGHT.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY AUG. C. L. ARNOLD.

NIGHT, deep and black, came down on sea and land,
Cooling with dews the burning breath of day;
No sound was heard, save on the distant strand
The rhythmic dashing of the star-lit bay.
Sleep fell on all. Bright rose the World of Dreams!
Each wizzard sense played there its proper role,
The warrior still pursued his mighty schemes,
And lovers still confessed love's soft control;
Youth dreamed of sunny forms around it fitting;
The aged dreamed of noon-day splendors setting.

OH TIME! NOT SO FLEETLY.

A SONG.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY AUG. C. L. ARNOLD.

I.
OH TIME! not so fleetly, and you, rosy hours,
Suspend, now, your too rapid flight,
And leave us to gather love's beautiful flowers,
Till day descends into the night.

II.
"Fast! faster!" a crowd of unfortunates say,—
Roll on, then, for them, and begone;
Bear all their distresses and troubles away,
But leave us, the happy, alone.

III.
Love,—love,—let us love, then; the fugitive hour
Is passing,—it hastens! it flies!
One kiss,—a fond word,—one warm embrace more,
For day no more lightens the skies.

A Barrister's Experiences.

THE STOLEN WATCH.

A TALE OF THE MARCH ASSIZE.

SOMETHING more than half a century ago, a person, in going along Holborn, might have seen near the corner of one of the thoroughfares which diverge toward Russell Square, the respectable looking shop of a glover and haberdasher named James Harvey, a man generally esteemed by his neighbors, and who was usually considered well to do in the world. Like many London tradesmen, Harvey was originally from the country. He had come up to town when a poor lad to push his fortune, and by dint of steadiness and civility, and a small property left him by a distant relation, he had been able to get into business on his own account, and to attain that most important element of success in London—"a connection." Shortly after setting up in the world, he married a young woman from his native town, to whom he had been engaged ever since his school-days; and at the time our narrative commences, he was the father of three children.

James Harvey's establishment was one of the best frequented of its class in the street. You could never pass without seeing customers going in or out. There was evidently not a little business going forward. But although, to all appearance, a flourishing concern, the proprietor of the establishment was surprised to find that he was continually pinched in his circumstances. No matter what was the amount of business transacted over the counter, he never got any richer.

At the period referred to, shopkeeping had not attained that degree of organization, with regard to counter-men and cashiers, which now distinguishes the great houses of trade. The primitive till was not yet superseded. This was the weak point in Harvey's arrangements; and not to make a needless number of words about it, the poor man was regularly robbed by a shopman, whose dexterity in pitching a guinea into the drawer, so as to make it jump, unseen, with a jerk into his hand, was worthy of Herr Dobler, or any other master of the sublime art of jugglery.

Good-natured and unsuspecting, perhaps also not sufficiently vigilant, Harvey was long in discovering how he was pillaged. Cartwright, the name of the person who was preying on his employer, was not a young man. He was between forty and fifty years of age, and had been in various situations, where he had always given satisfaction, except on the score of being somewhat gay and somewhat irritable. Privately, he was a man of loose habits, and for years his extravagances had been paid for by property clandestinely abstracted from his too-confiding master. Slow to believe in the reality of such wickedness, Mr. Harvey could with difficulty entertain the suspicions which began to dawn on his mind. At length all doubt was at an end. He detected Cartwright in the very act of carrying off goods to a considerable amount. The man was tried at the Old Bailey for the offense; but through a technical informality in the indictment, was acquitted.

Unable to find employment, and with a character gone, the liberated thief became savage, revengeful, and desperate. Instead of imputing his fall to his own irregularities, he considered his late unfortunate employer as the cause of his ruin; and now he bent all the energies of his dark nature to destroy the reputation of the man whom he had betrayed and plundered. Of all the beings self-delivered to the rule of unscrupulous malignity, with whom it has been my fate to come professionally in contact, I never knew one so utterly fiendish as this discomfited pilferer. Frenzied with his imaginary wrongs, he formed the determination to labor, even if it were for years, to ruin his victim. Nothing short of death should divert him from this, the darling object of his existence.

Animated by these diabolical passions, Cartwright proceeded to his work. Harvey, he had too good reasons to know, was in debt to persons who had made him advances; and by means of artfully-concocted anonymous letters, evidently written by some one conversant with the matters on which he wrote, he succeeded in alarming the haberdasher's creditors. The consequences were—demands of immediate payment, and, in spite of the debtor's explanations and promises, writs, heavy law expenses, ruinous sacrifices, and ultimate bankruptcy. It may seem almost too marvelous for belief, but the story of this terrible revenge and its consequences is no fiction. Every incident in my narrative is true, and the whole may be found in hard outline in the records of the courts with which a few years ago I was familiar.

The humiliated and distressed feelings of Harvey and his family may be left to the imagination. When he found himself a ruined man, I dare say his mental sufferings were sufficiently acute. Yet he did not sit down in despair,

To re-establish himself in business in England appeared hopeless; but America presented itself as a scene where industry might find a reward; and by the kindness of some friends, he was enabled to make preparations to emigrate with his wife and children. Toward the end of February he quitted London for one of the great sea-ports, where he was to embark for Boston. On arriving there with his family, Mr. Harvey took up his abode at a principal hotel. This, in a man of straitened means, was doubtless imprudent; but he afterward attempted to explain the circumstance by saying, that as the ship in which he had engaged his passage was to sail on the day after his arrival, he had preferred incurring a slight additional expense rather than that his wife—who was now, with failing spirits, nursing an infant—should be exposed to coarse associations and personal discomfort. In the expectation, however, of being only one night in the hotel, Harvey was unfortunately disappointed. Ship-masters, especially those commanding emigrant vessels, were then, as now, habitual promise-breakers; and although each succeeding sun was to light them on their way, it was fully a fortnight before the ship stood out to sea. By that time a second and more dire reverse had occurred in the fortunes of the luckless Harvey.

Cartwright, whose appetite for vengeance was but whetted by his first success, had never lost sight of the movements of his victim; and now he had followed him to the place of his embarkation, with an eager but undefined purpose of working him some further and more deadly mischief. Stealthily he hovered about the house which sheltered the unconscious object of his malicious hate, plotting, as he afterward confessed, the wildest schemes for satiating his revenge. Several times he made excuses for calling at the hotel, in the hope of observing the nature of the premises, taking care, however, to avoid being seen by Mr. Harvey or his family. A fortnight passed away, and the day of departure of the emigrants arrived without the slightest opportunity occurring for the gratification of his purposes. The ship was leaving her berth; most of the passengers were on board; Mrs. Harvey and the children, with nearly the whole of their luggage, were already safely in the vessel; Mr. Harvey only remained on shore to purchase some trifling article, and to settle his bill at the hotel on removing his last trunk. Cartwright had tracked him all day; he could not attack him in the street; and he finally followed him to the hotel, in order to wreak his vengeance on him in his private apartment, of the situation of which he had informed himself.

Harvey entered the hotel first, and before Cartwright came up, he had gone down a passage into the bar to settle the bill which he had incurred for the last two days. Not aware of this circumstance, Cartwright, in the bustle which prevailed, went up stairs to Mr. Harvey's bed-room and parlor, in neither of which, to his surprise, did he find the occupant; and he turned away discomfited. Passing along toward the chief staircase, he perceived a room of which the door was open, and that on the table there lay a gold watch and appendages. Nobody was in the apartment; the gentleman who occupied it had only a few moments before gone to his bed-chamber for a brief space. Quick as lightning a diabolical thought flashed through the brain of the villain, who had been baffled in his original intentions. He recollected that he had seen a trunk in Harvey's room, and that the keys hung in the lock. An inconceivably short space of time served for him to seize the watch, to deposit it at the bottom of Harvey's trunk, and to quit the hotel by a back stair, which led by a short cut to the harbor. The whole transaction was done unperceived, and the wretch at least departed unnoticed.

Having finished his business at the bar, Mr. Harvey repaired to his room, locked his trunk, which, being of a small and handy size, he mounted on his shoulder, and proceeded to leave the house by the back stair, in order to get as quickly as possible to the vessel. Little recked he of the interruption which was to be presented to his departure. He had not got as far as the foot of the stair with his burden, when he was overtaken by a waiter, who declared that he was going to leave the house clandestinely without settling accounts. It is proper to mention that Mr. Harvey had incurred the enmity of this particular waiter in consequence of having, out of his slender resources, given him too small a gratuity on the occasion of paying a former bill, and not aware of the second bill being settled, the waiter was rather glad to have an opportunity of charging him with a fraudulent design. In vain Mr. Harvey remonstrated, saying he had paid for everything. The waiter would not believe his statement, and detained him "till he should hear better about it."

"Let me go, fellow; I insist upon it," said Mr. Harvey, burning with indignation. "I am already too late."

"Not a step, till I ask master if accounts are squared."

At this moment, while the altercation was at the hottest, a terrible ringing of bells was heard, and above stairs was a loud noise of voices, and of feet running to and fro. A chambermaid came hurriedly down the stair, exclaiming that some one had stolen a gold watch from No. 17, and that nobody ought to leave the house till it was found. The landlord also, moved by the hurricane which had been raised, made his appearance at the spot where Harvey had been interrupted in his exit.

"What on earth is all this noise about, John?" inquired the landlord of the waiter.

"Why, sir, I thought it rather strange for any gentleman to leave the house by the back way, carrying his own portmanteau, and so I was making a little breeze about it, fearing he had not paid his bill, when all of a sudden Sally rushes down stair and says as how No. 17 has missed his gold watch, and that no one should quit the hotel."

No. 17, an old, dry-looking military gentleman, in a particularly high passion, now showed himself on the scene, uttering terrible threats of legal proceedings against the house for the loss he had sustained.

Harvey was stupefied and indignant, yet he could hardly help smiling at the pother.

"What," said he, "have I to do with all this? I have paid for everything; I am surely entitled to go away if I like. Remember, that if I lose my passage to Boston, you shall answer for it."

"I very much regret detaining you, sir," replied the keeper of the hotel; "but you hear there has been a robbery committed within the last few minutes, and as it will be proper to search every one in the house, surely you, who are on the point of departure, will have no objection to be searched first, and then be at liberty to go?"

There was something so perfectly reasonable in all this, that Harvey stepped into an adjoining parlor, and threw open his trunk for inspection, never doubting that his innocence would be immediately manifest.

The waiter, whose mean rapacity had been the cause of the detention, acted as examiner. He pulled one article after another out of the trunk, and at length—horror of horrors!—held up the missing watch with a look of triumph and scorn!

"Who put that there?" cried Harvey, in an agony of mind which can be better imagined than described. "Who has done me this grievous wrong? I know nothing as to how the watch came into my trunk."

No one answered this appeal. All present stood for a moment in gloomy silence.

"Sir," said the landlord to Harvey on recovering from his surprise, "I am sorry for you. For the sake of a miserable trifle, you have brought ruin and disgrace on yourself. This is a matter which concerns the honor of my house, and cannot stop here. However much it is against my feelings, you must go before a magistrate."

"By all means," added No. 17, with the importance of an injured man. "A pretty thing that one's watch is not safe in a house like this."

"John, send Boots for a constable," said the landlord.

Harvey sat with his head leaning on his hand. A deadly cold perspiration trickled down his brow. His heart swelled and beat as if it would burst. What should he do? His whole prospects were in an instant blighted. "Oh God! do not desert a frail and unhappy being: give me strength to face this new and terrible misfortune," was a prayer he internally uttered. A little revived, he started to his feet, and addressing himself to the landlord, he said, "Take me to a magistrate instantly, and let us have this diabolical plot unraveled. I court inquiry into my character and conduct."

"It is no use saying any more about it," said the landlord; "here is Boots with a constable, and let us all go away together to the nearest magistrate. Boots, carry that trunk. John and Sally, you can follow us."

And so the party, trunk and all, under the constable as conductor, adjourned to the house of a magistrate in an adjoining street. There the matter seemed so clear a case of felony—robbery in a dwelling-house—that Harvey, all protestations to the contrary, was fully committed for trial at the ensuing March assizes, then but a few days distant.

At the period at which these incidents occurred, I was a young man going on my first circuits. I had not as yet been honored with perhaps more than three or four briefs, and these only in cases so slightly productive of fees, that I was compelled to study economy in my excursions. Instead of taking up my residence at an inn when visiting—a considerable sea-port, where the court held its sittings, I dwelt in lodgings kept by a widow lady, where, at a small expense, I could enjoy perfect quietness, free from interruption.

On the evening after my arrival on the March circuit of the year 17—, I was sitting in my lodgings perusing a new work on criminal jurisprudence, when the landlady, after tapping at the door, entered my room.

"I am sorry to trouble you, sir," said she; "but a lady has called to see you about a very distressing law case—very distressing indeed, and a very strange case it is too. Only, if you could be so good as to see her."

"Who is she?"

"All I know about it is this: she is a Mrs. Harvey. She and her husband and children were to sail yesterday for Boston. All were on board except the husband; and he, on leaving the large hotel over the way, was taken up for a robbery. Word was in the evening sent by the prisoner to his wife to come on shore with all her children and the luggage; and so she came back in the pilot boat, and was in such a state of distress, that my brother, who is in the preventive service, and saw her land, took pity on her, and had her and her children and things taken to a lodging on the quay. As my brother knows that we have a London lawyer staying here, he has advised the poor woman to come and consult you about the case."

"Well, I'll see what can be done. Please desire the lady to step in."

A lady was shortly shown in. She had been pretty, and was so still, but anxiety was pictured in her pale countenance. Her dress was plain, but not inelegant; and altogether she had a neat and engaging appearance.

"Be so good as to sit down," said I, bowing; "and tell me all you would like to say."

The poor woman burst into tears; but afterward recovering herself, she told me pretty nearly the whole of her history and that of her husband.

Lawyers have occasion to see so much duplicity, that I did not all at once give assent to the idea of Harvey being innocent of the crime of which he stood charged.

"There is something perfectly inexplicable in the case," I observed, "and it would require sifting. Your husband, I hope, has always borne a good character?"

"Perfectly so. He was no doubt unfortunate in business; but he got his certificate on the first examination; and there are many who would testify to his uprightness." And here again my client broke into tears, as if overwhelmed with her recollections and prospects.

"I think I recollect Mr. Harvey's shop," said I, soothingly. "It seemed a very respectable concern; and we must see what can be done. Keep up your spirits; the only fear I have arise from the fact of Judge A—being on the bench. He is usually considered severe, and if exculpatory evidence fail, your husband may run the risk of being—transported.” A word of more terrific import, with which I was about to conclude, stuck unuttered in my throat. “Have you employed an attorney?” I added.

“Well, that must be looked to. I shall speak to a local agent, to prepare and work out the case; and we shall all do our utmost to get an acquittal. To-morrow I will call on your husband in prison.”

Many thanks were offered by the unfortunate lady, and she withdrew.

I am not going to inflict on the reader a detailed account of this remarkable trial, which turned, as barristers would say, on a beautiful point of circumstantial evidence. Along with the attorney, a sharp enough person in his way, I examined various parties at the hotel, and made myself acquainted with the nature of the premises. The more we investigated, however, the more dark and mysterious—always supposing Harvey’s innocence—did the whole case appear. There was not one redeeming trait in the affair, except Harvey’s previous good character; and good character, by the law of England, goes for nothing in opposition to facts proved to the satisfaction of a jury. It was likewise unfortunate that A— was to be the presiding judge. This man possessed great forensic acquirements, and was of spotless private character; but, like the majority of lawyers of that day,—when it was no extraordinary thing to hang twenty men in a morning at Newgate—he was a stanch stickler for the gallows as the only effectual reformer and safeguard of the social state. At this time he was but partially recovered from a long and severe indisposition, and the traces of recent suffering were distinctly apparent on his pale and passionless features.

Harvey was arraigned in due form; the evidence was gone carefully through; and everything, so far as I was concerned, was done that man could do. But at the time to which I refer, counsel was not allowed to address the court on behalf of the prisoner—a practice since introduced from Scotland—and consequently I was allowed no opportunity to draw the attention of the jury to the total want of any direct evidence of the prisoner’s guilt. Harvey himself tried to point out the unlikelihood of his being guilty; but he was not a man gifted with dialectic qualities, and his harangue fell pointlessly on the understandings of the twelve commonplace individuals who sat in the jury-box. The judge finally proceeded to sum the evidence, and this he did emphatically against the prisoner—dwelling with much force on the suspicious circumstance of a needy man taking up his abode at an expensive fashionable hotel; his furtive descent from his apartments by the back stairs; the undoubted fact of the watch being found in his trunk; the improbability of any one putting it there but himself; and the extreme likelihood that the robbery was effected in a few moments of time by the culprit, just as he passed from the bar of the hotel to the room which he had occupied. “If,” said he to the jury, in concluding his address, “you can, after all these circumstances, believe the prisoner to be innocent of the crime laid to his charge, it is more than I can do. The thing seems to me as clear as the sun at noonday. The evidence, in short, is irresistible; and if the just and necessary provisions of the law are not enforced in such very plain cases, then society will be dissolved, and security for property there will be none. Gentlemen, retire and make up your verdict.”

But the jury were not disposed to retire. After communing a few minutes together, one of them stood up and delivered the verdict: it was Guilty! The judge assumed the crowning badge of the judicial potentate—the black cap; and the clerk of arraigns asked the prisoner at the bar, in the usual form, if he had anything to urge why sentence of death should not be passed upon him.

Poor Harvey! I durst scarcely look at him. As the sonorous words fell on his ear, he was grasping nervously with shaking hands at the front of the dock. He appeared stunned, bewildered, as a man but half awakened from a hideous dream might be supposed to look. He had comprehended, though he had scarcely heard, the verdict; for on the instant, the voice which but a few years before sang to him by the brook-side, was ringing through his brain, and he could recognise the little pattering feet of his children, as, sobbing and clinging to their shrieking mother’s dress, she and they were hurried out of court. The clerk, after a painful pause, repeated the solemn formula. By a strong effort the doomed man mastered his agitation; his pale countenance lighted up with indignant fire, and firm and self-possessed, he thus replied to the fearful interrogatory:

“Much could I say in the name, not of mercy, but of justice, why the sentence about to be passed on me should not be pronounced; but nothing, alas! that will avail me with you, pride-blinded ministers of death. You fashion to yourselves—out of your own vain conceits do you fashion—modes and instruments, by the aid of which you fondly imagine to invest yourselves with attributes which belong only to Omniscience; and now I warn you—and it is a voice from the tomb, in whose shadow I already stand, which addresses you—that you are about to commit a most cruel and deliberate murder.”

He paused, and the jury looked into each other’s eyes for the courage they could not find in their own hearts. The voice of conscience spoke, but was only for a few moments audible. The suggestions that what grave parliaments, learned judges, and all classes of “respectability” sanctioned, could not be wrong, much less murderous or cruel, silenced the “still, small” tones, and tranquillized the startled jurors.

“Prisoner at the bar,” said the judge, with his cold, calm voice of destiny, “I cannot listen to such observations: you have been found guilty of a heinous offense by a jury of your countrymen, after a patient trial. With that finding I need scarcely say I entirely agree. I am as satisfied of your guilt as if I had seen you commit the act with my own bodily eyes. The circumstance of your being a person who, from habits and education, should have been above committing so base a crime, only aggravates your guilt. However, no matter who or what you have been, you must expiate your offense on the scaffold. The law has very properly, for the safety of society, decreed the punishment of death for such crimes: our only and plain duty is to execute that law.”

The prisoner did not reply: he was leaning with his elbows on the front of the dock, his bowed face covered with his outspread hands; and the judge passed sentence of death in the accustomed form. The court then rose, and a turnkey placed his hand upon the prisoner’s arm, to lead him away. Suddenly he uncovered his face, drew himself up to his full height—he was a remarkably tall man—and glared fiercely round upon the audience, like a wild animal at bay. “My lord,” he cried, or rather shouted, in an excited voice. The judge motioned impatiently to the jailer, and strong hands impelled the prisoner from the front of the dock. Bursting from them he again sprang forward, and his arms outstretched, while his glittering eye seemed to hold the judge spell-bound, exclaimed, “My lord, before another month has passed away, you will appear at the bar of another world, to answer for the life, the innocent life, which God bestowed upon me, but which you have impiously cast away as a thing of naught and scorn!” He ceased, and was at once borne off. The court, in some confusion, hastily departed. It was thought at the time that the judge’s evidently failing health had suggested the prophecy to the prisoner. It only excited a few days’ wonder, and was forgotten.

The position of a barrister in such circumstances is always painful. I need hardly say that my own feelings were of a very distressing kind. Conscious that if the unfortunate man was really guilty, he was at least not deserving of capital punishment, I exerted myself to procure a reprieve. In the first place I waited privately on the judge; but he would listen to no proposal for a respite. Along with a number of individuals—chiefly of the Society of Friends—I petitioned the crown for a commutation of the sentence. But being unaccompanied with a recommendation from the judge, the prayer of our petition was of course disregarded: the law, it was said, must take its course. How much cruelty has been exercised under shelter of that remorseless expression!

I would willingly pass over the succeeding events. Unable to save his life, I endeavored to soothe the few remaining hours of the doomed convict, and frequently visited him in the condemned cell. The more I saw of him, the deeper grew my sympathy in his case, which was that of no vulgar felon. “I have been a most unfortunate man,” said he one day to me. “A destiny toward ruin in fortune and in life has pursued me. I feel as if deserted by God and man; yet I know, or at least would persuade myself, that Heaven will one day vindicate my innocence of this foul charge. To think of being hanged like a dog for a crime at which my soul revolts! Great is the crime of those imbecile jurors and that false and hard-hearted judge, who thus, by an irreversible decree, consign a fellow-mortal to a death of violence and disgrace. Oh God, help me—help me to sustain that bitter, bitter hour!” And then the poor man would throw himself on his bed and weep.

But the parting with his wife and children. What pen can describe that terrible interview! They knelt in prayer, their wo-begone countenances suffused in tears, and with hands clasped convulsively together. The scene was too harrowing and sacred for the eye of a stranger. I rushed from the cell, and buried myself in my lodgings, whence I did not remove till all was over. Next day, James Harvey, a victim of circumstantial evidence, and of a barbarous criminal code, perished on the scaffold.

Three weeks afterward, the court arrived at a populous city in the West of England. It had in the interval visited another assize town, and there Judge A— had left three for execution. At the trials of these men, however, I had not attended. So shocked had been my feelings with the mournful event which had taken place at —, that I had gone into Wales for the sake of change of scene. After roaming about for a fortnight amid the wild solitudes of Caernarvonshire, I took the stage for the city which I knew the court was to visit, and arrived on the day previous to the opening of the assizes.

“Well, are we to have a heavy calendar?” I inquired next morning of a brother barrister, on entering the court.

“Rather light for a March assize,” replied the impatient counsel, as he bustled onward. “There’s Cartwright’s case—highway robbery—in which I am for the prosecution. He’ll swing for it, and perhaps four or five others.”

“A good hanging judge is A—,” said the under-sheriff, who at this moment joined us, rubbing his hands, as if pleased with the prospect of a few executions. “No chance of the prophecy yonder coming to pass, I suppose?”

“Not in the least,” replied the bustling counsel. “He never looked better. His illness has gone completely off. And this day’s work will brighten him up.”

Cartwright’s trial came on. I had never seen the man before, and was not aware that this was the same person whom Harvey had incidentally told me he had discharged for theft; the truth being, that till the last moment of his existence, that unfortunate man had not known how much he had been a sacrifice to this wretch’s malice.

The crime of which the villain now stood accused was that of robbing a farmer of the paltry sum of eight shillings, in the neighborhood of Ilfracombe. He pleaded not guilty, but put in no defense. A verdict was recorded against him, and in due form A— sentenced him to be hanged. An expression of fiendish malignancy gleamed over the haggard features of the felon as he asked leave to address a few words to the court. It was granted. Leaning forward, and raising his heavy scowling eyes to the judge, he thus began: “There is something on my mind, my lord—a dreadful crime—which, as I am to die for the eight shillings I took from the farmer, I may as well confess. You may remember Harvey, my lord, whom you hanged the other day at —?"

"What of him, fellow?" replied the judge, his features suddenly flushing crimson.

"Why, my lord, only this—that he was as innocent of the crime for which you hanged him as the child yet unborn! I did the deed! I put the watch in his trunk!" And to the unutterable horror of the entire court, he related the whole particulars of the transaction, the origin of his grudge against Harvey, and his delight on bringing him to the gallows.

"Inhuman, execrable villain!" gasped the judge in extreme excitement.

"Cleverly done, though! Was it not, my lord?" rejoined the ruffian, with bitter irony. "The evidence, you know, was irresistible; the crime as clear as the sun at noonday; and if, in such plain cases, the just and necessary law was not enforced, society would be dissolved, and there would be no security for property! These were your words, I think. How on that occasion I admired your lordship's judgment and eloquence! Society would be dissolved if an innocent man were not hanged! Ha!—ha!—ha! Capital!—capital!" shouted the ferocious felon with demoniac glee, as he marked the effect of his words on the countenance of the judge.

"Remove the prisoner!" cried the sheriff. An officer was about to do so; but the judge motioned him to desist. His lordship's features worked convulsively. He seemed striving to speak, but the words would not come.

"I suppose, my lord," continued Cartwright, in low and, hissing tones, as the shadow of unutterable despair grew and settled on his face—"I suppose you know that his wife destroyed herself. The coroner's jury said she had fallen accidentally into the water. I know better. She drowned herself under the agonies of a broken heart! I saw her corpse, with the dead baby in its arms; and then I felt, knew, that I was lost! Lost, doomed to everlasting perdition! But, my lord"—and here the wretch broke into a howl wild and terrific—"we shall go down together—down to where your deserts are known. A—h—h! that pinches you, does it? Hound of a judge! legal murderer! coward! I spurn and spit upon thee!" The rest of the appalling oburgation was inarticulate, as the monster, foaming and sputtering, was dragged by an officer from the dock.

Judge A— had fallen forward on his face, fainting and speechless with the violence of his emotions. The black cap had dropped from his brow. His hands were stretched out across the bench, and various members of the bar rushed to his assistance. The court broke up in frightful commotion.

Two days afterward the county paper had the following announcement:

"Died, at the Royal Hotel, —, on the 27th instant, Judge A—, from an access of fever supervening upon a disorder from which he had imperfectly recovered."

The prophecy was fulfilled!

POISONED TOYS.—The dangerous consequences of employing arsenic in making toys were exemplified lately at a meeting of the London Medical Society, where a member related that he had been called to attend two children who were seized, successively, with violent sickness and diarrhoea, and became alarmingly ill. He suspected the existence of a mineral poison, but no trace could be found, until a new toy, in the shape of a white rabbit, was examined. The child had been rubbing the white fur of the rabbit with its hand, which it immediately put into its mouth. The second child did so likewise. The fur was found dusted over with a quantity of fine white powder, which, being analysed, a mixture of arsenic and lead. The arsenic here was evidently employed, as it constantly is, to preserve the fur from moths.

Thackeray, dining one day at a public dinner at Ballinasloe, in fair time, asked a waiter to bring him some currant jelly for his venison. "There's no currant jelly, sir," said a waiter, running up to him, "but here's some very fine lobster sauce."

THE LIFE OF THE FLIRT.

Oh! the life of the flirt is no life for me!
It brings sad thoughts and sighs, be it ever so free;
I have ogled, and laugh'd, and danced with a score,
And found it, believe me, a horrible bore.
In my train have been Walter, and Charlie, and Cree,

A Spaniard, and Pole, and a French refugee.
But the life of a flirt is no life for me!

They have written mesonnets on love by the score,
Serenaded, and toasted for weeks or more;
To all "poppers of questions" I've answered "No, no!"

Now I'm teased or forgotten by belle and by beau;
And Miss Morley, in whom no beauty I see,
Has succeeded in throwing her shadow o'er me.
So the life of a flirt is no life for me!

Lord Harry last summer came down by the sea,
He sigh'd, and he blush'd, and look'd softly on me;
I had fully resolved he should down on his knee,
And now he is courting that horrid Miss Cleo;
I have heard it oft whisper'd he would have had me,
If I had not so flirted with Edward de G—.

Oh! the life of a flirt is no life for me!

In August, for change, I just ran down to see
If Weymouth could furnish amusement for me;
I ogled "a gent," who lounged on the quay,
And enter'd too freely in converse, they say;
For when I got home I miss'd watch and key;
The dinner was cold—so was Edward de G—.

Oh! the life of a flirt is no life for me!

For a few long days I flirted no more,
Till Seymour came down, with his phaeton and four,
Then I could not resist; so was Edward de G—
Announced his intention of crossing the sea;
But, alas! all my flirting with both was now o'er,
Seymour sail'd the next morning with him for Mysore.

Oh! the life of a flirt will suit me no more!

That arch-hypocrite Sly, and his colleague, young Lee,

Walk'd a mile to tell Ma I'd been talking too free,
In asking Squire Greyer, at half-past three,
To meet me alone by the "old oak tree."
Papa, too, was book'd for a lawyer's fee,
Because the Miss Crabbs whisper'd scandal of me.
Oh! the life of a flirt is no life for me!

And then, at the last ball, I thought it so mean—
One thought me too plump, and another too lean;
And then, could you guess it, my right eye was green.

I was further accused of making a scene,
And Edward de G— was my go-between;
But, oh! should you meet him, I pray you opine
That the life of a flirt is no life for Jossine.

Oh! rather than flirt, I declare I would be
"The One" to make cousins a strong cup of tea,
Or dandle a baby for aye on my knee,
And teach the young plagues to squeak out A B C;
And renounce now and ever ball and bel-esprit,
Reviews, launches, and races, and pet Ornee,
For the life of a flirt is no life for me!

THE ODD-FELLOW'S DAUGHTER.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY A LADY.

"Is my father in the counting-room, Mr. Cutter?"

"Yes, Miss Mary, but he is very busy."

"Is any one with him?"

"No, Miss Mary, but he is busy with his letters."

"Oh, well, I will not disturb him long."

When the young girl entered her father's counting-room she found him at his table, with a pile of letters before him—his head resting on his hand—and when he raised his eyes, on his daughter's entrance, she met his look with a bewildered air, for there was that in his countenance that reminded her of the days of grief and anguish following her dear mother's death, about three years previous. But as soon as Mr. Hillar saw who it was that interrupted him, his face resumed the calm, mild and affectionate look it was wont to wear.

"Well, my daughter," said he, "what can I do for you?"

"I am sorry, father," answered Mary, "that I interrupted you, but I wished for some money this morning to go shopping with Lizzie Lewis."

"Why, my child," said Mr. Hillar, "what can you find to purchase? I heard you say, a day or two since, that you had all that was necessary for winter."

"And so I think I have, dear father; only Lizzie wishes me to go with her, and my purse was nearly empty, and you have said I should never go with a lean purse, and I was beginning to think of Christmas presents for the boys and servants."

"Well, my child, trust to me; do not go out with your friend to-day, and hereafter you will not regret doing as I wished."

"Certainly, father, if you desire it, and I will go round by Lizzie's and tell her I cannot go to-day."

Mary Hillar was a bright, warm-hearted girl of twenty; not beautiful in the common acceptance of the term, for her features were irregular; but her broad, intellectual forehead, bright, expressive eyes, clear and healthy complexion, claimed admiration. And her voice, too—who could hear it and not love the owner? Not the languishing, lisping voice of a fashionable lady; but clear, gushing, bird-like music, that told of warm affection, and ready sympathy. Oh! how much of the heart can be expressed in woman's voice! How often do the sweet tones of the loved and lost linger upon the ear!

Mary Hillar was a Christian, too—not demure, precise, fault-finding—but one who, in the fear and love of God, endeavored to discharge her duties cheerfully. When Mary was seventeen, just as she had left school, and was about to enter society, with every prospect of happiness which wealth, station, and loving friends could insure, her invaluable mother was taken from her by death. She had two little brothers, several years her junior, and she promised her mother, on her dying bed, to supply her place to them; and so well had Mary fulfilled that sacred promise, and so watchful had she been of her father's comfort and happiness, that he had not thought yet of trying to supply the place of her he had lost. This had been a matter of great joy to Mary, although she had determined, in her own mind, never to oppose her father, should he wish to marry.

My readers must pardon me for being so prolix in my introduction of Mr. Hillar and his family, and we will follow Mary home from her father's store. All the rest of the morning she was incapable of composing herself to any kind of employment or reading—her mind constantly wandered to her father's sad face, as she found him in his counting-room. When he came to dinner he was paler than usual, but otherwise there was nothing particularly observable. But at tea he asked Mary to assist the little boys in their lessons, and get them to rest as soon after as possible, and follow him to the library. In the course of an hour Mary tapped at the library door.

"Draw up an easy-chair," said Mr. Hillar, as Mary entered, "and make yourself comfortable, for our conference may be long and tedious. Did you not think strange that I requested you not to go out to-day?"

"Oh no, father, for I know you have ever good reasons for your requests; but I have felt all day that you were in trouble, and have had a strong desire for your confidence."

"My confidence you deserve and shall have, dear child," said Mr. Hillar, impressing a kiss upon her forehead. "I thank God for having such a daughter to cheer and comfort me. You have always known prosperity, and lived in luxury, how will you now bear adversity and privation? for come it must. I have struggled long against it, but now it is in vain. The failure of several western merchants, the total loss of the Sybil, and the suspension of Jones, Chandler & Co., combined, have ruined me. One of the losses I could have battled; but all together is too much for me. Everything must be given up—house, equipage, furniture, servants and all. What is to become of you and your little brothers—and old nurse, too? Her little fortune which she would never take from my hands? It is cruel to thrust her out to labor for strangers, after spending the best years of her life in nursing my children, and she is too old to do hard work. And, Mary, I can never find capital to commence business again. The Lord help me! there is no help from man. I have turned in every direction; but there is a complete stagnation in the business community. Every man is afraid for himself. I have no one even to advise me!"

"Oh! father," exclaimed Mary, "if James Gilman were only here, he could advise you."

"James Gilman!" said Mr. Hillar, "what mean you to refer to that man—do you still believe him innocent, Mary? From your not mentioning his name for two years, I thought you was finally convinced of his guilt!"

"No, father, I am not, nor ever will be convinced that James would do an intentional wrong. My mother advised me, if you continued to believe him guilty, to refrain from mentioning his name to you."

"Mary, did your mother die in the belief of Gilman's innocence?"

"She did, dear father, and said too, that before you died, she firmly believed that his honesty and uprightness would be clearly proved. Oh! father, do not still believe he could wrong you!"

"Mary, God forbid that I should wrong any man knowingly, but who else could have taken that roll of bills? No other person saw them—he it was who was ordered to put the money in the bank. When he came to me with the lame excuse of having left the counting-room for fifteen minutes, and on going in for the money to take to the bank, he found the desk open, and the roll of bills gone, and the window of the counting-room also open. Why, when I charged him with the deed, did he turn pale as ashes, stammer, and almost faint? Mary, I am afraid I did wrong in listening to you and your mother's entreaties to spare him, and bear the heavy loss quietly. And if he was innocent, why have we never heard from him, in all these four years?"

"Because, father, he said he would never show his face until he could fully prove his innocence."

"Mary, did you see him after I forbade it?"

"Yes, father, but I could not help it; he came to bid dear mother farewell when she was ill, the night previous to his sailing for Havana."

"Well, my dear, we will let this drop, and return to our own troubles."

"Everything must be assigned for the benefit of my creditors. I am thankful that no poor person besides dear old nurse will be the sufferer, and nurse shall have my home as long as I can have a roof for my head. You must break this to her as tenderly as possible. I hope she will not think hard of me. If I could secure a cent to myself she should have her due. She never would take a note for what I owed her, and now she cannot claim it with the other creditors. In the morning select such plain furniture as will furnish a small, neat house, which I found to-day; there is a parlor, and back of it a small dining and bed-room; two chambers over them, one for the dear little boys and myself, and the other nurse must have. A kitchen and closets are added by a wing, and opening from the dining room. Take all your dear mother's books, and a few for yourself and boys; we will find room in the parlor for them. Take also the old family silver, the rest of the plate must go. Oh! my poor child, how will you ever endure all this? I can bear it, but for you to be cast out from the circle in which of right you have ever moved, do the work of a servant, and deprived of all the luxuries to which you are accustomed!"

"Dear father, do not think of me—if you can only be spared to me, and find the means for us to live upon, even in this way, you shall never hear one repining word, or see one gloomy cloud upon my face. I thank God that my dear mother has taught me that true happiness is not to be found in riches. And now I shall have an opportunity of practicing the precepts she took such unwearied pains to inculcate. My true friends will not desert me because I am poor, and no longer an heiress; those that do look coldly on my adversity are not worth a thought."

Besides, dear father," said she with a smile, "I shall not have times for many friends. Nurse loves us so well she will do all she can, and we two together can teach Willie and Frank, and that will be a saving. Oh, father, do not look so sad, you shall see what an economist I am—and we shall be happy, indeed we shall!"

The removal was made—nurse was a good assistance—she felt that her fortune was cast with her old master's; and she felt grateful that she was allowed to share their home and privations. She would not allow the "dear, young Miss Mary" to do any thing of the house work, "there was only enough to keep her busy."

A few friends were faithful in their fallen fortunes; but very many, when Mary accidentally met them, "could not find where Mr. Hillar had moved." One friend there was among the few faithful ones who was able to assist Mr. Hillar in gaining a subsistence. He was a brother of the "mystic tie," and gave him some business to do; but could not do more at that time without depriving others of situations they had honorably filled.

Mr. Hillar and his family had lived in this manner for nearly a year, and by the strictest economy maintained themselves without incurring debts. One evening Mary had waited tea beyond the usual time, for her father's return, but supposing he was detain at the office, she gave her brothers their supper, heard their evening lessons, and told them they had better not wait longer to bid their father good night. One evening in each week he was always absent at the meeting of the "Lodge," but this was not the night. Poor Mary sat listening till she was almost terrified at the beating of her own heart, and she nearly fainted, when at midnight she heard steps at the door, and when the bell was pulled, with a bound she was at the door; but instead of her father it was the old family physician, with a countenance of undisguised grief. Mary was filled with undefined terror—the doctor took her hand and led her in, and told her in a few brief, gentle words, that she was an orphan. Mary did not scream nor faint, but the physician allowed her tears to flow unrestrained, and when she was calm he told her how her father had been taken from her.

On his way from the office he called at the house of his old friend and physician, to speak with him about a pain he had felt in his side for several days; and while the doctor was conversing with him, he saw Mr. Hillar turn deadly pale, put his hand to his side, and before he could reach him his head dropped, he sighed once or twice, and his spirit had flown home to God. Every effort that friendship could make was put forth to resuscitate, but all in vain.

Every care and anxiety of a secular nature was taken from poor Mary Hillar by the members of the Lodge to which her father belonged, and which he had done much to sustain in his days of prosperity. A written pledge was given her that the welfare of her dear brothers should rest on those who loved and revered their father. As soon as they were old enough they should have such means of maintenance found them as could but please their father, were he permitted to behold the efforts of his beloved "brothers."

Mr. Hillar had been dead but a few weeks when Mary was again startled by the door-bell ringing at a late hour of the evening. Nurse went this time to the door, and Mary was surprised to hear a low, whispered conversation carried on between her nurse and another. She had nothing to dread, for she knew that her brothers were safe in their beds. After a few minutes the old nurse came in, with an almost imperceptible joy in her face, and told her "young lady" there was a young gentleman at the door, who begged permission to see her for a moment. A hope was struggling in her heart, but she hardly dared to give it place to rest, and before she made up her mind to see a stranger at that late hour, she found herself clasped to the manly breast of her first and only love—James Gilman. She knew in an instant that he was free from reproach, for he said that she should see him as soon, and no sooner than he could prove his innocence.

Oh! what joy for the poor mourner—sadden ed to be sure. She grieved that her father could not have known of this before his death. James said he ought to have known of it, for a letter he had written ought to have been received about the time of his death, containing all the circumstances. Mary immediately examined a package of letters and papers, taken from her father's pocket on the day he died and which she had forgotten. Among them she found James' letter, which her father had received in the mail that afternoon, previous to his death.

Who knows but the joy the news must have given him, might have hastened the crisis of the disease, to which he was predisposed? which the physician had pronounced a disease of the heart.

Gilman had left his cause in the hands of a faithful friend; and the friend's efforts had been unwearied while Gilman had been in Havana, in watching every criminal case; for it was only in this way they could ever hope to find the robber of Mr. Hillar's package of money. Old Hays himself had a hand in this search.

A man had been sentenced to State Prison for a term of years, who was engaged in burglary. (Every such case in particular was closely examined.) Under promise of assistance being rendered to his helpless family, he owned the fact. He had been several times engaged as porter in the store Mr. Hillar, and was at work at the back of the store, near the window of the counting room, when a gentleman came in and commenced counting out some money. He saw it placed in the desk—heard Mr. Hillar tell Mr. Gilman to place it in the bank on his way to dinner—and while Gilman was out for a few moments, he sprang into the window, secured the money, and spent it in a few nights at a gambling house.

We need scarcely say that Mary found a rich reward for all her trust and confidence in her lover.

FIRST LOVE RENEWED.—A young woman, an acquaintance of and near neighbor to Mima, my young Middleton favorite, accosted me one day in the streets of Manchester, and reproached me for having, as she said, forgotten the little maiden, who, she gave me to understand, still retained a tender remembrance of former days. Was that true—was it possible that she could cherish a kind recollection of one who had been so long absent? I asked. She said it was even as she had stated. This moved the old pulses of my heart, and awoke that tender feeling of regard which had been so long dormant. I entrusted the young woman with a kind message to Mima, confirming it with a small token which I thought would be acceptable; and I did not forget to make a present of a gay ribbon to the bearer of this unhopd-for, but welcome information. I now resolved to see my fair agitator, at all events, and learn from herself, fairly and promptly, if possible, whether or not our former friendship was to be renewed, or abandoned, at once and forever. I therefore went to Middleton the Sunday following; and as fortune, I suppose, was just at that time not in a humor for throwing impediments in my way, I obtained an interview with the object of my solicitude, and besides finding her as modest and bewitching as ever—the very model of a little head-bowed, health-flushed Hebe—a lily rose-tinted—I had the ineffable pleasure of receiving in her own words, with every grace of maidenly shame, an acknowledgment, that I had long been, and still was, regarded with a more than friendly interest by her. This was enough for the present, and after making arrangements whereby we might correspond by letter, I bade adieu to the dear little girl, and walked back to Manchester, in a state of mind to which I had long been a stranger. I felt that in this transaction I had, in fact, only performed a duty; that my early love had, after all, the most rightful claim to my affection; that she was in every respect worthy of it; and that, in this instance, as in many others, the performance of duty had been my guide to happiness. I was again as deeply in love as ever, only this time I was serenely contented, my confidence was greater, the void of my heart was filled, and I was happy.—[Barnford's Early Days.]

A Historical Sketch.

COUNT ARMFELT.

ONE of the chief favorites of Gustavus the Third, King of Sweden, was Count Armfelt, a young man of illustrious family, and of unusual mental and personal accomplishments. At an early age he entered the royal guards, and proved, during the war with Russia, that his courage in the field fully equaled his more courtier-like merits. He rapidly ascended in military grade, and finally, the king appointed him governor of Stockholm, and named him President of the Council of Regency, which, in case of his death, was to govern Sweden during the minority of the heir at the throne. Shortly after these dignities had been conferred upon Armfelt, occurred the famous masquerade, and the assassination of Augustus.

Upon this event happening, a written will of the king's was produced, of more recent date than the appointment of the count, and according to which, the guardianship of the prince royal was to devolve upon Duke Karl Sundermanland, the brother of Gustavus. This prince was weak, sensual, and vindictive, of limited capacity, and easily led by flattery and deceit. He belonged to a secret society, of which Baron Reuterholm was grand master. A couple of mysterious and well-arranged apparitions were sufficient to terrify the duke, and render him ductile as wax. The most implicit submission was required of him, and soon the crafty Reuterholm got the royal authority entirely into his own hands. There were discontent and murmuring among the true friends of the royal family; but Reuterholm's spies were ubiquitous, and a frowning brow or dissatisfied look was punished as a crime. Among others, Count Armfelt, who took no pains to conceal his indignation at the scandalous proceedings of those in power, was stripped of his offices, and ordered to set out immediately as ambassador to Naples.

This command fell like a thunderbolt on the head of the count, whom every public and private consideration combined to remain in Stockholm. Loth as he was to leave his country an undisputed prey to the knaves into whose hands it had fallen, he was perhaps still more unwilling to abandon one beloved being to the snares and dangers of a sensual and corrupt court.

It was on a September evening of the year 1792, and the light of the moon fell cold and clear upon the white houses of Stockholm, though the streets that intersected their masses were plunged in deep shadow, when a man, muffled in a cloak, and evidently desirous of avoiding observation, was seen making his way hastily through the darkest and least frequented lanes of that city. Stopping at last, he knocked thrice against a window-shutter; an adjacent door was opened at the signal, and he passed through a corridor into a cheerful and well-lighted apartment. Throwing off his cloak, he received and returned the affectionate greeting of a beautiful woman, who advanced with outstretched hand to meet him. The stranger was Count Armfelt, the lady, Miss Rudenskold—the most charming of the court beauties of the day. The color left her cheek when she perceived the uneasiness of her lover; but when he told her of the orders he had received, her head sank upon his breast, and her large blue eyes swam in tears. Recovering, however, from this momentary depression, she vowed to remain true to her country and her love. The count echoed the vow, and a kiss sealed the compact. The following morning a ship sailed from Stockholm, bearing the new ambassador to Naples.

Scarcely had Armfelt departed, when Duke Karl began to persecute Miss Rudenskold with his addresses. At first, he endeavored by attention and flatteries, to win her favor; but her avoidance of his advances and society increased his passion, until at last he spoke his wishes with brutal frankness. With maidenly pride and dignity the lady repelled his dishonorable suit, and severely stigmatized his insolence. Foaming with rage, the duke left her presence, and from that moment his love was exchanged for a deadly hatred.

Baron Reuterholm had witnessed with intense pleasure the growth of the regent's passion for the beautiful Miss Rudenskold; for he knew that the more pursuits Duke Karl had to occupy and amuse him, the more undivided would be his own sway. It was with great dissatisfaction, therefore, that he received an account of the contemptuous manner in which the proud and virtuous girl had treated her royal admirer. The latter insisted upon revenge—full and complete revenge; and Reuterholm promised him he should have it. The lady's life was so blameless, and her conduct in every respect so correct, that it seemed impossible to invent any charge against her; but Reuterholm set spies to work, and spies will always discover something. They found out that she kept up a regular correspondence with Count Armfelt. Their letters were opened, and evidence found in them of a plan to declare the young prince of age, or, at least, to abstract Duke Karl from the corrupting influence of Reuterholm. The angry feelings entertained by the latter personage toward Miss Rudenskold were increased tenfold by this discovery, and he immediately had her thrown into prison.

She was brought to trial before a tribunal composed of creatures of the baron. During her examination she was most cruelly treated, and the words of the correspondence were distorted, with infamous subtlety, into whatever construction best suited her accusers. The pillory, and imprisonment in the Zuchthaus, the place of confinement for the most guilty and abandoned of her sex, formed the sentence pronounced upon the unfortunate victim.

It was early on an autumn morning—a thick canopy of gray clouds overspread the heavens—and the dismal half-light which prevailed in the streets of Stockholm made it difficult to decide whether or not the sun had yet risen. A cold wind blew across from Lake Maeler, and caused the few persons who had as yet left their homes to hasten their steps along the deserted pavement. Suddenly a detachment of soldiers arrived upon the square in front of the Ritterhaus, and took up their station beside the pillory. The officer commanding the party was a slender young man of agreeable countenance; but he was pale as death, and his voice trembled as he gave the words of command.

The prison-gate now opened, and Miss Rudenskold came forth, escorted by several goalers. Her cheeks were whiter than the snow-white dress she wore; her limbs trembled; her long hair hung in wild dishelvement over her shoulders, and yet was beautiful—beautiful as a fading rose. They led her up the steps of the pillory, and the executioner's hand was already stretched out to bind her to the ignominious post, when she cast a despairing glance upon the bystanders, as though seeking aid. As she did so, a shrill scream of agony burst from her lips. She had recognised in the young officer her own dearly-beloved brother, who, by a devilish refinement of cruelty, had been appointed to command the guard that was to attend at her punishment.

Strong in her innocence, the delicate and gently-nurtured girl had borne up against all her previous sufferings; but this was too much. Her senses forsook her, and she fell fainting to the ground. Her brother also swooned away, and never recovered his clouded reason. To his dying day his mind remained gloomy and unsettled. The very executioners refused to inflict further indignity on the senseless girl, and she was conducted back to her dungeon, where she soon recovered all the firmness she had already displayed before her infamous judges.

Meanwhile, Armfelt was exposed in Italy to the double danger of secret assassination, and of a threatened requisition from the Swedish government for him to be delivered up. He sought safety by flight, and found an asylum in Germany. His estates were confiscated, his titles, honors, and nobility declared forfeited, and he himself was condemned by default as a traitor to his country. History is silent as to the ultimate fate of this luckless pair of lovers.

The Family Circle.

THE INFANT'S DREAM.

ONE day, I saw beside his books,
A child with sad and woful looks,
Tears from his eyelids dripping;
For cruel mammy—sad to tell—
Because it pull'd the parlor-bell,
Had given it a whipping!

It sobb'd and cried, and cried and sobb'd;
But soon its little "thought-box" bobb'd—
The "Dustman" closed its peepers;
And, lock'd with Morpheus' patent key,
Its gentle slumbers seem'd to be Like those of twenty sleepers.

Its thoughts flew off from life's alloys
To bright-day'd climes of smiling joys,
The native homes of fairies,
Which haunted by no cruel aunt,
(Aunts are not always so, I grant,)
No tiresome servant Marys!

For 'twas a bright 'mid-sweetness land,
And General Mirth was in command—
A land of no hard sorrows;
No royal spelling-book relays,
No sad and comfortless to-days,
Or dull perspective morrows!

Not one of pa's or ma's hard rules,
No silence, wretched horrid school's Brimstone-and-treacle manna;
No deaf and dumb old mannish play,
No dead and dull school-time array,
No drop of salts and senna!

No dirty fresh-clean pinafores,
No interdict against "all-fours,"
No tiresome grumbling mutter;
But in his dream he look'd around,
And saw, amazed, the very ground
Was sugar'd bread and butter!

The trees were oozing treacle taps;
Their dog's-ear'd leaves were brandy-snaps,
Nice bull's-eyes every stem on;
The rocks around were coltsfoot all;
Accidulated dew-drops fall
From shrubs of candied lemon!

Bright streams of tapioca flow'd,
The landscape round him smiled and glow'd;
'Twas all that nice and sweet is;
The garden-mold was wedding-cake,
And every frozen custard-lake
Was topp'd with raspberry ices!

Alas! that scene so bright and fair
Should melt and vanish into air,
Instead of being eaten!
Alas! that he should too soon find
They are only sweetmeats in the mind!
He'd only been well-beaten!

He stretch'd his hand, and raised his head;
But off the beauteous vision fled—
No single bull's-eye linger'd!
And such is life—our brandy-balls,
Our future built-up marble halls,
So vanish ere they're finger'd!

KNOWLEDGE OF THE WORLD.

THIS knowledge is in some degree indispensable to every man; and when it is found to exist in equal proportions with other acquirements, it tends to form a character at once influential and agreeable; but when a man has bartered the esteem of his friends, his own self-respect, the promptings of his better nature, and the incentives to nobler aims, for the miserable recompense of the mere worldling, he becomes an object of alternate pity, suspicion, and dislike, to all well-constituted minds. Yet, let us do the world justice—its lessons are valuable, and if we do not put our experience to a right use, let us acknowledge the fault to be our own. Weighed in impartial scales every man may find the accurate estimate of his capabilities and deficiencies. Left for a while to battle with its waves, we soon discover what stuff we are made of. There the spoiled and wayward child of fortune finds that little regard is paid to his capricious humors, and being made to feel their baneful effect on his comfort, he is taught (perhaps for the first time in his life) to bring them under control. The timid and the diffident there acquire that confidence in their own powers which they never would have possessed in their exclusion from its compulsory activity; and the man who has hitherto been wrapped up in self-sufficiency, finds, to his surprise, that he is not quite so independent of the assistance of others as he flattered himself. Initiation, however, in the world's ways, while it tends to make a man acquainted with himself, reveals the character of his fellow-man in a light that is very inimical to the growth of those feelings which constitute mental greatness or happiness of heart. Constant constraint hangs with a dead weight upon the intellectual efforts; and like the coils of the boa, cold and crushing, forbids the struggling soul to rise above its conscious degradation; while supreme selfishness, like a worm in the heart, feeds on the food which should administer to its health and growth. Where now, to such a man, is the spell which dwelt in the many-toned voices of Nature? Where are those emotions, in whose expanding warmth hope ripened into ambition, and ambition grew to energy and resolution? They were fresh in his heart at the commencement of his career, and they were to be the cherished guardians of his spirit through the scenes upon which he was entering, so he promised himself, but he gradually admitted the world into his heart, and its poisonous breath withered its blossoms; the fierce excitement of avaricious pleasures destroyed the appreciation of purer delights, and now, if remembered at all, it is with self-scorn to think he was ever influenced by feelings which he regards as mere obstacles in his course. Nothing, perhaps, can afford a stronger contrast than the different aspects presented by the world to those who are entering, and to those who are leaving it. To the first it is a garden of promise, every vista of which sparkles with sunny visions of happiness and joy. To the other it is an arid desert, marked here and there with the blackest ruins of some hope-built edifice; where the traveler fondly said, "here will I rest." The one looks forward (in youthful strength) in eager anticipation of the race he is to run, and the latter, weary of the delusive chase that has exhausted hope and energy, gladly receives his dismissal from toils, whose only recompense has been the conviction of their vanity. May the one be "cheered by the sallies of youth," the other "learn from the wisdom of age," and both commit to heart the truth inscribed on all things, that this world is not their home.

SWEARING AND LOW LANGUAGE.

In very ancient times swearing was a solemn act, and the man who employed it considered himself bound in conscience by the oath which he took. But now that men take oaths before magistrates, the solemn oaths of conversation have nothing but a vain and irreverend meaning. Swearing is generally supposed to give strength to speech. It is used by the vulgar with this intention. It implies strong passion—it is equivalent to strong gesticulation and ferocious looks; and it terrifies the sensitive, and makes the timid submit. It is affirmed by captains of vessels, that to give a command to the crew, without a volley of oaths accompanying it, would be perfectly useless. The sailors are so accustomed to the ferocious, that they would regard the captain who employed the meek and the delicate, even though firm and resolute, style of speech, as a man of little nerve, and unfit to command. We know not if this be a general rule, but the most tremendous broadside of coarse and abandoned swearing, that we ever heard, was from the captain of a packet in the German Ocean, during a storm; and we were informed by the captain, a kind, generous, warm-hearted, weather-beaten sailor, that he could not get on without it.

We were sorry to hear it, because men of spirit would rather refuse to obey a man who treated them disrespectfully. Gentlemen would have rebelled at once, and either shut up the captain under hatches, or been shut up themselves. Swearing is a low and despicable habit; and to be sworn at by a master is the most contemptuous treatment which a servant can receive. Slave drivers may swear at slaves; dog breakers at dogs, and grooms at stable-boys; and ferocious husbands may swear at their wives, brutal parents at their children, and dastardly brothers at their sisters, with impunity; but no decent man can swear at another decent man, and expect to see his face in peace again.

Swearing is a habit which prevails among rich and poor; chiefly the vulgar rich, and the rabble poor. Jockey noblemen and gentlemen—men of the turf and hells—who associate with knaves and rogues, themselves being strongly imbued with the spirit of knavery and roguery, who make no pretensions to talents of a high, intellectual order, and who have no reasonable hope of rising to distinction either in the senate or the drawing-room—men who eschew the society of ladies of good repute, because of their own congenial habits of conversation and behavior, who prefer the dining-room to the drawing-room, and the smoking or the club-room to the family circle; whose conversation is of dogs and horses, and five-barred gates, fowling-pieces and game, whiskey and port, and sparkling champagne, and girls that no lady of reputation ever heard of; such men, and such only, swear among the rich. They are the low and the vulgar rich. They are rich by birth only; greatness has been thrust upon them; they never could have attained to it by merit of their own, and they maintain their aristocratic position in society merely by the accidents of wealth and relationship. Many of them, however, are possessed of considerable talents—natural talent, quickness, mother-wit, and extensive acquaintance with the gossip of society, and the minutiae of fashionable, gentlemanly diversions. But scarcely one of them ever rises to distinction in legislation or in literature, or requires reputation in the circle of refined society for gentlemanly bearing. The moral taste which will permit a man to swear and employ the gross vulgarities of speech, will forever forbid him attaining to such distinction. Without pretending to enjoy the honor of familiarity, conversing with such men as Lord John Russell, or Sir Robert Peel, or Lord Palmerston, or Richard Cobden, or many other men distinguished for intellectual attainments we can safely affirm that such men, who have won for themselves a European reputation by the cultivation of their intellectual talents, and the use of strong argument, in preference to merely strong and slang phrases, can never be addicted to the habit of profane swearing, which generally grows upon a man who finds himself deficient in logic and good phraseology, and makes up the deficiency with the slang of the populace. And we have just as little hesitation in saying that a change like that which came over the character and habits of the late Lord George Bentinck, who was suddenly converted from a sportsman to a legislator, would gradually produce a corresponding change in his habit of speech, by bringing him into closer and more frequent communion with men who made use of argument only, and despised the adventitious aid of vulgar imprecations, in their personal intercourse.

The use of the Divine name in vain discourse, the damnation of men, of animals, of things, so common among the rich, and the coarse and ill-bred middle-classes, and so fearfully prevalent among the profligate poor, is an evil of so gross a nature, so incompatible with fine religious or moral feeling, temperance of judgment, or the free use of reason on subjects of importance, that it is quite impossible to enlighten any people that is generally addicted to it. It is not only a gross evil in itself, but it is the index of another and less apparent evil, a predominance of fierce and petty passion over reason, and an utter incapacity for that calm and judicious investigation of subjects which is indispensable for coming to a satisfactory conclusion. In other words, it is a serious obstacle to the discovery of truth.

FLOWER POTS.—If you use new pots for any kind of seeds, they ought first to be steeped in water for a few hours, as they will be too dry otherwise, and will suck away the moisture from the seeds, and nothing is worse for them than to be too often watered. All your old empty pots ought also to be steeped and well washed to be ready for use.

MORAL WITHOUT PHYSICAL COURAGE.—Lieutenant W—— was at the storming of Morne Fortune in the West Indies. His behavior on that occasion excited general admiration. He was the first to ascend the breach and plant the king's colors on the captured redoubt. His gallantry was recorded in the orderly book, and he was recommended for immediate promotion. Strange to say, the following morning he waited on his commanding officer, then Lieutenant Colonel V——, and requested leave of absence to return to Ireland, his native country, and to resign his commission in favor of a younger brother, who was desirous of entering the service. The colonel, surprised at this extraordinary request on the part of a young officer with such bright prospects before him, very naturally asked him what motive induced him to make so singular a proposal; when the young man frankly told him that, when the troops were moving forward for the attack, and the enemy's fire had opened upon them, he felt a strong, almost an insurmountable disposition to fall out; and he believed that nothing but the rapidity of the advance, and the shouts of the men, prevented him from disgracing himself; but after a short time, he added, his brain was on fire, he knew not where he was, and he found himself on the summit of the breach, with the colors in his hand, he knew not how; but he added, not without hesitation, that he felt that the profession of arms was not his vocation; and fearing, that at some future period, he might not have sufficient courage to overcome his fear, he was desirous to leave the service with honor while it was still in his power.—[Dr. Millingen's "Mind and Matter."

Thou hast spoken of the Jew as the persecution of such as thou art has made him. Read the ancient history of the people of God, and tell me if those by whom Jehovah wrought such marvels among the nations were then a people of misers and usurers! And know, proud knight, we number names among us to which your boasted northern nobility is as the gourd compared with the cedar—names which ascend far back to those high times when the Divine presence shook the mercy-seat between the cherubim, and which derive their splendor from no earthly prince, but from the awful voice which bade their fathers be nearest of the congregation to the vision. Such were the princes of the house of Jacob.—[Rebecca in Ivanhoe.

NOVEL CURE FOR DRUNKENNESS.—An inveterate drunkard once asked a Quaker whether he knew of a method whereby he could cure himself of his dominant vice. "Friend," answered Broadbrim, "it is as easy as keeping thine hand open." "How can that be?" said the drunkard; "every man can keep his hand open; but as to abstaining from liquor, that's quite a different thing." "I will tell thee, friend," quoth the Quaker. "When thee has gotten a glass of gin in thine hand, and before thee dost raise the tempting liquor to thy lips, open thine hand—and keep it open. Thee breakest the glass, but thee breakest not the laws of sobriety."

A GORGEOUS DESCRIPTION.—Macaulay, in his History of England, thus, not less truly than grandly, describes Milton:—"A mightier poet, tried at once by pain, danger, poverty, obloquy, and blindness, meditated, undisturbed by the obscene tumult which raged all around him, a song so sublime and so holy, that it would not have misbecome the lips of those ethereal virtues whom he saw, with that inner eye which no calamity could darken, flinging down on the jasper pavement their crowns of amaranth and gold."

THE SECRET OF EDUCATION.—Repetition is the mother of all culture. Like the fresco painter, let the educator lay his colors on the wet chalk; they will dry in, indeed but he will renew them again and again until they remain and bloom for ever.—[Richter.

The stage at once gives a body to our thoughts, and refinement and expansion to our sensible impressions. It has neither the pride or remoteness of abstract science, nor the petty egotism of vulgar life.

Choice Miscellany.

SONG OF THE OUTLAWS.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

COME fill the brown bowl, boys, let care bide the morrow,
For Life's but a shaft that flies feathered with sorrow,
And Love is a hart, that hides far from the glade,
So timid at first, that he shuns his own shade.
Our bodies are bows, and we laugh, drink, and sing,
Just to ease the bent wood, boys, and slacken the string;
Then fill the brown bowl, boys, and let it go round,
Least the bow-string should snap with too sudden a bound.

Oh! the world is a greenwood in which we all dwell;
Some know all its wild paths, some tread but the dell;

And they who have found its broad beaten highway
Oft sigh for the shade in the heat of the day;
Ambition grows weary and pines for the glade,
Where he often in childhood 'mid happiness played,
And fame throws behind him a lingering look,
As the hunted stag glances when passing the brook.

'Tis better to fall at the head of the herd,
Than to fly back and perish, unmourned, unin-terred;

'Tis better to die grasping arrow and bow,
Amid those that we love, than be slave to a foe:
To be bound with the brave amid Victory's sheaves,
Than to wither the last ear the reaper's hand leaves;
For Life is the target at which Death's shafts fly,—
If they miss us we live—if they hit us we die.

If we die in the greenwood, the sound of the horn
Still rings out as sweetly, both even and morn;
And the stag bounds above us as freely, as when
Our loud whoop and hallo awakened the glen;
And the old hoary oaks just wave o'er us the same
As they did, when beneath them we started the game;

And the stream rolls as blithe, with its tink, tinkling song;
And the Abbey-bell rings out its merry ding-dong.

Let others go slumber beneath the cold stone,
Deep, silent, and dark; narrow, dreary, and lone;
Give me the green forest-turf for my last bed:
Where the hart and the hind will pass over my head;

Where the blue-bell and violet above me shall wave,
And the merry birds gaily sing over my grave;
Where a thousand old oaks will a watch round me keep,

And their broad branches roar, while they sing me to sleep.

Oh! the priest, when he shrives us, will smile at our deeds;

And the leech heave a sigh, as the ebbing heart bleeds:

For the soul, that but kindled when tyrants did wrong,

Shall have little to fear as it journeys along.
On our grave will the peasant drop many a tear,
And maidens at twilight be found kneeling there;
And pilgrim and minstrel beside it be seen, Breathing forth a low prayer for the outlaw in green.

SALADIN AND MELCHISEDECH.

FROM THE ITALIAN OF BOCCACCIO.

SALADIN, whose great talents were such as enabled him not only to raise himself from a humble station to the dignity of Sultan of Babylon, but also to be victorious in many battles with Saracen and Christian kings, having exhausted all his treasure by his various wars, and the prodigality of his magnificence, and being also from other causes in want of money, and finding it impossible to obtain, with necessary speed, so large a sum as he required, bethought himself of applying to a certain Jew, named Melchisedech, a money-lender of Alexandria, who possessed ample means of supplying his necessities, were he so inclined. But this Jew was so avaricious that Saladin felt sure that he would never, of his own free will, trust him with so much money; and not wishing to resort to violence, he considered how he might so reason with him as to render it impossible for him to refuse.

Having ordered the Jew to be brought before him, he received him graciously, caused him to be seated, and thus addressed him:

"Honest man, having heard from many persons that you are wise in the things appertaining to God, I would willingly know of you which you esteem the true one of the three laws of faith—the Jewish, the Saracen, or the Christian?"

The Jew, who was really a wise man, readily perceived the aim of the Sultan; and seeing that to whichever of the three forms of faith he might give the preference, his opinion would be used as an argument against himself, considered earnestly how he should frame a suitable reply, and after a short space answered thus:

"My lord, the question you have put to me is one of great moment, and in order to fitly answer it, I will relate a story which I have many times heard told:

"Many years ago there lived a man, who, among many other precious jewels, owned a very beautiful and valuable ring, which he esteemed so highly as to desire that it might always remain among his descendants; and therefore he commanded that one of his children in whose possession the ring should be found at the time of his death, should not only retain that, but be considered heir to all his father's other wealth, and be esteemed and honored as the eldest and greatest by his brothers and sisters.
The one to whom the ring descended, in compliance with this rule, directed that the same should be observed at his death; and thus the ring descended from hand to hand, through many generations, when it came into the possession of a man who had three children, all beautiful and virtuous youths, all equally obedient to their father, and all equally beloved by him. These young men knew the custom of the ring, and were each desirous of holding the first rank in the family, so they severally entreated their father in his old age to leave them, after his death, the ring. The old man, to whom they were all dear alike, promised it to each one privately, and then thought how he might content them all. He caused a certain cunning jeweler to make two other rings exactly similar to the first, and when they were finished, hardly might he who made them know the difference.
And shortly afterwards, when he was on his death-bed, he called each of his sons to him secretly, and gave to each a ring, and after a little while was gathered to his fathers. Now, when their father was dead, each son produced a ring, claiming to be the heir of all; but as there was no way of proving which of the three was the original one, the question could not be decided, and is even yet pending. And thus I reply to you, my lord, in regard to the question you proposed to me, concerning the three laws given to three nations by God the Father. Let each one conform to his own law, to the religion of his fathers, and obey the commandments they observe; to which belongs the superiority, as with the rings, the question is yet undecided!"

The sultan was delighted with the ingenious reasoning by which the Jew had avoided the snare laid for him; and openly told him of what he stood in need, and with what intention he had sent to have him brought before him; and Melchisedach, on his part, amply provided Sala-din with the money he required, for which he received full security and gifts; and during many succeeding years he remained about the sultan's court, who ever held him in great honor, and treated him as a friend.

WHITE PAPER.—Dr. Lancaster, a celebrated physician in his day, said he never heard English printers blamed so much for any thing as for their paper being too white. I have found by experience that eyes are very good things; and yet I will not say I found it out at first, for they say old Friar Bacon knew it, and even some ante-diluvians lived long enough to have discovered it. Now, brown paper preserves the eye better than white, and for that reason the wise Chinese write upon brown. So the Egyptians, so Aldus and Stephens printed; and on such paper or old vellum are old MS. printed; and when authors and readers agree to be wiser, we shall avoid printing on a glaring white paper.

LOVE'S PARTING WREATH.

I GIVE thee, love, a blooming braid;
I cull'd it at eve's witching hour;
I twined it in the moon's sweet shade,
When starlight's dew was on each flower.
I chose the myrtle's fadeless leaf,
For it will picture faith to thee;
I chose the cypress—'tis like grief,
And that may well my emblem be.
I placed the violet in my wreath—
Its sigh is memory's perfume;
I placed the rose, for its sweet breath
Survives its beauty's passing bloom.
Oh! not a flower is here entwined
That lays not on thy thought a spell—
"Forget-me-not" the wreath shall bind;
"Forget-me-not" is love's farewell.

MISTS AND FOGS.—This is a month of thawing and fogs; and we dare say, that not all of our readers could very readily explain what a fog is. Why is the air damp and thick only occasionally? Air, in proportion to its warmth, will unite with the vapor in water; thus—the steam from our tea-kettle, and from a railway steam-engine, soon fades away in the air, because the air unites with it, or dissolves it; and the warmer the air, the quicker the steam is dissolved by it. So long as the air has no more vapor of water, or steam, mixed with it than it can dissolve, it remains clear and invisible, the same as hot water dissolves a large quantity of Epsom salt, and yet remains bright. But so soon as the water gets cold, it lets go some of the Epsom salt, which again appears in crystals; and so the warm air, when it has in it as much vapor of water as it can hold, when it becomes colder lets go some of the vapor, and this, if slight, is called a mist, but if abundant or thick, a fog. These, then, are the vapor of water, deposited, or dropped by the air, as it becomes cold. This explains why mists and fogs are seen over one field, or over part of a field, or garden, and not over the remainder. The part where the mist appears, either is worse drained, or, from some other cause, is colder than the other parts, and, consequently, the air over it becomes cold faster than over the other parts, and, therefore, deposits its vapor first.—[Cottage Gardener.

THE ATMOSPHERE.—It is only the girdling and encircling air, which flows above and around all, that makes the "whole world kin."
The carbonic acid, with which our breathing fills the air, to-morrow will be spreading north and south, and striving to make the tour of the world. The date-trees that grow round the fountains of the Nile will drink it in by their leaves; the cedars of Lebanon will take of it to add to their stature; the cocoa-nuts of Tahiti will grow riper upon it; and the palms and bananas of Japan will change it into flowers. The oxygen we are breathing was distilled for us some short time ago by the magnolias of the Susquehanna and the great trees that skirt the Orinoco and the Amazon. The giant rhododendrons of the Himalayas contributed to it, the roses and myrtles of Cashmere, the cinnamon-trees of Ceylon, and forests older than the flood, buried deep in the heart of Africa, far behind the mountains of the moon. The rain which we see descending was thawed for us out of icebergs which have watched the polar star for ages; and lotus lilies have sucked up from the Nile, and exhaled as vapor, snows that are lying on the tops of the Alps.—[British Quarterly.

ON one occasion, when the Emperor Augustus was passing through the baths at Rome, he saw a veteran who had fought with him, rubbing himself, after bathing, against one of the col-ums. The emperor inquired why he had not a boy to do this? and being told that he was too poor, ordered him the means of paying one. On the next visit he saw at every column an old man rubbing himself; and on making the same inquiry, he received the same reply. His rejoinder, however, was not what they expected; for he said, "Well, gentlemen, as there are so many of you, I should advise you to rub one another." Augustus here taught them sound wisdom; he taught them not to depend on the caprice of a patron, but to help one another.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1849.

RURAL CEMETERIES.

A NEW taste for Rural Burying Grounds has sprung up, and been most rapidly diffused throughout this country, within the recollection of most of our readers; and in the neighborhood of all large towns, elegantly embellished Cemeteries have been established. The disgusting practice of burying the dead in cities is everywhere being given up, and a purer and more Christian sentiment of respect for the departed taking its place.

We have already noticed and commended the movements of our Order, which seems to be every where impressed with the importance and economy of Rural Cemeteries; and with the hope of seeing this newly developed taste become universal, we shall endeavor, as far as we can, to contribute to so auspicious a sentiment.

The attention of the Lodges of this city and neighborhood has been recently directed to the new Cemetery on Long Island, called the Cypress Hills. And as there seems to be a strong probability of a union of most, and we hope all the Lodges of New-York, Brooklyn, Williamsburg, Kings and Queens Counties, in purchasing a large tract in this Cemetery, we shall furnish our readers with some information which cannot but be interesting to the members of our Order, at this time, when all the Lodges have this matter before them.

We shall first of all give Brother C. Edwards Lester's Address, which was delivered to an assembly of upwards of 3000 persons, on the occasion of dedicating those extensive grounds to the solemn and beautiful purposes of a Cemetery and a landscape garden. We perceive that this eloquent address has been extensively copied into the journals of England, where it has received the highest commendation. The Brighton Gazette, of Jan. 11, says of it:

"It will be in the remembrance of many of our literati, that at the last anniversary dinner of the Royal Literary Fund Society, one of the most beautiful and impressive speeches ever heard in Free-Masons' Hall, was, on the spur of the moment, delivered by a distinguished American guest, Mr. C. Edwards Lester. The appearance of the gentleman, his delivery, his manner, and his matter, were alike admirable, and will not soon be forgotten by those who had the good fortune to hear him: while those who were not so favored, equally with those who were, will be pleased that we now take the opportunity of extracting from a very recent number of a New-York journal, the following eloquent address from the same "Chrysostom," pronounced upon an occasion not less applicable to our own country than to that of our Transatlantic Cousins, and, as a piece of genuine and effective oratory, not easily to be matched among the rich stores of our common language. We are convinced that the readers of the Brighton Gazette will thank us for enabling them to partake in the pleasure and the profit we ourselves have felt in the perusal of the following oration:—"

DEDICATION ADDRESS.

Friends and Fellow-Citizens: We have assembled to-day on these Cypress Hills to dedicate to the repose of the grave and the hopes of immortality, this new Thanatopsis. We halt an hour, in our march over the waste of time, and leave the spot where we stood, sacred for ever.

It is a grand and a solemn occasion. Here, midway between the creation of man and the great day of the Resurrection, we are come to prepare a tomb of repose for an hundred generations. We are rescuing from the turmoil and strife of a crazy world, one green spot on earth's bosom that will be watched over tenderly by the guardian angels of those who sleep here—and on which the eye that never slumbers will look with approbation—for in the touching language of the Bible, we become co-workers with him in preserving the forms of earth's children. He will one day clothe with immortality.

We are performing an act, too, which the spirits of all the gifted of the ancient world are contemplating with satisfaction, if there be one out-look from the sky, where the departed can still gaze on the shifting time-drama they once moved in. I can imagine who make up this glorious company, if indeed their spirits are hovering over it.

The ethereal train would be led by the great Seer and Father of the eastern world. Heaven itself became his biographer, and Inspiration the historian of the first Rural Cemetery ever founded—"And Sarah died in Hebron, and Abraham came to mourn and weep for her. And Abraham stood up from before his dead, and spake unto the sons of Heth—I am a stranger and a sojourner with you—give me possession of a burying place with you, that I may bury my dead. And the children of Heth answered—in the choice of our sepulchers bury thy dead—none of us shall withhold from thee his sepulcher. And Abraham stood up and showed himself to the children of Heth, and he communed with them, saying—If it be your mind that I should bury my dead, hear me, and entreat for me to Ephron, the son of Zohar, that he may give me the cave of Machpelah, that is by the end of his field, for as much money as it is worth, he shall give it me for a possession of a burying place. And Ephron answered—Nay, my lord, hear me. The field give I thee, and the cave that is therein: I give it thee in the presence of the sons of my people—bury thy dead. And Abraham bowed himself before the people of the land, and said—I pray thee hear me; I will give thee money for the field—take it of me, and I will bury my dead there. And Ephron answered—the land is worth four hundred shekels of silver—what is that betwixt me and thee? bury therefore thy dead. And Abraham weighed to Ephron four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchants, and he purchased the field and the cave, and all the trees that were in the field, that were in all the borders round about, were made sure unto Abraham for a possession for a burying place."

Such is the touching story of the most ancient Rural Cemetery of which history speaks. And with the same sublime and tender feeling, a thousand stricken hearts among all nations have consecrated and adorned the places where they have laid their loved ones to rest. The feelings of the patriarch spring up unbidden in every human bosom.

The companion of his joys and his sufferings had left him. He felt the need of a family burying ground, and he chose a secluded corner in the cemetery of the people among whom he was a stranger, adorned with green trees around the tomb and around all its borders. It was a quiet rural spot, and he would pay for it with silver, and own the soil, that it might not be invaded for ever. A sadness came over his spirit after the heavy blow had fallen. He was among strangers, and there was a balm to his heart, in the thought that his loved one was reposing in ground secured to him for ever—where the lost cherished form was mingling warmly with the kindly earth, amid the singing of birds and the rustling of the waving green trees. Ages flowed on, untriflingly, and time's all desolating stream that undermines everything human, kept its flow—but it swept harmlessly by the rural field of Machpelah. Abraham had been dead two thousand years, and the long line of the Patriarchs were borne to their repose by his side. But heaven had not forgotten the grave of his family—its history was taken up by the pen of inspiration; proud empires had risen and gone to decay—but we are told that in the times of the Saviour Abraham's sepulcher was still preserved.

In that white robed company of winged beings who would cluster around us, would be, too, the half-divine form of Homer, who gave Greece her heroism and poetry, and flung over the tombs of her great children the wreath of undying fame—of Phidias, Cleomines, and Praxiteles, who filled their cemeteries and temples with breathing marbles—of the divine Plato, who revealed to the spiritual-minded Greeks the immortality of the soul—of Cicero and Virgil, who infused into the civilization of Rome the elegant taste of the Greeks—in a word, of all the great and the good who have, amid the struggles and gloom of a working world, directed mankind to the better life to come.

No nation on earth but our own has ever buried its dead amid the habitations of the living. We have done it, from some motive that will not be readily understood by posterity. But its consequences will be felt by our children—indeed, they are now felt by ourselves. Already the growth of our large towns and the progress of an age of steam have everywhere invaded the sanctuaries of the dead—affection can no longer find the memorial it placed over the object of its love, when it comes on a distant pilgrimage to the grave of the lost; and the monument, which was believed to be the herald of virtue to a future age, has been torn down by the ruthless hand of "public good."

To escape these Vandal invasions, and leave the weary undisturbed, the founders of this Cemetery have gone beyond the turmoil of our cities into the still country, where they could secure repose to the ashes entrusted to their charge, till they shall wake to sleep no more!

With these hopes and sentiments, we cheerfully beckon the weary and the suffering to the unbroken repose of this Rural Thanatopsis; we welcome the sorrowing and the broken-hearted to these sacred Hills. By these silver lakes ye may make your bed in peace—along these peaceful valleys the hum of earth's distracting cares will never come. We will plant the graceful willows to weep over your dust—the sweetest zephyrs shall wake music from waving boughs around your home, and the wild bird shall pour out his requiem strain over your pillow. We will train the "ivy-never-sere" over your monument, and teach the winter-loving evergreen to cling to you through the frost. And when the first warm sunbeam of spring looks into your secluded dell, the pale violet and the white snow-drop shall bloom over your resting place.

We know of no reason why the Rural Cemetery may not be made cheerful for the living, as well as sacred to the dead; a spot to which genius and sentiment may come for lessons of art, virtue and wisdom.

Such was the idea of the Ancients, who regarded death as an honorable termination to a life of toil and heroism—and hence the burial places of the Greeks were associated with images of taste, cheerfulness, art, and refinement. Such was the idea of the Hebrews, who consecrated their most beautiful grounds for the sepulchers of their fathers, and embellished them with the richest adornments. Christianity, too, which elevates every noble principle of man's nature, and refines his purest feelings, has sanctified the tomb of the Christian. It becomes something more than the sarcophagus of the ancients, which preserved honored ashes. It is the hallowed mausoleum, where the form is sleeping that will one day put on immortality.

The early Christians appear to have had none of those revolting ideas about the grave, with which moderns have so frequently associated it; and many of the most picturesque spots in the Orient were chosen by them for the sites of their temples, under whose solemn shadows they laid their departed to rest. There are a thousand slightly hills along the shores of the Mediterranean, where the grey towers of early Christian churches and convents are still relieved against the sky, and these consecrated places are marked by tall cypresses that cast their somber shades over early generations.

To this day the Moravians, who preserve many of those touching primeval customs that had their origin in the purer days of Christianity, regard their burial places as the dearest and most attractive spots. They never use the word death—they speak of their lost only as the departed. They educate their children to visit the graves of their fathers with cheerfulness and pleasure, to peruse their studies and take their walks of relaxation there, enlivening their moments of toil, by emblems of immortality.

The Greeks called their Cemeteries by the touching and beautiful name, gardens of the reposing. Where did our cold, revolting, forbidding and disgusting notions of a grave-yard come from? Not from the old Egyptians, Phœnicians, Romans or Greeks; not from the elegant nations of modern Europe; and they certainly never came from the sepulcher of the Christian, where we

"See truth, love and mercy in triumph descending,
And nature all glowing in Eden's first bloom,
On the cheek of death smiles and roses are blending,
And beauty, immortal, awakes from the tomb."

With the desire of combining in the grounds of the Cypress Hills, all that is touching, picturesque and beautiful, that can be borrowed from the classic and the Christian world, and with a wish to see all classes of our fellow citizens able to participate in the tender interest, associations and advantages of such a spot, we have established this Cemetery. We feel that death levels all distinctions among men; the prince and the beggar are the same, and they should appear the same in God's temple and in the grave. There can be no real distinctions in death, and there should appear none. If there be a blessing in wealth which should make it desired by all, it is that it may exempt us from wasting care and toil on earth and give us an honored grave when we die, embellished by taste, where affection may come to rear its monument and plant its flowers. If then, taste, genius and wealth have adorned a common Cemetery for the citizens of a town or a district, why should not its advantages be open to all? The fortunate and the learned may come to these grounds, and they shall find their purest tastes for landscape and artistic beauty gratified—but we will welcome, with equal cordiality and respect, the hard hand of honest toil. Here the poor man shall sleep as proudly as royalty.

Such are the objects and feelings with which this Cemetery has been founded, and such are the sentiments with which we commend it to our successors for ever.

Over this hallowed cluster of fraternal Cemeteries let the spirit of peace and beauty reign, till that final morning when the angel of the resurrection spreading the shadow of his broad wing over the troubled ocean, lifts the trumpet, whose blast shall wake the dead of the western world!

The following is a description of the location and scenery of the Cypress Hills:

Three hundred acres are now being laid out, and when it becomes necessary the grounds may be extended; since by a recent statute of the Legislature, this Cemetery can hold five hundred acres of ground, which makes it the largest Cemetery in the world.

No spot in the vicinity of New York embraces a greater variety of landscape, or a grander or more picturesque view. The Cemetery faces the south. The front (30 acres) is a lawn, gradually rising up to a high range of hills, from which the entire grounds of the Cemetery are visible, with the exception of dells and secluded spots, which are hidden by forests and shrubbery, or intervening undulations and hills. From this point the view is very extensive and magnificent. Away to the south stretches the broad Atlantic, bounded only by the horizon, and every vessel approaching the coast comes within the view. On the south-west stands Neversink, at whose base homeward and outward-bound fleets cluster, in entering and leaving the Narrows—and beyond it are seen the hills and plains of New Jersey. On the west lies Brooklyn, with its numerous spires; to the north-west, New York, with the Bay and the Hudson, crowned by the Palisades relieved against the sky. Williamsburg is visible, with the East River, to the north, and the hills of Connecticut bound the view on the north-east. Jamaica lies to the eastward, and far down the island spread rich fields, forests and hills. Within this wide sweep of horizon, which embraces a circle of immense extent, one of the finest scenes on the continent is embraced; and from the top of the monument to General Woodhull and the Martyrs of the Prison-Ships, to be erected on the highest point of the Cemetery, the most extensive view in the country will be visible.

The internal scenery of the Cemetery is not less striking. It is variegated by every alternation of surface. In laying out the carriage roads to develop the beauty of the landscape from every point, they extend about 40 miles. They climb every hill, and descend into almost every valley. They wind along the shores of more than a dozen wild cold spring lakes, (which, on attempt to drain, have been found to be perennial,) which are entirely surrounded by the most beautiful shrubbery and trees, and these lakes rest upon bottoms of variegated gravel, now covered by beds of rich loam. About one half of the ground is covered by a heavy forest, and the rest is made up of a luxuriant undergrowth of all the forest trees of Long Island, and green rich fields, on which several thousand choice nursery trees have been set out, to line the roads and avenues—thus furnishing, in the wild luxuriance of nature and the chaste embellishments of art, the blended beauties that are sought for in wild scenery and landscape gardening.

By consulting the map, and visiting the grounds with it for a guide, the visitor will perceive that the roads have been laid out to suit the scenery. Beyond the front lawn, the ways are all irregular, to conform to the surface, and they are not made so merely to have them winding. There are three great arteries that shoot through the Cemetery. The Lake Road, and the Valley Road, which wind around every lake and thread every valley, showing all the internal scenery—and the Highland Way, which sweeps along the hills, and commands the ocean and the distant landscape, and looks down upon the Lake and Valley Roads below.

Such are these grounds as they were made by nature, changed by a few months' labor. It is easy to imagine on visiting them, what they will become when they shall have been clothed with the embellishments of art.

The most accomplished artists have been employed for this purpose, and no reasonable expense will be spared in embellishing the place. It is the design of the Trustees to blend the beauties of a Cemetery with an extensive landscape garden, in which every appropriate shrub, tree and flower, that can grow in our climate, may be brought to perfection, and a large quantity of the richest evergreens will render the grounds cheerful even after the frost has stripped them of their foliage.

The advantages of the Cypress Hills, facility of access, &c., are thus set forth:

In the establishment of the Cypress Hills, particular reference was had to the necessities and accommodation of ecclesiastical, benevolent, social, and humane Societies. A large number of these associations have already located their grounds here, and others are continually applying. In a short time, the Cypress Hills will present what has, it is believed, never before existed—a fraternal cluster of Cemeteries, surrounded by one common enclosure, where every church and society may consecrate its own grounds according to their ideas of duty and feeling, and embellish them as their own means or taste may dictate. Such organizations have already perceived, that it is far more economical for them to purchase grounds in such a Cemetery, than to incur the necessarily large expense of starting and keeping up distinct and separate places of burial. Here they are saved all expenses of incorporation, roads and avenues; of office rent, trustees, treasurers, secretaries; and of the perpetual outlays for keepers of the grounds, gardeners, artists, and embellishments. By a moment's calculation any one may convince himself that the incidental, but unavoidable expenses of a separate burial ground, for a church or society, would soon far exceed the cost of purchasing a tract at the Cypress Hills large enough for any social or religious organization for a long time to come. Any private burial place too, is not only deprived of the great advantages of a large and magnificently-embellished Cemetery; but, being smaller, is regarded with less attention and respect, and is more likely to suffer in the convulsions and changes of society, and at last be sacrificed to the "public good," which will be almost sure, in the end, to invade its sacredness, and even excavate its tombs and scatter their ashes. But in public Cemeteries, where all classes, associations, and interests of society, are fully represented, a common enclosure is a common defense; and the time is not likely ever to come, when one or more generations have hallowed the ground of such a spot, that its sacredness and repose would ever be disturbed.

Although under the privileges of our incorporation, we might have located our Cemetery nearer to Brooklyn, yet we did not feel that we could do so with safety, for the rapid growth of that city has already outstripped all former calculations.

Cypress Hills is located less than two miles beyond the eastern line of the Corporation of Brooklyn; and it is considerably nearer the center of population, and the center of New York City itself, than Greenwood, which is now felt to be quite near enough to our busy cities.

Cypress Hills is as accessible as could be desired. The Long Island Railroad passes the front of the Cemetery at a distance of about eighty rods. An avenue leads up to the entrance of the grounds from the station, where all the trains have their regular stopping place. The president and directors of this road have offered the trustees every facility with the most liberal spirit. A car will be constructed expressly for funeral processions; and, in fifteen minutes from the time of leaving the Brooklyn depot, the procession is at the Cemetery. The expense of passage in all funeral processions has been reduced by the directors so low, that whatever number of friends may attend the dust of their departed to its final repose, at any hour, on any day, for the low price of ten dollars, and with little sacrifice of time.

As soon as the train arrives at the "Cypress Hills Station," the funeral car is detached, and the train goes on. The Cemetery hearse is always at the station; and every procession will have the attention of an experienced, intelligent, and gentlemanly man, to render every service which necessity or affection may require.

The Receiving Tomb is constructed of stone and iron, with every possible convenience, and its use for thirty days may be had gratuitously, by all persons burying at the Cypress Hills.

We understand that there are now five regular trains of cars leaving Brooklyn every day—so that for an expense of about ten cents for each person, a company may attend a deceased friend to the grave by any of the regular trains. In cases where members of Benevolent Societies are buried, the whole Order could attend, and the entire expense be ten dollars, and not more than an hour, or a little more, be consumed.

We understand that a large number of lots have been sold, and funerals are taking place every day. We rejoice at the success of a Cemetery which brings the elegant embellishments of a landscape garden, with the security of a quiet resting place, within the reach of the means of any economical and industrious man.

It has hitherto been a serious objection urged against Rural Cemeteries, that the cost of a lot was so great few could afford the expense. This remedy is obviated at the Cypress Hills, where a single lot of 400 square feet can be had for $35.

We believe that the particular site, which the committee appointed by the Convention of the I. O. of O. F., were most pleased with, was the lawn and high hill on the south-west side of the Cemetery. It is certainly one of the most beautiful positions in all the grounds. We hope it may not be long before this fine hill will be crowned with a splendid monument to Friendship, Love and Truth.

PLATO.

Among all writers and philosophers, ancient or modern, the grand figure of Plato stands pre-eminent in beauty, majesty, and strength. Notwithstanding he lived nearly twenty-five hundred years ago, he is still recognised as the master of human thought, and his wisdom is felt to be a beam of the Infinite Brightness.

Mr. R. Waldo Emerson has recently delivered a lecture upon the characteristics of the ancient sages, which is a just and beautiful analysis of the philosophers. He says, "Plato is philosophy, and philosophy is Plato."

In him, too, is found the auroral beams of Christianity; and here is forecast the Koran of Mohammed. Everybody finds his peculiar taste gratified in Plato. To the French he is Parisian, to the German Teutonic. In this respect he is like Helen of Argos, whose beauty made everybody that saw her feel related to her. It is remarkable that uncertainty exists as to the authenticity of some of the writings of genius—of Homer, of Plato, of Shakspeare. This is because these great minds magnetized and assimilated to themselves those about them, and thus each lived in several bodies. It is said that Plato plagiarized. "It is only the inventor who knows how to borrow," and the stupendous genius of Plato could not but absorb all the learning of the times. Another merit of Plato was, that being a philosopher, he was something beyond, he was a poet. A man, to attain perfection in any department, must stand on higher ground than he works upon. The biography of Plato is short. So is that of all geniuses; it is written in their books; and in the painting of Plato's pen, we are to look for the portraits of his family, and the pictures of his home. Plato was a patrician by birth—in early life he had an inclination for war, but was arrested by the persuasions of Socrates, with whom he remained from the age of twenty till thirty. Then Plato traveled to Italy, to Egypt, to Babylon, it is said; and, returning from his tour, instituted his celebrated Academy at Athens, and finally died in the act of writing, at the age of eighty-one years.

The writings of Plato are ever young, ever modern: for in them exists, in the germ, the Europe of our day. This is the test of genius; it is ever young, never outgrown by any passage of time. Emerson said: "All ontology existed in two departments—unity and variety. By prayer, by religion we soar to unity, having communion with God. Hence the religious and enlightened man can never be selfish; he has felt the living sense of his being in God, and the same God is everything about him; 'the words I and mine constitute ignorance.' To the religious, 'form is imprisonment; that which the soul seeks is resolution into being above form,' 'emancipation from organization.' Plato learned in Asia this religion, which ever goes back from the varied irradiation of the one to its central being. He also possessed Italian intellect and art, to trace his way back again from the one to the diffusion of variety. 'He shall be as a god to me, said Plato, who can rightly divide and define." "When I see, he said, one who can see the whole and the parts, I tread in his steps like those of a god." Devotion, says Emerson, bathes in the central sunlight of the one; Art represents the one by variety; Intellect races and detects the one and the same in its variety. Religion, Art, Intellect—all these had Plato. "He united the freest poetry with the most exact geometry;" his energy of thought was like the momentum of the falling planet, his discretion like the return to the curve." Plato believed in preternatural faculties. He knew, too, that the sublime essence of all being is beyond the stretch of human ken. But in this respect Emerson criticised Plato: Though immense of vision, he had Platonized the subjects of his thoughts and "fixed his copy-right upon the world." But it is the creation of God and not of Plato, and no partial intelligence can expound it, except to the limits of a finite understanding, and with the coloring of an imperfect mind. Plato, moreover, was too equal, too complete; you are never in his writings startled and thrilled by "the scream of the prophet," or the swaying force of the unlettered Arab. "Socrates and Plato," says Emerson, "are the double star which no instrument has been able entirely to separate." It was a happy thing that Socrates, "the wise Æsop of the mob," yet so honest and enthusiastic in religion, early impressed Plato, and took a lasting position in the foreground of his mind."

GRAND LODGE OF MICHIGAN.

We have received the printed journal of the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of Michigan, at its last semi-annual session, and from it make the following extracts, being portions of the Grand Master's report, which is a very interesting document:

THE DIFFICULTY IN NEW-YORK.

But while we are thus congratulating ourselves upon the peace and harmony which prevails among us at home, we must not be unmindful of the troubles and difficulties existing in our Order in a neighboring jurisdiction. It was to have been hoped that the decision of the Grand Lodge of the United States upon the questions which divide the brotherhood in the State of New York, would have been quietly submitted to, whatever the decision may have been. But I have reason to believe that such is not the case. I am informed that the dissentients to the decision of the Grand Lodge of the United States still keep up their organization of a State Grand Lodge, and refuse to acknowledge the decision of the Grand Lodge of the United States as binding upon them, thus presenting an exhibition of insubordination, which I had hoped not to see in such high places, and which, for the welfare and prosperity of the Order, is much to be lamented.

I do not propose, at this time, to go into any detailed discussion of the merits of the controversy, or the conclusion arrived at by the Grand Lodge, in deciding the questions referred to them. Your representatives to that Lodge will doubtless lay before you, in their reports, full information in relation to this and other important matters, which come up during the session. It is for this Lodge to decide what course shall be pursued by the subordinate Lodges in this jurisdiction, with regard to the reception of visitors from Lodges in that State, not recognizing the decisions and mandates of the Grand Lodge of the United States.

WILDEY ANNUITY.

The Grand Lodge of the United States, at its last session, adopted measures for the pecuniary relief of Past Grand Sire Wildey, appropriating funds from the treasury of the Grand Lodge sufficient to relieve him from his present embarrassments, and recommending contributions from subordinate Lodges and Encampments, throughout the United States, towards creating a fund, to be called the "Wildey Fund," designed to reimburse the treasury of the Grand Lodge; and for the purpose of providing for the comfort of his remaining days, they request contributions for the creating an annuity fund, to be called the "Wildey Annuity," believing that a small contribution from each Lodge, obtained in this manner, will render him adequate relief. The relations existing between P. G. Sire Wildey and the Order, regarding him as a "Father in Odd-Fellowship," would seem to sanction the propriety of the course pursued by the Grand Lodge.

Yet it would, in the opinion of the undersigned, have been better to have relied upon these voluntary contributions exclusively, than to have established a precedent likely to be productive of much evil in the Order. If this Grand Lodge should concur in the propriety of the course pursued by the Grand Lodge of the United States, it is probable that an expression, in some form to that effect, directed to the subordinate Lodges, would more readily elicit their action in the premises.

STATE OF THE ORDER IN MICHIGAN.

Brothers, since the establishment of our Order in this State, it has pleased an Over-Ruling and All-Wise Providence to prosper and bless us, to a very great degree. It is but about five years since a few brothers assembled in an obscure place in this city, and established the first Lodge of Odd-Fellows in Michigan. Now we have in full and successful operation, thirty-nine Lodges, generally in a prosperous condition, composed of over two thousand five-hundred members. This rapid increase is almost unprecedented, except in our Order; and it has been frequently urged as an argument against its permanency. The best answer that can be made to this objection is to point to our actions. During the year ending the 30th of June last, 296 brothers had received relief from their Subordinate Lodges, in the sum of $2,975—the sum of $105 was paid for the relief of widowed families, and $581 expended in the burying of the dead—making a total expenditure of $3,649, by the Lodges in this jurisdiction, for these several purposes of relief. That the distribution of this amount of money, in a quiet and unostentatious manner, has been the means of much good, cannot be questioned. Whether we shall continue to progress in as healthy and prosperous a manner as heretofore, will mainly depend upon ourselves. Too much care cannot be observed by us, in the carefully guarding the funds of our Lodges against improper and unnecessary appropriations. In many of the young, as well as older Lodges, I greatly fear that a desire to expend their income to a great extent, upon the procuring of costly regalias, and in the embellishment of Lodge Rooms, is apt to be too prevalent. The troubles arising from an impoverished treasury, are great obstacles to the successful carrying out of the principles of the Order. More especially are we warned by the evidences already near to our doors, that we may, during the present year, be called upon more extensively than ever, to illustrate our principles. A fearful pestilence is now hovering over us, and it becomes our duty as Odd-Fellows, to have our houses in order, that it may not find us unprepared. Make no expenditures that can be avoided, unless you have an ample fund invested, at your control in time of need. Be assured that the carrying into practice the duties of Odd-Fellowship, a well-filled treasury will be found a great auxiliary. Hoping that your deliberations will be conducted in a spirit of brotherly love, and that they will redound to the benefit of the Order, I submit these few suggestions, promising my cordial co-operation.

BENJAMIN FOLLET, Grand Master.

A correspondent writing from Detroit says:

It gives me much pleasure to say, our numbers, although not increasing with the rapidity which mark some of our sister States, are yet steadily and quietly augmenting. There has been, during the term just ended, in Subordinate Lodges, 297 initiations, 84 admitted by card, a few suspensions and rejections, and 7 deaths. Our Lodges generally are in a healthy condition, so that should the cholera come along we are fully prepared to meet it. 194 P. Gs.; 2552 Members; 39 Lodges.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP IN MAINE.—The Order is increasing more rapidly in Maine, than in some other States where it was earlier established, and apparently with better prospects. The citizens of Maine are not so impulsive as are those of other sections of the country, but when their minds are made up to approve an object, there is a commendable hold on to them, which gives assurance of its progress. Their climate is somewhat colder than here, and vegetation does not start up so early by some weeks, but their deep, rich soil gets warmed up after a while, and the abundant crops of harvest time put to shame the fears excited by small beginnings, and the sneers too, of a spring sun competition. It has been thus with the planting and growth of Odd-Fellowship in Maine, and thus will it be in its maturity. A better set of Brothers than those with whom we are acquainted Down East, never wore an Odd-Fellow's regalia.—[Odd-Fellow.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP IN WESTERN NEW-YORK.

BYRON LODGE, No. 365.—D. D. G. M. J. G. Barber, assisted by P. Gs. J. P. Vincent, A. D. Lampkins, E. Gray, and N. Gs. J. S. Gibson and T. J. Leonard, on the 22d inst., instituted Byron Lodge, No. 365, at Byron Center, Genesee county.

The occasion was a highly interesting one, and there was a large number of visiting brothers in attendance. The Hall is comme il faut in all respects, and well it may be, for the efficient and liberal committee of arrangements are compelled to acknowledge that for the gratifying results of their labors, in fitting up and decorating the room, they are chiefly indebted to the taste and industry of the Byron ladies.

After the installation a number of brothers were admitted by card, and several candidates initiated into the Order.

The officers installed, for the present term, were B. J. Lynd, N. G.; S. L. Loomis, V. G.; A. Loomis, Sec.; D. Byam, Treas.; and Z. Crocker, Per. Sec.

The Lodge has chosen Thursday as its night of meeting.

STAFFORD LODGE, No. 358.—Rep. C. F. Bissel, of LeRoy Lodge, No. 119, read a lecture before Stafford Lodge, No. 358, on the evening of the 20th inst., which was well calculated to cause those who heard it to love the Order for its own intrinsic excellencies. The three cardinal virtues—Friendship, Love, and Truth, were each presented by the lecturer, in a manner at once concise, beautiful and eloquent.

This Lodge was originally organized by the authority of the so-called Grand Lodge, and worked under it until the decision of the R. W. G. L. of U. S. on that subject, when without a dissenting voice the brothers voted to petition the legal G. L. for a charter, which being granted, they were placed in a legitimate position in the Order.

The Lodge is in a prosperous condition, and although several have withdrawn to form a Lodge at Byron there is a goodly number left and more to come.

The officers of the present term are T. J. Leonard, N. G.; M. P. State, V. G.; G. Wilson, Sec.; A. Wilson, Treas.; and A. C. Dodge, Per. Sec. Meeting night Tuesday. Yours, Fraternally, D. J. S.

J. C. BOOTH'S CLOTHING AND FURNISHING ESTABLISHMENT.—This extensive and elegant establishment is located at No. 27 Cortlandt-street, New-York. But notwithstanding this great depot of clothing is located here, there is scarcely a business man in the Union, who has ever visited New York, but is familiar with it, and has found in its ample cases some article which he felt necessary to complete his costume. We speak from experience, when we say that the clothing turned out by this establishment is made of the best cloths, in the very best style, and always fits. Ready-made garments, shirts, hosiery, gloves, suspenders, scarfs, cravats in endless varieties, and of all prices, always on hand. We advise our readers to call and look at the place, whether they purchase any thing or not. It is a curiosity.

DIRECTORY OF THE I. O. O. F. OF NEW-YORK.—We shall give our readers, next week, a complete directory of the Order in this State, containing a list of all the Lodges, Encampments, and Degree Lodges, with their present standing in the Order.

THE BRAVO'S DAUGHTER.—We regret that we are obliged once more—through the non-arrival of the copy—to omit this beautiful and interesting story. We hope to be able to resume it in our next.

HUDSON RIVER.—The navigation of the Hudson River has commenced, and those superb boats, the Isaac Newton, Hendrick Hudson, Rip Van Winkle, Confidence, Oregon, &c., are now running daily between this city and Albany.

A GLANCE AT EUROPE.

ANOTHER arrival from Europe—and in a short time we shall give to our readers a weekly summary of all the important events concerning the Old World. The year 1849 is equally destined to be pregnant with great changes in favor of Republicanism, and in opposition to existing tyranny. The people begin to learn the great advantages of having a Free Government instead of a Monarchy, and the difference is easily known when we cast a look only to the financial expenditures of various nations under despotism, and compare them to those enjoying the blessedness of liberalism. The Roman States, counting all together a population of three millions of inhabitants, were obliged to pay to His Holiness, Pius IX, six hundred thousand crowns a year; while the United States, with twenty-three millions of citizens, pay to their president the small amount of twenty-five thousand dollars. Besides the Pope, the Romans were to pay the Cardinal, the Bishop, what not, and even the Prelate's mistresses. All Italy knows this scandal, and there was but theocracy and despotism, and the beautiful and glorious word Republic was banished from that beautiful country. There appears to be, in some parts of Europe a temporary lull, at this moment; but the storm is only suspended, we are sure that it has not blown away, and in less than a month, all the Old World will be set on fire, there will be a general war, not between nation and nation, but between freedom and tyranny. The struggle will be hard and terrible, it will be long and full of all the horrors of a battle of life or death, but we have faith that democracy shall raise proudly from the ruins of monarchy, and freedom shall be the only government of the whole European continent.

"Yet, Freedom! yet, thy banner, torn, but flying, Streams like a meteor 'gainst the stormy wind."

If France should interfere in favor of the Pope, or should the government allow Austrian intervention in Italy, another intervention in Italy, another convulsion in France would be inevitable, and the same impulse will be thereby given to democratic action all over the world. The popular movements of Hungary and Italy are far from being suffocated so soon, the Magyars have fought bravely against the hordes of Austria, and the same example will be followed by the Republican children of beautiful Italy. The Republic of Rome, united with the Etrurian commonwealth, have already elected their president in spite of the excommunication and threats of their former sovereigns, and the question of Constitutional Government at Rome, and at Florence, can scarcely be settled by the point of the bayonet. For those who have never traveled in the south of Italy cannot form an idea of the implacable hatred of those people against any foreign dominion; they would fight to the last, and are capable, these Romans of modern times, to give an example to the world worthy of the memory and valor of their glorious ancestors. We shall begin our foreign miscellany with

ENGLAND.

The commercial accounts from the mother country are very satisfactory, although in cotton there was less business than when the America left. The terrible accounts from East India and from Russia have caused some uneasy feelings, and it is said that they have operated injuriously upon the business of the country. In Parliament the suggestions of the philanthropic Mr. Cobden to cut down the expenditure £10,000,000 per annum were rejected. In foreign affairs Lord Palmerston, who has so well ruined the affairs of Italy, has been supported by Parliament in the course he has found himself compelled to take, especially in the Sicilian disputes. We may say that the amiable Lord does not know yet the general spirit which animates the Sicilian population; they will reject any offer of arrangement with the king of Naples, and will trust themselves to the fate of war.

INDIA

Is at present the topic of all conversation in England. The terrible accounts from the seat of war have caused as much sensation to John Bull as did the fall of Vera Cruz to Santa Anna. The Bombay Telegraph says that a most murderous conflict occurred on the left bank of the river Jhelum, near, as some say, to the identical spot which 2,000 years ago formed the battle-field of Alexander and Porus. The Sikh forces were under Rajah Shwere Sing, had gained a most glorious victory—98 officers and 2,500 men were killed, 4 guns were captured, and 5 regimental colors were taken by the enemy. The Bengal Cavalry Regiment passed over to the side of the Sikhs. This news is of the most disastrous kind to England, and it is generally believed that two battles more of a similar nature would put the English population of the East Indies in a very difficult position. We have reason to believe that two British corps of dragoons who retreated before the enemy were all children of Erin, who, to avenge their unfortunate and oppressed country, thought well to pass to the side of the Sikhs.

IRELAND

Is always in statu quo. Part of her inhabitants are starving, others perish crossing the Atlantic, and many are condemned to serve in a foreign country, and to fight against people who are struggling in the same cause. The great misfortune of this beautiful country is the priestly craft, and the landlords, who spend their money in England; and the other evil is the iron sway of English despotism. Few parts of the world have furnished such eminent talents and distinguished warriors as Ireland, yet you can't think of that Island now but with contempt at seeing a people who prefer to die by starvation rather than at the point of the bayonet.

FRANCE

And the Government continue to gather strength. The labors of the Assembly have ceased to be of any interest, and the high court at Bourges engaged in the trial of Barbes and Blanqui. The celebrated Vidocq is one of the witnesses, as also Lamartine, Arago, Marrast, and about 200 others. A debate of great interest took place in the Assembly with reference to the attitude to be taken by France in relation to Rome and Tuscany. Ledru Rollin spoke for some length in favor of Italy; he declared that France had to defend the freedom of the present Republics of the Italian Peninsula, and wished that she should attach herself to the Constitution of May, 1848—that is to say, to help and to support any nation struggling for their independence.

ROME AND TUSCANY

Form two Federal Republics, and have named their President, Congress and Senate! The Vice President of the Roman commonwealth is the Prince Canino, a cousin of Louis Napoleon, and one of the most learned and liberal men of Europe. The Pope and the Duke of Tuscany have protested against their rebellious subjects, and have asked foreign intervention. It is said that the King of Naples, Spain and Austria will co-operate in this infamous plot against the freedom of those people, and against all rights of nations. Charles Albert, the King of Sardinia, who betrayed the Italians in 1821 and '48, will march some troops into Tuscany to hinder civil war! There are no internal dissensions in that country; the true intent of this renegade is to attack the Etrurian Republic, and to make common cause with the enemies of Italy. Such a treacherous step may cost him his royal and crowned head, and while his own States would revolutionize against his movements, Genoa would proclaim herself independent, and a Republic.

SPAIN.

Notwithstanding the imbecility of the young Queen, in spite of the intrigues of her mother, and of the cruel minister Narvaez, this miserable peninsula has not lost all hope for a better future. There is still seed of republicanism, and the failure of the attempts made in March, 1848, will teach them to organize their proceedings better for a future occasion. A republican movement is said to have broken out in Barcelona, Tiquera and Gerona, and Isabella's troops, sent in a crusade against the Romans will be recalled to protect her declining power.

AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY

Are battling more fiercely than ever. The Hungarians fought bravely in all their battles, and although they were obliged to retreat, after two days of great slaughter, before Oilan, the Vienna papers say that many such victories as the Austrians won there would, ere long, bring the Hungarians to the gates of Vienna. The brave General Bem, at the head of 140,000 men, has marched into Hungary, and left Transylvania to the Russians. All the Italian regiments under Austria, employed in the war against the Magyars, have joined the enemy, and the termination of this cruel war seems still to be very remote.

DENMARK AND PRUSSIA

Are ready to resume hostilities, and are concentrating large forces at Kolding. The King of Prussia, wishing to imitate lady Victoria of England, has delivered a speech, but he does not prepose anything new. It seems that this is the season in Europe for royal speeches; but we fear that the people will not allow their despotic masters to speak a long time. Great times are coming, and we say again that war is imminent in Europe. Veh requantibus!

WRECK AND GREAT LOSS OF LIFE.

The frightful wreck of an emigrant ship has taken place on the English coast, off Harwich. The bark Floridian, from Antwerp, was lost, with master, crew, and 128 passengers. s. DE C.

A FEMALE PRIZE FIGHT.

On Tuesday evening of last week, the congregation of the Tabernacle was suddenly disturbed by a tremendous noise out of doors, and many of his hearers, somewhat more curious than pious, hurried into the street to see the "elephant," and left Mr. Thompson to preach to the empty benches.

A lady of a very respectable appearance having had some doubts of the fidelity of her husband, thought proper, on that evening, to watch the nocturnal wanderings of her spouse, and so attentively followed his steps—in short, she was but a walking calculation.

"Where are you going to-night, Mr. Hairless?" said the lady to her unfaithful husband. "You go out every blessed evening, and leave me alone. Mercy! I am tired of this solitary life. In day-time you are 'doing' in Wall-street, and out every night. God knows where you keep yourself!"

"Dear wife, you should know that the life of a politician is a very stormy and difficult one. Having had our candidate defeated at the last election, we must now try to make more proselytes. Read the paper, dear Lucy!—I shall bring home some peanuts. Keep in good humor!"

But the lady, to whom it had been whispered that he had a mistress, could not keep herself in good humor, and accordingly set forth on the track of the suspected betrayer. Mr. Hairless, when he found himself at liberty, soon accommodated himself with one of the mysterious lionesses of Broadway, and arm-in-arm they entered an omnibus, bound to Canal-street. The offended wife, who had watched the infamous doings of her husband, blinded by jealousy and forgetting her dignity, ran after the omnibus, and cried aloud to the astonished driver:

"Stop! stop! Give me back my husband!"

The omnibus having stopped, she rushed in with all the fury of a sea-gipsy, and after having cast a threatening glance at her husband, she attacked his companion, pulling her hair and scratching her painted face in the most horrible manner. The lioness, though attacked unexpectedly, soon recovered her self-possession, and being well acquainted with the rules of the ring, answered her antagonist with a tremendous salute a la Tom Hyer, until both fell out of the omnibus and turned and rolled in the mud. The husband, rather willing to fly from the omnibus like a bird from his cage, than to interfere in the ladies' fighting, seeing his moist almost buried in the golden mud of Broadway, attempted to make his escape, but his lady rose instantly from her delicate position, and attacked him in the most desperate manner.

"You rascal! You tell me that you are going to a political meeting. I suspected that you run after the women. These are your candidates!"

The poor husband, feeling ashamed before the immense crowd assembled to witness the fight, tried to calm his offended lady, saying that his companion was not a woman of the pave, but a very respectable young lady, and a member of the Rev. Dr. Maffit's church, who was taking a walk round to see "New-York as it is" in the darkness. The police at length came and disturbed the interesting performance. Mr. Hairless, having lost his wig and hat, went home with his lady and promised her to reform.

KATE ST. CLAIR—WHO IS KATE ST. CLAIR?—We have received from this charming young lady several articles of great merit, which we have already presented to our readers. We hope she will still remember us.

The following gem is addressed to Signor G. F. Secchi de Casali, a talented Italian exile, now a resident in this country. He has been an extensive contributor to our journal. The following has reference to an article of Signor Secchi's published some time since in the "Union Magazine:"

TO G. F. SECCHI DE CASALI.

THOU sayest thou'st been exiled long
From "sunny Italie," Bright wanderer from the Land of Song,
Have we not welcomed thee?
Not "exiled,"—for thy home shall be
The true hearts of the brave and free.
Thrice welcome thou, to our fair land,—
Thou of the song and lute,
Whose strings are swept with thrilling hand,
Oh, bid them not be mute,
But wake the soul's deep mystery,
In burning song of Italie!
Ah, there are soft dark eyes that shine
Upon the classic page,—
Where those "Life Passages" of thine
Our anxious thoughts engage;
Oh, that the mystic veil were rent,
We'd know where the "Contessa" went.
Oh, wake thy lute's soft notes again,
Its music-chords are sleeping.
We listen for the thrilling strain
Its silent strings are keeping;
Oh, wake its gushing melody,
In song of thine own Italie!

✂ "THE FAIRY BOOK." New-York: Harper & Brothers.—This is a delightful little book for the Young. It contains some new and many familiar tales, those which were engraven on the memory of Childhood, and which are read with associations of a period of life that teems with innocence and guileless pleasures. They are stories hallowed by time, and stamped with the impress of each succeeding age. The Introduction is a long and interesting one, and from the hand of one high in literary fame. It is beautifully illustrated with wood cuts.

✂ "A SYSTEM OF GEOGRAPHY, FOR THE USE OF SCHOOLS," by Sidney E. Morse. New-York: Harper & Brothers. 1849.—This is a text-book in general use in Schools throughout the Union. In the arrangement, the number, size and distinctness of its maps, the conciseness of the descriptions and views of countries, the amount of general information and statistics embodied in it, it shows the result of long and careful study, and is admirably adapted to the objects for which it is designed.

CLIMATE OF CALIFORNIA.—We have received meteorological tables of the weather and thermometer at Monterey, Upper California, kept by Talbot H. Greene, Esq., a merchant at Monterey, during the space of a year—viz: from March, 1845, to February, 1846. From these tables, a pretty good idea may be formed of the climate of California.

In March, 1845, the thermometer averaged 65 at noon. There was no rain; the sky generally clear.

In April, the same degree of heat; five rainy days, four foggy, the others clear.

In May, the thermometer at noon never rose higher than 64, and never fell lower than 58; weather clear.

In June, the highest noonday heat was 73; the lowest 60; weather clear.

In July, the highest heat at noon, 74; lowest 60; clear skies.

In August, greatest heat at noon, 72; lowest 63; clear skies.

In September, greatest heat at noon, 73; lowest, 61; clear skies, occasional fogs at eight in the morning; rain once only.

In October, greatest heat at noon, 70; lowest, 59; fogs in the morning, days clear; rain three times within this month—a little rain in the night on two occasions.

In November, greatest heat 76; lowest 60; weather generally clear; rains in the night occasionally.

In December, greatest heat 66; lowest 57; clear weather; rain on four different nights.

In January, 1846, greatest heat, 62; lowest 48; more rain this month than the former months.

In February, 1846, average heat at noon, 62; lowest, 50; clear skies; rain on three different nights.

A pretty general idea may be formed from this of the climate of California. It appears to be remarkably mild and temperate. This is the result of the facts, not a conclusion of mere opinion.

EXTRAORDINARY BALLOON EXCURSION.—Yesterday afternoon a great crowd of people assembled near the corner of Poydras and St. Charles streets, to witness the feats of M. Victor Verdalle, who had announced that he would ascend with his balloon at 4 o'clock, not, as is customary, in a car, but attached to the balloon by a rope, his "feet to heaven, head to earth," and so ascending would perform some most wonderful aerial feats. We did not see his exhibition previous to and immediately after starting, but we saw him when at his greatest height, and witnessed his extraordinary declension. The afternoon was exceedingly favorable for the daring aeronaut; but an accident occurred as he started which placed him in great danger, as the event showed. It seems that when all was ready for the ascent, and the word was given to let go, a rent of some four feet was made in the balloon by getting foul of a post. The gas, of course, commenced escaping, the balloon at the same time rising majestically, and Verdalle going through his novel performances, to the great delight of the assembled multitude. The balloon, did not rise to a very great height, but went off steadily in a northern direction, the gas all the time making its escape. As it passed over Canal street, we had a fine view, and continued watching the progress of the aerial voyage until the grand catastrophe occurred. The first thing we noticed preparatory to the sudden decline and fall of Verdalle and his balloon was the canting over of the latter. Before this, however, it seems that Verdalle was aware of his danger, and had prepared to meet it. The next thing we saw (immediately after the canting) was a great explosion of the remaining gas, the sudden loss by the balloon of its swelling outline, and its instantaneous fall from a height of several hundred feet. We expected to hear nothing else than that M. Victor Verdalle was "among the things that were;" that in descending from his high position he was dashed to pieces. Such appeared to be the opinion of every one—such was the prevailing report last evening. But the opinion and the report were both incorrect. M. Victor Verdalle still lives, and, we understand, showed himself in some of our public places last evening, to convince the skeptical. It seems that on being precipitated to the earth, he landed in a garden in Moreau street, Third Municipality, and, wonderful to relate, escaped without sustaining the slightest injury. The only way to account for this miraculous escape is by the supposition that as the wind was pretty strong, the balloon was in a measure kept up so as to break the fall. Loud cheers from the assembled crowd greeted the daring man when it was ascertained that notwithstanding the fearful rapidity of his fall he was sound, wind, limb, and eyesight. M. Verdalle yesterday gave the most wonderful proof of his proficiency in ground and lofty tumbling we ever witnessed.—[N. Orleans Crescent, March 12.]

THE SEA SERPENT SOUTHWARD.—The Jacksonville (Fla.) Republican gives the following account, on the authority of Capt. Adams, of the schooner Lucy, whom the editor of the Republican certifies to be a man of responsibility:

Captain Adams states that on the morning of Sunday, the 18th ultimo, about 9 o'clock, when off the south point of Cumberland Island, about 12 miles from the St. John's (Fla.) bar, the attention of himself, crew and passengers, was suddenly rivetted upon an immense sea monster, which he (the Captain) took to be a serpent.

It lifted its head (which was that of a snake) several times out of the water seemingly to take a survey of the vessel; and at such times displayed the largest portion of its body, and a pair of frightful fins or claws several feet in length. His tail was not seen at any time; but judging from the dimensions of the body, the Captain supposes the leviathan to be about ninety feet in length. Its neck tapered small from the head to the body, and it appeared to measure about seven feet across the broadest part of its back. The monster moved from the side of the vessel and placed itself athwart its track in front of her bows, but Captain Adams, not feeling partial to an encounter with his snake-ship, ordered the vessel to be kept off.

A STRANGE ANIMAL.—Col. Fremont has recently dispatched to Corpus Christi an extraordinary animal which his party succeeded in capturing, after a three days' chase, in the neighborhood of the River Gila. A letter received from one of Col. Fremont's party, by a merchant in St. Louis, describes it as an animal resembling a horse in every particular, except that it is completely covered with a close curly wool resembling camel's hair in color and the fineness of its texture. It has no mane, and its tail is like an elephant's. The animal possesses wonderful agility, leaping over obstructions ten feet high with all ease.

The above "Strange Animal," has arrived in this city, and of course has been secured by Barnum, of the American Museum, who will soon trot him out for exhibition.

THE ECONOMITES.—* * * Economy, famous as the thrifty village of the Rappites, 12 miles above Beaver, is indeed one of the pleasantest spots on the Ohio. The location is fine, buildings plain but tidy, the walls very frequently covered with the grape-vine. The tract of land belonging to the community is in a high state of cultivation, and the public hotel is a pattern of convenience, good fare and cleanliness. Since the death of the Patriarch Rappe, the singularities of this singular people have been sustained without interruption, his spiritual mantle and authority having fallen upon Patriarch Baker. They number about 400, and in addition to being simple and unostentatious, are no doubt quite as happy as the bustling world around them.—[Cor. Cleveland Herald.]

TO DRIVE AWAY RATS.—The Boston Cultivator says that Mr. Charles Pierce, of Milton, pounded up potash and strewed it around their holes, and rubbed some on the sides of the boards and upper parts where they came through. The next night he heard squeaking among them, which he supposed was from the caustic nature of the potash that got among their hair, on their bare feet. They disappeared, and he has not been troubled with them since that time which was nearly a year ago.

The mail between Newbern, N. C., and Norfolk was robbed last week. A part of the contents were found in Nansemond river.

The high wind which prevailed on Tuesday night, entirely cleared the Hudson River of ice, at Albany.

A sea serpent, ninety feet long, is said to have been seen recently on the Florida coast.

M. De La Forest, late Consular Agent to this city from France, is about to return to Paris.

Gold is said to be found in abundance near Chapel Hill, N. C.

A small box of strawberries, raised near Brighton, Mass., the first of the season, was sold in Boston, a few days since, for $8.

A man was recently expelled from the society of the Sons of Temperance, in Cincinnati, for marrying his mother-in-law.

A project is on foot to construct a plank road from Albany to Schoharie, N. Y. One half of the capital necessary has been subscribed in the latter place.

CHICAGO, Illinois, has been damaged in its shipping, &c., $100,000 by an inundation.

A man has been arrested in Rochester, N. Y., and fined $10, for stealing a newspaper.

FLEETING HAPPINESS.

I'll not repine that in this world of ours,
There is no happiness that fadeth never;
E'en here there are some glad and blissful hours,
But brightest moments are the briefest ever.

See a bright summer's day, all pure and fair,
Come forth in beauty at the morn's rich breaking;
How the sweet buds, and every flow'et there,
Breathes out new fragrance at their first awaking.

But often o'er that brilliant day will steal
A fearful gloom, the fairy scene surrounding;
A sudden tempest makes the forest reel,
While through the air the thunder peals are sounding.

E'en thus it is with life: in early youth
We picture happiness for ever smiling;
We dream of spotless virtue, fadeless truth,
We wake—and find the dream was but beguiling.

All things will fade—all to death's bourne are bound,
Earth's fairest spot will grow all lone and dreary;
Till in the silent grave at length is found,
A peaceful haven for the sad and weary.

Heaven's promise dormant lies in human hope,
Man's heart the Almighty to the future sets.—YOUNG.

In his present state of probation, man's greatest happiness arises from an instinctive belief in the promises of the future. Immediate good however valuable it may be, is yet to him less productive of delight than that which seen, in prospective, wears the rainbow hues of distance, and comes clothed in the prismatic coloring of his own immortal aspirations.

Observe that child, how it enjoys the bliss of expectancy and laughs outright, clapping its little hands in extatic pleasure, as it tells you, "Papa has gone to bring the Christmas presents—the dolls and the picture books," &c., &c. But why has its eyes' bright sparkle vanished—and the merry laugh, why rings it out no longer? Is it because the playthings have not yet arrived? No, indeed!—not that—but because they have! The child is not so happy now, as it was an hour ago,—true, she is busily engaged in the examination of the new acquisitions, and Paley, says "engagement is everything." But it is evident she is only trying to convince herself that everything is as pretty and delightful as she had expected it to be, while that sigh of disappointment and yawn of listless weariness, prove how much more bright are the things of fancy than of fact, and that even in infancy imagination's toy-shops are infinitely more curious than any yet opened in New York or London.

Some think it unreasonable to expect happiness in this life, but such a sentiment has no foundation in truth, as the expectation is both rational and practicable; experience proves that many are and that all may be happy, who believe the promises, "the exceeding great and precious promises made, to us by the author of our being. The heart itself, and a thousand other" silver-toned—voices in the material and immaterial world, repeat these in detail: They constitute the soul's best wealth and cast over its night of sorrow, not "a glimmering dawn," but a roseate day, replete with gladness: nay; felt positive bliss, still in proportion (be it remembered) to the strength, or weakness of our faith.

Here, I should expect to encounter the laugh of the worldling, who seems unwilling to comprehend how a Christian can have any joys from the exercise of a principle on which the existence of his own depends; for gross and illusory as his unimagined happiness is, it lives only in the light of hope, and the promises of faith, and dies the moment these promises are fulfilled.

I once beheld a village maiden—imagination could not have drawn a lovelier picture of health and gladness. It was May eve, and as she hurried through the lanes and meadows, collecting buttercups, and other spring flowers for the coming festival, she never suspected that her happiness was deepened than it would on the following day, when amid the smiling damsels she should stand a queen. But such are the mysteries of mind, making it happiness to hunt a crown, and misery to wear one. Yet this fact does not in anywise detract from the sum total of human enjoyment, or of that felicity which is man's portion here below.

Nay, rather it acts as a multiplier or magnifying medium, showing us the vast dimensions and amazing value of even the least of the many good things provided for us by a bountiful Providence. Under the influence of this invisible communion, even Night itself becomes a promiser, and every succeeding morning is expected to bring a brighter dawn and more ruddy day-beams, and a series of more fortunate events, than ever marked the past. Morning when it does arrive, however, with the demureness of a pretty jilt, refers us to the noon, and in turn that radiant hour points toward evening, sober though it be; evening too is sanguine in its moods and promises to send the stars and other bright visions, and sure enough the stars do always come, and dear to me is their quiet spiritual light: would that every luster shone like these with purifying splendor.

But not alone the hours; each season also is eloquent in promises, and we believe them all. And far be it from me, to blame that gentle-heartedness, which makes a man regard the snow-drift as burial honor over the fallen leaves and faded flowers, or the noiseless descent of the winged flakes as messages of love, suggestive of better things to come.

Varities.

A SIGN THAT IS A SIGN, AND A TAILOR THAT IS A TAILOR.—As we were going up the Bowery, a few days since, we saw a crowd of boys looking very earnestly at something elevated above the sidewalk. After observing for a moment we discovered that they were looking at a new sign, just placed over a tailor's store, in the Bowery, between Bond and Great Jones streets. On examining we saw it was a sign, and a sign, too, well worthy of remark. It was painted by Bro. Gregory for Bro. G. W. Underwood, merchant tailor, who makes elegant clothes, and is an excellent fellow; and we hope Bro. Gregory's sign, and Bro. Underwood's qualities, both as a gentleman and tailor, will continue to attract crowds about that same place.

GENTLEMEN'S FURNISHING ESTABLISHMENT, 95 William-street, New-York.—At this place will be found every article of beauty and utility belonging to a gentleman: shirts of all styles and prices, bosoms and collars, hosiery, gloves, cravats, and Scarfs, Suspenders, Dressing Robes, and other articles of dress too numerous to mention. Dealers in the country will do well to examine this stock, as Messrs. Herrick & Scudder deal with all their customers on the most favorable terms. There cannot be found in this city a more complete stock, and at lower prices, than at this store.

MARCH STORM.—We have had one of the severest equinoctials that we remember in years. On Monday night it commenced snowing, with a fierce northeast wind. On Tuesday forenoon it turned to rain, which came down in a perfect deluge during the entire day, with a high wind.

GOLD COMING.—The "dust" is beginning to come at last—$70,000 having been received at Boston.

Rev. Isaac Van Tassel, Superintendent of the Ottawa (Ohio) Mission, since 1824, was found dead in the Miami on the 8d inst. He was 60 years old.

William H. Pennington was killed on Saturday of last week, near Pittsburg, Pa., by the upsetting of a stage, in which he was a passenger.

An extensive iron establishment, with a capital of $125,000, is about to be erected at Hudson, N. Y.

A bill has passed the Michigan Legislature, making the office of State printer an elective one by the people.

The Connecticut River was clear of ice at New Haven, on the 20th inst. and vessels had already begun to arrive.

Mrs. Ann Gerry died at New Haven, (Conn.) on the 17th inst. aged 86. She was a relict of Elbridge Gerry, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence.

LOST REGALIA.—Some months since, a Brother, whose name is not now remembered, borrowed from the then Publisher of the Golden Rule, Mr. E. Winchester, a Past Grand's Regalia. Said Regalia has never been returned. It was of the usual scarlet silk velvet, trimmed with gold bullion, with a gold star on the sash. The person in whose possession it now is, will oblige the owner by returning it to this office immediately.

GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE.

THE ORGAN OF THE ORDER,
Published under the auspices of the M. W. Grand Sir:

It will contain, from week to week, the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of the State of New-York, and also of other States; accounts of Celebrations, Institutions of new Lodges, and occasionally, a complete Directory of all the Lodges in the Union.

Its Literary department will be filled with Original Tales of the highest excellence, prepared by the most eminent writers in our country—Popular Tales; Choice Miscellany; the rarest Gems of Poetry from the English Poets; Sketches of Travel; Anecdotes, &c., &c.; and occasionally illustrated with beautiful Wood Engravings. Being equal in its Literary character to any Weekly in the country, and being thus perfect in its Odd-Fellowship department, it will be worthy of a place on the table of every brother of the Order.

The Gazette and Rule is published every Saturday, at 44 Ann-street, New-York, by Bro. J. R. CRAMPTON, and is under the Editorial Superintendence of Rev. Bro. AUG. C. L. ARNOLD, P. C. P.

All Communications should be addressed to J. R. CRAMPTON, 44 Ann-street, New-York.

TO OUR TRAVELING AGENTS.

OUR Traveling Agents are reminded that they are required to make prompt returns to this Office every week. They will also, when writing, state from what place their preceding letter was mailed, and the amount therein remitted. By this arrangement errors may more readily be corrected, and letters not duly received traced out, and the business between themselves and the Office easily adjusted. They are also requested to inform us, in every instance, where a letter from the Office may reach them, as we occasionally have matters to communicate which might be of advantage to them.

Office of the Grand Secretary Grand Lodge State of New-York:

ODD FELLOW'S HALL, CITY OF NEW-YORK, }
March 13, 1849.

To District Deputy Grand Masters, Officers of Lodges, and Brethren:

In consequence of the many complaints made to this Office of the failure of Deputies, Officers of Lodges and Members to receive communications which have been issued from this Office, and of the failure to receive many communications which have been intended to reach this Office, for several months last past, and which have been transmitted by Deputies, Lodges and individuals, you are therefore notified and requested to address all communications intended for the Grand Lodge, Grand Master, or Grand Secretary, to BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Box No. 838, Post Office, New-York, and in all cases to be particular that Letters and Documents are properly mailed, in order that a failure of papers intended for this, or sent from this Office, to reach their destination, may be traced to the proper cause.

Fraternally yours,

BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Grand Secretary.

GOURAUD'S LIBRARY OF ROMANCE.

JULIA WRIGHT—CANTO IV.

But how shall I describe, as it deserves,

The glorious outline of my Julia's breast?

Swelling in graceful and voluptuous curves,

Like ocean, when the winds are lulled to rest;

It really was enough to try one's nerves,

To witness those twin "Islands of the Blest."

Though had her dress been rudely torn asunder,

One might have seen a very dark skin under!

Of what avail are the "graceful and voluptuous curves" of a woman's form, if the appearance of her skin is repulsive? A dark, tanned, freckled, pimpled or sallow cuticle is certainly odious—not only to the possessor, but the beholder;—why, then, will ladies neglect procuring the only certain remedy for these evils, namely, GOURAUD'S incomparable Italian Medicated Soap? The most magical feats of either Adrien or Blitz are thrown in the shade when compared with the marvels which this delicious Soap works upon the human skin, by cleansing it from all eruptive impurities, discolorations, freckles, &c., and making it as brilliantly white, smooth and transparent as an alabaster vase!

GOURAUD'S Powders Subtiles are warranted positively to remove all superfluous hair from the upper lip, temples, brow, arms, &c. The removal is effected in a few moment's time, and without the slightest injury to the skin!

GOURAUD'S Grecian Dye is designed to supply a want that has long been painfully felt by those to whom Nature has denied a head of redundant black or brown hair. This Dye will effectually change the color of red, light or gray hair to a brilliant brown or black, at the option of the user.

GOURAUD'S magnificent Liquid Rouge imparts a brilliant rose-tint to pale cheeks or lips—and so permanent that it cannot be removed entirely, even by the most determined washing and rubbing.

Remember! Dr. FELIX GOURAUD has but one depot in this city, where his renowned toilet preparations can be obtained genuine, and that is at 67 WALKER-STREET, 1st store west FROM Broadway. Boston, Bates & Jordan, 129 Washington-street.

AUTHORITATIVE EVIDENCE.

From Dr. Winslow Lewis, one of the most eminent Physicians of Boston. Boston, Feb 15, 1847.

Mr. Wm. Bogle—Sir: The preparation invented by you for the hair has been extensively used in my family for some time, and they give it the decided preference over all other compositions of the kind.

It invigorates and beautifies the hair, and clears the skin of all impurities, without producing any ultimate deleterious effects, which are so frequently the result of many well-known patented compounds.

Having been thoroughly tested, and its reputation fairly established, as the best article known for the human hair, it may be superfluous, still I cannot resist the opportunity to add to others the name of your obedient servant,

WILSON LEWIS, Jr.

For Sale, Wholesale and Retail, by A. B. & D. Sands, 100 Fulton-st.; Rushton, Clark & Co., 110 and 273 Broadway, N. Y. To be obtained of the Proprietor and Manufacturer, Wm. Bogle, 277 Washington-st., Boston, and of the principal Druggists and Perfumers in the United States and Canada.

THE NEW-YORK SUN'S ART UNION!
A SPLENDID ENGRAVING, AND

THE NEW-YORK WEEKLY SUN one Year for One Dollar, besides One Thousand Magnificent Prizes distributed among those who subscribe!—BEACH, BROTHERS, Publishers of the Weekly Sun, as a testimonial of their appreciation of the vast and rapidly increasing patronage bestowed upon that Dollar Newspaper, will make a gratuitous present of a large and elegant full length engraving, beautifully printed on fine paper, of General Zachary Taylor, President of the United States, to every subscriber, (whether a new one or one who renews an old subscription,) whose name is entered upon the subscription books between the first day of January, 1849, and January, 1850. They will also distribute among the subscribers ONE THOUSAND PRIZES, varying in value from $25 to $1—the total value amounting to two thousand dollars! The very great expense attendant on this liberal distribution of prizes and splendid Portraits of President Taylor, in full military uniform, &c., renders it imperatively necessary that only one name should be entered for each dollar sent. Those who subscribe in clubs will please designate the names of such as are to be entered upon the books as candidates for the prizes, &c.

THE ONE THOUSAND PRIZES

To be distributed among the subscribers to the Weekly Sun, will comprise a rich selection of costly and valuable works in the several departments of Literature, History, Biography, Voyages, and Travels, Domestic and Moral Economy, Essays, Belles Lettres, &c., including most of the well known publications of Harper and Brothers.

Those who draw prizes will have the privilege of making their own selections from the catalogue which is furnished to each subscriber. To insure the fullest advantages of the above prize distribution, subscribers should send in the amount of their subscriptions without delay, as the names are registered in rotation, and those first in order will be entitled to the early impressions of the engravings of General Taylor, &c.

For a more detailed account of the above plan, the reader is referred to the Extra Sun's Art Union, which may be obtained free of charge by any person addressing (postpaid) the proprietors.

THE NEW-YORK WEEKLY SUN

Is the best as well as the cheapest family newspaper ever presented to the American public.

In addition to its usual features of interest, beautiful Engravings, &c., the Weekly Sun for 1849 will be enriched by a succession of written by eminent American authors expressly for this paper, for the premiums of $250.

The subscription price being

any person may receive a copy, at any time, by sending the direction and enclosing the money by mail. (Postmasters will frank the letters.)

CLUB SUBSCRIPTIONS, when sent to one address, are received at the following rates: Five copies for $1—eleven copies for $8—twenty-five for $18—and seventy-five copies for $50. When an order is sent for copies requiring them to be forwarded to more than one address, one dollar will be charged for each subscription.

Letters and Communications (always postpaid,) should be addressed to BEACH, BROTHERS, Sun Establishment, New York.

BOLESTIC MEDICAL AND SURGICAL OFFICE,
No. 127 Chambers-st., New-York.

of their diseases—as also our TREATMENT, unlike those of any others which they may have heretofore known or tried.

III. Our REMEDIES or TREATMENT will be found the most pleasant, safe, simple, and efficacious that can be used. No confinement to the sick room—no hindrance from business,—no danger from colds,—and no injury to the constitution;—but, on the contrary, IMPROVEMENT at once.

IV. All the Medicines we prescribe are made in our own CHEMICAL LABORATORY, as we cannot rely on the Drugs sold in the shops, in consequence of almost universal ADULTERATIONS. Our remedies being prepared in the most pure and concentrated form, but little is used or needed to cure the worst cases.

V. We claim, by our UNUSUAL SUCCESS, to be masters over all curable diseases—particularly in all SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS—the DISEASES PECULIAR TO WOMEN—the HEREDITARY DISEASES OF CHILDREN—and all those most HOPELESS and DESPERATE cases in male or female which have defeated the best efforts of the most distinguished medical practitioners, as the more than ten thousand cases, whom we have successfully treated, can testify.

VI. THOSE DISEASES which are almost invariably treated in the first stage with Balsam of Copiava, Capsules, Cubes,—with injections of solutions of Nitrate of Silver, Borax, Alum, Sugar of Lead, Sulphate of Zinc,—with Bougies, Catheters, and Caustics—and in the second stage with Yellow or Black Washes, Blue or Mercurial Ointment, Blue Stone or Lunar Caustic, externally—and with Calomel, Blue Pill, Red Precipitate, Corrosive Sublimate, Hydriodate of Potassa, Sarsaparilla Syrup, and other like cheats and slops, internally—we say before Heaven and Earth what we know and can DEMONSTRATE by hundreds of cases, that by such treatment and means these diseases have never, and can never, be healed—they deceive the patient, disguise the disease by driving it into the system to other and more important parts,—they produce Strictures; Abscesses in the Kidneys; Piles; Fistulas; Catarrhs; Gravel; Diseases of the Eyes; Loss of Hair and Hearing; Rheumatic Pains; Decay of the Flesh and Bones; Ulcers in the Limbs, Throat, Head, Neck, Nose and Palate; Disease of the Liver and Stomach; with CONSUMPTION OF THE LUNGS, or WHOLE SYSTEM; and thus render either the whole life of the patient miserable, or hurry him to a premature grave.

Without using any of the above named Quackish, Swindling and Murderous Remedies, we PROMISE to every case we treat a PERMANENT and RADICAL cure FOR LIFE, by a very simple medicine, which is without taste or smell, which neither purges nor vomits, nor hinders from business, nor exposes the patient in any way whatever. Testimonials to these Facts we can furnish from persons who were carried out of the Broadway Hospital to die as hopeless cases, and many others of like character, whom we have cured.

VII. FISTULAS cured invariably WITHOUT AN OPERATION. Of the hundreds of cases of this disease which we have known, we have never seen one which had been cured with cutting with the knife—though nearly all had been cut out once, twice, or more times. Cutting never cured a case—it is false, delusive and cruel. References will be given to cases in this city which have been SUCCESSFULLY treated of the most terrible forms of Fistula ever known.

VIII. Cases of SURGERY, MIDWIFERY and DENTISTRY attended to in all their departments—Tumors, Cancers, Dislocation, Fractures, Wounds, and Injuries of every kind treated with safety and success.

IX. ALL DISEASES OF THE EYES and EARS treated without PAIN or PERIL, and with UNEQUALLED SUCCESS.

We invite all the afflicted, however hopeless their cases may appear, or whatever their disease may be, or however many physicians or remedies they may have tried, to put our knowledge and skill to the test in an examination of their case,—it will cost them nothing,—and then they will be prepared to know whether we can treat them successfully or not—for if we do not find, to their satisfaction, the cause or origin of all the difficulties in the case, we will own that the cure is not in our power, and hence put them to no expense. Most physicians treat symptoms—we go to the root, and thus succeed where others fail.

NEVER DESPAIR till you have given our Remedies and Treatment an honest trial.

Patients visited at their residences when required.

THE PROPRIETORS having spent much time

In bringing this preparation of SARSAPARILLA to its present state of perfection; and the experience of fourteen years has furnished them the most ample opportunity to study, in their various forms, the diseases for which it is recommended, and to adapt it exactly to their relief and cure. Patients who wish a really good Medicine are invited to give it a trial, and satisfy themselves of its superiority, and the invaluable property it possesses of arresting and curing disease. The bottle has been enlarged to hold one Quart, and in its present improved form may safely claim to be the best and cheapest medicine of the age. Its progress to the fame it has attained may be traced by a long line of facts and cures, that stand as landmarks and beacons for the invalid, pointing the way to the haven of health; and what it has already done for the thousands who have used it, it is capable of doing for the millions still suffering and struggling with disease. It purifies, cleanses, and strengthens the fountain springs of life, and infuses new vigor throughout the whole animal frame.

DYSPEPSY CURED.

The following testimonial, from a gentleman so well known as Mr. Cox, requires no comment, and recommends itself to all similarly afflicted: NEW-ORLEANS, Dec. 18, 1848.

Messrs. A. B. & D. SANDS—Gentlemen: Having experienced the most beneficial effects from the use of your Sarsaparilla, it gives me pleasure to add my testimony to the numerous spontaneous effusions of grateful hearts which you continually are receiving.

My case was dyspeptic, or rather I may term it a weakness of the digestive organs. For more than a year, I was troubled with wind upon my stomach and its frequent eructation, together with producing a spasmodic contraction of the heart, often gave me much annoyance. After trying various remedies without avail, I commenced with your Sarsaparilla. Before I had used half a bottle, almost every symptom of this disagreeable complaint had vanished, and in a few weeks its continued use effected a complete cure. I therefore confidently recommend it to all persons affected in the same manner, and have reason to believe that many who are suffering under a supposed disease of the heart, if they would take your Sarsaparilla, in a few weeks would find themselves restored to health in both mind and body. I remain yours, very truly,

JOHN V. COX, 93 Lexington Avenue.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA IN PRUSSIA.

The Proprietors of this valuable Medicine have just received an order from our esteemed friend and correspondent, Theodore S. Fay, Secretary of Legation to the Court of Prussia, for the use of a member of the Royal Family—a copy of which we herewith lay before our readers.—[Home Journal.

"U. S. LEGATION, BERLIN, Nov. 30, 1848.—Gentlemen: I wish you to send two dozen bottles of your Sarsaparilla, for the use of his Royal Highness Prince Waldimir of Prussia, to this Legation, as soon as possible. It is necessary that he should receive it immediately; therefore, please send it by first steamer. The bill can be made out in the name of the Prince, and sent with it. Your obedient servant,

"THEO. S. FAY."

SCROFULOUS AFFECTION OF THE EYES.

SOUTH KINGSTON, (R. I.) Oct. 11, 1847.—Messrs. SANDS—Gentlemen: My little daughter, when one year old, was attacked with a scrofulous humor on her face, which soon after extended into her eyes, causing almost total blindness in one of them, and disfiguring her whole face. I employed two physicians to attend her, who exhausted their utmost skill to give her relief, but it all proved useless, and finally one of them remarked to me that he had known of some striking cures effected by Sands' Sarsaparilla, and advised me to try it. I obtained one bottle, which she commenced using, and before it was all used up it had effected an entire cure. It is now over four years since she was cured, and there has been no reappearance of the disease, and we are satisfied that it is a perfect cure. It gives me great pleasure to add that I can recommend it to any sufferer from a similar complaint.

Respectfully yours, GEORGE ROBINSON.

DR. S. P. TOWNSEND'S COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA.

The Most Extraordinary Medicine in the World!!

This Extract is put up in Quart Bottles; it is six times cheaper, pleasanter, and warranted superior to any sold. It cures without vomiting, purging, or debilitating the Patient.

THE great beauty and superiority of this Sarsaparilla over all other medicines is, that while it eradicates the disease, it invigorates the body. It is one of the very best.

SPRING AND SUMMER MEDICINES
 ever known: it not only purifies the whole system and strengthens the person, but it creates rich, new and pure blood, a power possessed by no other medicine. And in this lies the grand secret of its wonderful success. It has performed, within the last two years, more than 100,000 cures of severe cases of disease; at least 15,000 were considered incurable. It has saved the lives of more than 10,000 children the past two seasons in the city of New-York alone.

10,000 Cases of General Debility and want of Nervous Energy.

Dr. S. P. Townsend's Sarsaparilla invigorates the whole system permanently. To those who have lost their muscular energy by the effects of medicine or indiscretion committed in youth, or the excessive indulgence of the passions, and brought on by physical prostration of the nervous system, lassitude, want of ambition, fainting sensations, premature decay and decline, hastening toward that fatal disease Consumption, can be entirely restored by this pleasant remedy. This Sarsaparilla is far superior to any Invigorating Cordial, as it renews and invigorates the system, gives activity to the limbs, and strength to the muscular system, in a most extraordinary degree.

Consumption Cured.

Cleanse and Strengthen. Consumption can be Cured. Bronchitis, Consumption, Liver Complaint, Colds, Catarrh, Coughs, Asthma, Spitting Blood, Soreness in the Chest, Hectic Flush, Night Sweats, Difficult or Profuse Expectoration, Pain in the Side, &c., have been and can be Cured.

Spitting Blood.

NEW-YORK, April 28, 1847.—Dr. S. P. Townsend: I verily believe your Sarsaparilla has been the means, through Providence, of saving my life. I have for several years had a bad Cough. It became worse and worse. At last I raised large quantities of blood, had night sweats, was greatly debilitated and reduced, and did not expect to live. I have only used your Sarsaparilla a short time, and there has been a wonderful change wrought in me. I am now able to walk all over the city. I raise no blood, and my cough has left me. You can well imagine that I am thankful for these results. Your obedient servant,
 WM. RUSSELL, 65 Catharine st.

Dyspepsia.

No fluid or medicine has ever been discovered which so nearly resembles the gastric juice or saliva, in decomposing food, and strengthening the organs of digestion, as this preparation of Sarsaparilla.

BANK DEPARTMENT, ALBANY, May 10, 1845.—Dr. Townsend—Sir: I have been afflicted for several years with the Dyspepsia in its worst forms, attended with sourness of stomach, loss of appetite, extreme heartburn, and a great aversion to all kinds of food, and for weeks (what I could eat) I have been unable to retain but a small portion on my stomach. I tried the usual remedies, but they had little or no effect in removing the complaint. I was induced, about two months since, to try your Extract of Sarsaparilla, and I must say with little confidence; but after using nearly two bottles, I found my appetite restored, and the heartburn entirely removed; and I would earnestly recommend the use of it to those who have been afflicted as I have been.

Yours, &c. W. W. VAN ZANDT.

Great Blessing to Mothers and Children.

It is the safest and most effectual medicine for purifying the system, and relieving the sufferings attendant upon childbirth, ever discovered. It strengthens both the mother and child, prevents pain and disease, increases and enriches the food; those who have used it think it is indispensable. It is highly useful both before and after confinement, as it prevents diseases attendant upon childbirth. In Costiveness, Piles, Cramps, Swelling of the Feet, Dependancy, Heartburn, Vomiting, Pain in the Back and Loins, False Pains, Hemorrhage, and in regulating the Secretions, and equalizing the Circulation, it has no equal. The great beauty of this medicine is, it is always safe, and the most delicate use it most successfully.

Scrofula Cured.

This Certificate conclusively proves that this Sarsaparilla has perfect control over the most obstinate diseases of the Blood. Three persons cured in one house is unprecedented.

Three Children.

Dr. S. P. Townsend—Dear Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that three of my children have been cured of the Scrofula by the use of your excellent medicine. They were afflicted very severely with bad sores; have taken four bottles; it took them away, for which I feel myself under great obligation. Yours, respectfully,
 ISAAC W. CRAIN, 106 Wooster st.

Opinions of Physicians.

Dr. S. P. Townsend is almost daily receiving orders from Physicians in different parts of the Union.

This is to certify, that we, the undersigned, Physicians of the city of Albany, have, in numerous cases, prescribed Dr. Townsend's Sarsaparilla, and believe it to be one of the most valuable preparations in the market.

THE LILIES OF THE FIELD.

BY JAMES HENDERSON.

EACH at the dawn uprears its silver chalice,
When day-spring ushers in the dewy morn—
Gems that make bright the sweet sequestered valleys,

Day-stars that mead and mountain glen adorn!
God said "Let there be light!" and lo, creation
Shone forth with smiles emparadised and fair,
Then man had Eden for a habitation,

And ye, bright children of the Spring, were there!
Ye came to bless the eye when sin had clouded
The glorious earth with ruin pale and wan;
Ye came to cheer the heart when sin had shrouded
With peril dark and dread the fate of man!
Ye came to whisper with your living beauty
A lesson to the hearts that doubting stray;
To win the spirit to a trusting duty,
And guide the wanderer's steps in wisdom's way!

What though your accents, gentle, sweet, and lowly,
Unto the silent ear no sound impart?
Ye whisper words all eloquent and holy,
To wake the finer feelings of the heart!
Meekly ye tell your emblematic story
Of the Creator's love with pathos true,
For Solomon, with all his pomp and glory,
Was ne'er arrayed like any one of you!

Ay, ye have lessons for the wise, revealing
Truths that proclaim Jehovah's bounteous love;
And wisdom then grows wiser, nobler, feeling
How all's that good descendeth from above!
Ye touch the thoughtful soul with pure emotion,
When contemplation doth your beauties scan;
Ye fill the heart with calm, serene devotion,
And breathe a moral unto erring man!

A TALE OF MYSTERY.

It is now some years since, that a family, that had lately come to this country, from the West Indies, took a house in our street, and domiciled among us—it consisted of a mother and two daughters.

The mother, Mrs. M'Queen, was an old, withered, weather-beaten, little body, of slender frame, with clear, black, twinkling eyes, a hawk nose, and wrinkly features; putting one in mind of an ancient Sybil. When she spoke her countenance lighted up with animation, and her words came fluently and fast. She did not seem occasionally to be destitute of observation or good sense; but ever and anon, mixed up with her discourse, there was a flippancy, and at times an incoherence, which seemed less to say that her faculties were impaired, or her intellect weakened, than that she had long been a stranger to that moral standard which has been set up in our hearts for the guidance of our principles. I do not mean to say that she at all gave license to indecorum in speech or manner—quite the reverse. She had been educated in, and rigidly adhered to all the forms of the church of England; read her prayer-book; and, as far as external demeanor went, was a devout Christian. It appeared rather that a long residence in the west, where custom had seared her to behold, without sympathy or feeling, all the degradations which slavery imposes on a portion of our fellow creatures, had, by blunting the moral sense, rendered her at length an inadequate judge between right and wrong, yet left her the trappings of religion.

Her eldest daughter was dark, of slender make, and about the average height; quick and lively in her motions; with a rapid utterance, and a volubility in her discourse, which was not sometimes altogether pleasing. It was a little curious that her thoughts, like those of her mother, seemed generally to run in the same channel; and she seldom spoke of anything else than the West Indies, its towns and slave owners, and rum merchants—of the number of negroes they had kept on their property—of their habits, hours of work, recreation, and treatment—of their wives and children—the severities exercised to keep the slaves to their tasks—and of their revenge, cowardice, cunning, and blood-thirstiness. Whatever topic of conversation was introduced, something or other seemed to afford a handle for turning it upon this repulsive and sometimes disgusting subject.

The other daughter was of a florid complexion, with bright yellow hair. She was taller than her sister, and rather handsome. Of the early history of this girl, on whose fate the interest of this little narrative hangs, I could only learn a few scattered, but these are rather striking, particulars. It appeared that, when little more than a girl, she had been addressed by a young gentleman abroad. The lover died; and after struggling a while with her feelings, the young lady became frenzied, and was sometime kept under restraint by her family—how long I never was able to ascertain. At the period when I first saw her, which must have been some ten or twelve years after this circumstance, time had exerted its soothing influence; and the general impression of her countenance was not that of despondency, but of cheerfulness and good humor. What may have been the original tone of her mind, I have, of course no means of ascertaining; but now it was evident that it was far from being firm and determined. She was nervous, and very apt to be overcome by sudden noises, or impressions of any kind; and yet could pass from what appeared to affect her with sorrowful emotions, to whatever excited laughter, with a rapidity that was startling, and far from being pleasant.

On their arrival in our neighborhood, circumstances occurred which drew us into familiar acquaintanceship. It was in May that they settled among us; and after many interviews, in which the preceding traits of character developed themselves to me, the season wore in December.

Half forgetful that they were Episcopalians, I made a call on Christmas day, and found only Mrs. M'Queen at home, the younger ladies having gone to church. After wishing each other the congratulations of the season with mutual heartiness, somehow or other, as it generally fell out, the conversation took some turn which led to the introduction of the West Indies, and a parcel of splendid dried seeds and berries, which had arrived from the agent on their property only two or three days before, was produced by the younger sister. Part of these I was solicited to take. As I was on the point of departure from the house, I was called to from the landing-place at the head of the stairs, by Miss Sophia, regarding the loan of a book, about which we had been speaking, and which I had promised to send them. She seemed all playfulness and good humor. Alas! I never heard—but tush, of that anon.

It was then, as I have said, the depth of winter. The weather had been for some weeks boisterous and rainy; and although it had in some degree cleared up into frost, was still variable and uncertain; cloudy days and whistling nights, with falls of snow, and intervals of tinkling black ice. The harvest had been a bad one; provisions were high, and disease prevailed among the poorer classes to an unwonted extent. Every thing appeared to render more gloomy the already sufficiently somber aspect of external nature; and even the hilarity of Christmas time was insufficient to dispel the pervading cheerlessness of the season. The morrow was Sunday.

Some hours before daybreak, a loud knocking at my door aroused me from sleep. It was an urgent request for me to come, with the least possible delay, to Mrs. M'Queen's, as one of the ladies had been taken alarmingly ill, and they were anxious for my making arrangements for sending an express to a relative of the family, some miles distant. I obeyed this injunction with alacrity; but by the time I had hurried down the street, and gained admission, I found that a surgeon, who had at the same time been sent for, was in attendance.

"What of your patient—what is the matter?" said I to him, breathlessly, as, with an anxious countenance, he came out of one of the sleeping apartments to the sitting parlor.

He gravely shook his head,

"It is all over, sir, the young lady must have been dead at least an hour. It is a little mysterious, this business!"

I was as thunderstruck.

"Not possible," I said; "this is really dreadful. I saw Miss Sophia yesterday, in health and spirits!"

"Her death is not the less certain on that account, however," added the surgeon. "It is a curious and perplexing case; and if you have no objection, I should like you, before leaving the house, to visit that chamber with me," pointing to the apartment he had just left.

While we were conversing I heard, at intervals, the voice of the elder sister, as it were, occasionally breaking out to herself in incoherent ejaculations. The sounds evidently came from the room alluded to—wild, fitful, and startling. More indistinctly, and from an opposite quarter, I could now and then hear a low, murmuring sound, rising into what might be called a chatter or a giggle. This struck me as coming from the bedroom of the old lady.

On calling in the servant and interrogating her, she seemed greatly agitated, and said that she had heard some noises while in bed; but these at length ceasing, and after a considerable pause, she could not positively say of what duration, as she was half asleep, the bell was violently rung for her. When she went into the room she was told that Miss Sophia had fainted, and saw her sister in bed with her, supporting her on her bosom, and bathing her temples. That she had continued some time assisting in the task, but that from the first she had remarked the lifeless look and chilly feel of the body. That for nearly an hour this course was pursued, the elder sister expressing surprise and impatience that their patient did not revive; and that at length she had suggested the propriety of calling in medical aid, which was at once assented to.

In obedience to the request of the medical gentleman, I proceeded to the fatal apartment. Every thing in it wore an aspect of utter cheerlessness, little needing the melancholy catastrophe itself to add to its dismal effect. On a side-table stood a candle, whose black, smoky wick showed it to have been long unsnuffed; and on the bed were both the sisters—the living and the dead. The features of the latter, who was maintained half in a sitting posture by her sister, wore almost the placidity of sleep, save that around the mouth there was that swollen appearance peculiarly indicative of death. Her eyes were closed, and her long yellow hair, which had partly escaped from under her cap, lay in disheveled ringlets over her shoulders. It was dreadful to think that, only a few hours previously, those features had been lighted up with smiles. On the body and neck were black or purplish patches, which, to my unpracticed eye, bore a resemblance to contusions; but these, my medical friend assured me, were far from being unequivocal evidences of external injury, and were always very large and perceptible in cases of sudden death, unaccompanied by venous congestion.

Before leaving the house, I undertook to get information conveyed by express to their relatives, and promised to call in the evening.

It is now necessary to give some idea of the geography of that part of the house connected with the details of this story. Suppose then, a large parlor, which, besides its general entrance-door, has one near its eastern and another near its western angle, each severally communicating with sleeping apartments in these directions. In the eastern room slept Mrs. M'Queen, in the western the eldest daughter.

On Christmas night, it appeared from the account of the servant, Miss Sophia went to bed with her mother; whereas, from Miss M'Queen's statement, we were led to infer that she had come into her bed-room to sleep with her, and that after remaining there for some time she felt unable to compose herself, and had, after midnight, left her to go to her mother's apartment. From what could be gathered from the rhapsodies of the old lady—who seemed, in a few hours, to have made a rapid stride toward her dotage—first one inference was induced, then its opposite; and at length it was evident that nothing satisfactory could be collected—every thing, she said, being vague and indistinct.

According to promise I made my visit in the evening, after having passed a day of wretched anxiety. The sudden demise was, of course, the sole topic of conversation, and regarding it, one circumstance was adhered to by the elder sister. This was, however, an unaccountable one, being that she could not remain comfortable upon her sister's leaving her, and that, after some broken and unrefreshing sleep, she could not resist getting up in the dark, and groping her way across the parlor; in so doing, she stumbled and fell; it was over the body of her sister, which was stretched on the carpet.

I could never understand, notwithstanding all my endeavors to the purpose, what steps were taken on this discovery, or how the corpse was conveyed into the adjoining room; as the servant only allowed that she was summoned after Miss M'Queen had been for a considerable time using means to restore suspended animation, but in vain.

The old lady being confined to her bed, I did not see her during this visit; but I heard her frequently pulling the bell, and could casually catch the tones of her singular voice. In Miss M'Queen's manner there was a singular mixture of absorbed attention and frivolity. At times she was silent, and it was evident from her eyes that she had been weeping; while, anon, she spoke in a rapid and hurried manner about her sister, the West Indies, the weather, or the news of the day. She occasionally left the room abruptly, with a candle in her hand, and went alone into the apartment where the body was laid out, and then in a few moments would come back—listen as if she heard a sound—and again enter into conversation on different topics.

The occurrences of the day rendered me very nervous, and vague doubts were constantly crossing my mind. Over all hung the veil of impenetrable mystery.

Concomitant circumstances tended to render this still more perplexing. Surmises were now hazarded, which before I had never heard a whisper of—the servant appeared to know more than she had disclosed—and the family inhabiting the adjoining house to that in which the catastrophe happened, averred that they had been repeatedly surprised by noises during the night, and that on the fatal one they had been both loud and frequent. The many tongues of rumor were all loosened on the subject, and imputations were laid at the door of the mother, by some, and of the sister by others; while not a few shook their heads when the name of the victim herself was mentioned. All, however, was mere surmise; no one, perhaps, knew so much of the particular circumstances as myself, and I knew only enough to render conjecture hazardous, and all conclusions uncertain.

The funeral took place on the last day of the year; and along with the more immediate relatives, I was invited, as a mark of respect, to attend an hour earlier than that fixed upon for the interment, that I might be present at the reading of the funeral service; which, from the inclemency of the weather, was to be read in the house. The scene was most impressive. Neither of the ladies appeared, and after the "earth to earth, and dust to dust" had been pronounced, the clergyman laid two sealed packets into the folds of the shroud. These, I afterwards learned, were, the one a bundle of letters relating to the early attachment which I have before alluded to—the other containing two or three small presents (a book, a ring, and a miniature,) made to her during the same season. In a sealed note, dated some years before, although not discovered until after her decease, she had desired these to be laid with her in the grave.

Few events in my life ever effected me so deeply as those I have now related, and for a long time they continued to haunt my imagination, opening up a maze of doubts and horrors, and throwing a gloom over existence.

When the feelings are deeply excited all objects are adventitiously colored, be it in the hues of joy or grief; and perhaps it was from this very reason, that the funeral scene in the churchyard had for me an unwonted impressiveness. All nature wore the dull and cheerless aspect of winter. It had rained incessantly during the previous night; and through the morning the skies were shrouded in a heavy leaden hue. But though the sward was saturated with moisture, the rain had ceased, and a light breeze wafted amid the leafless branches of the solemn old trees around.

We had reached the grave and were lowering the coffin down, when suddenly the light breeze was changed to tempest. It blew a perfect hurricane, and the earth, sand, and bones, which had been dug out, were caught up and whirled about in a shower, which forced the attendants to cling to the sepulchral railings, or to hurry for shelter to the lee of the church. The sexton and his men alone remained at their posts, battling with the whirlwind until their task was finished.

Several years have passed away since the mysterious catastrophe, and as the principal parties have died, and yet "made no sign," it is not probable that any light will ever be thrown upon it now.

Shortly after the event, Mrs. M'Queen and her remaining daughter left the neighborhood, and all intercourse ceased with the few in it who had formed temporary acquaintance with them.

THE HEART OF THE BRUCE.

THE poem of "The Heart of the Bruce" is founded on the incident of Sir James Douglas's death, in action with the Moors on the borders of Andalusia, while on his way to Jerusalem, to deposit the heart of Robert Bruce in the Holy Sepulchre. A vision of the night, which is introduced with great effect, has warned Sir James that his mission will not be fulfilled. He and his hundred knights still hold on their way:

"And aye we sailed, and aye we sailed,
Across the weary sea,
Until one morn the coast of Spain
Rose grimly on our lee.

"And as we rounded to the port,
Beneath the watch-tower's wall,
We heard the clash of the atabals,
And the trumpet's wavering call.

"Why sounds yon Eastern music here,
So wantonly and long,
And whose the crowd of armed men
That round yon standard throng?"

"The Moors have come from Africa,
To spoil, and waste, and slay;
And King Alonzo of Castile
Must fight with them to-day."

"Now shame it were," cried good Lord James,
'Shall never be said of me,
That I and mine have turn'd aside
From the Cross in jeopardy!

"Have down, have down, my merry men all—
Have down into the plain;
We'll let the Scottish lion loose
Within the fields of Spain!"

"I know thy name full well, Lord James,
And honored may I be,
That those who fought beside the Bruce,
Should fight this day for me!

"Take thou the leading of the van,
And charge the Moors again;
There is not such a lance as thine
In all the host of Spain!"

"The Douglas turned towards us then,
Oh, but his glance was high!—
'There is not one of all my men,
But is as bold as I.

"There is not one of all my men
But bears as true a spear—
Then onward, Scottish gentlemen,
And think King Robert's here!"

"The trumpets blew, the crossbolts flew,
The arrows flashed like flame,
As spur in side, and spear in rest,
Against the foe we came.

"And many a bearded Saracen,
Went down, both horse and man,
For through their ranks we rode like corn,
So furiously we ran!

"But in behind our path they closed,
Through fain to let us through,
For they were forty thousand men,
And we were wondrous few.

"We might not see a lance's length,
So dense was their array,
But the long fell sweep of the Scottish blade
Still held them hard at bay.

"Make in! make in!" Lord Douglas cried,
'Make in, my brethren dear!
Sir William of Saint Clair is down;
We may not leave him here!"

"But thicker, thicker grew the swarm,
And sharper shot the rain,
And the horses reared amid the press,
But they could not charge again.

"Now, Jesu help thee!" said Lord James,
'Thou kind and true Saint Clair!
An' if I may not bring thee off,
I'll die beside thee there!"

"Then in his stirrups up he stood,
So lion-like and beld,
And held the precious heart aloft,
All in its case of gold.

"He flung it from him, far ahead,
And never spake he more,
But—"Pass the first, thou dauntless heart,
As thou wert wont of yore!"

"The roar of fight rose fiercer yet,
And heavier still the stour,
Till the spears of Spain came shivering in,
And swept away the Moor!"

"Now, praised be God, the day is won!
They fly o'er flood and fell—
Why dost thou draw the rein so hard,
Good Knight, that fought so well?"

"Oh, ride you on, Lord King," he said,
'And leave the dead to me,
For I must keep the dreariest watch
That ever I shall dree!"

"There lies, beside his master's heart,
The Douglas, stark and grim;
And wo is me I should be here,
Not side by side with him!"

"The king, he lighted from his horse,
He flung his brand away,
And took the Douglas by the hand,
So stately as he lay.

"God give thee rest, thou valiant soul,
That fought so well for Spain;
I'd rather half my land were gone,
So thou wert here again!"

THE ENCHANTED BAY.

[THE following adventure of a boat's crew, in their voyage from Possession Island, a small guano station near the coast of South Africa, to Walwich Bay on the main land, is extracted from the "Cape Town Mirror," a very meritorious miscellany recently commenced.]—

The breeze was very light, and it was midnight before we heard the breakers on Pelican Point, a long spit of sand, forming the western side of Walwich Bay. It was then blowing fresh, with very thick weather, and we stood off till morning. At daylight on the 12th we stood in again for Pelican Point; as the wind now blew from the south-east, which was directly off the bay, we found it would be necessary to work in. I therefore filled the ballast-casks, to give the boat a better hold on the water, and kept three hands bailing, as she then leaked very badly. In this way we got in before evening, near enough to see, close to the beach, on the east side of the bay, opposite Pelican Point, a small storehouse, built of planks, with a large triangle or "shears" near it, such as are used to fasten cattle to for slaughtering.

The wind, however, continued adverse, and we were unable to effect a landing before sunset, and were thus obliged to stand out to sea again. As the evening advanced, the wind drew round to the south-west, and was thus driving us gradually over towards the land north of the bay, near the mouth of the Swakop River. Not being able to wear the boat, for fear of her filling, we were obliged to "clubhaul" her, by throwing overboard, on the weather-bow, a sail lashed to an oar, and this made fast by a line passing round to the lee-bow of the boat. The sail and oar floated on the surface, and not being so high out of water as the boat, were not carried forward so fast by the force of the wind. Thus the line, pulling at the lee-bow, gradually drew the boat's head round to the south-east, and she then drifted along parallel with the land.

I have given this explanation not for the benefit of seamen, who of course do not need it, but for those readers who may never happen to have seen a boat put about in this fashion.

My companions were now ready to give up altogether, believing that we should never reach the land. They were quite worn out, and for a time refused to lend a hand in working the boat, declaring that it was useless, and that our case was desperate. At length, after much reasoning and persuasion, I induced them to aid in making one more trial.

By good fortune, shortly after midnight, the wind, for the first time since we left the ship, came out from the northward, and enabled us to stand in, as we thought, directly for the bay. What was our surprise and alarm, then, to find, when the sun rose over the eastern mountains, that we were approaching a part of the coast of which we had not the slightest recollection! On our starboard-bow, where we expected to see Pelican Point, was a low sandy island, that we had no knowledge of whatever. Other islands lay right ahead between us and the mountains. The hut and the shears were nowhere to be seen. We could not tell what to make of it. I began to be afraid that we had been carried by a current to a place laid down on the chart as Sandwich Harbor, about thirty miles south of Walwich Bay, though how we could have come so far in so short a time I could not imagine.

We continued to stand on, in great wonder and perplexity, till Frederick Noon suddenly exclaimed, "See! there is a woman in a white shawl on that island." We looked, and certainly saw something that had very much the appearance he described. But while we were doubting and speculating upon it, the supposed woman suddenly unfolded her wings and flew off, in the shape of a pelican with brown wings and a white neck and head. We had a hearty laugh at Fred's mistake, but at the same time puzzled to think how it was that we had not discovered the deception till the bird flew away, as the distance did not seem great enough to give rise to such an error.

At length, as we kept drawing in to the land, some one cried out—"There is a village, and the people about it." And sure enough there they were, right before us, and, as it seemed, not a half mile distant. There was a row of round-topped huts above the beach; and the people in clothing of various colors, were standing before them, apparently engaged in watching our motions. The little naked brown children could also be distinguished running about at the edge of the water. The people seemed to be numerous, and we were at first uncertain how to act. At length, after a brief consideration, I determined to take the risk of landing alone. Putting off a part of my clothes, in order to swim ashore, and giving my watch and some other small articles which I had about me to Frederick to keep, I directed my companions, in case they saw any harm befall me, to bear away immediately for an anchorage laid down on the coast to the northward, where it was possible that they might find a trading vessel, or at least obtain some provisions on shore.

I then jumped into the water. The splash which I made produced a miraculous effect: the whole crowd of people on shore, great and small, gray, red and brown, instantly soared up into the air, and flew away in a cloud of pelicans, flamingoes, sand-pipers, and other birds. This put the climax to our perplexity. We were too much astonished to be amused at our strange blunder. Bearing up again for the shore, we presently arrived at the beach, and landed. On going up to the supposed village, it proved to be the skeleton of an enormous whale, whose arching ribs had taken the appearance of a row of native huts. Still it seemed very singular that we should have been so completely deceived at so short a distance.

On looking about us, we found that not only was the land we stood on an island, but we were surrounded by numberless low sandy islets, between which the sea was running in and out in the strangest manner. My companions now became greatly alarmed, declaring that we should all perish if we remained there, and insisting that we should quit this desolate and unknown region, and look for Walwich Bay. To quiet them, and to clear up the uncertainty of our situation, I resolved, as it was now nearly noon, to get an observation, and determine our real situation. Accordingly, we went back to the boat, and stood out from the land, in order to obtain a clear horizon. On taking the altitude of the sun, and making the calculation, I found that we were in the precise latitude of Walwich Bay. The others thought that I was deceiving them; but feeling positive that I was right, I resolved to stand in for the shore again, in hopes that the mystery would be cleared up.

And now a wonderful change was apparent. The sun, having passed the meridian, was now shining with a western declination. A smart breeze, moreover, had arisen and swept away the haze that hung over the land. With it, and with the change in the position of the sun, the mirage, which had been the cause of all our perplexities, had disappeared. Everything was now familiar to us as we had seen it on the previous afternoon. There was Pelican Point, with the skeleton of the whale, and the hundreds of birds about it, no longer magnified by the deceptive haze, but in their natural proportions. The straits which had converted it into an island were now changed to dry land, as was also the seeming sea which had flowed about the sand-hills on shore, and turned them into so many islets. On the opposite side of the bay, the store and the triangle, which had been concealed by the mist, were plainly visible. The source of all our mistakes was now apparent; at the same time, I am inclined to think that any other persons, coming in as we did, would have been equally deceived. When we told the missionaries of our troubles and perplexities on this occasion, they were very much amused, and said that they had at first been frequently puzzled, both at the bay, and in traveling through the country, by the delusive appearances of the mirage, to which it required some time to become so accustomed as not to be misled. The bay, they said, from its shape, and the nature of the country about it, seemed to be peculiarly subject to those variations in the density and refractive power of the atmosphere which give rise to these singular effects. I have been thus particular in describing them, thinking that it may be of use to put my brother mariners on their guard against this source of deception on approaching a coast.

VOICE OF THE TENCH.—In the spring of 1823, I received from a friend a brace of very fine tench, just taken from the water. They were deposited by the cook in a dish, and placed upon a very high shelf in the larder, a room situated between the dining parlor and cooking kitchen. On the following midnight, while writing in the dining-room, to which I had removed in consequence of the extinction of the fire in the library, my attention was suddenly excited by a deep, hollow, protracted groan, such as might be supposed to proceed from a large animal in extreme distress. It was twice or thrice repeated; and all my efforts to discover the source of the alarming sound were ineffectual. At length my ear was startled by a loud splash, succeeded by a groan more deep and long-continued than those which I had previously heard, and evidently proceeding from the larder. Inspection of that room at once explained the mystery. One of the fishes had sprung down from the shelf on the stone floor, and there lay with mouth open, and pectoral and ventral fins extended, and uttering the sounds by which my midnight labors had been so unexpectedly interrupted. Next day both fishes were cooked for dinner; and such is the tenacity of life in the tench, that although thirty hours had then elapsed since their removal from their native element, both fishes, after having undergone the processes of scaling and evisceration, sprang vigorously from the pot of hot water when consigned to it by the cook.—[Dr. Shirley Palmer.]

German Lyrical Poems.

ALARIC AND ATTILA.

I.—ALARIC.

BY HEINRICH STIEGLITZ.

THE hordes that from the Eastern plains
A mighty flood on Europe press'd,
Are gone; one stream alone remains;
Lost in Time's ocean are the rest.

One stream—its billows still rush on,
And make the old Pantheon nod;
While all victorious the throne
Arises of the Triune God.*

This is the mighty German stream
Which in the East began to roar,
Then sparkled with the cross's gleam,
Which on its haughty waves it bore.

A hero, with young glory bright,
Riding in pride above the foam,
Appears—the sturdy Goths' delight—
The terror of old rotten Rome.

Alaric's brain with conquest glows,
The mighty future stirs his soul;
The torch of sacrifice he throws
At Rome's defying capitol.

Great thoughts his youthful soul inspire,
His Goths to storm the world are led;
But, ah! whose eye hath lost its fire?
Who now is slumbering with the dead?

Wild songs of grief are those in truth,
That round the royal corpse arise;
The Gothic star has set—the youth
Stretched in his golden coffin lies.

And while the Goths their hero mourn,
The Romans—now a captive swarm—
Busento's waves are forced to turn,
Digging the stream another arm.

The Goths within the hollow lay
The corpse, and treasures beyond prize;
Next, 'mid the shades of night they slay
The captives, as a sacrifice.

Now rolls the stream its torrent back,
And covers o'er the Germans' grave;
Borne along Time's eternal track,
Wave still is pressing close on wave.

II.—ALARIC'S GRAVE.

BY COUNT VON PLATEN.

On the river, by Cosenza, swells at night a mournful sound,
And the waters give it answer, and it echoes all around.

And the Goths cast moving shadows, as along the bank they pace,
For their Alaric lamenting—best and bravest of his race.

Dead too soon, from home too distant, now he must be buried here,
While about his youthful shoulders still his yellow locks appear.

On the banks of the Busento all the Goths their station take,
And to turn aside the river now another bed they make.

In the hollow drain'd of waters busily they ply the spade;
In the grave, with horse and armor, soon the noble corpse is laid.

Then to hide the royal treasure o'er it heaps of earth they throw;
From the grave of that young hero lofty waterplants shall grow.

Now once more they turn the river, bid it cast its waters back,
And the billows of Busento foam along their ancient track.

Rugged voices in a chorus sing, "Oh, sleep the hero's sleep,
Safe from base rapacious Romans, thus thy sacred grave we keep."

Thus they sing; and through the army rolls the dull and mournful song, on the Now from sea to sea, Busento, bear it y waves along.

* This expression (Dreimal ein), brought into such close contact with Alaric's invasion, is not quite felicitous, for Alaric was an Arian.

III.—THE SWORD OF WAR.

BY AUGUST NODNAGEL.

ROARING as the billows roar,
When the sea is lash'd to yeast,
Crowding from the distant East,
Savage Huns in fury pour;
Foul's their face, and short their form,
Rough their hair, their mouths are wide,
Through the wood and plain they ride,
On their horses, like the storm.

"Attila, thy people bring
To the magic western land,
Where, from sparkling silver sand,
Fountains of fresh water spring;
Where the trees rich burdens bear,
Houses stand of marble white;
Where the people shake with fright,
When the sound of war they hear."

Attila waits many days,
Will not grasp the battle-horn,
Will not heed his people's scorn;
Still the king his march delays.
Ere he ventures foreign wars,
Ere he seeks a foreign land,
He must from a peasant's hand,
Take the mystic sword of Mars.

At the ruddy break of morn
Through the vale the cattle wind;
One is lagging far behind,
Bloody is its foot, and torn,
And the herdsman marks the wound,
And the blood begins to trace;
Buried in a mossy place,
'Mid the rocks, the sword is found.

Now he holds the prize secure,
To the king the sword he brings;
Attila the weapon swings
Round his head, of conquest sure.
"Up, now up, my Huns arise,
'Tis our own that western soil,
We have the conquest without toil,
All the world before us lies."

God's own scourge is mov'd—his breath
Goes before—a burning flood,
Tears and howlings, fire and blood,
Are the harbingers of death.
Here ye, Huns, your monarch's voice.
God's own scourge the world will scathe,
With th' eternal thunderer's wrath;
Loudly in your tents rejoice.

IV.—ATTILA'S GRAVE.

BY KARL HALTAUS.

From the foot of the Carpathians, there comes forth
a heavy groan,
But all Europe as it passes can find triumph in the tone;

And old Rome has heard with rapture the glad messenger, who said:
"Attila, God's scourge, is taken to the kingdom of the dead!"

He, who long the earth has blighted, making all the nations quake,

When the sword, which Mars once carried, round his head he dared to shake;

He who scared old Rome, Byzantium, and the giant German race,

Made, as none were made before him, man's creations to efface.

At the foot of the Carpathians stands the Huns—a dusky throng—

In a wild and fearful chorus, they howl forth the fun'ral song;

Deck'd in all their brightest armor, while the clanging trumpet sounds;

Now the faithful hordes are marching, who the silken bier surround,

And they cut their hair dishevel'd, 'mid the women's piercing cries,

And they gash their limbs and faces for a bloody sacrifice.

Safely closed within three coffins is the royal body laid,

Which, of silver, gold and iron, by a skillful hand were made;

In earth's bosom they are buried, arms and treasures o'er them thrown,

At the deepest hour of midnight—never shall the spot be known.

Where the world's great scourge is slumbering, all who dug his grave are slain,

They have hewed down all the captives to a fierce and warlike strain;

O'er the grave, so newly cover'd, goblets deep with wine they fill,

And they quaff it, madly dancing, till in drunkenness they reel.

While the Huns are thus carousing, old Italia smiles beside,
For she knows that her Honoria will not be the
"Scourge's" bride;
He no more the sword shall brandish to affright the human race,
And the Hunnish folk is pow'rless man's creations to efface.

Ethical Sketches.

DEVIL WORSHIPERS.

MR. LAYARD, in his recently published work on the Antiquities of Nineveh, gives a very interesting account of a strange people, who have been little known to the rest of the world, but who have inhabited Mesopotamia and the neighboring countries, time out of mind. These are the Yezidis, or Worshipers of the Devil. We extract the following account from the last number of the London Quarterly Review:

The third expedition of Mr. Layard led him among a still more remarkable people, perhaps in their origin not only much older than the Nestorian form of Christianity, but even than Christianity itself. He is admitted into the rites, almost into the inmost sanctuary of their singular race, who bear the ill-omened name of Devil Worshipers. He is the first European, we believe, who has received almost unreserved communication as to the nature of their tenets;
though probably from the ignorance of the Yez-idis themselves, he has by no means solved the problem either of the date or the primal source of their curious doctrines. How extraordinary the vitality even of the wildest and strangest forms of religious belief! Here are tribes proscribed for centuries, almost perhaps for thousands of years, under the name most odious to all other religious creeds—hated and persecuted by the Christians, as, if not guilty of an older and more wicked belief, at least infected by the most detested heresy, Manicheism, trampled upon, hunted down, driven from place to place by the Mussulmen, as being of those idolaters, the people without a book, toward whom the Koran itself justifies or commands implacable enmity.

Against the Yezidis, even in the present day,
the Moslem rulers most religiously fulfil the precepts of their Scripture—making razias among them, massacring the males, and carrying off the women, especially the female children, into their harems. That fanatic persecution, which accidental circumstances suddenly and fatally kindled against the Chaldean Christians, had been the wretched lot, time out of mind, of the Yezidis. Toward the Christians the Koran contained more merciful texts—towards the Devil Worshipers none.

Yet here are they subsisting in the nineteenth century—flourishing tribes, industrious tribes, cleanly beyond most Asiatics—not found in one district alone, but scattered over a wide circuit (some have lately taken refuge from Mohammedan persecutions under the Russian government in Georgia,) celebrating publicly their religious rites—with their sacred places and sacred orders—and with the unviolated tombs of their sheikhs, their groves, and their temples.
The manners of these tribes are full of the frank, courteous, hospitable freedom of the Asiatics—they are resolute soldiers in self-defense, and at least not more given in their best days, to marrauding habits than their neighbors, and only goaded to them by the most cruel and unprovoked persecution. Their morals, as far as transpires in Mr. Layard's trustworthy account, are much above those of the tribes around them—they are grateful for kindness, and by no means, at least as far as Mr. Layard experienced, and we may add some earlier travelers, jealously uncommunicative with Franks.

It is this strange and awful reverence for the Evil Principle which is the peculiar tenet in the creed, and has given its odious name to this ancient and singular people. With them and old Lear alone the "Prince of Darkness is a gentleman." They will not endure the profane use of any word that sounds like Sheitan, or Satan; and they have the same aversion—some slight much of which might perhaps not be unbecoming in the followers of a more true and holy faith—to the Arabic words for a curse and accursed. Satan in their theory, which approaches that of Origen, is the chief of the angelic host, now suffering punishment for rebellion against the divine will—but to be hereafter admitted to pardon and restored to his high estate. He is called Melek Taous, King Peacock; or Melek el Kout, the mighty angel. The peacock, according to one account, is the symbol as well as the appellative of this ineffable being—no unfitting emblem of pride. They reverence the Old Testament almost with Jewish zeal, (a tenet absolutely inconsistent with Manichæism;) they receive, but with less reverence, the Gospel and the Koran. Their notion of our Savior is the Mohammedan, except that he was an angel, not a prophet.

WHY THUS LONGING?

BY MISS WINSLOW.

Why thus longing, thus for ever sighing
For the far off, unattained, and dim;
While the beautiful, all around thee lying;
Offers up its low, perpetual hymn?

Wouldst thou listen to its gentle teaching,
All thy restless yearning it would still;
Leaf, and flower, and laden bee are preaching,
Thine own sphere, though humble, first to fill.

Poor indeed thou must be, if around thee
Thou no ray of joy or light can'st throw;
If no silken cord of love hath bound thee
To some little world through weal or woe.

If no dear eyes thy fond love can brighten,
No fond voices answer to thine own;
If no brother's sorrow thou can'st lighten,
By daily sympathy and gentle tone.

Not by deeds that win the crowd's applause,
Not by works that give the world renown;
Not by martyrdom or vaunted crosses,
Can'st thou win and wear the immortal crown.

Daily struggling, though unloved and lonely,
Every day a rich reward will give;
Thou wilt find by hearty striving only,
And truly loving, thou can'st truly live.

THE PROMISES.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY MRS. S. MOWBRAY.

A blest hereafter, then, or hoped or gain'd
Is all!

Though indifference to pain were a valuable science, yet the voluntary endurance of unnecessary misery is no part of true wisdom. Every right-minded person will, therefore, try to be as happy as possible, and to make others feel so too; and as the materials of this happiness should not be expected to descend in the form of miracles, but through the usual unostentatious modes instituted by infinite goodness and wisdom, just as a great city drinks of the distant fountain from the puny rills of ten thousand almost invisible aqueducts. So the soul of man should learn to bring its vast and various desires, that thus they may drink of the rivers of pleasure which flow from God's right hand.

Why should they be allowed to wander in quest of the Abannas and Parphars of sin, or turn aside to the broken cisterns of unhallowed indulgence? while heaven and earth give joy: various and abundant joy: at once permanent and legitimate; and in the only form indifferent to the touch of time and change; namely, that of faith and promise—and let not any think that these are meager materials of such a precious commodity, for they are indeed its only elements—at least as far as the experience of the human mind enables it to judge; at any rate they compose every emotion worthy of that name, of which we have any idea.

It is not my object, in this paper, to expatiate on the promises of revelation, they are full ex-

licit and glorious beyond what any words of mine could express. They are the Christian's proper consolation; and to them he reverts in every darker hour. But is not the Christian often soothed, and cheered, too, by less direct consolations in the Divine economy communicated through the medium of surrounding objects? Now, methinks there is something both wise and profitable in one's allowing oneself to be comforted by the ministry of birds and flowers, and clouds and wind, especially under certain circumstances, which, from their very nature and design, admit of no other sort of amelioration.

Nor are such helps as these to be lightly accounted of. Look at the man who but an hour ago seemed to be the prey of a hopeless insanity, his heart writhing beneath the lash of conflicting passions, did anything come with promise of peace and love, that now he seems so changed and cheered? Yes, but it was only a moon-beam, which attracted him to the window—that planet's mild regard has often solaced the distressed. The cool winds were there, and the stars, in their own way, assured him that though weeping may endure for a night, joy cometh in the morning.

Indeed, it is a very useful as well as a very pleasant habit, that of being able to hold a kind of spiritual communion with whatever objects may happen to surround us; to have ears to hear, and hearts to interpret the significant language of even inanimate thoughts—to have faith to believe the eloquent breathings of harmonious sounds, as prophetic of unspeakable happiness yet to be. Nay, the heart should learn to hold communion with itself or some kindred one; but especially with the Author of its being. This requires the exercise of the soul's noblest faculties, and affords the loftiest and truest pleasure.

Apart from these considerations, however, it is safer for us to confine our sympathies to inanimate subjects. Birds will fly away, and butterflies brook no attention; but flowers, with their incense-breathing lips, will never betray or upbraid us, nor promise that which they do not mean to perform.

It is a pretty sight, that wedding party—the gay bridegroom, and the gentle bride—to mark how trustfully she treasures his promises, thus solemnly witnessed on earth and recorded in heaven; but, alas! little accounted of by him. Well, let her believe them all, perhaps it is best she should do so, now; few of them will be remembered by him; by her not one of them shall ever be forgotten, though finding them faithless as the ignis fatuus of the marsh.

But let us turn from these glow-worm lamps of faith and hope, and look once more toward the heavens of the soul, even the promises of God, as contained in the scriptures. These, like the lighthouse on the beetling cliff, can never be obscured, but shine to guide the tempest-tossed spirit through the billows of sin and death into the haven of its final rest. Then let every one be familiar with their language, number and import, and comforted by the very recollection that God has said, "Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will answer you," and that this is only one of the many "exceeding great and precious promises."

New-York, March, 1849.

PROSPERITY AND PROGRESS.—From all we have seen for a century, the tide of affairs has set in waves: any extraordinary advance has always been followed by a reflux. It is in vain to bid "be still;" for it is one of the conditions, and perhaps means, if not of the existence, at least of the progress of society—which, amid all its perturbations, moves steadily up and down on the shores of time, under the dominion of a power that makes nations advance or recede, and under laws which can only be discovered by long, accurate, analyzed observation. As statistical science and education advance, the severity of seasons of distress—whose general course can be calculated—will be diminished by mutual aid, and provision will be made in prosperity against their recurrence; as the losses of shipwreck, fire, and life to society are mitigated by the various kinds of insurance. Knowledge will banish panic.—[Ninth Report: Reg. Gen.

SPIRIT COMMUNINGS.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY ALLIE VERNON.

I HEAR spirit voices from each bending flower—clear, loud tones from the full-blown rose, the gaudy tulip, the perfumed magnolia, and the pure lily—low, sweet ones from the delicate blossoms of the mignonette, the fairy bells of the lily of the vale, and the petals of the humble violet; and they tell ever of Hope and Love, the glad spirits that seek a resting place in the blooming flowers.

Mid the graceful branches of the waving trees, from the velvet moss of the shady vale, and from the leafy forest I hear their strain—sweeter, far sweeter than the song-bird's lay. They are borne on the fragrant wings of the wandering wind; they sweetly mingle with the rude tones of the storm-king; they softly chime with the song of the dancing brooklet, the gayer strain of the sparkling river, and the deep murmur of the sullen sea. Loudly they swell the wild song of the foaming cataract; softly they whisper in the gushing fountains, and the falling rain-drop.

Others, perchance, may have listened in wonder to the lays of the unseen spirits—they may have felt their influence upon their softened hearts—but I have held communion with them. Ay! in the still, dark midnight, when the stars look down like bright eyes upon the slumbering earth, and the pale moon-beams tremble on each dew-gemmed blossom, I hear their tones. Faintly at first, as though they had scarcely left the heavens, and then louder and louder as they wing their way toward earth. I hear the rustling of their silken pinions like the sound of flowers, whispering musically together. The pure rays of the moon fly before the coming brightness, and soon my dreary room is filled with the heavenly ones. I see them with their snowy robes, and stainless wings, and crowns of interwoven stars; and they gaze so sweetly upon me, with their large, loving eyes, that my heart yearns to leave this world, and with them seek a home on high.

One, there is, with a pale, high brow, and gentle smile, and she leaves the throng and bends lovingly over me, with affection beaming in her soft eyes, and presses her lips to my burning brow, and gazes sadly in my tearful eyes, while she whispers to me in low, sweet tones:

"Be of good cheer, and faint not; though the love thou wouldst freely give unto others hath been forced back into thine own heart; though thy young soul is weary of life, thou shalt not be weary long. There is joy, much joy in store for thee, and a crown of light above. Thou shalt cast off this mortal dress, dear one, and put on robes of purity."

And then again the spirits raise their voices, while they sing of "Him that sitteth on the throne;" and faintly the sweet music dies away, as, one by one, they unfold their wings and leave me. But she—my mother—lingers till the last, and casts a glance of mingled pity and love upon me, as though she fain would stay; but they cannot tarry when the early sun-beams play over the rippling waves. 'Tis only in the calm midnight hour they come to me, when thoughts or bitter woes are madly chasing through my brain. They come only then, but I hear them ever, and they sing of Love and Faith.

Others wonder, when, ever and anon, I start and listen; they dream not that my soul can hold communion with spirits. And some bright night they tell me that I, too, shall mingle with them; and oh! joy! shall soar far, far from this dark earth.

Ye will marvel, perchance, when some fair morn ye shall find my spirit fled; but ye need not weep; nay, smile and rejoice that one more voice is added to the land of unseen spirits that are ever breathing thoughts of love to weary man.

THE really humane man is prone to the study of humanity. He likes to see it brought home from the universality of precepts and general terms, to the reality of persons, of tones, and actions, and to have it raised from the grossness and familiarity of sense, to the lofty, but striking platform of the imagination.

"THOSE EYES THAT WERE SO BRIGHT, LOVE."

BY THE LATE THOMAS HOOD.

Those eyes that were so bright, love,
Have now a dimmer shine;
But what they've lost in light, love,
Was what they gave to mine.
And still those orbs reflect, love,
The beams of former hours;
That ripened all my joys, my love,
And tinted all my flowers.

Those locks were brown to see, love,
That now are turned to gray;
But the years were spent with me, love,
That stole their hue away.
Thy locks no longer share, love,
The golden glow of noon;
But I've seen the world look fair, my love,
When silvered by the moon.

That brow was fair to see, love,
That looks so shaded now;
But for me it bore the care, love,
That spoilt a bonny brow.
And though no longer there, love,
The gloss it had of yore,
Still Memory looks and dotes, my love,
Where Hope admired before.

HEROIC WOMEN OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

PRINCESS DE LAMBALLE.

A WOMAN of no great powers of mind, but of affectionate character and spotless reputation, who fell a victim, not to political intrigues, but simply to her friendship and attachment for Marie Antoinette. On the taking of the Tuileries, she had voluntarily accompanied the queen to the Temple, until the brutal order came to exclude all the friends of the fallen monarch from his prison. She was not, however, released from captivity, but was transferred to La Force; in which she heard the whole, even the minutest details, of the appalling and atrocious butchery of the royalist prisoners, to the number of nearly 7000, perpetrated by the orders of Marat and Danton.

The vulgar murderers, who were absolutely hired and paid at so much a head, by arrangement with Manuel, their chief, had yet so much of sincerity in them, and belief in the retributive justice of their acts, that no inducement of interest operated on their pity or mercy, which was, in a few instances, singularly and capriciously shown. But the chiefs were in no wise so inaccessible to corrupt and sordid arguments; and several of the chief prisoners, particularly ladies, had, at enormous pecuniary sacrifices, obtained a respite from the sabers and pikes of the assassins.

One alone of these victims, ransomed in the judge's intention, could not escape fate. Hébert and L'Huilier wished to save her. A cry ruined her. She fell between the tribunal and the street. This was the Princess de Lamballe. This young widow of the Duc de Penthièvre was a princess of Savoie Carignan. Her beauty and the charms of her mind had drawn to her the affectionate attachment of Marie Antoinette. The chaste affection of the Princess de Lamballe had only answered the odious suspicions of the people, by a heroic devotion to the misfortunes of her friend. The more the queen fell the more the princess attached herself to her fall. All her pleasures were in the participation of the queen's reverses. Péthion had allowed her to follow her royal friend to the Temple. The commune, more implacable, sent to take her from the arms of the queen, and threw her into La Force. The father-in-law of Madame de Lamballe, the Duc de Penthièvre, adored her as his own daughter.

The Duc de Penthièvre lived in retirement at the Chateau de Bizy, in Normandy. The people's love protected him there in his old age. He watched from a distance over her days. A secret agent of his house, furnished with a sum of a hundred thousand crowns, was sent back by order of the prince to Paris, and had bought from one of the principal agents of the commune the safety of the Princess de Lamballe. Other inferior agents, domestics of the private friends of the house of Penthièvre, were spread in Paris, charged by the duke to get intimate with the dangerous men who roamed around the prisons, to insinuate themselves into their confidences, to keep watch over the crime, and prevent it, in attempting the cupidity of the assassins. All these measures, of which the center was the Hotel de Toulouse, the palace of the duke, had succeeded. At the commune, among the judges and executioners, eyes were watching over the princess.

She appeared one of the last before the tribunal. She had been spared the day and night of the 2d of September, as if to give the people time to satiate themselves before robbing them of their prey. Shut up alone with Madame de Navarre, one of her women, in a chamber high up in the prison, she heard from there, during forty hours, the tumult of the people, the blows of the assassins, the groans of the dying. Voices which pronounced her name mounted to her ears. Sick, lying on her bed, passing from the convulsions of terror to the stupor of sleep, startled again by dreams less frightful than the blows of murder under her window, she fainted every instant. At four o'clock two national guards entered her chamber, and ordered her, with a feigned harshness, to rise and follow them to the Abbaye. Scarcely able to rise from her seat and support herself upon her elbow, she supplicated her benefactors to leave her where she was. "Wishing as much," said she, "to die there as elsewhere." One of these men leaned towards her bed, and said in her ear, that she must obey them, and that her safety depended upon it. She begged of the men who were in her chamber to retire, dressed herself quickly, and descended the stairs, supported by the national guard, who seemed interested in her safety.

Hébert and L'Huilier were waiting for her. At the aspect of these sinister figures, that appearance of crime, those ruffians with blood-stained arms, half opening the door where the victims were heard falling, the young woman lost the use of her senses, sank into the arms of her waiting-woman, and returned slowly to life. After a brief interrogatory, the judges said to her:

"Swear love of equality and liberty, and hatred to kings and queens."

"I will willingly take the first oath," said she, "but hatred to the king and queen, I cannot swear it, for it is not in my heart."

One of the judges leaned toward her:

"Swear all," said he, with a significant gesture. "If you do not swear, you are dead."

She bowed her head and closed her lips.

"Well, go out," said the assistants to her, "and when you are in the street, cry, 'Vive la Nation!'"

One of the chiefs of the massacre, named Truchon, or "the big Nicholas," supported the princess on one side—one of the Acloytes sustained her on the other. She appeared on the threshold, and recoiled at the sight of the heap of mutilated corpses. Forgetting the saving cry which they had recommended her to proffer, "God," cried she, "what horror!" Truchon put his hand upon her mouth, and made her stride over the dead.

The cut-throats, disarmed by this angelic apparition, stopped before so much beauty. She had traversed, amid astonishment and silence, more than half the street, when a barber-fellow, named Charlot, drunken with wine and carnage, would, in barbarous jest, raise with the point of his pike, the cap which covered Madame de Lamballe's hair; the pike, ill-directed, by an unsteady hand, grazed the princess's forehead, and the blood gushed out of the wound and covered her face.

The murderers, at the sight of blood, thought that the victim was turned over to them, and threw themselves upon her. A villain, named Grizon, laid her at his feet by a blow from a club. The sabers and pikes struck her. Charlot seized her by the hair, and cut off her head. Others stripped the corpse of its clothing, profaned and mutilated it. During these sacrileges Charlot, Grizon, Hamin, Rodi—history of the eternal pillory of infamous names—carried the head of the Princess de Lamballe into a neighboring pot-house, laid it on the counter between the glasses and bottles, and forced the assistants to drink with them to her death. These drinkers of blood walked in numbers to the doors of the Temple to terrify the eyes of Marie Antoinette by the livid head of her friend. The commissioners of the commune, who were watching at the Temple, with a deputation from the assembly, warned of the approach of this mob, received it with consideration and prayers. The mob was content to ask leave to parade the head of the queen's accomplice under the windows of the royal family. The commissaries consented to it. While the possession defiled into the garden, under the tower inhabited by the prisoners, the commandant of the post invited the king to show himself to the people. The king obeyed. A commissary, more humane than the rest, placed himself between the prince and the window where they were raising the horrible trophy. The king, nevertheless, saw the head, and knew it. The queen, whom they had loudly called for, ignorant of the spectacle prepared for her, rushed toward the window. The king held her in his arms and carried her to the back of the apartment. They only concealed from her the sight of her murdered friend; the same evening she knew the details, and recognized the hatred of the people in their animosity against all she loved.

The mob took their march across the streets of Paris, and stopped under the windows of the Palais-Royal, to show to the Duc d'Orleans the head of his sister-in-law, not as a menace, but as a tribute. The Duc d'Orleans was at table with Madame de Buffon, his new favorite, and some other companions of his pleasure. He dared not refuse the homage of a crime offered in the name of the people by assassins. He rose, presented himself at the balcony, and in silence contemplated, for some moments, the bleeding head which they raised to him.

Madame de Buffon perceived it. "God!" cried she, joining her hands, and throwing herself backwards, "it is thus, then, they will soon carry my head in the streets!"

The duke closed the window, and endeavored to reassure his favorite.

"Poor woman," said he, in speaking of the princess, "if she had believed me, her head would not be there!"

He then sat down, and remained silent and mournful to the end of the meal. His enemies accused him of having pointed out that head to the steel of the assassins, and of having required them to present it to him, to satisfy his vengeance, and to tranquillize his cupidity. He saw an enemy in the queen's friend; and he was to inherit, by the death of Madame de Lamballe, a dowry which the estates of the Duc de Penthièvre owed to the widow of his brother-in-law. These imputations fall before the truth. The life of this woman was indifferent to his ambition, her death added nothing to his fortune. At the moment of the assassination, the Duke and Duchess of Orleans were legally separated. The dowry of Madame de Lamballe did not increase the future property of the Duchess of Orleans but by a trifling rent of thirty thousand francs a year. This price of blood was beneath an assassination, and did not even go to the assassin. They threw back upon the Duc d'Orleans all the crimes for which they were embarrassed to find a cause; sad condemnation of a bad renown. They often surprised his hand in the frenzy of the people, and they thought to detect it in this blood; it was not.

When the night came, an unknown person, who piously followed the progress of the train; bought of the murderers, for gold, the head of the princess, still ornamented with her long hair. He cleansed it from the blood and mud which soiled its features, sealed the head in a leaden coffer, and sent it to the servants of the Duc de Penthièvre, in order that this part of her beautiful body should at least receive the rights of interment in the family tomb. The Duc de Penthièvre awaited in anguish the news that public rumor brought to his chateau at Bizy. On the reception of these dear remains, his daughter, wife of the Duc d'Orleans, and the servants vainly endeavored to compose their countenances, to conceal from the old man the knowledge of this outrage. The prince read his misfortune in their eyes. He raised his hands to heaven, exclaiming:

"Great God! what avails youth, beauty, all the tenderness of woman, if they do not find grace before the people? Who are the people?"

He never again rose from his bed of tears. The funeral service was performed in the chamber hung with black.

"I think I always hear her," said he, in his last conversation with his daughter. "I always think I see her sitting near the window, in the little study. Do you remember, my child, with what assiduity she used to work there, from morning till night, at the labors of her sex, for the poor? I have spent many years with her; I have never discovered a thought in her mind which was not for the queen, for me, or for the unfortunate; and this is the angel they have torn to pieces! Ah! I feel that this idea is digging my grave!"

He went down to it without being a moment consoled.

SONG.

BY THE LATE THOMAS HOOD.

THERE is dew for the flow'ret,
And honey for the bee;
And bowers for the wild-bird,
And love for you and me!

There are tears for the many,
And pleasure for the few;
But let the world pass on, dear,
There's love for me and you!

There is Care that will not leave us,
And Pain that will not flee;
But on our hearth unaltered
Sits Love, 'tween you and me!

Our love, it ne'er was reckoned,
Yet good it is, and true;
It's half the world to me, dear,
It's all the world to you!

CLEANLINESS.—A white-yellow cravat or shirt on a man speaks at once the character of his wife; and be you assured that she will not take with your dress pains which she has never taken with her own. Then the manner of putting on the dress is no bad foundation for judging—if it be carelessly, slovenly, if it do not fit properly. No matter for its mean quality; mean as it may be, it may be neatly and trimly put on; and if it be not, take care of yourself, for, as you will soon find to your cost, a sloven in one thing, is a sloven in all things. The country people judge greatly from the state of the covering of the ankles; and if that be not clean and tight, they conclude that all out of sight is not what it ought to be. Look at the shoes; if they be trodden on one side, loose on the foot, or run down at the heel, it is a very bad sign; and, as to slipshod, though at coming down in the morning, and even before daylight, make up your mind to a rope, rather than live with a slipshod wife. Oh! how much do women lose by inattention to these matters! Men, in general, say nothing about it to their wives, but they think about it; they envy their luckier neighbors; and, in numerous cases, consequences the most serious arise from this apparently trifling cause. Beauty is valuable; it is one of the ties, and a strong tie too, that, however, cannot last to an old age; but the charm of cleanliness never dies but with life itself.—[Cobbett.]

THE BEST FRIEND.—The most agreeable of all companions is a simple, frank man, without any high pretensions to an oppressive greatness; one who loves life, and understands the use of it; obliging alike at all hours; above all, of a golden temper, and steadfast as an anchor. For such a one we gladly exchange the greatest genius, the most brilliant wit, the profoundest thinker.—[Lessing.]

Humorous.

A RUSE FOR A DINNER.

THE following characteristic anecdote of Theodore Hook, is given in Barham's life of that extraordinary man. Of the hoax so commonly told and generally believed as taking place at the Spanish ambassador's at Woolwich, on the banks of the Thames, Mr. Barham has given a truer and more authentic account. One of the streets near Soho-square, either Dean-street, or Frith-street, was the real scene of action. Hook was lounging up one of those streets in company with Terry, the actor, when they saw through the kitchen window preparations for a handsome dinner.

"What a feast!" said Terry. Jolly dogs! I should like to make on of them."

"I'll take any bet," returned Hook, "that I do, —call for me here at ten o'clock, and you'll find that I shall be able to give a tolerable account of the worthy gentleman's champagne and venison." So saying, he marched up the steps, gave an authoritative rap with the burnished knocker, and was quickly lost to the sight of his astonished companion. As a matter of course he was immediately ushered by the servant as an unexpected guest, into the drawing-room, where a large party had already assembled. The apartment being well nigh full, no notice was at first taken of his intrusion, and half-a-dozen people were laughing at his bon mots, before the host discovered the mistake. Affecting not to observe the visible embarrassment of the latter, and ingeniously avoiding any opportunity for explanation, Hook rattled on till he had attracted the greater part of the company in a circle near him, and some considerable time had elapsed ere the old gentleman was able to catch the attention of the agreeable stranger.

"I beg your pardon, sir," he said, contriving at last to get in a word; "but your name, sir,—I did not quite catch it,—servants are so abominably incorrect, and I am really a little at loss."

"Don't apologise, I beg," graciously replied Theodore. "Smith—my name is Smith—and, as you justly observe, servants are always making some stupid blunder or another. I remember a remarkable instance, &c."

"But really, my dear sir," continued the host at the termination of the story illustrative of stupidity in servants, "I think the mistake on the present occasion does not originate in the source you allude to; I certainly did not expect the pleasure of Mr. Smith's company at dinner to-day."

"No, I dare say not; you said four in your note I know, and it is now, I see, a quarter past five—you are a little fast, by the way, but the fact is I have been detained in the city, and I was about to explain when—"

"Pray," exclaimed the other, as soon as he could stay the volubility of his guest, "whom, may I ask, do you suppose you are addressing?"

"Whom? Why, Mr. Thompson, of course—old friend of my father; I have not the pleasure, indeed, of being personally known to you, but, having received your kind invitation on my arrival from Liverpool—Frith-street, four o'clock—family party—come in boots—you see I have taken you at your word. I am only afraid I have kept you waiting."

"No, no, not at all. But permit me to observe, my dear sir, my name is not exactly Thompson, it is Jones, and—"

"Jones," repeated the soi-disant Smith, in admirably assumed consternation, "Jones! Why surely I cannot have—yes, I must—good heaven! I see it all. My dear sir, what an unfortunate blunder—wrong house—what must you think of such an intrusion! I am really at a loss for words in which to apologise. You will permit me to retire at present, and to-morrow—"

"Pray don't think of retiring," exclaimed the hospitable old gentleman; "your friend's table must have been cleared long ago, it, as you say, four was the hour named; and I am only too happy to be able to offer you a seat at mine."

Hook, of course, could not think of any such thing,—could not think of trespassing upon the kindness of a perfect stranger; if too late for Thompson, there were plenty of chop-houses at hand. The unfortunate part of the business was, he had made an appointment with a gentleman to call for him at ten o'clock. The good-natured Jones, however, positively refused to allow so entertaining a visitor to withdraw dinnerless; Mrs. Jones joined in the solicitation; the Misses Jones smiled bewitchingly; and at last, Mr. Smith, who soon recovered from his confusion, was prevailed upon to offer his arm to one of the ladies, and take his place at the well-furnished board. In all probability the family of Jones never passed such an evening before. Hook naturally exerted himself to the utmost to keep the party in an unceasing roar of laughter, and make good the first impression. The mirth grew fast and furious, when, by way of a coup de grace, he seated himself at the piano-forte, and struck off into one of those extemporaneous effusions which had filled more critical judges than the Jones's with delight and astonishment. Ten o'clock struck, and, on Mr. Terry being announced, his triumphant friend wound up the performance with the explanatory stanza—

I am very much pleased with your fare,
Your cellar's as prime as your cook;
My friend's Mr. Terry the player,
And I'm Mr. Theodore Hook.

THE ART OF CONVERSATION.—In the first place, remember, in sustaining a light and polished dialogue, that to go on saying anything is infinitely better than coming to a dead stop and saying nothing.

Never bungle, hesitate, or correct yourself. Let the stream of words flow easily; and as in taking care of the pence, the pounds are said to take care of themselves, so in managing well your forms of diction, the sense must be often left to its own guidance.

As a substitute for a particular word, "What's its name" is always at hand, and is preferable to "Thingumybob," which is decidedly vulgar.

In the absence of argument, the logical "of course" is invaluable.

"All that sort of thing," admirably supplies the place of general knowledge.

"As the poet says," will account for any quotation from any or no author in existence.

"In the middle ages," or "in the days of Louis XIV.," is a capital date to work upon.

It is convenient to assume, by the way, that Dr. Johnson, Theodore Hook, or Sidney Smith, were the heroes of all the anecdotes you are in the habit of repeating. For example—

"Hook one day observing to Johnson that he did not patronise vegetables; the doctor replied, winking at Sidney Smith, who sat opposite, 'Sir, I believe I once tasted a pea!'"—[Puppet Show.]

HINTS FOR SHERIFF'S OFFICERS.—All the cunning devices of the process-server I narrated with a gusto that smacked of my early training—how sometimes my crafty parent would append a summons to the collar of a dog, and lie in wait till he saw the owner take it off and read it, and then, emerging from his concealment, cry out, "Served!" and take to his heels; and again, how once he succeeded in "serving" old Andy himself, by appearing as a beggar-woman, and begging him to light a bit of paper to light her pipe. The moment, however, he took the bit of twisted paper, the assumed beggar-woman screamed out, "Andy, ye're served; that's a process, my man!" The shock almost took Andy's life.—[Confessions of Col. Grogan.]

Sir William Burrell used frequently to boast of having been both at Oxford and Cambridge; being one day at an agricultural meeting, he made some proposals which a farmer present objected to. "Sir," said the baronet, who could ill brook any opposition from an inferior, "I should be very sorry indeed if I were not better informed on such subjects than you are, having been at the two Universities." "Ay, that may be," replied the farmer, "but I remember to have had a calf that sucked two cows, and the observation that I made was, that he was the greater calf for that."

Choice Miscellany.

WE'LL MEET AGAIN.

We'll meet again: how sweet the word—
How soothing is its sound!
Like strains of far-off music heard
On some enchanted ground.

We'll meet again—thus friendship speaks
When those most dear depart,
And in the pleasing prospect seeks
Balm for the bleeding heart.

We'll meet again, the lover cries;
And oh! what thought but this
Can e'er assuage the agonies
Of the last parting kiss?

We'll meet again, are accents heard
Beside the dying bed,
When all the soul by grief is stirr'd,
And bitter tears are shed.

We'll meet again, are words that cheer
While bending o'er the tomb;
For oh! that hope, so bright and dear,
Can pierce its deepest gloom.

We'll meet again; then cease to weep
Whatever may divide;
Not time, nor death, can always keep
The loved ones from our side:

For in the mansions of the blest,
Secure from care and pain,
In heaven's serene and endless rest
We'll surely meet again.

EDWARD THE SIXTH LORD DIGBY.

THE following interesting anecdote of this young nobleman is related by a young gentleman who enjoyed his friendship, and, like all who knew him, revered and loved him. "Lord Digby came often to Parliament-street, and I could not help remarking a singular alteration in his dress and demeanor, which took place during the great festivals. At Christmas and Easter he was more than usually grave, and then always had on an old shabby blue coat. I was led, as well as many others, to conclude that it was some affair of the heart which caused this periodical singularity. Mr. Fox, his uncle, who had great curiosity, wished much to find out his nephew's motive for appearing at times in this manner, as in general he was esteemed more than a well-dressed man. On his expressing an inclination for this purpose, Major Vaughan and another gentleman undertook to watch his lordship's motions. They accordingly set out; and observing him to go to St. George's Fields, they followed him at a distance, till they lost sight of him near the Marshalsea Prison. Wondering what could carry a person of his lordship's rank and fortune to such a place, they inquired of the turnkey if such a gentleman (describing Lord D.) had not entered the prison. 'Yes, masters,' exclaimed the fellow, with an oath, 'but he is not a man; he is an angel; for he comes here twice a year, sometimes oftener, and sets a number of prisoners free. And he not only does this, but he gives them sufficient to support themselves and their families till they can find employment. This,' continued the man, 'is one of his extraordinary visits. He has but a few to take out to-day.' 'Do you know who the gentleman is,' inquired the major. 'We none of us know him by any other marks,' replied the man, 'but by his humanity and his blue coat.'"

One of the gentlemen could not resist the desire of making some further inquiries relative to the occurrence from which he reaped so much satisfaction. The next time, accordingly, his lordship had his alms-giving coat on, he asked him what occasioned his wearing that singular dress! With a smile of great sweetness, his lordship told him that his curiosity should soon be gratified; for as they were congenial souls, he would take him with him when he next visited the place to which his coat was adapted. One morning shortly after, his lordship accordingly requested the gentleman to accompany him on a visit to that receptacle of misery which his lordship had so often explored to the consolation of its inhabitants. His lordship would not suffer his companion to enter the gate, lest the hideousness of the place should prove disagreeable to him; but he ordered the coachman to drive to the George Inn in the Borough, where a dinner was ordered for the happy individuals he was about to liberate. Here the gentleman had the pleasure of seeing near thirty persons rescued from the jaws of a loathsome prison, at an inclement season of the year, being in the mid of winter; and not only released from their confinement, but restored to their families and friends, with some provision from his lordship's bounty for their immediate support.

Lord D. went, some few months after these beneficent acts, to visit his estates in Ireland, where he caught a putrid fever, of which he perished in the dawn of life, November 30, 1757.

AN INDEFATIGABLE TEACHER.

IN the commencement of this century, in the parish of Alsace, which contains 600 or 700 inhabitants, there was a teacher, who, of his own accord, had organized his school very much in the manner I have been describing. I received my own first instruction from him, and what I have now to say—inspired by gratitude as much as by the desire of being useful—is only the faithful expression of my remembrances. The grave has long covered the remains of James Tous-saint, but his memory lives in the hearts of his pupils, who never pass his tomb without experiencing the greatest emotion, and bowing with respect. His school consisted of 120 pupils; the teacher, a descendant of one of the numerous Protestant families who had taken refuge in Alsace, had not received any other education than was then given in ordinary schools. He had learned the trade of joiner, and wrought at the Ban de la Roche, where a worthy rival of the pastor Oberlin, struck with his capacity and vocation for teaching, gave him lessons and excellent advice, and placed him at the head of a school, where, under his direction, he was initiated in the profession of teacher. From that position he was called to one whose organization I am now about to describe. Early in the morning—from five to seven in summer, and from six to eight in winter—he instructed the pupils in the first division: those from twelve to fourteen years of age. After them came the others in assembled classes, who received four hours' teaching each day. At five o'clock in the evening he held what he called the French school, which was a sort of innovation—French not being generally taught in Alsace at that period. After the school for French, at which a considerable number of adults attended, there was in winter, from seven to nine, an arithmetical class for young persons; and thus did this indefatigable man teach ten hours a day in winter, and eight hours a day at least throughout the year. Nor was this all; there were, besides, about ten children from ten to fourteen years of age, who, in order to be more thoroughly instructed, spent the whole day in the school-house, under the superintendence of the teacher and his wife, who assisted him greatly in his undertakings. By degrees he formed a sort of boarding-school at his own house, and something like a normal school, from which came many distinguished teachers, some of whom still live. Tous-saint was also organist and notary of the mayoralty, and fulfilled all his duties with the greatest fidelity. When I add that this energetic man was a prey to a painful malady, arising from no fault of his, but from a defective organization, which every day at the same hour caused him great suffering, it will be seen what can be effected by means of few materials, and even little science, provided that zeal is joined with some ability, and, above all, the love of one's vocation. The career of Tous-saint was short: he died in 1811, scarcely forty years of age; but his work survives in his pupils, in the generation he has formed.—[William on Education.]

THE hearts of married people ought to be the types of one another; a husband owes to his wife all the sentiments he expects from her; and his happiness depends much more on what he is to her than on what she is to him.

THE KINDLY GERMANS.—"Gellert's Fables," says a memoir of that writer, "appeared between the years 1740-1750—a time of literary drough in Germany. They were received everywhere with enthusiasm, and soon became the book of the nation. By their means Herr Gellert made his way into every heart in every family of all classes and conditions. They gained for him not cold admiration merely, but glowing, cordial love. The substantial proofs which he received of this affection were not few; and the nature of the gifts frequently bespoke the naivete of the givers. For instance, one severe winter day a countryman stopped before his house with a huge wagon, drawn by four stout horses. It was loaded with well-seasoned firewood, ready split for use. On being asked its destination, he replied that it was for Gellert—"For I shall feel more comfortable," he said, "when I am certain that the poor poet, who amuses us well while we sit in the warm chimney of an evening, has the means of warming himself well also."

INWARD INFLUENCE OF OUTWARD BEAUTY.—Believe me, there is many a road into our hearts besides our ears and brains; many a sight, and sound, and scent, even of which we have never thought at all, sinks into our memory, and helps to shape our characters; and thus children brought up among beautiful sights and sweet sounds will most likely show the fruits of their nursing by thoughtfulness, and affection, and nobleness of mind, even by the expression of the countenance. Those who live in towns should carefully remember this, for their own sakes, for their wives' sakes, for their children's sakes. Never lose an opportunity to see anything beautiful. Beauty is God's hand-writing—a wayside sacrament; welcome it in every fair face, every fair sky, every fair flower, and thank for it Him, the fountain of all loveliness, and drink it in simply and earnestly, with all your eyes: it is a charmed draught, a cup of blessing.—[Politics for the People.]

SOLID MILK.—We observe in the Repertory of Patent Inventions for January, that a Mr. Felix Louis of Southwark has enrolled a process for preserving cows' milk, goats' milk, and asses' milk, by converting the same into solid cakes or masses, which are soluble in warm water, and which may be kept for a long time without losing their original sweetness and freshness. The entire process, if we understand aright the terms of the specification, consists in a little sweetening by sugar, agitation, evaporation, and pressure.

A PORTER having a parcel to carry to a student in one of the colleges of Cambridge University, upon entering the square met with one of the collegians; and asked him if he could tell him where he might meet with Mr.—. The son of Euclid replied (at the same time placing his trencher on one side of his head, and wrapping his gown round him,) "You must crucify the quadrangle, then ascend the grades, and you'll find him perambulating in the cubicle near the fenester." The porter, not knowing the meaning of all this, stared; but recollecting the last word, asked what was a fenester. "A fenester, my man, is the diaphonous part of an edifice, erected for the introduction of illumination." The porter walked off, grumbling, and said he would never inquire his way of a Frenchman again.

PRONUNCIATION OF ORIENTAL OR INDIAN NAMES.—The vowels alone need be attended to, and they are pronounced as those of the Italian language. Thus, the English vowels take for their corresponding Eastern sounds—a, as a in the English word far; e, as e in set; i, as i in pit; j (for j is a vowel in Italian and all Oriental tongues), as double e in fee; o, as o in robe; u, as double o in poor. Thus, Kaubul is properly sounded as Kobool; Shujah, as Shoojah, the double e of the j having the sound of y when preceding a vowel; the Punjaub as Poonyob; Hindustan, Hindoostan; Maharajah, as Marharayaah, and so on.

GAZETTE AND RULE.

Friendship, Love and Truth.

AUG. C. L. ARNOLD, EDITOR.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1849.

THE FINE ARTS AND ODD-FELLOWSHIP.

A few days since we visited the new Odd-Fellows' Hall, now in process of erection in this city, on the corner of Grand and Center streets. As this edifice is somewhat remarkable in its character, design and finish, we have no doubt a full description of it will be interesting to our readers.

This great temple of Odd-Fellowship is of the following dimensions: On Center street, 78 feet, 8 inches; on Grand street, 70 feet, 9 inches; on Orange street, 74 feet, 11 inches. Perkins' Refectory is in the basement, and on the ground floor there are two stores. On the second floor, are one Lodge Room, (the antique,) and the rooms of the Board of Managers, Grand Scribe, Grand Secretary, Library and Banner, and also a Reception Room and four Committee Rooms. The third story contains, Corinthian Lodge Room, $51\frac{1}{2} \times 88\frac{1}{2}$ feet; Egyptian Room, 37×47 , and the Elizabethan, $89\frac{1}{2} \times 82$. Each of these has three ante-rooms. On the fourth floor, are the Persian, Gothic and Doric Rooms; and in the fifth story is the immense saloon of the Grand Lodge, 78 feet in diameter.

This imposing structure is built of freestone, in the most durable manner, and will cost, when completed, not far from $120,000. It is finished and furnished in the most excellent taste, and some of the rooms exceed in splendor anything in this country.

The Egyptian Room, for example, painted and embellished by William Harveet, the distinguished German artist, is itself a study for a week. Twelve richly ornamented columns support the cornish where the ceiling rises in an oblique line, ornamented with panels, which are divided by a row of massive blocks, resting on the columns. On one of the panels, directly over the chair of the Vice Grand, is painted a representation of the judgment scene of Amenti. Horus is leading in the deceased—his actions are weighed in the balance of truth or justice. Cerberus is keeping watch, and Anubis looking at the result, which is recorded by Thoth. He is then introduced into the regions of the blessed and the presence of Amenti, who is sitting on a throne, holding the flagellum and crook, the emblems of punishment and spiritual power. The four genii of Amenti are standing on a lotus flower before him. This scene is interesting to Odd-Fellows, and indeed to all members of secret Orders, as it represents exactly the form of initiation into the mysteries of Isis, one of the oldest secret Orders of which history gives any account. On each side of this large panel are two smaller ones, over the entrance doors, with Anubis, the Conductor, and Cerberus in a watchful position.

On the large panel over the N. Grand's seat, the artist has painted a scene of his own composition. The center is occupied by a sun, the source of all life, from which emanate the divine gifts, the intellectual and physical. Stability, life, purity and truth are represented on one side, and the hieroglyphics of bread, water and shelter on the other. The corresponding figures allude to these hieroglyphics.

The intellectual side is represented by a king, an offering priest, and a figure in advance of these, holding a vase to receive truth. The other side is occupied by several persons, receiving the necessities of life as the reward of labor and piety. The two adjoining panels are painted with the statues of Thoth, the Secretary, and Ehou, "the day." Six more panels are ornamented with the figures of Rompi, "the year." Two truths protecting Thor, or the word. Nau, "the hour." Isis, Nilus, binding the throne of a king, and Netpe, the mother of the gods.

The rest of the ceiling is ornamented with different designs of the lotus, wrought up nearer the center in a vine, surrounding three large panels, painted with a rich and harmonious combination of colors, in encaustic; the difference in design, as well as in the management of the colors, gives a finish to this room, and a higher idea of the elegance of the Egyptian style than is generally imagined. Not only the figure, but the spirit of this style is represented in this piece of work. The center piece is of a still richer appearance, and admirably connected with the surrounding ornament.

The names of the Board of Managers, the Past Grand Sires of the Order, the commencement, finishing and dedication of the hall, are applied on appropriate places, in hieroglyphic writing.

For persons doubting the originality of the different designs, suffice it to say that they are taken from reliable sources—from Napoleon's "Expedition l'Egypte," "Wilkinson's Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians," and other late works.

The Persian Room, intended for Encampments, is a perfect fairy palace, and has no parallel in America. In style, drapery, painting and furniture, it is entirely Oriental. The Gothic Room, painted by Allegri and Molteni, Italian artists of great merit, is also a superb apartment.

The edifice, taken all in all, is highly creditable to the Order, and speaks much for the taste of those under whose supervision it has been erected; and especially is much credit due to P. Grand Sire John A. Kennedy, the President of the Odd-Fellows' Hall Association.

FRIENDSHIP, LOVE, TRUTH.

Why is Truth made the corollary of the motto of our Order? "Because Truth is the basis of practical goodness; without it all virtues are mere representations wanting the reality; and having no foundation, they quickly prove their evanescent nature, and disappear as 'the morning dew.'"

"Whatever brilliant abilities we may possess, if the dark spot of falsehood exist in our hearts, it defaces their splendor and destroys their efficacy. If Truth be not our guiding spirit, we shall stumble upon the 'dark mountains,' the clouds of Error will surround us, and we shall wander in a labyrinth, the intricacy of which will increase as we proceed in it. No art can unravel the web that Falsehood weaves, which is more tangled than the knot of the Phrygian king.

"Falsehood is ever fearful, and shrinks beneath the steadfast, piercing eye of Truth. It is ever restless in racking the invention to form some fresh subterfuge to escape detection. Its atmosphere is darkness and mystery; it lures but to betray, and leads its followers into the depths of misery.

"Truth is the spirit of light and beauty, and seeks no disguise; its noble features are always unveiled, and shed a radiance upon every object within their influence. It is robed in spotless white, and, conscious of its purity, is fearless and undaunted; it never fails its votaries, but conducts them through evil report and good report, without spot or blemish; it breathes of heaven and happiness, and is ever in harmony with the Great Center.

"The consciousness of truth nerves the timid and imparts dignity and firmness to their actions. It is an internal principle of honor which renders the possessor superior to fear; it is always consistent with itself, and needs no ally. Its influence will remain when the 'luster of all that once sparkled and dazzled has passed away.'

"Deceit and chicanery are mean and contemptible. The double-minded are 'unstable in their ways,' and generally fail in attaining their wishes; while those who cultivate singleness of heart and aid aim, with sincerity of feeling and purpose, have energy for an attribute, and success a frequent reward.

"There is no pleasure comparable to the standing upon the vantage ground of truth—a hill not to be commanded, and where the air is always clear and serene. Certainly it is heaven upon earth to have the mind moving in charity, resting in Providence, and turning upon the poles of truth.

"The Athenians were remarkable for their reverence of this noble virtue. Euripides introduced a person in a play who, on reference being made to an oath he had taken, said, 'I swore with my mouth, but not with my heart.' The perfidy of this sentiment highly incensed the audience, and induced Socrates, who was the bosom friend of the great tragic poet, to quit the theater. Euripides was publicly accused and tried as one guilty of breaking the most sacred bond of society.

"Montaigne says, 'If a man lieth, he is brave toward God and a coward toward men; for a lie faces God, and shrinks from man.'

"There is nothing more beautiful than a character in which there is no guile. Many who would be shocked at an actual breach of truth, are yet much wanting in sincerity of manner or conversation; this is a species of deceit that cannot be too strictly guarded against.

"Unswerving truth should be the guide of youth. It is not sufficient to speak the truth, but our whole conduct to them should be sincere, upright, and without artifice. Children easily discern between truth and deceit, and if once they detect the latter in those to whose charge they are committed, confidence is for ever banished, and on the first opportunity the same baneful duplicity which they have observed in others will be practiced by them. Childhood catches and reflects everything around it, and an untruth told by one to whom it is accustomed to look with deference, may act upon the young heart like a 'careless spray of water thrown on polished steel, staining with rust which no after efforts can efface.'

"Truth is the basis of love; where we cannot trust, we cannot love. Wherever falsehood exists, it destroys happiness, paralyzes energy, and debases the mind; no superiority of intellect can long associate with this fearful vice.

"The study of truth is perpetually joined with the love of virtue; for there is no virtue which derives not its origin from truth; as, on the contrary, there is no vice which has not its beginning in a lie. Truth is the foundation of all knowledge, and the cement of all societies."

SABBATH BREAKING.

We have derived much gratification from the able message lately delivered to the Common Council by his honor the Mayor. We cordially agree with the animus of this document, and consider that the sale of liquor, on Sunday, deserves the utmost reprehension, and is also worthy of much attention, with a view to adopt means for its suppression. The sale of liquor is at all times productive of evil, but a traffic of such a nature on the Sabbath day, is quite unchristian in its character. Any reasonable being would suppose that it were sufficient for men to besot themselves upon six days of the week, and that a consideration for public decency, together with the respect due to the Sabbath, would deter them from indulging in the brutalizing pleasures of alcohol, upon that holy day. We are sorry to be obliged to say that the Sabbath affords no cessation to this vicious indulgence; on the contrary, we should imagine that liquor is sold to a greater amount on that day than any other; arising, perhaps, from the freedom from business engagements, which the community enjoys upon that day. However much we may coincide with the general views of his honor upon this subject, we must differ with him in his estimate of the efficiency of legal enactments, as the remedy best adapted to eradicate this extensive evil. But let it be borne in mind that the use or sale of spirits, on Sundays, should not alone occupy the attention of the public well-wishers. To bring it into general disuse, on every day in the week, is the noble aim of all philanthropists. Legislation cannot meet the necessities of this public demoralization; for if men choose to be vicious they will be so, in spite of legal prohibitions, as long as our nature is constituted as it is. However, when the force of public opinion will be brought to bear upon the vice to which we have alluded, we may then hope to see the community ameliorated in this respect by the influence of mere moral force. There is no doubt that, in this vast city, there are but too many allurements to vice and intemperance. Those traps for destruction, (rum shops) are to be met with every way we turn, enticing the young and the thoughtless to habitual infamy. But still, however, we conceive that moral force would exercise a greater amount of influence, in the extirpation of intemperance, than any legal enactment.

It may not be necessary to remark that the Rev. Mr. Matthew, the benevolent apostle of temperance in Ireland, is about paying us a visit, in the course of a few months. We confidently expect that much benefit to the cause of temperance will be derived from his mission in this country. God prosper him in his holy work, and a thousand welcomes from the land of freedom.

ELOQUENCE.

THE study of eloquence is one peculiarly agreeable to an educated man, and among all civilized nations has ever been held in high estimation, as an elegant and necessary accomplishment. Many erroneous notions have prevailed, relative to this art; and, indeed, even now some associate with eloquence, a sophistical, tricky, flash of words, tending to gloss over a bad argument plausibly.

If it were such an art as that, it would be most unworthy of the high rank it holds, and undeserving of the attention of any discerning man. That definition of the art is, happily, however, entirely wrong; it may be justly defined as that mode of speaking, the most adapted to the accomplishment of the aim which we have in view. Therefore, he who suits his words and delivery the most effectually to that end, is to be considered the most eloquent man. Conviction and persuasion are the great ends of all public speaking; but it is not sufficient for the orator to convince a man of the truth of what he advocates, for he must also persuade him to adopt it in his practice. To convince, however, should be the first aim of a speaker, because any persuasion which is not based on a thorough sense of right, is not at all likely to prove lasting.

The beneficial effects of eloquence would be more visibly experienced in society, were our conduct guided by the conviction of our reason. As our nature is constituted, it unfortunately happens that a man may rest satisfied as to the justness of any truths, and yet not act according to the principles of them. Then, in the words of Blair, the orator "must address himself to the passions; he must paint to the fancy, and touch the heart." Therefore, besides mere sound argument, and a clear arrangement of a discourse, all the amenities and graces of composition, pronunciation, and, above all, delivery, are essential to the realization of true eloquence.

33—"LES CONFIDENCES," par Alphonse de Lamartine. New-York. We are under obligations to M. D'Arphin, the talented and enterprising editor of the Courier des Etats Unis, for the two first parts of this interesting work of the great French poet. We have read the pages before us with intense interest and delight, and are waiting impatiently for the remainder. We have translated a passage, which our readers will find in another portion of our paper.

CLEVELAND AND ITS ENVIRONS.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, March 30, 1849.

MY DEAR SIR: You have never, perhaps, sported your umbrella and other traveling paraphernalia out in this western country. You have never seen, then, much of the best of God's world; you have never seen this "Gem of the Lakes," from which I now give you good greeting. I have voyaged a little up and down the great highways of the western valleys, scampered over some of the great meadows and prairies, and swung my "Niagara canoe" around some of the choicest spots of this great, unfenced country, in my time; yet I can well say that for beauty, thrift and hospitality, this burg is not surpassed by any. They say, "God made the country and man made the town;" but the angels must have had a hand in planning and perfecting the handiwork which presents so pleasant a scene before a stranger's eye as he arrives here.

The city is laid out upon the table-land, 100 feet above the lake, extending back from the bank, which falls in natural and irregular terraces to the sandy beach, on which the clear waters of old Erie disport themselves in many a game of "ground and lofty tumbling." From the water this bank looks very inviting—dotted as it is, with pleasant residences, and laid out here and there in thriving young peach orchards and gardens. The streets are very broad, the most narrow being wider than Broadway, and lined with elms and shady locusts. It very much resembles New Haven; and the Public Common, a square of ten acres, covered with fine trees and flanked by two or three churches, completes the resemblance. You wonder, as you stroll up the broad avenues, what generous heart and far-seeing eye conceived, half a century ago, a plan which has resulted in so much beauty, regularity and utility. A few residences betray extravagance and ostentation, especially on Euclid and Kinsman streets. Yet few cities show such a uniformity in buildings—so few contrasts between proud marble piles and miserable hovels; and this is very much owing to the very equal distribution of wealth, and the comfortable manner in which the middle and lower classes are able to live on moderate incomes. On the west and the south, the crooked Cuyahoga winds along like a lazy snake through the green meadows and hills, till it reaches the mills and furnaces, the forges and factories, when it darts around through the forest of masts, and sweeps rapidly out with its muddy waters and loses itself in the clear blue of the lake.

On the opposite side is Ohio City, containing about three thousand people, much given to manufacturing engines and axes, and building steam and sail craft.

Cleveland will be perfect as a place of business and residence, when the public works, now in progress, are completed. The Columbus rail-road will go into operation next fall; that is, 40 miles of it terminating here. The Pittsburg and Cleveland rail-road will be completed in a year or two. Three plank roads are being laid down out of the city, and the streets are to be lighted with gas before next January. I understand that in summer large numbers of Southern people stop here to catch a sniff of the pure air, luxuriate in the abundance of delectable peaches, and enjoy the comforts of a cool vacation. By the way, they say that along the lake shore all kinds of fruits flourish, without let or hindrance. The proximity to the water, and the humidity of the equable temperature, preserves them from frosts; and peaches, grapes, apricots, and all other fruits are not surpassed in quality by even those of Long Island or New Jersey. Every house in the city has its score of fruit trees, and the nurseries and orchards of peaches and cherries line every road beyond the suburbs.

One cannot leave Cleveland without noticing the handsome Medical College building, a very extensive one, and said to be the most approved in its arrangement of Lecture, Library, Museum Rooms and Theaters. Two hundred and fifty students have annually, for several years, attended its lectures.

Not far from the College, on the bank of the lake, the U. S. Marine Hospital is building. It will be an elegant structure when finished. Twenty-five thousand dollars were voted by the last Congress for its completion. It will be an asylum for the sick, disabled, and superannuated seamen, which will do honor to the country. A government that owes so much of its commercial greatness and its naval glory to the noble sailors who have borne its stars and stripes to every quarter of the world, with pride and success, cannot do a greater justice than to extend its parental care over them in their time of sickness, adversity or old age. From the Hospital, the picture is most charming. The blue waters of the lake, dotted here and there with a white sail, or stirred into a foam by a monster steamer—the harbor, and all the bank fringing the city up and down, are enough to gladden an old sailor's heart, without even throwing in "Whiskey Island," in the distance.

A stranger very naturally strolls into the graveyard; but here one could hardly pass it without entering. It is most elaborately laid out in avenues and walks, and shaded by a profusion of willow, mountain ash, pine, cypress and catalpa trees. It is a spot, of all others that I have seen, most inviting and beautiful. On Sunday evenings the walks are almost crowded with visitors, who come to stroll, as they do in Paris on the Boulevards, or in New York on the Battery. Young widows, and peradventure some widowers—belles, beaux, mechanics, with satisfied faces, relaxed from the week-day cares, and merchants and professional men, glad to escape the dins and vexations of counting rooms and offices, and all stopping for the fiftieth time to con the inscriptions on Joc-o-sel's monument, a memorial of the big Indian, one of the last notables of the Ottawa chiefs, who died here, and whose name is less honored by a marble in the Cemetery, than dishonored by being given to the most narrow of all the dirty, dark alleys of the under-the-hill portion of the city.

In my next, I shall, if you will tolerate me, give you my doings on my visit to the Public School examinations, and the Odd-Fellows' Lodges, which have furnished my tablet with a very rich, rare and racy schedule of "items." So, success to thee and thine.

Fraternally yours,
ROBERT RAMBLER.

A NEW LODGE.

MONTICELLO, March 27, 1849.

BRO. ARNOLD: It is with pleasure that I announce to you the establishment of another Lodge in Sullivan District, N. Y. On the 16th inst., accompanied by P. Gs. Pelten, Quenbia and Devoe, and other Brothers of Mongapa Lodge No. 298, I proceeded to the beautiful village of Liberty, where was instituted Willemac Lodge No. 368. The Brothers composing this Lodge are of the right stamp, and having a large field for their operations, success must attend them. Sixteen candidates were elected, and thirteen initiated. John A. Chapman was elected N. G.; Wm. H. Buckley, V. G.; T. S. Boyd, S.; John Davidge, T.

Yours, truly, O. WHISTON, D. D. G. M.

ANOTHER GRAND ENCAMPMENT.—The Grand Encampment of the I. O. O. F., of the State of Wisconsin, was instituted at Southport, on the 8th ult., by D. D. Grand Sire W. D. Wilson, when the following officers were unanimously elected:

H. L. Page, Grand Patriarch.
Rev. A. C. Barry, Grand High Priest.
D. McDonald, Grand S. Warden.
James B. Martin, Grand J. Warden.
W. W. Holden, Grand Scribe.
F. W. Hatch, Grand Treasurer.
W. D. Wilson, G. Representative to G. L. U. S.
The next session take place in Southport, on the third Monday in July next.

GRAND LODGE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

We have received from Bro. Jones, the indefatigable and worthy secretary of the R. W. G. Lodge of Mass., the journal of its proceedings, at its last semi-annual session, held at Boston, Feb. 1, 1849. We extract the following from the Grand Master's address, which we commend to the attentive perusal of our readers. It is an earnest and eloquent communication, and affords food for serious consideration:

"You are not to be told for the first time, brethren, that for the past year the attendance at our Lodge Meetings has been comparatively small. There are, of course, some exceptions to this remark, but such is the general state of affairs. My immediate and able predecessor, in his quarterly communication to the Grand Lodge, has referred to this subject, but has not regarded it as an alarming indication, trusting that after the attraction of novelty had worn off, there would follow a reaction in the personal interest and attention of its members.

"The Order is fast decreasing in numerical strength, and I am aware it is reasonable to suppose that most of the suspensions for non-payment of dues are confined to those members who joined the Order under the attraction of novelty, and who have hung upon its neck like a dead weight, dragging it down; and that the increasing diminution of members is but the separating of the chaff from the pure grain. But is it an idle fear, brethren, to suppose that through inattention to that most important duty of an Odd-Fellow, to wit, attendance at Lodge meetings, the Order itself may fall into decadence, and finally become the sickly skeleton of a once noble form, discharging its functions like an automaton, but not with that quickening spirit that has heretofore crowned our exertions with prosperity and success. Massachusetts has heretofore stood proudly pre-eminent upon the annals of Odd-Fellowship, in her exertions to fraternize with the world; and shall she falter now?

"Is it possible for us to read of the vast sums of money expended annually by the Order, throughout its whole jurisdiction, in relieving the distressed, burying the dead, and educating the orphan, to say nothing of those other and holier duties, the midnight vigil by the couch of the sick brother, without feeling our bosom glow and our pulsation quicken with the thought that we are instrumental, in some degree, in giving to such an association strength, prosperity and perpetuity? Each and every one of us, brethren, have a personal interest in this matter; our attention and sympathy may decay, but the principles of our institution will live; for they are immutable and immortal. Greater than the pecuniary features of our association is the duty of sending our fellow men into the world with a deeper sense of their duty to society and each other. The implanting of a single germ that shall sprout up in the hour of fruition, and form a bond of fellowship among men, will strengthen our good resolutions, and consolidate those elements of character that are the grand consecrative principle in the work of amelioration and reform. Let the Lodge Room continue to be to us like the family circle; let us not by indifference and neglect forsake the old hearth stone, from whose circle have gone forth those eternal truths that will break down the artificial distinctions of society; that will hush the spirit of party, and soften many of the asperities of life, that in our intercourse with the world are rendered so formidable, by the constant conflict of opinion and interest.

"It is the peculiar province of Odd-Fellowship to impress upon our hearts, in living characters, those cardinal virtues, Friendship, Love, and Truth, which are the props and pillars of its temple. These are the principal jewels that are entrusted to our keeping. It is our duty to see that their lustre be not dimmed, for they come to us from the mine of heaven, and will reflect their own brightness on the human heart.

"Such are the legitimate fruits of Odd-Fellowship, and such is its destiny, if we are only faithful to the trusts committed to our keeping. In other States, throughout our confederacy, the Order continues to advance in strength, in numbers, and general usefulness. Grand Sec. Ridgely, in his last report to the Grand Lodge of the United States, speaking of Ohio, remarks that that State has for several years past been rapidly gaining upon her elder sisters, New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts, conceding to us a high position among the States of our Union. By renewed and continued exertions let us resolve that this high position shall be maintained; let us not imitate the base Judean who threw away a pearl richer than all his tribe."

"In closing this communication, I will merely remark that the Order in our jurisdiction, at the present time, seems to demand a more than usual share of your prudence and judgment. It is for your wisdom to determine, and your judgment to adopt such measures as will preserve and render the Grand Lodge at all times able to carry out its financial engagements, and at the same time infuse into the Order throughout its jurisdiction, the spirit of harmony and unity.

"Respectfully and Fraternally submitted.

"WILLIAM ELLISON, Grand Master."

A GREAT MUSICAL NOVELTY.—ELEUTHERIA, OR THE FESTIVAL OF FREEDOM.

THERE is soon to be produced at the Broadway Tabernacle, what we are led to believe will prove the great musical event of the season in New York. Mr. Curtis, of this city, an accomplished musical composer, has at last completed his great composition—"Eleutheria, or the Festival of Liberty."

The design of this Oratorio is (as the Libretto, written by Horatio Stone, Esq., the sculptor, shows,) to illustrate the progress of liberty and fraternity through the world from the early ages. It will be brought out, we understand, at the Broadway Tabernacle, on the evening of the 11th of April, with all the musical force of the city.

Those who have attended its rehearsals, assure us that it is by far the grandest musical composition of this country, and perhaps not surpassed by any of the modern Oratorio's of Europe. We have no doubt that the Broadway Tabernacle will be crowded. Indeed, we understand that already, before any notices of its performance have appeared, a very great number of persons have endeavored to obtain tickets, for fear they would be too late. But no alarm on this subject need be entertained. Such a production will be no ephemeral affair. It will probably be the musical attraction of the season, and the artists will be obliged to repeat it often.

The subject is old in name; but we believe that this is, in fact, the first time in the history of music that any artist has attempted to compose a piece in illustration of the history and the triumphs of liberty, from the dawn of the world to our own times.

All we have to say on the subject is, that if the artist has done his work as well as the poet who wrote the words, both have risen to the sublimity of their theme; and if it be performed as well as it is composed, it will be one of the greatest musical productions of the age.

THE INFANCY OF ALPHONSE DE LAMARTINE.

Translated from "Les Confidences," by the Editor.

ALL the religious lessons of our mother were limited to this simple end—viz: to make us religious with ourselves. Prayer, not cold and formal, but brief and lyrical, was associated with all the acts of the day. This invocation was not felt to be a fatigue or an obligation, but a pleasure and a recreation. Our life, under the hand of this woman, was a perpetual "sursum corda." She rose as naturally to the thought of God as the plant turns toward the air and light. Instead of imposing upon us a principal devotion, which tears children away from their sports, or their sleep, and forces them to offer a prayer to God, with repugnance and tears, she made for us of these little religious exercises, a festival of the soul, to which she smilingly led us. She did not mingle prayer with our tears, but with all the little happy events which happened to us during the day. And when, in the morning, we awoke in our little beds, and the bright sun sparkled in our windows, and the birds sang upon our rose bushes, or in the cages, and we were impatiently expecting her, she would enter, her face radiant with goodness, tenderness, and sweet joy. She embraced us in our beds; she assisted us to dress; she listened with pleasure to that joyous prattle of children, whose refreshed imagination warbles on awaking, as a nest of swallows warble on the roof when the mother appears, as by them she said to us: "To whom do we owe this happiness we enjoy here together? It is to God, our heavenly Father! Without Him this beautiful sun would not perhaps have risen, those trees would have lost their foliage, those joyful birds would have died of hunger and of cold upon the naked earth, and you, my poor children, you would have had neither bed nor house, nor gardens, nor mother to shelter you. It is very proper to thank Him for whatever He gives us with this day, and to pray to Him to give us many such days."

Then she knelt before our bed; she joined our little hands; and often, while kissing them, in tears, she said slowly, in a low voice the brief morning prayer, which was repeated with her inflexions, and her words.

Q3—"MODERN SOCIETY; OR, THE MARCH OF INTELLECT." By Miss Catherine Sinclair. New-York: R. Carter & Brothers. 1849. "MODERN ACCOMPLISHMENTS." By the same. 1849. The world often turns from lessons of a grave character and a religious import, and instruction too often falls from the lips of the preacher unheeded and unfelt. But in the form of familiar narrative, with the attractive hues of romance thrown over it, the exhibition of the development of taste and feeling in the genuine Christian character is apt to excite a deep interest, and to produce good and lasting impressions. Such is the effect which results from the perusal of these volumes. They are written in an easy style, by a reflecting mind, and one well versed in the study of the human heart. The scenes are depicted naturally and truthfully. They enforce the best practical, moral, and religious lessons, and the story is, throughout, full of interest.

Q3—"OREGON AND CALIFORNIA." By Judge Thornton. New-York: Harper & Brothers. The position of the port and town of San Francisco is singular, as well as beautiful. The fertile and rich country in the neighborhood—the great valley opened to it by the waters of the Sacramento, and the pleasantness of the country during the whole year, are advantages which will make it among the most noted of any in the world. The bay of San Francisco is cut off from the Pacific by high hills. From the summit of some lofty mountain we have presented to the eye a range of land without any opening, save the bay itself. On the north the mountain rises to a great height; while on the south it gradually slopes till it presents a surface diversified with hills, ending in a steep point, against which the sea dashes. Frequent islands break the level of the bay.

Q3—"LIFE AND TIMES OF THE REV. PHILIP HENRY." New-York: R. Carter and Brothers. 1849. This is a valuable biographic work. The subject of it, the father of the Commentator on the Scriptures, was eminent for piety, zeal, humility, and every Christian grace, and for a strong and independent mind. He united simplicity and integrity with long suffering, patience, and a conscientious moderation and charity. The quaintness, and vigor of expression of the biography, by his son, have been retained, but additions and explanations have been made, and some changes to adapt it to the present times.

Q3—"THE HAPPY HOME." By the Rev. James Hamilton. New-York: Robert Carter & Brothers. 1849. Many books are written for the parlor, and to be read in the higher walks of life; but very few among us are entirely adapted to the laboring classes, and to their condition and modes of living and thought. This is, however, one strictly of that kind. It was written for the mechanic, the daily laborer, and the artisan, and will be found most valuable in revealing the secret of a Happy Home.

THOUGHTS ON SPRING.

Sorrow must indeed have laid a heavy hand upon that heart which cannot join in the song of joy breathed forth by the glorious spring-time. Spring is the season of hope and anticipation. The very gleams of sunshine, with the balmy atmosphere—the playful wind, that dances here and there, in its wild glee—the bright verdure—the sweet and fragrant flowers—the gurgling rivulets, whose every bubble seems a thing of joy, and every ripple music—the birds, whose free wings cut the air with delight, and whose voices waft to the ear the sweetest melody, join with all Nature in one harmonious song of praise to Heaven, and envelop with a chorus of sympathy, the grieved and sorrowing of earth, bidding them hope, rejoice and be happy.

To the young and hopeful, spring is a season with whose every attribute their hearts vibrate in perfect union. Love rolls like a celestial melody through their souls. Hope carols to their hearts its sweetest tones, and all their feelings blend with Nature's everlasting song of bliss and joy. Youth is indeed the spring-time of life.

To the more mature it is as a withered rose; its beauty is marred, but its odor is as sweet, and it casts around them the fragrance of their youthful days. It is to them like gazing on a portrait, in which the painter has, life-like, depicted every lineament and feature of some beloved friend, now lost. Though it may remind them "that all which was reality has left them," it still yields an exquisite pleasure; and they, in their imaginations, live over again their seasons of brightness and joy.

To the aged it speaks of hope beyond the grave—where all is joy and gladness—all is brightness and sunshine—where flowers bloom for ever, and sweetest music charms the ear with unequalled melody. Spring breathes to them of hope eternal, thrilling their souls with holy melody and inspiration, making them feel as though they would fain "take the wings of the morning and fly away" from things beautiful on earth, to the more beautiful in heaven.

Those whose hearts do not sympathise with this season of hope and gladness, or who would still cloak their feelings in the icy, dreary garb of winter, I could induce to believe that all the beautiful attributes and embellishments of spring are instinct with intelligent life, the shrines of blessed spirits and holy angels—angels of consolation and hope. The very air, with its balmy fragrance, is an angel's breath.

Away with winter's dreary powers;
For spring now treads our hills along,
With her bright coronal of flowers—
Her happy smiles, and joyful song.

If thy heart's oppressed with sadness,
Look on Nature, sorrowing child;
E'en the very air breathes gladness,
And speaks to thee in accents mild.

And the flowers around thee springing,
Full of life, and hope, and glee,
On thy heart are ever flinging
Breathings full of hope, to thee.

Listen to the wild birds' voices,
While they sing their joyous song—
Surely, now thy heart rejoices,
And its notes of hope prolong.

Then away with every sadness,
See, all Nature bids thee sing;
'Round thy heart's a robe of gladness,
Woven by the hopes of spring.

KATE WARE.

OUR CLEVELAND CORRESPONDENT.—We hope our readers will not pass by the excellent and interesting letter from Cleveland, Ohio, which we give in this number. We have been at Cleveland, and can testify that this description of the city is accurate. Cleveland is decidedly the most beautiful place at the west. We shall be glad to hear from B. often.

DOING THINGS WELL.

EASIER said than done, says an English journal. To do anything well requires very singular talents. A well-done deed is as great a rarity as a large diamond. Even to do an easy action well is difficult. To walk well is difficult; to stand well, to eat well, to drink well, is difficult; to speak well is difficult, and to write well is difficult. It is difficult to make a chair well, or to put in a pane of glass well; to bake bread well, or to make a cup of tea well. Every thing is difficult to do well; and the blunders that are daily committed in doing the common actions of life, are almost as numerous as the actions themselves.

How very rarely can anything be got which is quite satisfactory! Did ever a lady receive a dress from a dressmaker that had not a fault in it—that was not either too wide or too tight—that had no wrinkles or creases in the body—that did not catch about the armpits—that was not too tight or too loose about the elbows—and that was altogether faultless about the waist? We doubt it very much. We question if Eve herself was satisfied with her coat of skin. We have no doubt that there was a fault even in that, and that the fit, if it was one, was by no means complete. As for a perfect gentleman's coat, that is out of the question. There is no such thing. Coats generally pucker too much about the breast; and if they do not they are too skimpy. (We have not a better word to express the idea. Even the language is not perfect, and one is often at a loss for a word to convey precisely the meaning which is entertained.) Sometimes they are too low in the collar, which gives the wearer a plucked appearance; sometimes they are too high, which makes him look slouchy; sometimes they are too large, which gives a man a consumptive look; and sometimes they are too small, which gives a man a dropsical, flatulent, or busting development. There are some coats that seem to be perfect at first; but if you only give yourself the trouble to examine them carefully, you will find a defect in them; and if you cannot succeed in this investigation, then just remark to the wearer that that coat is very well made, and he will say, "Yes, upon the whole, it is; but," &c. Imagine the rest.

It is the same with books, sermons, speeches, and leading articles. They are all deficient. "A very good sermon that we heard to-day; but it was just too dry;" or "it was too moral, too doctrinal, too declamatory, too argumentative, too imaginative, too historical, too timid, too presumptuous—rather daring, verging on heresy, don't you think?" "A capital speaker, Mr. Taper, but rather too drawing—rather too fluent. What a pity his voice is so weak. He wants a little more knowledge of the world. His fancy is not discursive enough; he is too personal, too fond of clap-traps," &c. "A capital article that, but I think it is rather weak in the conclusion. It is like the transmutation of gold into brass. If it had left off at the last paragraph but one, I think it would have been better." "Don't you think that Mr. Peterkin dances very well?" "Yes, but I don't like the style much." "Splendid poems, the Paradise Lost and the Divina Commedia, eh?" "Yes, but the feeble and one-sided attempts of two great minds to justify injustice, and gag the mouth of Divine mercy."

These are merely the works of man; but we shall go a little higher. Man has a right to judge all things. Did you ever see a man or a woman perfectly made? Some are too tall, others too short; others rather stout; others would be the better for an ounce or too more of flesh. Some want color, others have too much; some would be very pretty if they had better teeth; others if they had better eyes. Some noses are too long, some too short; others too pointed, and others too round. Few noses are set precisely in the middle of the face; and very few have both nostrils alike, or both sides of the nose alike. Some lips are too thick, some too thin; some too pale, and some too red. Some chins are too small, some too large, some too multiform.

As for eyes, some are too pale, some too small in the pupil, some too large and staring, some to feeble.

THE DEAD SHOT.

OLD GOLDEN, the merchant, sat one afternoon, recently, in his counting room, sleepily gazing at the columns of a daily journal, and was gradually growing indifferent to all things around him, thro' the medium of a pleasant doze, when he was aroused by an unusual noise outside of the window, and rising cautiously, to his fear, he peered earnestly into the small back yard adjoining. This attracted the notice of one of his junior partners, who, coming quietly behind him, and gazing over his shoulder a moment, without seeing anything to gratify his curiosity, earnestly inquired the cause of the excitement. The old gent, motioning him to silence, and whispering mysteriously in his ear, said:

"There's a rat in the spout!" and rubbing his hands with a quiet satisfaction, intimating his intention of killing the reptile.

Down stairs into the yard, on tip toe, went old Golden, followed as quietly by the junior; and sure enough, there evidently appeared to be something scratching its way up the channel to the roof.

"Rap the spout with a stick," said the old gent, which was promptly done, but no rat came forth. A stick was poked in from below, but without the desired effect, though the inmate appeared to be thrown into a great state of excitement thereby.

In the midst of this gymnastic exercise, it suddenly occurred to the old gent that he had nothing to operate effectively with, in case they succeeded in ejecting the intruder; so the junior was dispatched to bring the old gun out of the fire-proof, and slip a few buck-shot into it; and a few moments served to mount the old gent upon the window-sill of the adjacent coal-hole, poising skillfully in his hand a terrific looking shooting-iron as long as himself.

"Now its coming!" shouted the junior, exultingly, and the old gent brought the piece promptly to his shoulder, trembling the while with the most intense earnestness, just as a dark object rushed from the bottom of the spout. Slap! bang! went the shooting-iron, and the old gentleman pitched back violently through the window. The smoke and report perfectly bewildered the junior, who recovered himself just in time to see old Golden's head appear above the window ledge, with his face beautifully tattooed with charcoal; and hear him exclaim anxiously:

"Is it killed?"

"Dead as a door nail!" shouted a voice above their heads; and gazing up in astonishment, they saw the head of an urochin poked over the edge of the roof, while his outspread fingers gyrate pleasantly from the end of his nose. The junior, seized with a sudden suspicion, hurried to the corner where the shot was lodged, and, looking down, exclaimed with embarrassment:

"Why, it ain't no rat, after all!"

"No?" said the old gent, doubtfully; "gracious me! what is it, then?"

"By thunder!" said the junior, darting through the door, "it's only a stone, with a string tied round it!"

PANORAMA OF THE HUDSON.—This great work is now on exhibition at the hall corner of Broadway and Walker-street. We have not yet seen it ourselves, but learn that it is a painting of high merit. The Herald has the following regarding it:

"People may say what they choose, that a love of the fine arts is not generally diffused among our people; but, nevertheless, the truth is, when anything intrinsically good appears, the New Yorkers are never backward in patronising it. Here is this Panorama of the Hudson River, which is so beautifully painted that many portions of it are fit to be framed and hung up as specimens of the finest landscape painting, crowded with visitors every evening; and well it deserves to be visited, for a more magnificent panorama, of a more magnificent river, was never painted."

"Too SICK TO BE HANGED.—The doctors are at work to cure up a man, in South Carolina, that he may be executed according to law."

"So says one of our exchanges. But ain't it funny, though, that death can't be allowed to do its own work without a sheriff's aid? We hope that the poor negro they have got caged up in Boston jail, and who is marked down for slaughter some time in May, won't be sick within the next few weeks. What nauseous drugs the poor fellow would have to take, to keep life in him till he could be duly and legally throttled. We have been rather passive on the subject of the death penalty, but we are satisfied that the time has arrived when it is a duty to speak out, and we now say let there be no more legalized murder. Blood enough has been shed to wash out blood, but it is all ineffectual, save that which freely flowed from the wounded body of the Redeemer of the world."

We cut the above from the Boston Odd-Fellow, a journal which, notwithstanding its occasional thrusts at us, says a great many good things. The fact which it mentions above is a disgrace to a Christian community. The idea of nursing a person, trembling on the verge of the grave, into good health, for the purpose of destroying him by strangulation! Now, we have no doubt, some men deserve to be cut off from their race, but if nature is about to extinguish the lamp of life, in heaven's name let nature do the work!

GREYNA GREEN.—Greytna Green is the name of a village in Dumfriesshire, Scotland; and is called, in the Gaelic idiom, Grainey Green. It has long been celebrated in the annals of clandestine marriages. The village, which is a mean one, is eighty two miles from Edinburgh, and eight from the city of Carlisle, and is resorted to by those fond and true-hearted lovers whose nuptials are forbidden by unnatural parents and cruel guardians. It is luckily situated on the south-western bank of the Sark, at the bottom of the frith of Solway; and, being beyond the operation of the British and Scotch marriage act, affords a safe retreat for all fond, confiding and doting lovers. The marriage rite is performed by persons who are destitute of all authority; and, still, by the laws of England, all marriages thus contracted are strictly legal and binding. The same common law, in the case of clandestine marriage, it was decided by Judge Edmonds, in the case of Fox vs. Martin Hare, operates in this country.

The chief practitioner matrimonial, at Greytna Green, was, for many years, a Mr. Henry Green, a blacksmith. He died, recently, at Lambeth-Till, in Scotland, at the age of seventy. He exercised his singular office for more than twenty-eight years, and during that time he celebrated more than seven thousand marriages, making nearly three hundred and five a year. He charged a fee of from ten to twenty guineas for every marriage, according to the means of the parties, and left a very considerable fortune, the exact amount of which, however, is not known.

The Greytna Green of New England was for many years the little, but wealthy and important State of Rhode Island. Eloping parties, from all the adjacent States, fled to it, where they could get married in ten minutes after their arrival, by a clergyman or a squire, for a fee of six Yankee shillings. If Rhode Island was a kind of marriage broker, so also she enacted the part of marriage dissolver. The husband, or wife, as the case might be, who wished to be rid of the silken bands, when they became oppressive, had only to go to Rhode Island, reside there six months, and obtain a divorce. This law has been somewhat changed of late, and Rhode Island is rather punctilious in reference to marriage; and divine New Jersey, at present, has a monopoly of the business.—[Sunday Atlas.

Stonington, Ct., is the Greytna Green of New England.—[Ed. Gaz.

CHINESE EMPIRE AND ITS REVENUE.

A FUNDAMENTAL principle of the Chinese system of revenue is to make each department pay itself. If there is any surplus, the money is put out at interest, to form a reserve fund in time of need. Several institutions, especially those belonging to the court, have funded property, independent of the income from the State, out of which all the expenditure is paid, and a fair surplus always remains in the exchequer.

The Imperial Treasury is quite distinct from the National one. No accounts of its receipts, disbursements, and deposits are ever published. The sovereign of China reserves to himself the power to appropriate any amount of money for his own use; and twelve millions may be taken as the average minimum. On this point, however, no certain data exist.

The list contains solely the disbursements and income of the supreme government, and of the provincial authorities, in so far as they stand in immediate connection with the general administration. Of the strictly local and municipal finances, it does not appear that any accounts have yet been laid before the public. It is a standing rule, that the national granaries throughout the empire should always contain 81,355,077 shih of poddy, and 12,022,458 shih of rice, to be used in time of famine. Whenever the new harvest is brought in, the old stock is sold at a reduced price.

The receipts of the present year, compared with those ten years ago, show a great falling off, and it is to be feared that the decrease of revenue will be more considerable. The government having lost much of its vigor and energy, the collection of taxes is frequently resisted, while a series of famines and other calamities in some districts have rendered unavailing all efforts to realize the ordinary revenue.

Whenever public works are to be undertaken, or any extraordinary expenditure is to be incurred, government collects patriotic contributions. Their amount is now and then published in detail, and they constitute occasionally large sums. The donors are frequently rewarded with office and emoluments for their munificence.

Many small items which are expended in maintaining the numerous dependents of the Mantchoo dynasty, do not appear among the receipts. It is, on the whole, very difficult to come at certain results. It will be borne in mind, however, that it is not the gross revenue which is here stated, but the estimated surplus, after meeting local charges; a principle followed, though not to the same extent, in our own revenue returns, which exhibit, not the sums collected on account of each department, but what is actually paid into the exchequer.

The Chinese constitution of government is a consistent despotism; there is but one master and lord, the Emperor, the others being merely his slaves; while the so-called privileged classes are only such by favor; and no honors or emoluments can be conferred without his express sanction. It is true there is a numerous class of hereditary nobility; but the title bequeathed from father to son is considered as of little value unless the Emperor adds fresh luster to it by a new decree or grant. A host of the scions of the imperial clan, the greater portion of the Mantchoo and Mogul chiefs, and a considerable number of the Chinese hereditary nobles, have as little influence in the affairs of State as those who lately acquired their rank by purchase. It is very far from being the wish of government that the nobles should occupy situations of trust, and consequently few will be found in the lists of high military or naval officers, or attached to the civil service. It seems as if the Emperor was afraid they might ultimately become too powerful, and usurp those prerogatives which ought only to belong to royalty. A decree has lately been issued, prohibiting them from holding more than one office at a time, and directing that great caution should be used in conferring appointments.

DR. JAMES McALLISTER.—This gentleman, we are glad to learn, has been nominated for Assistant Alderman of the Fourth Ward. We know nothing of the politics of the Doctor, but we do know that he is a most excellent man, and that he will make a most efficient officer. We hope our friends in that Ward will elect him. Bro. McAllister is well known, and has a host of friends. We cut the following from the Morning Star:

Dr. James McAllister, we perceive, has been nominated as Assistant Alderman of the Fourth Ward. He is an intelligent, active, and clear-headed business man; and will doubtless prove exceedingly useful to the city, if elected.

SOMETHING NEW IN BROADWAY.—Mr. F. Hitchcock, late the enterprising and successful manager of the American Museum, and Mr. Leadbeater, late of Arnold's establishment in Canal-st., have opened in Broadway, the most charming, and the best arranged DRY AND FANCY GOODS STORE, there is in New-York. We called there a few mornings since, and found the establishment as busy as a bee-hive, thronged by the beauty and fashion of the city, selecting their spring dresses, &c., from the well-stored cases. We refer to this place now, because we wish our friends to know where they can find a choice assortment of silks, prints, muslins, linens, and everything in the fancy line, at prices extraordinarily low. But one price, and that the lowest, is put on each article, and the purchaser feels satisfied that he is getting the worth of his money. Messrs. Hitchcock and Leadbeater are gentlemen, and their clerks are obliging and attentive.

PERFUMERY, SOAPS, &c.—We ask the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Bros. Johnson & Groser, in another department of our paper. Many of our readers, we know, though in the country, are dealers, more or less extensively, in these articles; and we know also that Messrs. Johnson & Groser are precisely the persons to supply them. They manufacture all the articles they sell—with the exception of what they import—and are always ready to supply the trade with any quantity, and also families and individuals, at the shortest notice, and on the most reasonable terms. They are intelligent gentlemen and worthy Odd-Fellows.

CHOICE CIGARS.—Those who love to enjoy the luxury of smoking, in its highest perfection, will call at Bro. Sadlier's, 234 Broadway. Dealers in the country will be supplied on application to him, on satisfactory terms.

ODD FELLOW'S HALL, CITY OF NEW-YORK, }
March 13, 1849.

To District Deputy Grand Masters, Officers of Lodges, and Brethren:

In consequence of the many complaints made to this Office of the failure of Deputies, Officers of Lodges and Members to receive communications which have been issued from this Office, and of the failure to receive many communications which have been intended to reach this Office, for several months last past, and which have been transmitted by Deputies, Lodges and individuals, you are therefore notified and requested to address all communications intended for the Grand Lodge, Grand Master, or Grand Secretary, to BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Box No. 838, Post Office, New-York, and in all cases to be particular that Letters and Documents are properly mailed, in order that a failure of papers intended for this, or sent from this Office, to reach their destination, may be traced to the proper cause.

Fraternally yours,
BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Grand Secretary.

NEW-YORK DIRECTORY OF LODGES AND ENCAMPMENTS

BELOW we present our readers a complete List of the Lodges, Degrees Lodges and Encampments working under the authority of the R. W. Grand Lodge and the R. W. Grand Encampment I. O. O. F. of the State of New-York, with their present standing in the Order, and their time of meeting, as far as known. Also, a List of the Grand Officers. We have taken considerable pains to insure accuracy.

The Grand Lodge meets at National Hall, in the city of New York, annually on the first Wednesday in August, and semi-annually on the last Wednesday in February.

We believe there are three or four more Lodges in Connecticut, the names and location of which we are not in possession of. Otherwise the list is quite complete.

DIED,

At Norristown, Penn., March 21, of malignant erysipelas, Bro. JOHN B. WALWORTH, a member of Mechanics' Lodge No. 15, Baltimore, Md. and a native of Massachusetts. In the 26th year of his age. He remains were deposited in Montgomery Cemetery, in the lot belonging to Curtis Lodge No. 239, I. O. O. F.

GOURAUD'S LIBRARY OF ROMANCE.
JULIA WRIGHT—CANTO V.

True majesty, yet modesty of mien
Belonged to Julia Wright, beyond compare;
For these and other reasons, 'twill be seen,
Our heroine had some charms which made her fair;
Despite her pimpled, tanned, and freckled skin—
Despite the fiery redness of her hair!
A gentler soul you might distinctly trace
Beaming from her dark eyes and classic face!

POOR JULIA'S pimpled, tanned, and freckled skin, was the theme of many a rude jest, which she might have avoided by using GOURAUD'S ITALIAN MEDICATED SOAP, which would have made her skin as white and soft as eider down. GOURAUD'S POUDES SUBTILES would have eradicated the nasty moustache from her upper lip, as also the hair from her arms and hands; with GOURAUD'S GRECIAN HAIR DYE, she could have colored her red hair a beautiful jet black. One touch of GOURAUD'S LIQUID ROUGE to her pale cheeks would have given them an immovable rosininess. Bear in mind, that the genuine preparation of DR. FELIX GOURAUD can only be procured genuine, at his depot, 67 Walker-street, first store FROM Broadway.

DANDRUFF CURED.

From Dr. Train, of Roxbury, Mass.

ROXBURY, Feb. 18, 1847.

Mr. William Bogle—Dear Sir: Having been troubled with dandruff for a number of years, and after repeated trials with various remedies without success, I had despaired of finding a preparation, the use of which would clear the skin of this impurity; when I heard of, and was induced to try, your Hyperion Fluid. It now gives me pleasure to state, that it has not only performed its promises in this respect, but gradually is preventing my hair from falling off, which had increased to such extent as to cause alarm. Many of my friends have tried it, both male and female, and I have never heard of but one opinion respecting it, that of entire satisfaction in its being the best composition in use for keeping the head clean, cool and agreeable. It gratifies me to have this opportunity of adding my name to your list of patrons.

H. D. TRAIN, M. D.

For Sale, Wholesale and Retail, by A. B. & D. Sands, 100 Fulton-st.; Rushton, Clark & Co., 110 and 273 Broadway, N. Y. To be obtained of the Proprietor and Manufacturer, Wm. Bogle, 277 Washington-st., Boston, and of the principal Druggists and Perfumers in the United States and Canada.

SOAP AND CANDLES.

JOHN D. LEE, Manufacturer, Nos. 61 and 63 Trade street, New-York, has constantly on hand a large assortment of the above articles, which he will sell at the lowest market prices, warranted equal, if not superior, to any manufactured in the city; delivered or shipped without charge for boxes or cartage.

MERCHANTS, GROCERS, COUNTRY DEALERS and FAMILIES, who are in want of the above articles, will find it to their interest to call on him before purchasing elsewhere. 3m235

OPPOSITION—TO COUNTRY MERCHANTS.

A LITTLE one side from the bulk of Jobbers, for the purposes of low expenses, yet I hope you will cut this advertisement out and give me a call, as I am trying to build up a trade for cash and short time, which I hope to succeed in, in opposition to long time and old established houses. I buy the principal portion of my goods for cash at auction and in Europe. They will consist of all styles of Dry Goods, such as are desirable, and under the usual market prices. I shall be receiving daily—Ribbons, Laces, Embroideries, Muslins, Silks, Bareges, (green, plain & fancy,) Draperies, Gloves, Fans, Ladies' and Gentlemen's L. C. Hdk's, Fancy Silk Hdk's, Grass Cloths, Oil Silks, Italian and Fancy Cravats, Sewing Silks, Crapes, Grape Lisse, Silk, Lisle, and Kid Gloves, Tiarlatus, Flowers, &c. &c. In short, any article in Dry Goods which I consider cheap and desirable.

241 L. H. MOORE, 45 Beaver-street, New-York.

ORGAN MANUFACTORY,

NO. 322 MARKET-STREET, PHILADELPHIA.—The Subscriber would call the attention of the public to his Manufactory, (the oldest in the city) where can be furnished Organs of all kinds, for Cathedrals, Churches or Parlor, with all the modern improvements, viz: Composition Pedals, Double Swells, Coupler's Octave, &c. &c., with his unsurpassed Reed Stops, which I will furnish cheaper than any builder of established reputation.

WM. A. CORRIE.

N. B. Small size Organs, suitable for Lodges, &c., always on hand. 1y238

JOHN OSBORNE, REGALIA MANUFACTURER.

NO. 99 MADISON-STREET, NEW-YORK, supplies promptly every description of Lodge and Encampment Regalia. He will be happy to receive orders from the Brotherhood for furnishing all articles required by the New York. 237

ECLECTIC MEDICAL AND SURGICAL OFFICE,
No. 127 Chambers-st., New-York.

I. ALL CASES OF DISEASE in any part of the HUMAN SYSTEM, INTERNAL or EXTERNAL, whether in MEN, WOMEN or CHILDREN, will be EXAMINED, and COUNSEL or ADVICE given freely to all, by the Physicians in attendance, WITHOUT CHARGE.

II. Patients will find our EXAMINATIONS, and the mode by which we arrive at a knowledge of their diseases—as also our TREATMENT, unlike those of any others which they may have heretofore known or tried.

III. Our REMEDIES or TREATMENT will be found the most pleasant, safe, simple, and efficacious that can be used. No confinement to the sick room—no hindrance from business,—no danger from colds,—and no injury to the constitution;—but, on the contrary, IMPROVEMENT at once.

IV. All the Medicines we prescribe are made in our own CHEMICAL LABORATORY, as we cannot rely on the Drugs sold in the shops, in consequence of almost universal ADULTERATIONS. Our remedies being prepared in the most pure and concentrated form, but little is used or needed to cure the worst cases.

V. We claim, by our UNUSUAL SUCCESS, to be masters over all curable diseases—particularly in all SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS—the DISEASES PECULIAR TO WOMEN—the HEREDITARY DISEASES OF CHILDREN—and all those most HOPELESS and DESPERATE cases in male or female which have defeated the best efforts of the most distinguished medical practitioners, as the more than ten thousand cases, whom we have successfully treated, can testify.

VI. THOSE DISEASES which are almost invariably treated in the first stage with Balsam of Copiava, Capsules, Cubebis,—with injections of solutions of Nitrate of Silver, Borax, Alum, Sugar of Lead, Sulphate of Zinc,—with Bougies, Catheters, and Caustics—and in the second stage with Yellow or Black Washes, Blue or Mercurial Ointment, Blue Stone or Lunar Caustic, externally—and with Calomel, Blue Pill, Red Precipitate, Corrosive Sublimate, Hydriodate of Potassa; Sarsaparilla Syrup, and other like cheats and slops, internally—we say before Heaven and Earth what we KNOW and can DEMONSTRATE by hundreds of cases, that by such treatment and means these diseases have never, and can never, be healed—they deceive the patient, disguise the disease by driving it into the system to other and more important parts,—they produce Strictures; Abscesses in the Kidneys; Piles; Fistulas; Catarrhs; Gravel; Diseases of the Eyes; Loss of Hair and Hearing; Rheumatic Pains; Decay of the Flesh and Bones; Ulcers in the Limbs, Throat, Head, Neck, Nose and Palate; Disease of the Liver and Stomach; with CONSUMPTION OF THE LUNGS, or WHOLE SYSTEM; and thus render either the whole life of the patient miserable, or hurry him to a premature grave.

Without using any of the above named Quackish, Swindling and Murderous Remedies, we PROMISE to every case we treat a PERMANENT and RADICAL cure FOR LIFE, by a very simple medicine, which is without taste or smell, which neither purges nor vomits, nor hinders from business, nor exposes the patient in any way whatever. Testimonials to these Facts we can furnish from persons who were carried out of the Broadway Hospital to die as hopeless cases, and many others of like character, whom we have cured.

VII. FISTULAS cured invariably WITHOUT AN OPERATION. Of the hundreds of cases of this disease which we have known, we have never seen one which had been cured with cutting with the knife—though nearly all had been cut once, twice, or more times. Cutting never cured a case—it is false, delusive and cruel. References will be given to cases in this city which have been SUCCESSFULLY treated of the most terrible forms of Fistula ever known.

VIII. Cases of SURGERY, MIDWIFERY and DENTISTRY attended to in all their departments—Tumors, Cancers, Dislocation, Fractures, Wounds, and Injuries of every kind treated with safety and success.

IX. ALL DISEASES OF THE EYES and EARS treated without PAIN or PERIL, and with UNEQUALLED SUCCESS.

We invite all the afflicted, however hopeless their cases may appear, or whatever their disease may be, or however many physicians or remedies they may have tried, to put our knowledge and skill to the test in an examination of their case,—it will cost them nothing,—and then they will be prepared to know whether we can treat them successfully or not—for if we do not find, to their satisfaction, the cause or origin of all the difficulties in the case, we will own that the cure is not in our power, and hence put them to no expense. Most physicians treat symptoms—we go to the root, and thus succeed where others fail.

NEVER DESPAIR till you have given our Remedies and Treatment an honest trial.

Patients visited at their residences when required.

All DR. BEACH'S BOOKS and MEDICINES for sale at this office.

Office open from 8 o'clock, A. M., to 8 P. M. Sundays from 9 to 10 A. M., and from 7 to 8 P. M.

WRIGHT'S INDIAN PILLS
VEGETABLE

THIS Superior Medicine may be had in part as follows:—At Dr. Wright's Offices in Philadelphia, 169 Race street; New-York, 288 Greenwich-street; and Boston, 198 Tremont-street—and by 20,000 Agencies in North and South America, England, France, and Germany. Agents whose supplies become exhausted, can obtain a fresh lot at the Philadelphia rates, by addressing any of the above Offices. Care should be taken not to confound this medicine with other articles of similar name, so as to prevent disagreeable consequences; and in no case should it be purchased from individuals who cannot vouch for its genuineness. 240

SELPHO'S PREMIUM ANGLESEY LEG,

AND ARTIFICIAL HAND, patronized by the most eminent Surgeons throughout Europe, and by the most distinguished of their professional brethren in this country, and allowed by all to be the nearest approach to nature hitherto produced. Introduced into this country, and made solely by WILLIAM SELPHO, 24 Spring-st., N. York. Reference to Prof. V. Mett and other eminent Surgeons in this city. 245

IN QUART BOTTLES,

For Purifying the Blood, and for the Cure of

SCROFULA, RHEUMATISM, STUBBORN ULCERS, DYSPESIA, SALT RHEUM, FEVER SORES, ERYSIPELAS, PIMPLES, BILES, MERCURIAL DISEASES, CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS, LIVER COMPLAINT, BRONCHITIS, CONSUMPTION, FEMALE COMPLAINTS, LOSS OF APPETITE, GENERAL DEBILITY, &c.

THE PROPRIETORS having spent much time in bringing this preparation of SARSAPARILLA to its present state of perfection; and the experience of fourteen years has furnished them the most ample opportunity to study, in their various forms, the diseases for which it is recommended, and to adapt it exactly to their relief and cure. Patients who wish a really good Medicine are invited to give it a trial, and satisfy themselves of its superiority, and the invaluable property it possesses of arresting and curing disease. The bottle has been enlarged to hold one Quart, and in its present improved form may safely claim to be the best and cheapest medicine of the age. Its progress to the fame it has attained may be traced by a long line of facts and cures, that stand as landmarks and beacons for the invalid, pointing the way to the haven of health; and what it has already done for the thousands who have used it, it is capable of doing for the millions still suffering and struggling with disease. It purifies, cleanses, and strengthens the fountain springs of life, and infuses new vigor throughout the whole animal frame.

DYSPEPSY CURED.

The following testimonial, from a gentleman so well known as Mr. Cox, requires no comment, and recommends itself to all similarly afflicted: New-ORLEANS, Dec. 18, 1848.

Messrs. A. B. & D. SANDS—Gentlemen: Having experienced the most beneficial effects from the use of your Sarsaparilla, it gives me pleasure to add my testimony to the numerous spontaneous effusions of grateful hearts which you continually are receiving.

My case was dyspeptic, or rather I may term it a weakness of the digestive organs. For more than a year, I was troubled with wind upon my stomach and its frequent eructation, together with producing a spasmodic contraction of the heart, often gave me much annoyance. After trying various remedies without avail, I commenced with your Sarsaparilla. Before I had used half a bottle, almost every symptom of this disagreeable complaint had vanished, and in a few weeks its continued use effected a complete cure. I therefore confidently recommend it to all persons affected in the same manner, and have reason to believe that many who are suffering under a supposed disease of the heart, if they would take your Sarsaparilla, in a few weeks would find themselves restored to health in both mind and body. I remain yours, very truly, JOHN V. COX, 93 Lexington Avenue.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA IN PRUSSIA.

The Proprietors of this valuable Medicine have just received an order from our esteemed friend and correspondent, Theodore S. Fay, Secretary of Legation to the Court of Prussia, for the use of a member of the Royal Family—a copy of which we herewith lay before our readers.—[Home Journal.

U. S. LEGATION, BERLIN, Nov. 30, 1848.—Gentlemen: I wish you to send two dozen bottles of your Sarsaparilla, for the use of His Royal Highness Prince Waldimir of Prussia, to this Legation, as soon as possible. It is necessary that he should receive it immediately; therefore, please send it by first steamer. The bill can be made out in the name of the Prince, and sent with it. Your obedient servant, "THEO. S. FAY."

SCROFULOUS AFFECTION OF THE EYES.

SOUTH KINGSTON, (R. I.) Oct. 11, 1847.—Messrs. SANDS—Gentlemen: My little daughter, when one year old, was attacked with a scrofulous humor on her face, which soon after extended into her eyes, causing almost total blindness in one of them, and disfiguring her whole face. I employed two physicians to attend her, who exhausted their utmost skill to give her relief, but it all proved useless, and finally one of them remarked to me that he had known of some striking cures effected by Sands' Sarsaparilla, and advised me to try it. I obtained one bottle, which she commenced using, and before it was all used up it had effected an entire cure. It is now over four years since she was cured, and there has been no reappearance of the disease, and we are satisfied that it is a perfect cure. It gives me great pleasure to add that I can recommend it to any sufferer from a similar complaint.

Respectfully yours,

GEORGE ROBINSON.

THE NEW-YORK SUN'S ART UNION!
A SPLENDID ENGRAVING, AND
THE NEW-YORK WEEKLY SUN one Year for One Dollar, besides One Thousand Magnificent Prizes distributed among those who Subscribe!—BEACH, BROTHERS, Publishers of the Weekly Sun, as a testimonial of their appreciation of the vast and rapidly increasing patronage bestowed upon that Dollar Newspaper, will make a gratuitous present of a large and elegant full length engraving, beautifully printed on fine paper, of General Zachary Taylor, President of the United States, to every subscriber, (whether a new one or one who renews an old subscription,) whose name is entered upon the subscription books between the first day of January, 1849, and January, 1850. They will also distribute among the subscribers ONE THOUSAND PRIZES, varying in value from $25 to $1—the total value amounting to two thousand dollars! The very great expense attendant on this liberal distribution of prizes and splendid Portraits of President Taylor, in full military uniform, &c., renders it imperatively necessary that only one name should be entered for each dollar sent. Those who subscribe in clubs will please designate the names of such as are to be entered upon the books as candidates for the prizes, &c.

THE ONE THOUSAND PRIZES
 To be distributed among the subscribers to the Weekly Sun, will comprise a rich selection of costly and valuable works in the several departments of Literature, History, Biography, Voyages, and Travels, Domestic and Moral Economy, Essays, Belles Lettres, &c., including most of the well known publications of Harper and Brothers.
 Those who draw prizes will have the privilege of making their own selections from the catalogue which is furnished to each subscriber. To insure the fullest advantages of the above prize distribution, subscribers should send in the amount of their subscriptions without delay, as the names are registered in rotation, and those first in order will be entitled to the early impressions of the engravings of General Taylor, &c.
 For a more detailed account of the above plan, the reader is referred to the Extra Sun's Art Union, which may be obtained free of charge by any person addressing (postpaid) the proprietors.

THE NEW-YORK WEEKLY SUN
 Is the best as well as the cheapest family newspaper ever presented to the American public.
 In addition to its usual features of interest, beautiful Engravings, &c., the Weekly Sun for 1849 will be enriched by a succession of

 written by eminent American authors expressly for this paper, for the premiums of $250.
 The subscription price being

ONLY ONE DOLLAR A YEAR,
 any person may receive a copy, at any time, by sending the direction and enclosing the money by mail. (Postmasters will frank the letters.)

CLUB SUBSCRIPTIONS, when sent to one address, are received at the following rate: Five copies for $1—eleven copies for $2—twenty five for $18—and seventy-five copies for $50. When an order is sent for copies requiring them to be forwarded to more than one address, one dollar will be charged for each subscription.

Letters and Communications (always postpaid,) should be addressed to

OLD DOCTOR
Jacob Townsend,
THE ORIGINAL
OF THE
TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA.

Old Dr. Townsend is now about 70 years of age, and has long been known as the AUTHOR of the DISCOVERER of the GENUINE ORIGINAL "TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA." Being poor, he was compelled to hunt its manufacture, by which means it has been kept out of market, and the sales circumscribed to those only who had proved its worth and known its value. It had reached the ears of many, nevertheless, as those persons who had been healed of severe diseases, and saved from death, proclaimed its excellence and wonderful HEALING POWER. This is manufactured on the largest scale, and is called for throughout the laud and wealth of the land.

Unlike young S. P. Townsend's, it improves with age, and never changes, but for the better; because it is prepared on scientific principles by a scientific man. The highest knowledge of Chemistry, and the latest discoveries of the art, had been brought into requisition in the manufacture of the OLD DR. SARSAPARILLA. The Sarsaparilla root, it is well known to medical men, contains many medicinal properties, and some properties which are inert or useless; and others, which, if retained in preparing it for use, produce fermentation and acid, which is injurious to the system. Some of the properties of Sarsaparilla are so volatile, that they entirely evaporate and are lost in the preparation, if they are not preserved by a scientific process, known only to those experienced in its manufacture. Moreover, these volatile principles, which fly off in vapor, or as an exhalation, under heat, are the very essential medicinal properties of the root, which give it all its value. The

is so prepared, that all the inert properties of the Sarsaparilla root are first removed, every thing capable of becoming acid or of fermentation, is extracted and rejected; then every particle of medicinal virtue is secured in a pure and concentrated form; and thus it is rendered incapable of losing any of its valuable and healing properties. Prepared in this way, it is made the most powerful agent in the cure of

Cure of Innumerable Diseases.
 Hence the reason why we hear commendations on every side in its favor by men, women, and children. We find it doing wonders in the cure of CONSUMPTION, DYSENTERY, AND LIVER COMPLAINT, and all CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, and all affections arising from

Impurity of the Blood.
 It possesses a marvellous efficacy in all complaints arising from indigestion, from Acidity of the Stomach; from unequal circulation, determination of the blood to the head, from the operation of the heart, cold hands, cold snills and hot flashes over the body. It has not had its equal in coughs and colds; and promotes easy expectoration, and gentle perspiration, relaxing structure of the lungs, throat, and every other part.
 But in nothing is its excellence more manifestly seen and acknowledged than in all kinds and ages of

Female Complaints.
 It works wonders in cases of four either or whites, Falling of the Womb, Obstructed, Suppressed, or Painful Menstruation, irregularity of the menstrual periods, and the like; and is effectual in curing all forms of the Kidney Disease.
 By removing obstructions, and regulating the general system, it gives tone and strength to the whole body, and cures all forms of

Nervous Diseases and Debility,
 and thus prevents or relieves a great variety of other diseases, as Spinal Irritation, Neuralgia, St. Vitus Dance, Swooning, Epileptic Fits, Convulsions, &c.

It is not possible for this medicine to fail to do good; it has nothing in it which can ever harm; it can never sour or spoil, and therefore, can never lose its curative properties. It cleanses the blood, excites the liver to healthy action, tones the stomach, and gives good digestion, relieves the bowels of torpor and constipation, allays inflammation, purifies the skin, equalizes the circulation, what much it produces, restores the balance of the system, and the insensible perspiration; relaxes all strictures and tightness, removes all obstructions, and invigorates the entire nervous system. Is not this, then,

The Medicine you Pre-eminently Need?
 But can any of these things be said of S. P. Townsend's inferior article? This young man's liquid is not to be

Compared with the Old Dr.'s, because of one GRAND FACT, that the one is INCAPABLE of DETERRIORATION and

Never Spoils,
 while the other DOES; it sours, ferments, and blows the bottles containing it into fragments; the sour, acid liquid exploding, and damaging other goods! Must not this horrible compound be poisonous to the system? What! put acid into a system already diseased with acid! What causes Dyspepsia But acid! Do we not all know, that when food sour in our stomachs, what much it produces, restores the balance of the system, and the insensible perspiration; relaxes all strictures and tightness, removes all obstructions, and invigorates the entire nervous system. Is not this, then,

Souring, Fermenting, Acid "Compound"
OF S. P. TOWNSEND!

and yet he would fain have it understood that Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's GENUINE ORIGINAL SARSAPARILLA, is an IMITATION of his inferior preparation!!

Heaven forbid that we should deal in an article which would bear the most distant resemblance to S. P. Townsend's article; and which would bring down upon the Old Dr. such a mountain of complaints and circumstances from Agents who have sold, and purchasers who have used S. P. Townsend's FERMENTING COMPOUND.

We wish it understood, because it is the absolute truth, that S. P. Townsend's article and Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's Sarsaparilla are as heaven and earth apart, and infinitely dissimilar, that they are unlike in every particular, having not one single thing in common.

As S. P. Townsend is no doctor, and never was, is no chemist, no pharmacist—knows no more of medicine or disease than any other common, unscientific, unprofessional man, what guarantee can the public have that they are receiving a genuine scientific medicine, containing all the virtues of the articles used in preparing it, and which are incapable of changes which might render them the AGENTS OF DISEASE instead of health? It is to arrest frauds upon the unfortunate, to pour bait into wounded humanity, to kindle hope in the despairing, to restore health and vigor into the crushed and broken, and to banish infirmity—that OLD DR. JACOB TOWNSEND has BOUGHT and FOUND the opportunity and means to bring his

 within the reach, and to the knowledge of all who need it, that they may learn and know, by joyful experience, its

Transcendent Power to Heal!
 and thus to have the unpurchaseable satisfaction of having saved thousands and millions from the bed of sickness and dependency to hope, health, and a long life of vigor and usefulness to themselves, their families and friends.

CHAPTER VIII.

MOULTRIE'S DEFENSE.

The flash, the smoke, the artillery roar—
The answering volley from front and rear—
The wounded, slain, the bloody gore—
Yet not a thought of fear. G. W. DEWEY.

DAY-BREAK glimmered in gray light over the harbor and city of Charleston. All along the line of the water, on beach and wharves, were gathered, even at that early hour, crowds of the anxious inhabitants. Every housetop which could command a view of the river and channel—every elevated spot from which Sullivan's Island and the British squadron could be seen—was thronged with old men, and women, and children; parents, wives, and infants of those who had gone forth to fight the battles of their country.

Little hope cheered the lookers-on who loved the cause of freedom. Though stimulated by their brave governor, and urged likewise by their own patriotic feelings, the citizens had determined on the most strenuous resistance; though Lee with his raw levies had sworn to die on the beach rather than behold the landing of the foe; and though every confidence was felt in the unyielding bravery of Moultrie, Marion, and the other brave men that formed the garrison of Sullivan's Island,—yet, such was the dread entertained of the British ships of war, and so vastly had report magnified the courage and ferocity of the regular English army, that there was scarcely one among the spectators of that morning's conflict who dared to hope even, for the triumph of the good cause.

The river-mist rose slowly from the surface of the water, beneath the advancing rays of the sun, and the fleet of Sir Admiral Peter Parker appeared in all the pride of its nautical display, slowly advancing up the harbor. It was a magnificent spectacle. Nearly fifty vessels, comprising nine ships of the line, and forty transports, ranged up the channel, with all their canvases set to catch the soft morning breeze, and the first beams of the sun, shooting on their bellying sails, made them seem almost like wings of fire, bearing huge monsters to the battle against freedom.

Lee from his camp, and Moultrie from his redoubt, watched with earnest gaze, the movements of the enemy. No fear, it is probable, found room in the breast of either, but the latter was certainly apprehensive of defeat, while on the other hand, the bold partisan colonel expressed to his comrades an unbounded assurance of victory. It may be that Moultrie hazarded in word more than he in reality felt; but however that may be, never was there a more determined front displayed than that by the devoted little garrison of the palmetto fort, as the war-ships of the enemy rode majestically in their view.

It had been foreseen, that, should the engagement be a protracted one, the small store of ammunition on the island would be exhausted before its termination; and therefore Moultrie, like Putnam at Bunker's Hill, resolved that every shot should tell upon the enemy. The feeble armament which he possessed was therefore mounted in the most commanding, and at the same time protected situation, so that it should sweep diagonally the advancing fleet; and the powder, consisting of scarcely five thousand pounds, was distributed in due proportions along the line, every gun being superintended and even pointed by the commissioned officers of the regiment. The defenders of the fort, mute with determination,—every heart swelling with the spirit of a hero,—awaited the attack of their haughty foemen.

They could cast their eyes to the left, and behold where watched their trembling friends. They could see the house-tops of Charleston, covering their own homes and firesides, now crowded with those who were dearer to them than life. Were greater sentiments than these needed, to inflame each soul with patriotism—to make every lip respond to the gallant Moultrie's resolve to die or beat off the invaders?

The river-fogs melted away entirely, and the hot sun of June began to pour its scorching beams upon the scene. Moultrie moved up and down the line, smoking a short pipe, and emitting a continued succession of puffs, as he encouraged the soldiers. Marion, cautious and silent, moved among his men, exchanging quick glances with his old comrades in arms—glances which contained whole volumes of brave meaning. All watched earnestly, at the same time, the advance of the hostile squadron.

"We shall have hot work, Captain," said Moultrie to the young volunteer Rivers, who stood beside an English eighteen-pounder, which he had pointed upon the hull of the enemy's flag-ship, and was at the moment lowering, to catch the range of her course. "We shall have hot work,—but we must endeavor to keep cool."

Saying this, Moultrie quietly took his pipe from his mouth, and lazily emitted a wreath of smoke.

"The enemy may find our shot as hot as theirs," returned Rivers. "And if our powder holds out, they will acknowledge it as strong."

"Our powder must be husbanded," said Moultrie. "I see, captain, you understand the business, by the direction in which your gun points. That is right, my young soldier. Look to the Commodore—look to the two-deckers—and we'll soon have them all between wind and water."

"Look to the Commodore—look to the two-deckers," ran in a low murmur along the line of the entrenchments, and in a moment it might be seen that every gun was aimed at the hulls of the advancing line of battle-ships, and all following closely with their veering muzzles the course which the windings of the channel forced the frigates to take.

Moultrie smiled as he noticed the quick response to his directions. "There's no fear of men like these," said he.

At this moment Major Marion approached his commanding officer, followed by the stalwart Sergeant Jasper and another individual of an equally athletic frame. Moultrie glanced rapidly from one to another, and a slight frown bent his eyebrows, as he seemed to recognize the last of the three. "Who have we here?" asked he sharply.

"A new volunteer," answered Marion "who, however, finds little favor in the eyes of our brave sergeant, here."

As the major spoke he pointed to the new comer, in whom Moultrie had recognized the individual who, the night previous, had ridiculed the idea of defending the island, and whom the reader is further acquainted with under the name of Matthew Orrall.

"Well, sir, you have altered your mind in regard to our log ramparts?" said Moultrie, attentively regarding the forbidding features of the man.

"Whether I have or have not, colonel," answered the bravo, carelessly, "I have come to do my part in defending them—that is, if one poor fellow is worth making a target of."

"We want men who will make targets of the Britons," said Sergeant Jasper, warmly.

"I can point a gun as true as any man on the island," said Mat. Orrall, with a scowling glance at the sergeant.

As the bravo said this, a gun from the admiral's ship boomed across the water, and the two foremost frigates immediately let go their anchors, and ranged broadside to, abreast of the fortifications.

"Answer that, if you can point a gun so well," said Moultrie to the man, as the shot from the enemy's gun whizzed over their heads. "Answer that—'tis the signal for battle."

"I beg, sir, you will permit me to point the gun!" cried the young Captain Rivers, hastily.

But the bravo had already swung the heavy carriage round with one hand, while with the other he seized a match, and stooping at the breech, sighted the piece with a rapid glance. The next moment he had applied the fire, and the smoke and flame belched forth from the cannon's mouth.

"See you that, Colonel Moultrie?" cried Mat. Orrall, with a laugh, as the smoke clearing away discovered the direction of the shot, ricocheting over the waves, which, on account of the late easterly winds were now unusually rough. It struck the hull of the admiral's ship, the Bristol, and the men of Sullivan's Island could see the splinters flying in every direction from the shattered planks.

A loud huzza ran through the American lines as the opportune effect of the shot was witnessed. Moultrie puffed three or four thick volumes of smoke from his mouth in quick succession.

"Well done! well done!" he cried. "'Tis a good omen. Now, men, to your stations, and give the foe a sample of what they may expect. You, sir, may remain here, if Captain Rivers is agreeable, and assist in working the gun you have aimed so well."

"With all my heart," said Rivers; "he is a brave fellow, and will fight well, I've not a doubt."

The dark sneer that was habitual to him, curled Orrall's lip with a deeper shade, as he heard this; but no one noticed it, save Jasper, who had never ceased to regard the bravo with a suspicious gaze.

"Let us to our post, sergeant," said Marion; "the man will do well enough; if he be a traitor, we have him in our power."

With these words, spoken in a low voice to Jasper, the major turned from the spot.

The sergeant followed his commanding officer to their station, but not without first casting a last scrutinizing look at the new volunteer, and muttering to himself: "I like him not—I like not."

But the battle had now begun. From the ports of six frigates, which had ranged in the channel opposite the fort, vomited at once a tremendous burst of flame. The fort replied by an extended volley of small arms, and a succession of double-shotted discharges along the line of the works. And now, almost instantaneously, a dense cloud of smoke rolled and wreathed upon the water, and soared upward in columns above the heads of the combatants. Flash—crash—followed in awful rapidity, shaking the land and water, and echoing a thousand times from the plantations and the city.

The waves rocked and swelled up with every fierce explosion, lashing the beach with their white froth, and rolling at times close up to the logs of the outer walls of the fort. Now the prolonged roar of a hundred guns would rumble like heavy thunder, and a serried line of continuous flame seemed burning along the surface of the water. Then with a sudden crash some heavy broadside would rise above the din, and the dense volumes of smoke, scattered aside for an instant, would permit the swaying hull of a frigate to be seen, and give the gallant fort defenders an opportunity to point their guns with greater precision.

Beyond the immediate theater of conflict, and about a mile below the island, the British transports had endeavored to anchor, in order to permit Sir Henry Clinton to effect a landing with his regular troops, and attack the American fortifications on the side where the defenses were weak, or perhaps to make a detour and assail the city and the camp of Lee, in a totally unexpected quarter. But the elements were against the well concerted scheme of Sir Harry, and in attempting to carry it out he nearly involved himself, inextricably, among the dangerous shoals that surrounded the islands of the harbor. As it was, three frigates, in trying to gain the positions assigned them for the general attack, ran aground below Sullivan's Island, and lost all opportunity of testing their metal in the fierce conflict.

Oriental Tale.

MOORSHID THE WISE.

A TALE OF AN ARAB STORY-TELLER.

EIGHT hours on the back of a camel, under the clear sky of Eastern Arabia, will generally be found sufficient for the development of a sound substantial appetite. My companion and myself, therefore, on our arrival at Minna, were in a condition to do ample justice to the worthy sheikh's hospitality, which exhibited itself in the inviting form of a lamb boiled whole and stuffed with rice and spices, after the Persian fashion. When the meal was concluded, with the invariable Al humdoo lillah! (Praise be to God!) we reclined for a time on our carpets and cushions, smoking our pipes in unbroken silence. At length, the sheikh, who seemed to feel that something was wanting for our entertainment, and perhaps for his own, said suddenly to one of the Arabs who surrounded us as attendants and spectators, "Where is Abou Talib? Send for the story-teller. He will divert our guests."

As there is nothing in which the Arabs so much delight as in the tales related by their professional reciters, particularly when these narratives have reference to the famous deeds of their forefathers, I always made it my practice to listen with attention to their stories: not that these are often interesting to strangers, even to such as are better acquainted than myself with the language; but the cheap compliment of appearing pleased afforded an evident gratification to my entertainers, and helped to establish a friendly feeling between us.

The story-teller, who presently made his appearance, differed little in externals from the other Arabs, being a small, poorly-dressed man, of a rather ordinary physiognomy. He had, however, a clear, pleasant voice, with a bright, animated eye, and a wide forehead, which gave him a decidedly intellectual look. His gestures were graceful, his elocution easy and fluent; and, after speaking for a little while, his countenance lighted up with a sort of poetic inspiration, which lent dignity to his mean form and homely features. As the story which he related on this occasion struck me as being more interesting than usual, I afterwards noted it down, and give it here in an abridged form, but retaining, as far as possible, his style of narration: "I am commanded," he said, "to relate a story in the presence of the great Sheikh of El-Ghafaree, who is renowned throughout the southern lands for his wisdom and his liberality, and before the noble ameer of the great Inkilish nation, whose troops, in former days, conquered the heretic robbers, the Beni Abou Ali, and whose war-ships are stationed on the coast to prevent the Johasmee and the other tribes from fighting and plundering. Therefore it will be fitting and pleasing that I shall relate a tale of the Sheikh Moorshid the Wise, the great-grandfather of our excellent sheikh, who ruled over the Ghafarees at a time when they had the supremacy of all Oman; which time, if it please Allah, will speedily return."

"Very good! well said!" exclaimed the sheikh and the other Arabs, flattered by the compliment paid to their tribe. "The Sheikh Moorshid," continued the story-teller, "was the greatest prince of the southern lands. His power extended over all Oman, from Ras Musendom to Hadramant, and his riches were beyond calculation. He had many thousand pieces of gold and silver, with herds of camels, both noble and common, and flocks of sheep and goats. Now all this wealth he had acquired by his sagacity, for he was wise above all other men, even like to Suleyman Ibn Daood, who subdued the Genii; or like to Lokman king of Yemen, who built the great mound to restrain the waters of the plain. Moreover, he was generous in giving, as another Omar or Hatim Tai, and whosoever brought him a present received a hundred-fold in return. So that the fame and good report of Moorshid the Wise, the son of Salah, was spread abroad among all the tribes of the Arabee and the Mostarab.

"In his younger days, Moorshid had been a great warrior, and had conquered many enemies and taken much spoil; but when he became of mature age, his mind was changed, and he sought rather to make peace than to kindle war. 'By peace,' he said, 'come abundance, and strength, and happiness; but out of war arise misery to many, and weakness in the end to all. Behold,' he said, 'if we people of the south, who are all Khuwarigites, fight among ourselves and destroy one another, then the Persians from the east, and the Bedoweens of Nejd from the north, and the tribes of Hadramant from the west, will come upon us unawares when we are at variance and destroy us one by one; for they hate us because we alone have preserved the true faith. Therefore let us be reconciled, and adjust our differences like people of judgment, and renounce the right of retaliation, and accept the price of blood.' These were the words of Moorshid the Wise, and whether they were right or not is a matter too high to be judged. God knows all things. But the Arabs will never renounce the thar (blood-revenge)."

"No," interrupted the auditors, "the Arabs will never renounce the thar."

It is known that this law of retaliation, or of 'blood for blood,' is the main cause of the continual dissension and feuds which prevail among the Arab tribes. Many of their more sagacious rulers, seeing the evil consequences which it produces, have attempted to eradicate the custom, but without success. Among those who have been the most earnest in their efforts may be mentioned Mohammed Ali and the Imaum of Muscat, both of whom have denounced the severest penalties upon all acts of private revenge committed within their dominions. These measures, though well meant, have had no other effect than greatly to irritate their Arab subjects, who are resolute in maintaining the law of their forefathers. As the Bedoweens of the interior, it has been asserted with much truth that the "thar" is the very foundation of their social system, without which they would be completely lawless. These observations will serve to account for the strong expression of feeling which the subject elicited from the story-teller and his auditors, all of whom were partially under the sway of the Imaum of Muscat. The former thus continued his narrative:

"Now, when Moorshid was wont to speak in this manner in the presence of his councilors and chief men, they would reply, 'Your words are words of wisdom, O great sheikh; but tell us, when the Beni Heshed come against us from Hadramant, under their young chief, Aloyan Ibn Saad, to take vengeance for the death of his grandfather, what will you do? For he has sworn never to accept the price of blood.' Then Moorshid would reply, 'If Aloyan Ibn Saad come against me with his tribe, I will meet him face to face, and overcome him with a victory which shall be a cause of astonishment to all the tribes from Lahsa to the Holy City.' So these words were spread abroad, and reached the ears of Aloyan Ibn Saad and his people, whose anger thereupon burnt more fiercely than ever; for the grandfather of Aloyan had been slain by the father of Moorshid in a great battle between the Ghafarees and the Beni Heshed; and the Beni Heshed had been driven away from their lands in Oman, and had fled to Hadramant to escape from the fury of their enemies; and since that time they had increased greatly and became stronger than at first, and their souls were eager for vengeance on the Ghafarees.

"Now it happened that one day a great troop of armed men on camels and horses were crossing the desert, and came to a well that had been dried up. And beside it they found a man lying with his face in the sand, unable to speak, and his camel expiring beside him. So they took him up, and gave him water to drink, and bread and dates to eat, and set him on a camel; and presently his strength returned to him. He was a man of swarthy complexion, and wore an aba and a keffiyeh, like the Arabs of the west, and spoke in the dialect of the Hedjaz. When the chief asked him who he was and whither he was going, he replied.

"O great sheikh, I am called the Hajji Hassan El-Khateeb, of the tribe of Joheina. I came from Muscat with other merchants to trade throughout Oman and Hadramant; and when the caravan left Minna four days ago, I was weak from illness and could not accompany it: but two days afterward, I set out alone on a swift camel, thinking to overtake it, and, losing my way, I wandered about in the desert till the water in my goat-skins was exhausted, and my camel could go no further; and, at length, coming to this well which was dried up, I said to myself, 'It is the will of Allah that I shall perish here,' and so I lay down to die where you found me. But tell me, O sheikh, what is this great multitude of lion-like warriors, and what wretched tribe is about to undergo destruction at your hands? For, as I judge, it is not for plunder alone that such a host has taken up the spear and the matchlock, and girded on the sword.'

"At these words the young chief frowned and said:

"Art thou an Arab, O Hajji, and dost not know the Beni Heshed when thou seest them in their array?"

"To this the Hajji replied:

"I have been many years a wanderer beyond the seas, trading with the Franks, and am now a stranger in my own land. Tell me, O sheikh, to what end is this great armament?"

"Thou hast been in Minna," said the chief, "and hast seen the Sheikh Moorshid, whom men have called the Wise, but who will be hereafter known as the Braggart. Art thou a friend of his?"

"I have eaten and drunk at the table of the Sheikh Moorshid," replied the Hajji. "Moreover, I was ill in his house, and his slaves tended me with care, and it was his camel on which I was riding: therefore I am bound to the sheikh Moorshid. Nevertheless I will not say that I am his friend. How should a poor wandering trader call himself the friend of a great sheikh, and one whom he will perhaps never see again? Does not the proverb say, 'If the rose come, we eat and drink near it; if it depart, we do not regret it?'"

"Thou speakest after thy kind," said the chief. "Then know that I am Aloyan Ibn Saad, sheikh of the Beni Heshed, and that we are going to take revenge upon Moorshid and his people. There is a blood-feud between us for my grandsire, whom his father slew at the time when we fled before him from Oman to Hadramant. Moorshid has defied us with many scornful words, and at length the hour of requital has come. To-morrow thou wilt see the vengeance of the Beni Heshed."

"But can there be no adjustment?" asked the merchant. "Wilt thou not take the price of blood if he offer it? For we know that such an act would be most agreeable to Allah, of whom it is said in the Book, 'He is the most merciful of those that show mercy.'"

"But the chief answered with a scowl:

"It is easy to see that thou art a stranger in this land, or thou wouldst not ask if the Beni Heshed will take ransom from El-Ghafaree."

"Be it so, O sheikh," answered the merchant. "What is it to me? Thou dost right to act as shall seem best for the honor and prosperity of thy tribe. Therefore, no doubt, thou wilt come upon the Sheikh Moorshid by surprise. Else will he bury his treasures of gold and silver in the earth, and the spoil will be lost to thee and thy people."

"I will meet him face to face as he has defied me," said the chief. "It is not for spoil that I have come out against the Ghafarees."

"Nevertheless," persisted the hajji, "thou wilt do well to send a detachment suddenly to Nizzuwah; for he has there a herd of camels at pasture, all of the pure breed, such as are not to be found elsewhere in Oman. To each camel there is a driver, and it is known that thou hast come against them, they will flee with the herd to the fortress of Rostak."

"Truly, the camels would be a prize," replied the chief; "but I cannot divide my troop, lest we be found too weak for our enemies."

"At least," continued the merchant, "thou wilt surround the town of Minna before the battle? Else will he send away his two famous Nejde mares, Fodda and Janhar, the boast of El-Ghafaree. Pure white are they from the ear to the fetlock, swifter than the wind, each with its pedigree of a thousand years suspended from its neck. But at the first alarm they will likewise be sent to Rostak, whither thou canst not follow them."

"I have not men enough to surround the town," answered the young chief; "yet, verily, it will be a cause of grief and shame to us if the mares escape out of our hands: for their worth is well known throughout all the country."

"Then the hajji said, 'There yet remains one prize, the greatest of all, which thou wilt surely take. Thou knowest that the Sheikh Moorshid has a daughter, Khadeejah, loveliest among maidens. I was admitted, as a merchant, to the presence of the girl; and I speak the truth when I say, that I have nowhere beheld such beauty in all the countries of the Arabs or the Franks. Bright-eyed is she as the gazelle, graceful as the slender palm-tree, her cheeks ruddy as the peony, her braided locks black as the wing of the raven. She is like Ibla, the beloved of Antar, of whom the poet has written: 'She moves,—thou wouldst say it was the branch of the tamarisk that waves its boughs to the southern breeze. She starts away,—thou wouldst say it was the frightened fawn, when a terror alarms it in the desert. She approaches,—thou wouldst say her face was truly the sun, when its luster dazzles all beholders. She gazes,—thou wouldst say it was the full moon of night, when Orion encircles it with his stars. She smiles,—and the pearls of her teeth sparkle, in which there is a cure for the sickness of lovers. She kneels in adoration to Allah,—and the greatest of men are ready to bow down to her beauty.' Truly, O sheikh, such a maiden, of the blood of El-Ghafaree, would be a wife for a caliph; and now thou mayest have her by the strong hand, and without the fear of a repulse, or the payment of a price."

"Hajji," answered the chief, "thou hast lived among the Franks until thy mind is perverted like theirs. Do the sheikhs of the Joheinah get them wives by violence? It would be an enduring shame to a chief of the Beni Heshed who should carry off a woman. Yet, if it please Allah, I will see this Khadeejah of whom thou speakest, and of whose beauty the Ghafarees brag so highly. Perhaps there are fairer damsels among the Beni Heshed."

"So they rode on in silence: but it was easy to perceive that the heart of the young chief was inflamed with what the merchant had said of the maiden's beauty. That night they encamped by a fountain, and on the morrow, before noon, they came in sight of the town of Minna. And in the town were great confusion, and shouting, and running to and fro; and presently a troop came forth armed for battle, some on horseback and others on foot, and arrayed themselves opposite the Beni Heshed. And when it was seen that the hostile troops were equal in number, there was an expectation of a terrible battle; for no man could judge on which side the victory would fall."

"Then the merchant said to Aloyan, 'Behold, I have eaten of the bread of the Sheikh Moorshid; and now, if I am seen in the ranks opposed to him, it will be a disgrace to me for ever. Let me therefore go to him and explain the matter, and I will return faithfully to thee; but I cannot take part in the battle against one whose bread I have eaten.'

"Then the young chief answered, 'What thou sayest is just and honorable. Go to Sheikh Moorshid, and tell him that I have come to require the blood of my father's father at his hand, and that I will not return without atonement; therefore, let him look now at the sun and the earth, and his treasures, and his daughter, and all things that he prizes; for he will never behold them after this day.'

"So the hajji dismounted from his camel, and walked across the space between the two armies. And when he had come to the line of the Ghafarees there arose a great shouting and joyful clamor, and the warriors closed about him, so that he was no more seen by the Sheikh Aloyan and the Beni Heshed. And they wondered greatly, and began to suspect some treachery. And while they stood in suspense, behold! the throng of their enemies opened, and a horseman came forth, richly dressed, in a white mantle, with a shawl of Cashmere about his head, and a jeweled dagger in his girdle, and a sword, the scabbard of which was inlaid with gold, and in his right hand a lance adorned with scarlet plumes. He rode a handsome steed, black as night, with splendid housings of red cloth and silver. And as he came near, the Beni Heshed beheld the face of the hajji, but he had washed away the dye which had darkened his skin, and they knew that they had been deceived in him; and some who had seen him before said, with astonishment in their hearts, 'This is the Sheikh Moorshid!'

At this point, which he, no doubt, considered the most interesting crisis of his narrative, the story-teller suddenly stopped short, and, sinking the high falsetto voice in which he had been speaking to his natural tone, addressed the circle of excited and eager listeners in the following terms: "O mighty and generous sheikh! O excellent ameer! O noble and valiant children of El-Ghafaree! I, your poor servant, am an humble poet and story-teller, who, as it has pleased Allah, (exalted be his name!) have neither 'date-trees, nor fields of grain, nor flocks of goats and sheep,—only my camel, my matchlock, and the tales of wonderful and pleasing events and great deeds of our forefathers which I recite for your gratification. Let now your liberality be manifest, and do not shame your noble ancestors by niggardliness; for if you fail to reward the recorder of traditions, who will preserve the memory of your own exploits?"

In reply to this appeal, the narrator received a number of small copper coins, varying in value from a half-farthing to fivepence. The sheikh, however, and the two foreigners, displayed their munificence by the gift of a dollar each, which unusual liberality threw the astonished story-teller into a trance of delight. As soon as he had recovered his equanimity, and deposited the money in his girdle, he proceeded with his narrative:

"The Sheikh Moorshid stopped not until he was face to face with the young chief, when he checked his horse, and said:

"Sheikh Aloyan Ibn Saad, I am Moorshid, whom thou hast come to seek. Take now my life for the life which my father took, and let there be peace hereafter between the Beni Heshed and El-Ghafaree."

"But Aloyan replied, in a transport of rage:

"O thou more subtle than the fox! thou knowest that I cannot slay thee at this time, for thou hast eaten of my bread. This is the victory which thou hast gained over me in thy craft and the cowardice of thy heart. If I kill thee I am for ever dishonored, and if I return home unrevenged, I shall become the laughing-stock of all our neighbors. When next I come forth against thee, I will leave all compassion behind, and slay every man whom I meet in the way, whether he call himself friend or foe, hajji or robber. So look to thyself, Sheikh Moorshid, for thy wiles will not avail thee a second time."

"Yet listen to me, Aloyan Ibn Saad," returned the sheikh; "there is a third way by which thou mayest escape both dishonor and derision. Take now the price of blood which I have brought with me—it is four thousand dollars; such a ransom was never yet paid among the tribes of the south."

"But the young chief answered in a voice of anger:

"Not for the treasures of the mosque of Mecca will I sell the blood of my forefather."

"Yet hear me, Sheikh Aloyan," persisted Moorshid; "I have a herd of a hundred camels at Nizzuwah, all of noble breed, straight-limbed, bright-eyed, broad-chested, fit to carry warriors and princesses; these I offer thee, with four black slaves of the Somanly race, and two matchlocks encased with silver,—all these and the money besides."

"The chief considered for a moment, astonished at the munificence of the offer, and then replied:

"What need of more words, Sheikh Moorshid? Shall I break my vow for a hundred camels? no, not for ten thousand."

"A vow which is contrary to the Koran is not binding,' answered the sheikh; 'and the Koran commands to accept the ransom of true believers. Hear once more. I have two Nejdees mares of the breed of Saklawye, white as milk, devourers of the desert, tireless as eagles, such coursers were never yet seen in Oman. These I offer thee, with the camels, the slaves and the money, as the price of blood which my father shed.'

"Then Aloyan looked round upon his councillors and chief warriors, and he saw their eyes sparkling with desire; but he hardened his face, and said:

"It is useless, it cannot be!"

"The Sheikh Moorshid remained silent for a time, with a sad countenance, looking first at the Ghafarees, and then at the Beni Heshed, and no man interrupted the stillness. At last he said:

"What a number of goodly men are here to die for the folly of our fathers and our own madness! My soul is heavy with grief at the thought. Listen now to me for the last time, O chief of the Beni Heshed! I have a jewel of price, a darling treasure, the charm of my eyes, the delight of my heart. I offer thee my daughter Khadeejah in marriage. Take her, and return to Oman, thou and all thy tribe, to the valley of Wady Betha, where I will give to you pasture-grounds, and date-groves, and wheat-fields, to be an inheritance of the Beni Heshed for ever. Aloyan Ibn Saad, what sayest thou to this offer?"

"Then the young chief looked round again upon his followers, and saw that they were smiling in the pleasure of their hearts. And he bent down his face, like one confounded, and replied:

"O great sheikh! thou hast conquered. How can a foolish youth stand before the wisest of chiefs? Behold, I am thy son, and thy servant! and the Beni Heshed are thine in peace and in war, from this time forth."

"So the two chiefs alighted from their horses, and the Sheikh Moorshid dug a hole in the ground with his lance, and Aloyan collected seven small stones and threw them therein, and covered them with the sand; and the chiefs pressed down the sand with their feet, saying:

"In the name of the merciful God, this is a witness that our quarrel is buried for ever."

"And all the people shouted for joy."

"So in due time Aloyan Ibn Saad was wedded to Khadeejah, the daughter of Moorshid; and there were great rejoicings, with feasts and dances, and racing of camels. And the Beni Heshed returned to Oman, to the valley of Betha, where they remain to this day, close friends of El-Ghafaree, in peace and in war. And the renown of Moorshid the Wise, and his wonderful policy, was spread through all the lands of the Arab tribes, from Masr (Egypt) to the borders of Sind (Western India)."

The story-teller, having finished his narrative, sat down amid loud exclamations of applause; but the strain was presently taken up by one of his auditors, and continued by the others in succession, each seeking to outvie the rest in the marvelousness of his tale. When the Arabs once commence on the theme of their legendary history, they never seem to be willing to leave off. My last recollection, before I resigned myself to slumber, is of a long-winded narrative that an old man was relating, with great particularity, about the manner in which a remote progenitor of his chief had acquired great distinction and riches through the plunder of a caravan. Such an exploit would be quite as much to the taste of the Modern Arabs as of their forefathers. But there are very few among them, I fear, who are disposed to imitate the far-sighted policy of the wise and peaceful sheikh of El-Ghafaree.

A MAN at an ordinary had eaten so enormously, that the company were astonished and disgusted at his gluttony. The gentleman at the head of the table ironically pressed him to take another plateful, observing that he had actually eaten nothing. The gourmand declined taking any more, saying that his stomach was quite gone; upon which an Irish gentleman opposite exclaimed, "If its your stomach that's gone, my honey! you must mean the bottom part of it!"

Selected Poetry.

THE OLD BARON.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

HIGH on a leaf-carved ancient oaken chair
The Norman Baron sat within his hall,
Wearied with a long chase by wold and mere;
His hunting spear was reared against the wall;
Upon the hearth-stone a large wood-fire blazed, Crackled or smoked, or hissed, as the green boughs were raised.

Above an arched and iron-studded door
The grim escutcheon's rude devices stood;
On each side reared a black and gristly boar,
With hearts and daggers graven on grounds of blood,
And deep-dyed gules, o'er which plumed helmets
frown;
Beneath this motto ran—"Beware! I trample down."

And high around were suits of armor placed,
And shields triangular, with the wild-boar's head;
Arrows, and bows, and swords the rafters graced,
And red-deer's antlers their wide branches spread;
A rough wolf's hide was nailed upon the wall.
Its white teeth clenched as when it in the dell did fall.

An angel-lamp from the carved ceiling hung;
Its outstretched wings the blazing oil contained,
While its long figure in the wide hall swung, Blackening the roof to which its arms were chained;

The iron hair fell backward like a veil,
And through the gusty door it sent a weary wail.

The heavy arras fluttered in the wind,
That through the grated windows sweeping came,
And in its foldings glittered hart and hind,
While hawk, and horse, and hound, and kirtled dame,

Moved on the curtained waves, then sank in shade,
Just as the fitful wind along the arras played.

On the oak table, filled with blood-red wine,
A silver cup of quaint engraving stood,
On which a thin-limbed stag of old design,
Chased by six long-eared dogs made for a wood;
Sounding a horn a huntsman stood in view,
Whose swollen cheeks upraised the silver as he blew.

At the old baron's feet a wolf-dog lay,
Watching his features with unflinching eye;
An aged minstrel, whose long locks were gray,
On an old harp his withered hands did try;
A crimson banner's rustling folds hung low,
And threw a rosy light upon his wrinkled brow.

VERSES

Suggested by seeing a Little Girl weep over her Mother's Grave.

MOTHER, they say you slumber here—
The cold, cold clay your dreary bed;
They tell me, too, you call'd me "dear,"
And to your child kind words have said.

And I am told you loved me, too,
And often press'd me to your heart;
But such sweet days were long ago,
That memory serves me but in part.

The fond caress, the tender smile,
I ne'er shall feel or see again;
My infant hours you did beguile—
Oh! mother, I was happy then.

And if thy placid spirit fled
Can visit earth's discordant shrine,
Oh! hasten to my home, and shed
In other hearts such love as thine.

A home! Alas! dear mother, I Am torn from that you left away;
My home is with you in the sky,
Where cruel spirits hold no sway.

"In a village in the west of England," the Arbroath Guide relates, "the following is seen to flourish upon a sign-board over the door of an ancient couple:

"I cures a goose, and my wife cures the ganders.

"The meaning intended to be conveyed is:

"I cure agues, and my wife cures the jaundice."

Sketches of the Aborigines.

THE INDIANS OF CALIFORNIA.

WHERE the Sacramento—the boasted Pactolus of the present generation—rolls its tranquil and limpid waters amid a rich vegetation, interrupted occasionally by long slips of bare sand, may be seen small round huts of rushes, like bee hives, the habitation of the Indians. These wigwams, which are of a temporary character, the Indians erect where they halt for a season, and burn when they change their station. These huts are about thirty-five feet in circumference, constructed with pliable poles, fixed in the ground and drawn together at the top, to the height of twelve or fifteen feet. They are then interwoven with small twigs and covered with bulrushes, having an aperture at the side to admit the inhabitants, and another at the top to let out the smoke. In each dwelling are nine or ten Indians of both sexes, and of all ages, nearly in a state of nudity, huddled round a fire kindled in the center of the apartment, a prey to vermin, and presenting a picture of misery and wretchedness, seldom beheld in even the most savage state of society.

In removing, the Indians take all their furniture on their shoulders. This furniture consists only of a chest, a dish, a bowl, made in the shape of a high crowned hat, a bone which serves them for an awl in making it, a little piece of touchwood for kindling a fire, a small net in which they put their fruit and seeds, another in the shape of a purse or bag, fastened to a kind of prong across their shoulders, in which they carry their children, and lately, their bows and arrows—to which some, who affect elegance, add a shell for drinking. This furniture the women carry, when they remove from one place to another. The men have only their bows and arrows, with their appurtenances, as flints and feathers for the arrows, and sinews for the bows. But to secure them, and at the same time not to discommode them in their march, they make holes in the cars, where they hang a large case, which holds the things they need.

In personal appearance the Indians of California are, in general, small and weak, their height being seldom above five feet. They are of a considerably darker color than the natives of the provinces more to the south; and what, with their filthy habits and constant exposure to the sun, they approach the hue of the negro. They resemble the negro also in their large projecting lips, and broad, flat noses. Their hair, however, is very different from that of the negro, being long and straight, not crisp; if let to grow it hangs down to the hips; but they commonly cut it off to the length of four or five inches, which makes it stick out like quills. The hair grows very far down towards the eyes, which makes their naturally low forehead look extremely low; the eyebrows are, in general, small, though in some bushy; the beard is also, in general, scanty, although occasionally a full, flowing beard is observed. These people are in the habit of painting themselves in party-colored stripes of red and black; and this is also an emblem of mourning for their friends, for whom they seem to entertain strong affection. But they tattoo their bodies in a much less degree than the Indians of the Islands. This practice is chiefly confined to the women. They turn their toes inward when walking. At first sight their timid character announces their pusillanimous character. Both sects, in their native state, go nearly naked, having only a wrapper, of greater or less extent, around the waist. In the winter, however, they use a sort of outer garment of deer skin, or otter skin, or of the feathers of water fowls. These latter are chiefly worn by the women, and are rather ingeniously constructed. The feathers are twisted and tied together into a sort of ropes, and these are then tied close together, so as to have a feathery surface on both sides. Like all savages they are fond of ornaments for their persons. These consist of bits of carved wood, worn as earrings, bands of feathers around the head, and shells rounded and strung as beads. Their feather bandeaus are sometimes very beautiful.

Of the character of the Indians perhaps a better idea may be formed, than from a lengthened description, from the following passages, being part of the narrative of a traveler, who has visited California since the discovery of the gold region. These passages will also point out the great danger to which Europeans are exposed who emigrate to the newly-found Utopia. We may here observe, by the way, that many assassinations imbrue with blood the placers—as the Indians term the places where gold is found—and these assassinations are never heard of, as these placers are not organized like towns, and do not swarm with the idle, the inquisitive, and above all, with police.

The infatuation, besides, which the sight of gold produces, the almost certain impunity promised by the deserts which surround one, and the facility with which crime can be committed in tents on the open plains, are motives more than enough to give free scope to cupidity. In a placer, the gold-finders, encamped according to the position of the ground which they are exploring, remain at a distance from one another in a thousand different places. If by accident a human body, not to be known again, and decomposed, is found, where is the man who will trouble himself about the motive which made that body a corpse? The isolated gold-finder is exposed to so many accidents, without taking into consideration fevers, disasters, and hunger. One is contented to pass by, after looking, if any sack of gold is near him; but gold is never found near corpses. Many a time has there been seen in placers, already known and occupied, crowds of birds of prey, stopping and wheeling about at the bottom of a ravine or a precipice. "Ah, a crime has been committed!" thinks the spectator, as he passes on his way, carelessly; but never has the idea ever entered his head to write to a newspaper, or to tell any one that the zopylotes—or birds of prey—were busy at their repast.

The placer of Sacramento, yet scarcely touched by the rapacity of man, offers much less chance of assassination than if it had been explored for a long time. Up to this point it may be compared to one of those seas which abound in fish, and where the sharks, glutted with prey incessantly in their reach, do not think of attacking the bathers. But as soon as the soil of Sacramento shall become impoverished, the gold there becomes scarcer, and the difficulties to procure it be augmented, assassination will replace labor. Alas! for those avaricious Europeans whom we see hastening thither! Their bones, picked clean by the beaks of birds of prey, will blanch the soil which they have seen in their dreams enameled with gold, and which will serve for their tomb.

In the narrative above mentioned we find the following facts, respecting

STREAMS POISONED BY THE INDIANS.

"We might have gone," says the traveler, "about four or five miles, when he, (meaning his companion, Quirino, a gambusino, as the Indians term a gold finder,) stopped near a place where about fifteen Indians were busily washing for gold.

"You are laboring here at sad task, friends," said he to them. "This place is badly chosen."

"Your worship," replied one of them to him, who probably knew him, for he saluted him humbly—"Your worship is very good to trouble himself in this fashion about poor Indians; but still this place is the best of those that the Americans have left us. We ask only one thing more of them, and that is to leave us here to ourselves."

"Does not the soil in a placer belong to the first occupant?" asked Quirino.

"Alas! your worship, that used to be the case once, and ought to be still; but the Americans, since the traitors gave up California to them, act and speak like masters, and see in us but slaves and beasts of burden, instead of independent men. See, there's one coming in our direction. I will wager ten ounces of gold that he is going, without saying anything, and as if it was his right, to set about digging our ground."

"Indeed, an American, distant about a thousand yards from the place where we were, was disappearing and appearing, according to the inequality of the ground, as he directed his steps toward us.

"I am anxious to know if the Indian is right," said I to Quirino; "let us remain here. While waiting for the Yankee I will go and quench my thirst at that beautiful spring of clear water, which is glittering twenty yards from us, like a bed of rock crystal."

Quirino held me back forcibly, by the arm.

"Would you advise Senor to drink of that water?" asked he of the Indian, accompanying his question with an inexplicable smile.

"Why, your worship," replied the Indian, very embarrassed, "fresh water, to speak the truth, is a bad thing for the health. It often gives frios.* If I was his worship I would not touch that spring."

"You hear the advice which this brave fellow gives you," said Quirino to me, still holding me strongly by the arm.

"Yes, I hear it, and I thank him for it; but as I am not at all in perspiration, I think that I can dispense with following it."

"Then yield to my entreaty. Do not drink."

"You are my guide, and I must obey you," I replied to Quirino, quite surprised at his importunity.

"Very good," said he to me. Then addressing the Indians, who, during this colloquy, insignificant as it was, had left off working, he resumed:

"Friends, the American is drawing nigh. Let us speak a few words together, but to some purpose. How much do you gain here a day? Eighteen or twenty piastres each, don't you?"

"Yet, your worship, twenty piastres."

"Will you work for his worship? he will pay you forty piastres a day."

"Certainly, your worship."

"It's a bargain. Pick up your shovels and baskets, and come along with us at once."

Scarcely had Quirino finished uttering this phrase, when the American, whom we had not perceived, arrived. His forehead bedewed with perspiration, his clothes covered with dust, and his hard and difficult breathing, proclaimed that he had come far, and that he had been walking fast. His first glance was at the spring of living water, of which I have already spoken; his first action was to plunge his bowl into it, to draw it out full, and to drink with avidity.

"Here is a man less prudent, and more fortunate than myself," said I to Quirino.

"Quien sabe? (who knows?) he replied to me, shaking his head.

The Indians having picked up their shovels and baskets, we proceeded on our journey. Quirino walked before us and showed us the way.

I perceived, however, before leaving, the American digging with as much ardor as lack of ceremony, in the place lately occupied by the Indians, whom Quirino had hired so inconsiderately on my account.

Quirino walked on for about an hour, directing his steps always toward the north, without once turning his head round to us, and without uttering a syllable.

"Friends," said he, at last, turning round toward us, "we have reached our destination. First of all let us exchange a few syllables. Good pay makes good friends; your time is precious; I will be brief. I am going to discover to you a place hitherto unknown and easy to work. A man may easily pick up there, in a day, from eighty to one hundred piastres of gold. You are going to work for Monsieur. (Quirino mentioned.) These are his conditions. Each of your are to deduct from the produce of his day's work a sum of forty piastres; and then to remit to him faithfully the surplus; but when this surplus shall exceed forty piastres, which will always be the case, if you are tolerably active, this surplus will be again divided between you and him. The Senor relies entirely on your good faith; however he has been pleased to authorize me to sheathe my knife into the breast of any one of you whom I shall catch abusing his confidence. My name is Rafael Quirino. It is very difficult to deceive me, and I always keep my word. Now, answer my conditions; or, to speak more properly, those of Senor; do they suit you—yes or no?"

*Literally colds. It is thus that the Indians designate the intermitting fevers of California, which are always very dangerous, and often fatal.

"Que viva el Senor Quirino! (Long live Senor Quirino!) cried the Indians, waving their caps, 'Yes! yes! your conditions suit us.'

"Then follow me," said the Gambusino.

Don Rafael immediately glided between two rocks, so close to each other that a fat man could not have passed between them.

"Here," he exclaimed five minutes after, pointing with his finger to the dried up bed of a river that was surrounded by rocks. A very small stream of water, just sufficient only for the washing of the gold, flowed in a serpentine course through the middle of it.

Scarcely had the Indians examined some handfuls of sand, than hurrahs of a frantic joy—the first, no doubt, that had ever called forth, up to that day, the echos of the desert—rose toward heaven. The tenth part of the sand, at first sight, was gold.

"I did not think that this place was so rich," said he to me, as he look carefully at a small quantity of sand in the palm of his hand; "receive my most sincere congratulation. Each man can gather here, without difficulty, at least two hundred piastres of gold a day."

"But, Quirino, you overwhelm me—my gratitude—"

"Bah! bah! let us have no fine speeches—this discovery is not worth it. In three weeks' time the bed of our stream will be exhausted. But it is getting late, come."

"Ah! now that I think of it," resumed the Gambusino, after he had explained several times to the Indians the precise place where my tent was to be found, "you must still be thirsty."

"That I am."

"Well, quench your thirst at this stream before we resume our route."

"You are then no longer afraid I shall catch the fever?"

"Drink—drink without fear—I will answer for you."

When the Gambusino and myself arrived at the place where we had met the Indians, who had been engaged on my account, we fancied we heard groaning. Soon after we saw the American, whom we had left there, lying on the ground, and a prey to frightful convulsions. I was hastening forward to give him assistance, when Quirino held me back.

"It is useless to disturb yourself," said he to me, coldly, "that man will be dead in five minutes. See, he is stiff—he is dead."

"It was true. I remained struck with astonishment."

"You see, dear friend," resumed the Gambusino, with the same calmness of manner, "that one sometimes dies in a singular way in these placers. This man, who is young and strong, was this morning in most excellent health; now he is dead."

"And what can be the cause of such a terrible and sudden catastrophe, Don Rafael?"

"Who knows? Probably imprudence. Ah! I recollect. Did not this American, who had not such good advice as you, drink of that neighboring spring? Yes, it is that, he has been seized with the fever."

"But, Don Rafael, a glass of cold water does not kill one like a bullet."

"Gad, it depends. If the water has been poisoned, for example, by the fortuitous fall of some poisonous plant."

"What is this you are telling me?" I cried with horror; "you think that the Indians have poisoned this spring?"

"Who knows? The Indians are vindictive when they are crossed in their interests, and they administer poison in the most dexterous style. As for myself, I have never drank in any placer of the water from a spring near which I have seen the prints of human footsteps. After all, every one has his ways and his fancies. Let us resume our journey."

PERSEVERANCE merits neither praise nor blame it is only the duration of our inclinations and sentiments which we can neither create nor extinguish.

LASTING FLOWERS.

FLOWERS there are of the brightest hue,
Which bloom in the shade and sunlight, too;
Which lavish gay smiles on great and small,
And breathe out their perfume alike to all.

But are there not flowers as fresh and fair—
Are there not flowers as rich and rare—
That fold their leaves when the sun is gone—
That bloom in his presence, and for him alone?

They care not for colors to show and allure;
Their worth is more lasting, their fragrance more pure;

The straggler may scorn as he passes them by,
But the flowers care not, for the sun is nigh.

If the clouds are obscure, and he visit her not,
The flower may wither, but she clings to the spot;
In silence she looks on the heavens above,
And waits for his coming in sunshine and love.

BLUE STOCKINGS.

THERE WAS, in other times, a club (if Johnson tells us true.)

Where learned men might not appear but dress'd in stockings blue.

'Tis said, that then the gentle sex, with great desire imbued

To see this club, entreated that they might for once intrude;

But (the Spectator tells the tale) that, to seem learned too,

And of that club, they were obliged to wear the stockings blue.

And since that time no lady yet to learning finds the clue,

But by her friends, the luckless one is called from this—"A Blue."

They picture her with ancient books, of Hebrew and of Greek,

And tell you there's no modern tongue but she of course can speak;

Philosophy, the words of Kant, combined with those of Plato,

And the biographies of men like Regulus and Cato. Stern sentences, condemning all the sentiments poetical,

And talking, a la Martineau, economy political. Such is the picture; such is said of ladies who pursue

The road which intellect directs, but which proclaims them "Blue."

Surely of deeper thought the mind had better far be full,

Than occupied with netting silks, or shades of Berlin wool?

If, in the garden of the mind, the muses cull their flowers,

Why scorn the fragrance which may cheer amid life's desert hours?

Nor for the sage's hidden lore, nor yet for worldly fame,

Nor yet that other ages may repeat with praise her name;

But that o'er home and hearth may beam a soul enrich'd and pure—

A light to cheer its darker days, when joys no more allure.

Thus, in the bright companion, if ye to yourselves are true,

Fair sisters, will the world at length forget the hated "Blue"

HYSTERICAL WIVES.

CAPTAIN WEATHERSFIELD'S REMEDY.

You must know that last October was a year, when I arrived at Babylon with a cargo of teas from Canton, and as soon as it was possible, I left the ship, and under the highest steam-pressure, set out for my little nook of a village, on the Hudson, where my whole stock of human hopes and affections lay invested in a wife and three children. It is singular, perhaps, but so it is, that I never had any dread that anything can have happened to my family, till I get on soundings, and then I can neither sleep or eat till I get into port, and have seen my owners, and found out if all is well at home. I had the happiness to learn that my family had been increased by a fine boy, born one month after my departure. You may guess my impatience to see him. I sent off a letter announcing my arrival, and the day on which I should be at home. My welcome was as joyous as I could have wished it to be. The boy was a noble fellow, a year old, and as like me as two peas. These are bright days of sunshine, which repay a sailor for some of the storms of his ocean life, and of which his owners, though they get all the profit of the voyage, can't deprive him, though they would do so if they could, for they grudge everything of their ship-masters.

After I had been at home three days, I returned to finish up the voyage with the owners, and haul up the ship. This done, I returned, bag and baggage to my wife, to make a long stay at home. The opening of a sailor's boxes is always a matter of interest to captain's wives, and I had procured for myself all the presents Canton provides. Two pieces of rich silk for dresses, a set of lacquered tea-tables, a set of carved chess-men, and things of that sort. I saw a look of disappointment upon my wife's face, but she said nothing, and things passed off. But when Sunday morning came, my wife was exceedingly cross, and declared she would not go to church, though she was as regular as the sexton, "for," she said, "I have nothing fit to wear." I thought it very odd, but said nothing, and taking my little boy and girl, set off for church. Everybody was glad to see me, and I quite forgot that all was not right at home, till I found my way back into my house. There my wife stood, ready to scold the children for muddying their shoes, and would have spanked them on the spot, if I had not interfered with a good deal of firmness in word and look. The children were undressed, and dinner served, and nothing on the table was cooked fit to eat. And so the next week passed on. My coffee was as thick as mud—my turkeys were done to a crust, and I well knew the devil was about to be let loose; but for why, I couldn't guess. In the meanwhile, my wife's sister, who had been a sort of ship's cousin quartered upon me, ever since my marriage, looked all the while as demure as a Connecticut deacon under the parish pulpit, and gave no sign to show me what all this was about.

On the next Saturday afternoon, as I was sitting with my wife and children, I heard a knock at the door, and called out "Come in,"—and in came my old friend, Capt. Thomas Bowline, and his wife, in all the splendors of a new rig. He had returned the week before me, from Calcutta, and we were the only seafaring men of the place, and though our wives were neighbors, it so happened that we had not been home at the same time for years.

I was delighted to see them both, and my wife, I thought, was wonderfully cool, though exceedingly polite. I soon forgot all about her manner, in the pleasure of talking over our several fortunes since we last met; and as we had not met before, he having been absent from the village since my coming home, we had many things to talk over. They made a long call, and when they went away my wife went up to her room, and I saw no more of her, for when tea was ready, she sent word that she had a headache, and had gone to bed.

The next morning matters wore a no more pleasant aspect than they had done, and when the first church bell began to ring, my wife burst into a flood of tears, and set off for her chamber. I followed her, and there she lay on a bed, in a regular fit of hysterics. When she came to herself, I asked—"Why, what on earth, what is all this about?" She rose, and putting her hands on my shoulders, looked me full in the face, and said—"Captain Weathersfield, if you don't know, you ought to know," and I wilted down under her look, like a boy caught in the act of playing truant.

There's very few men, who, after a long voyage, could have stood such an appeal as this. I felt some rascal had been telling stories out of school; but for the life of me I couldn't conceive who it could be. And then my wife went off again, into another fit, worse than the first. I took off her shoes, and her feet were as cold as ice. As I rubbed them I conjured up all the recollections of my voyage, and they were not half so pleasant as I could have wished them. But finding it impossible to restore my wife, I ran down stairs, leaving the doors all open behind me, to the kitchen, to make some mulled wine; and there was my wife's sister, with her demure face, which helped to irritate me no little. I called for wine, and spices, and a porringer, and while it was heating she began by saying—"She wished to Heaven her sister knew how to treat a husband as he ought to be treated—that if she was a wife, she would know how to prize a man who did everything a man could do to please her." I was in no humor to hear my wife abused, and I burst out upon her in a rage, and told her I believed she was a snake in the grass, and that I had rather have her sister than ten thousand such hypocrites as she was; that if there was any mischief done between me and my wife, I knew who to thank for it all. She lifted up her hands and said she believed all men were fools, and of all fools I was the greatest. This brought on a spirited altercation, in which I spoke my mind pretty plainly. So soon as I had heated the wine, I decanted it into a tumbler. My wife's sister recommended hot vinegar, but I told her I knew a better thing than that for my wife.

On my way up stairs, I thought I heard my wife's footsteps about the chamber, but on entering, I found her laying on the bed, crying in a very sensible way, so I found no difficulty in persuading her to drink the mulled wine, and then I rubbed her feet again. She now began to sob, and to say she didn't deserve to have such a husband—I was too good for her—nobody would love her. I felt encouraged to leave rubbing her feet, and take to rubbing her hands, and kiss her, begging her to tell me what was the matter. And then she fell to crying again, and sobbing; she said she couldn't tell me, for I should hate her, and she deserved to be hated, and all that sort of thing. The more she cried herself, the more penitent I became, and was on the point of making a clean breast, and asking her forgiveness; but luckily, I did no such thing, for, after sobbing, the secret came out. Captain Bowline had brought home to his wife a Cashmere shawl, and I had only brought her a silk dress. "Is that all!" I exclaimed, and I kissed her as heartily as ever a woman was kissed before. And now 'twas my turn to complain, to tell her how unkind she had been to keep me in such suspense all the while, and then came her turn to put her arms around my neck, and to kiss me, and beg to be forgiven. All which, I assure you, was a very agreeable winding up of the scene.

I was not long in discovering the whole secret of my wife's grievances. She thought I didn't love her as much as Captain Tom loved his wife, because I brought China silks from Canton, instead of an India shawl; but I explained to her that Cashmere shawls came from one part of the world, and silks from another; but these women believe that shawls are made everywhere beyond the seas.

Now, every woman has her Napoleon Bonaparte, and my wife's was Mrs. Tom Bowline, and the thought of being outshone by her, at church, had caused all this commotion, now so happily ended in a clearing-up shower. I told my wife her wishes should be gratified as soon as ever I had it in my power to do so, and intended that this should be done as soon as ever I could find a shawl to my mind.

By dinner time my wife was dressed, and as we sat down to dinner, she looked as happy as a bride, and as for myself, I never was happier in my life. My wife's sister looked on with astonishment, and I was surprised to see, for the first time, that my wife spoke to her with a little tinge of sharpness. I had reason to believe, afterward, that my wife, hearing our loud talking, had come to the head of the stairs and overheard us. It was one of those few instances in which listeners hear good things of themselves; and resulted in my wife's sister finding the house too hot for her; so she married herself to a saddler, and removed to Babylon.

But to go on with my story; the next day my wife and I set out for Babylon, she to have her China silks made up, and as for myself, I really had no other business than to accompany her, and to buy a shawl, which should outshine Mrs. Tom Bowline's. Fortunately, I found my old friend Briggs, of Salem, in from Calcutta with a half dozen magnificent shawls, of which he allowed me to take my pick, at cost price, and a bill made out at any price I pleased to have affixed. So I modestly told him he might receipt a bill for one at seven hundred and fifty dollars, for which I paid him three hundred. This I had safely stowed away in my trunk as a coat I had been buying. I purchased, beside, a fine satin bonnet with a plume that dropped down on her shoulder in the most bewitching style, and she was perfectly delighted with her visit. We remained in town a week, when her silks came home from the milliner's. Her dresses were just as she liked to have them; a most rare thing, I can tell you, and as to the bonnet, no language could express her admiration of it. And so we reached home on Saturday night, perfectly well pleased with every thing in the house and out of it.

The next day was rather a bright and frosty day, and my wife, dressed in her beautiful bonnet and rich silk dress, certainly looked charming. She had a pretty fur cape on, and with a sweet smile, said, "Now, dear, let's go, for the bell is tolling." You must know my wife never goes into church too soon, but just before the minister commences his prayers. "Why, my dear, where's your shawl?" "Oh! I don't need a shawl to-day." "But, love, just please me, and wear one;" she was for an instant a little displeased, but quelling the feeling, she ran up stairs, and there lay my splendid present on her bureau. She came running down with it on her arm, and throwing her arms around my neck, burst into tears. As I knew these tears did her good, I let her cry them out, and as soon as they could be dried away, she put on her shawl, found it all right, and, though I say it, there was never a finer looking nor a happier woman in the world, than my wife at that moment.

We walked up to the head of the broad aisle, in presence of the whole congregation, to our pew, next to the minister's, and it would have done your heart good to have heard her sweet, clear, ringing voice, making the responses; she seemed especially desirous that all the congregation should know what a miserable sinner she was, and how, "she had done the things she ought not to have done;" and when the service was over, she had a kind word for every one, especially was she anxious for the health of Mrs. Bowline, and all her children, and on the church steps she lingered to speak to all her neighbors, high and low, far and near; so it was pretty well advertised, before we got home, that my wife had a splendid shawl, the prettiest bonnet, and the richest silk dress ever seen in the parish. As for poor Mrs. Tom Bowline, her dinner was spoilt for one day. Nor was she the only woman made miserable by my wife's finery. Many an old cloak and shawl, which in the morning was thought good enough to last another winter, was now taken off with a feeling of absolute loathing. The wives of all the parish praised me to their husbands, as "such a kind man," "one who loved to see his wife look like somebody;" and the daughters teased their fathers for new bonnets and shawls, so that I was abundantly abused on all hands, by the men for spending all my money on my wife's back; and when the secret leaked out what my wife's shawl cost, for I took care to hide Brigg's bill were my wife was sure to find it, the admiration of the women, and the contempt of the men, rose to the highest pitch. One thing is certain—never had the parish church worn such a fashionable air before as it did that winter. "Now," said the Captain, with a thump on the table that made the glasses dance, "there's my method of treating women with the hysterics. And I will give you, sir," addressing the priest, "the exact proportions of spice to be put into a pint of wine, and in your next edition of Conjugal Love, I beg you will put it in as Captain Weatherfield's Remedy. Women will sometimes be cross-grained; it can't be helped! but instead of breaking up all the relations of husband and wife, mother and child, the most terrible of calamities, let everybody try my prescription—a pint of mulled wine taken warm on going to bed, and a Cashmere shawl in the morning—and I pledge you my life it will work wonders. There never need be another divorce on that score—don't you think so?" said the Captain, turning briskly to Peter.—[Peter Schlemil in America.]

DEATH-BED OF JACOB BOEHMEN.

BY REV. R. S. BROOKE.

"And thus I shadow out the enthusiast mystic of the first sort—viz: the harmless species; at the head of which stand the illuminated Teutonic Theosopher Jacob Boehmen." SAMUEL T. COLERIDGE.

The circumstances attending the death of this great philosophic mystic of the sixteenth century, are faithfully detailed in the following lines.

WHEN, within the walls of Gorlitz, the Teutonic mystic lay,
Circled by his weeping dear ones, watching till he passed away:
When, with coming death contending, the reluctant flame of life,
Leaping in its silver socket, scarce maintained the dubious strife.

It was daybreak, and the crimson of the purple skies had come,
Like a spirit, through the lattice, flushing all the sick man's room—
Lighting up his bright features, calm as marble sculpture-wrought,
With something like their former tone of life and lofty thought.

Broader, brighter broke the morning, and the crimson hues are gone;
And, blazing all with gems and gold, upheaves God's glorious sun;
Was it this that stayed the life-tides, as they slowly ebbed away?
Was it this that checked the spirit ere it soared to endless Day?

And the dying man upspoke and said: "Ope the door, that I may hear
That soft music which is ringing wild and sweet within my ear.
Hear you not that strain excelling? Blessed sound! it sinks and falls—
Oh, Lord of Hosts, 'tis thy still voice which to my spirit calls!

"Oh! strength of Love—oh! Life of death—my God, 'above this hour Lift me. Oh, Saviour, strong the waves, but stronger is thy power!"
Then to the wall he turned his face. "Now I go hence," he cried,
"To paradise to meet my Lord." And simply thus he died.

And was it not a marvel in such an hour to see
How God did loose the fetters of his mind's long phantasy?
How one like him, so over-wrought, who had leaped beyond all rules,
To plunge in depths untrod alike by sages and by fools—

"Rapt in the holy Sabbath"—"trod the center and the ground Of man's hidden nature"—"shadowed over with a mystery profound"— "Heard the tones, and felt the touch of God"—"in seven day's vision dim Saw the Spirit throned in thousand lights"—"held his peace, and worshiped Him."

To think that such a mind and man, on this his dying day,
Like a river issuing bright and swift from weeds which clogged its way,
Heard but the Heavenly Shepherd's voice, as the vale he trod,
Then laid him down like some dear child, and slept, to wake with God.

NOTE.—For a picture of Boehmen's extraordinary and interesting mind, the reader is referred to Coleridge's exquisite "Parable" in the "Aids of Reflection," and under the head of "Mystics and Mysticism."

THE WAR OF MIND.

MAN is doomed to fight in some mode or other for ever. When the sword is sheathed, the tongue is unsheathed; and when the tongue is at rest, the pen is engaged. But war, like everything else in nature, is susceptible of refinement, and by means of the application of a series of polishes, the thing which in its rude and natural state is a great and unmixed evil, may actually become the source of the most exquisite enjoyment.

There can be no enjoyment to a mind of any refinement in the physical conflicts of the field of battle, nor can there be any satisfaction derived by such a mind from the railing and abusive controversies of bigotry in politics or religion; for enmity reigns supreme over these arenas of contention, and the defeat, the death, the ruin, the confusion, and misery of the vanquished, constitute the glory and happiness of the conqueror. But yet we must not be too hasty in condemning the principle of battle in the abstract, for it is easy to conceive the possibility of deriving both benefit and instruction, health and enjoyment of mind and body, from the amicable conflicts of generous and enlightened friends on the field of physical and intellectual emulation, discussion, and controversy. The principle of contention must not be condemned, but only the abuse of it. The principle of everything is right, and lasts for ever; and the evil modification of the principle alone is that which may or can be annihilated. Heaven itself may be represented as the scene of active controversy on the mysteries of Nature for ever, but of controversy refined and beautified by the laws of good manners, and by the generous impulses of a liberal and an enlightened spirit. But such wars and such controversies as we have at present, are merely manifestations of the evil aspect of the principle which they represent—the principle of action and reaction, which is the soul of society.

The evils of controversy are everywhere developed in this world, for the subject matter is intimately mixed up with the overwhelming interests of a selfish and an unsocial existence, which open or shut the eyes or the ears of men to the truths or opinions that float about in society, in proportion as the reception of them is likely to influence the pecuniary or social condition of the thinker. A rich nobleman does not think of becoming a charlatan; because by so doing he loses caste, or social rank, and, moreover, gives encouragement to a doctrine subversive of his own interests. For corresponding reasons, a poor handloom weaver cannot hold the opinions of the rich nobleman. Controversy between two such men, therefore, is interminable. It is not pure controversy, not the controversy that leads to the discovery of truth; for the ears and eyes of both parties being partially shut, the truth can never be perceived by either. They are both blind of an eye. Hence the tendency to fight with physical weapons, when an opportunity occurs. If both eyes and ears were opened, the necessity for the use of physical weapons would be superseded.

The case of a Roman and a Protestant Christian is precisely analogous. The one will not hear the other. Their ears are stopped; neither will yield one jot or tittle; and in the heat of intellectual battle, they very often deny that there is any truth or goodness whatever on the other side. This uncharitable antagonism would be exceedingly amusing in monkeys, but it is frightful in men; for the very sight of it alone, independent of the subject matter of debate, is sufficient to show that the controversy is interminable. Set John of Tuam on the one side, and Hugh McNeile on the other, to discuss a great question of Christian doctrine, and the result is the same as putting equal weights in the scale of a balance. The ears and eyes of both are shut. A sectarian cannot see a truth in direct opposition to his own church; or, if he do, he feels conscientiously bestirred to question it, to evade it, to modify it, to clip it, to prune it, to dress it up in his own livery, and send it out against his opponent. The controversy thus becomes a display of ingenuity—in paring, and clipping, and dressing up truths and errors to make them conform, or not conform, as the argument demands. This is not pure controversy. There can be no such thing until the ears and eyes of men are opened.—[English Periodical.]

TRAGEDY at first was nothing more than a song, sung at certain festivals; and even among the English it was at one time used to designate any narration that had an unhappy ending, or was of a serious nature.

MY BOYHOOD'S HAPPY HOME.

ONCE more I tread the much-loved spot,
Where I in youth have play'd;
And see the well-known fields again,
O'er which so oft I've stray'd.
Glad welcome sounds on every hand,
But yet I'm dull and sad;
Something, alas! is wanting still
To make my heart feel glad.

The quaint old church looks still the same,
The parson's house is here;
The mill is turning as of old,
The stream still flows as clear.
But where are they that watched o'er me,
That soothed me into rest;
And first instilled the holy word
Into my youthful breast?

Yes, where are they? Can they be gone,
While all the rest remain?
'Tis true—upon a fresh tombstone
I trace the hallowed name!
My bosom swells with grief, as o'er
The sacred spot I roam;
The tie is gone which binds me to
My boyhood's happy home.

AMERICAN SOCIETY.

THERE is very little in America of what we understand by acquaintanceship. Intercourse leads to friendship, or it leads to nothing, it being contrary to an American's nature to feel indifferent, and yet look cordial. Having none of the sympathies, he has none of the antipathies of class; his circle is his country; and in that circle, admitting of no superiors, he sees none but equals. Not but that there are in America many who are superior, in the share which they possess of all the conventional ingredients of a gentleman, to the great bulk of their countrymen, and to whom cultivated society is more grateful than that which is rude and undisciplined. The distinction of polish and refinement is all the difference that is discernible on the surface of American society, there being no exclusiveness of feeling, or isolation of sympathy concealed beneath a polished exterior. The American is first and essentially an American, and then a gentleman: with him refinement is not the enamel which conceals what is beneath, but the polish which brings out the real grain, exhibiting him in a better light, but ever in the same character. I have often been struck with the readiness with which the ease and frankness characteristic of American intercourse have led parties to an unreserved interchange of views and sentiments, although they might have come from the most remote parts of the country, and had never seen each other before. How can it be otherwise, when the Georgian can put himself at once into the position of the Missourian, and the resident of Louisiana find in himself the counterpart of the inhabitant of Maine? It is this ease of manner which so frequently offends the stranger, who does not comprehend its origin; that which is the natural result of the universality of feeling and sympathy in America, is regarded as an impudent liberty with us, when a member of one class dares to address one of another in those terms of familiarity which nothing but a community of interest and sentiment can render tolerable. An American can be as reserved as any body else, when he comes in contact with one whom he does not understand, or who will not understand him; and this is the reason why so many travelers in America, who forget to leave their European notions of exclusiveness at home, and traverse the republic wrapped in the cloak of European formalism, find the Americans so cold in their demeanor, and erroneously regard their particular behavior to themselves as the result of a general moodiness and reserve.—[The Western World, by A. Mackay.]

On one occasion La Fayette resigned the command of the National Guard, and entered an evening party in the dress of a private. "What, general!" exclaimed the guests, "we thought you were commander of the National Guard?" "Oh!" said he, "I was tired of obeying, and therefore entered the ranks of the privates."

CULTIVATION OF TASTE.

I CANNOT help taking notice of an opinion which many persons entertain, as if the taste were a separate faculty of the mind, and distinct from the judgment and imagination: a species of instinct by which we are struck naturally, and at the first glance, without any previous reasoning, with the excellencies or the defects of a composition. So far as the imagination and the passions are concerned, I believe it true that the reason is little consulted; but where disposition, where decorum, where congruity are concerned—in short, wherever the best taste differs from the worst, I am convinced that the understanding operates, and nothing else; and its operations are in reality far from being always sudden, or when they are sudden, they are often far from being right. Men of the best taste, by consideration, come frequently to change their early precipitate judgment, which the mind, from its aversion to neutrality and doubt, loves to form on the spot. It is known that the taste (whatever it is) is improved exactly as we improve our judgments, by extending our knowledge, by a steady attention to our object, and by frequent exercise. They who have not taken these methods, if their taste decides quickly, it is always uncertainly; and their quickness is owing to their presumption and rashness, and not to any sudden irradiation that in a moment dispels all darkness from their minds. But they who have cultivated that species of knowledge which makes the object of taste, by degrees and habitually, attain not only a soundness, but a readiness of judgment, as men do by the same methods on all other occasions. At first they are obliged to spell, but at last they read with ease and with celerity; but this celerity of its operation is no proof that the taste is a distinct faculty. Nobody, I believe, has attended the course of a discussion which turned upon matters within the sphere of mere naked reason, but must have observed the extreme readiness with which the whole process of the argument is carried on, the grounds discovered, the objections raised and answered, and the conclusions drawn from premises, with a quickness altogether as great as the taste can be supposed to work with; and yet where nothing but plain reason either is or can be suspected to operate. To multiply principles for every different appearance is useless, and unphilosophical too in a high degree.—[Burke.]

ERROR RESPECTING EATING FRUIT.

IN the last quarterly return on the state of public health, some notice is taken of the common notion that dysentery, and other diseases of the sort, are occasioned at this season by eating fruit. That it is an error, is established by the fatality of these diseases to infants at the breast, to the aged, to persons in prison and public institutions, who procure no fruit, and by many such facts as the following, reported about the middle of the last century by Sir John Pringle in his classical account of the diseases of the campaign in Germany:—Nearly half the men were ill or had recovered from dysentery a few weeks after the battle of Dettingen, which was fought on the 27th of June, 1743. The dysentery, the constant and fatal epidemic of camps, began sooner this season than it did in any succeeding campaign. Now, as the usual time of its appearance is not before the latter end of the summer or the beginning of autumn, the cause has been unjustly imputed to eating fruit to excess. But the circumstances here contradict that opinion; for this sickness began and raged before any fruit was in season except strawberries (which, from their high price, the men never tasted,) and ended about the time the grapes were ripe; which, growing in open vineyards, were freely eaten by everybody. To this add the following incident. Three companies of Howard's regiment, which had not joined us, marched with the king's baggage from Ostend to Hanau, where, arriving a night or two before the battle, and having orders to stop, encamped for the first time at a small distance from the ground that was afterwards occupied by the army. These men had never been exposed to rain or lain wet; by this separation from the line they were also removed from the contagion of the privies; and having pitched close upon the river, they had the benefit of a constant stream of fresh air. By means of such favorable circumstances, it was remarkable that, while the main body suffered greatly, this little camp almost entirely escaped, though the men breathed the same air, the contagious part excepted, ate the same victuals, and drank the same water. This immunity continued for six weeks, until the army removed from Hanau, when these companies joined the rest, and encamping in the line, were at last infected, but suffered little, as the flux was then so much on the decline. Fruit, potatoes, and green vegetables are essential parts of the food of man; and it is only when taken to excess that, like other articles of diet, they disorder the stomach.

A MEDICINE AGAINST DROWSINESS.—In an excursion made in the winter of 1702-3, from St. John's to the Bay of Bulls, Captain (the late General) Skinner forming one of the party, we had, on our return, to cross a large lake, over the ice, some miles in extent. When about the middle, Captain Skinner informed me that he had long been severely pinched by the cold, and found an irresistible drowsy fit coming on. I urged him to exertion, representing the fatal consequences of giving way to this feeling, and pointing out the state in which his wife and family would be found should the party arrive at St. John's without him. These thoughts roused him to exertion for some time; but, when he had reached the margin of the lake, he gave way, and declared he was utterly unable to struggle further, delivering at the same time, what he considered his dying message to his family. As there happened to be some bushes near the spot, I broke off a branch, and began to thrash my fellow-traveler with it; at first, without much apparent effect, but, at length, I was delighted to find that my patient winced under my blows, and at length grew angry. I continued the application of the stick until he made an effort to get up and retaliate. He was soon relieved from the torpor, and, as we were now but a few miles from St. John's, I pushed on before the party, leaving the captain under their especial care. I left, also, the stick, with strong injunctions that it should be smartly applied in the event of the drowsiness returning. I soon reached the town, and had some warm porter, with spice, prepared against the arrival of my friends; with this and considerable friction he was enabled to proceed home, where he arrived, perfectly recovered. He himself related the story at the Earl of St. Vincent's table, at Gibraltar, many years afterward, expressing at the same time, much gratitude for the beating he had received.—[Memoirs of Rear-Admiral Sir J. J. Brenton.]

FINE CRITICISM.—Endymion is an ecstatic dream of poetry—a flush—a fever—a burning light—an involuntary outpouring of the spirit of poetry, that will not be controlled. Its movements are the starts and boundings of the young horse before it has felt the bit; the first flight of the young bird, feeling and exulting in the powers with which it is gifted, but not yet acquainted with their use or extent. It is the wanderings of the butterfly in the first hour of its birth, not as yet knowing one flower from another, but only that all are flowers. Its similitudes come crowding upon us from delightful things. It is the May-day of poetry, the flush of blossoms and weeds that start up at the first voice of spring. It is the skylark's hymn to the daybreak, involuntarily gushing forth as he mounts upward to look for the fountain of that light which has awakened him. It is as if the Muses had steeped their child in the waters of Castaly, and we beheld him emerging from them, with his eyes sparkling and his limbs quivering with the delicious intoxication, and the precious drops scattered from him into the air at every motion, glittering in the sunshine, and casting the colors of the rainbow on all things around.

An equivocation is worse than a lie, for it is a lie guarded.

GAZETTE AND RULE.

Friendship, Love and Truth.

AUG. C. L. ARNOLD, EDITOR.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1849.

TRAIN UP A CHILD IN THE WAY HE SHOULD GO.

WE, some months since, had a conversation with Prof. Lewis, touching the education and discipline of children, when he advanced some very strange doctrines. Mr. Lewis is well known as the Greek Professor in the New-York University, and editor of a volume of the Platonic writings, published two or three years ago in this city. We had never seen the Professor before, but held him in high esteem, on account of his supposed acquaintance with, and love of the distinguished sage of ancient Greece.

We had supposed the Professor to be a man of progress—of enlarged and liberal views of things, and far more likely to live in the future than the past. We were disappointed; and the peculiar and wild thoughts of Mr. Lewis, particularly on the subject of the government of children, are an anomaly in this age.

The Professor insists that in the government of children, we should go back to the old Hebrew customs, and punish filial disobedience with death. According to him the world has made no advancement on the past, but has rather retrograded; that the liberality, generosity and mercy which have been blended with the laws and institutions of modern civilization, are rather to be condemned than approved; and that the sanguinary and barbarous laws of the ancient world are precisely what degenerate society needs to-day. "Let one child," said the Professor, "who disobeys his parents, be punished with death by our laws, and what a salutary effect would be produced? What terror would it strike through the hearts of disobedient children, and with how much greater ease would the filial government be carried on?"

This is, no doubt, a horrible and infernal doctrine, and few will believe that any man in this enlightened age could be found who would hazard the utterance of such an abhorrent sentiment. But while we reprobate this doctrine as unchristian and savage, will it not be well for us to consider whether our modern notions on the government of children are not also excessive and extreme in the other direction? If the theory of Professor Lewis is cruel and horrible, the prevailing "moral suasion" doctrines bid fair to leave no parental government at all.

Children have no reason, and consequently must be governed by force. Just as soon as a parent begins to reason with his child, he loses his authority and power to govern. The child should believe the parent infallible; and the parent, on his part, should give no reason whatever for his command, but insist on its being obeyed, without question and without hesitation. And all this may be done without severity—without unkindness, and without a harsh word. A gentle and firm hand is all that is requisite.

A child who is always taught to regard the command of its parent as absolute and final, will rely with more confidence on the parent's judgment, and trust more confidently to his benevolence, and will love him with a devotion and intensity which will always secure obedience. Hence we find that those parents only have loving and obedient children, who govern absolutely, and by force; while the children of the "moral suasionists" are generally disobedient, and without filial affection.

While, therefore, we reject Professor Taylor Lewis' theory with horror, we are by no means ready to go to the opposite extreme of no government. The family is no doubt the foundation of government, and the authority of the parent is the basis of the authority of the State. In other words, the government of the State will always be the reflex of that of the families composing it. Indeed, the whole superstructure of the State is based and rests upon the family. See the importance, then, of having the family government right. The training of children, therefore, is the most important subject which can engage our attention and command our consideration. To have a well regulated household should be the highest ambition of a parent. There is no spectacle so beautiful and lovely as that which is presented by dutiful, loving and obedient children. They make home a paradise. The father's foot-fall, as he returns from his business, is hailed with exclamations of joy, and his appearance is greeted with embraces and kisses. "Happy is the home which is in such a case"—happy are those children who recognise the absolute authority of the parent.

HEALTH-INSURANCE AND ODD-FELLOWSHIP.

THE Boston Odd-Fellow, of last week, has the following judicious remarks, which, we need not say, meet our entire approval. It has long been our opinion that these health-insurance companies were little better than public swindlers:

"THE TABLES TURNED.—One of the greatest hindrances to the progress of Odd-Fellowship, for the last two years, has been the rise and multiplication of Health Insurance Offices. These have offered greater apparent inducements, on the score of pecuniary benefits, than the Order of Odd-Fellows could afford; thus many who would have joined our Order have been deterred, and benefits accruing from mere health insurance, have been sought at the sacrifice of the richer advantages connected with a social and charitable institution, spread over a large part of the world. But the experiment has been tried, and health insurance has not given satisfaction. The policies issued have been next to worthless to the holders, because the offices, which are generally managed by the meanest men in the community, are so reluctant at paying losses, that those who are justly entitled to them, abandon their claims rather than to contend for them. Such is the feeling in many neighborhoods where health insurance was quite popular a year ago, that an agent of one of these humbugging, sponging concerns, would be hissed at as he passed by, and he might think himself fortunate to escape without riding on a wooden horse.

"The inquiry now is 'what does Odd-Fellowship promise?' The answer is at the tongue's end of every intelligent member of our Order. 'It promises and secures, for the same amount of premium, advantages vastly superior to any other provident institution.' In the first place there are the social benefits, those to be derived from an extended and select acquaintance. In the second, the watchful care of brothers in sickness, and in health. Then there are the weekly benefits to the sick, and the provisions made for funeral charges, and care of widows and orphans of deceased members. Odd-Fellowship promises and performs this, while health insurance companies only promise to pay a weekly allowance to a person insured, providing he can prove that he never was sick till the time he took out his policy, and that he was down sick and no mistake, during the time for which he claims damages. There are so many ifs and ands, so many doctor's certificates, and in short, so many holes to creep out of, that it may be safely said, that the health insurance does not perform the little which it does promise. The public begin to understand it so, and to appreciate the vastly superior merits of Odd-Fellowship."

ODD-FELLOWSHIP AT FINESVILLE, N. J.—On Thursday, the 5th inst., we made a visit to Finesville, and attended a public meeting of the Order in the evening. This little village is pleasantly situated among the hills in the valley of the Delaware, and depends chiefly on manufacturing. The Lodge consists of about forty members, and appears to be in a good condition. The brethren are intelligent and active, full of zeal, and desirous of doing their part in the great work of Odd-Fellowship. We put up at the hotel of Bro. Hagen, where we also enjoyed the pleasant society of Bro. Dr. John Leavitt. The lecture was well attended, and the audience listened with much apparent interest.

CHARITY AS CONNECTED WITH ODD-FELLOWSHIP.

An Address delivered before Lackawanna Lodge No. 238, I. O. O. F., Rondout, Feb. 13, 1849.

THE few remarks I intend to make will be confined to the two questions:

1. What is charity? 2. How is it to be understood in our Order?

The word Charity, in a general sense, means love, benevolence, good will; that disposition of heart which inclines men to think favorably of their fellow men, and do them good. Accompany this disposition with an active desire to promote their happiness, and you have benevolence; add to both the affections of your heart, and you possess brotherly love.

Of all the virtues that humanity and the spirit of our institution demand of an Odd-Fellow, none is more easy in its practice, and hence none more generally noticed by the community at large, than charity. What is easier for a man than to divide, here and there, a small portion of his substance with the poor and needy—a portion which otherwise would, perhaps, be spent to less useful purposes?

But is this, by itself, virtue? We might be charitable to rid ourselves of an importunate intruder—give, as a kind of ransom, for the momentary good feeling awakened in our bosom, by the sight of misery and distress; we throw our mite to them more for our than their sakes. This is not true charity. Often, too, men are charitable because they are rich; and it leads them to think mightily well of themselves—how happy they are, compared with this or that poor man—how little a few dollars will affect their easy circumstances. Now this class of benefactors care little whom they benefit with their charity; worthy or unworthy subject is all one to them. This is not true charity. Again, many give because, in these days of progress and civilization, a man dare not be hard-hearted toward the poor, without exposing himself to censure and disrepute in community. It is fear that stimulates them to be charitable, not love; it is to public opinion that they make a sacrifice, rather than to the poor. The giving of a shilling is so little, but to refuse the shilling might injure them; hence almost everybody is more or less inclined to charity. But such is not true charity.

Be not deceived, brethren, with many that act charitably. It is more a matter of good breeding than a virtue. Their standing and relation in society is the main mover of their deeds; the spirit of true charity never entered their bosoms. Be not deceived, brethren. It is too true that our actions, as a body, are often better than ourselves; that at times we are charitable and generous, without possessing the true spirit of those virtues; hence Christ prized the poor widow's penny higher than all the gold of the Pharisees.

Charity becomes a virtue only when our willingness to give springs from an inward participation in the misfortunes of the needy and the afflicted; and at the same time it be applied to a worthy subject, with the intention to relieve, or at least alleviate his sufferings as much as it is in our power so to do.

But our good will and charitable deeds require one more caution. In order to be truly charitable we must spare no pains to learn how our gifts may be applied to the best advantage, and to do the most good, i. e., in the distribution of our gifts we must be prudent and wise, for there is danger that any virtue practiced without prudence and wisdom may do more harm than good.

True charity, my brethren, has her seat within the heart; she is planted there by our Creator, as one of those nobler sentiments, the exercise of which elevates man to his proper sphere, and not only makes him social and humane, but yields him peace and happiness. She is one of the main sources from which spring all the nobler sentiments of the human race.

A selfish man may be inoffensive, but he will never be truly charitable as long as he is selfish. He may quiet his conscience, that in paying his poor tax he has done all that is necessary for the support of the poor; while perhaps he knows that in the next house an honest, yet timid family are in want of bread, and he heeds them not. Let us compare such a man with the truly benevolent philanthropist at the close of their respective daily avocations; the one making an idol of his own dear self, the other, humble and lowly, thanking his Creator that on that very day, perhaps, he was enabled to do good to his fellow man without ostentation and outward show. Will not the angel of peace watch over his couch, lest some malignant spirit poison his holy pursuit at the next rising sun?

Without true charity no other virtue is possible. Its practice and meaning, while they are laudable and necessary, should be distinctly understood by all, but more especially by an Odd-Fellow.

Now there is no government in the world without some law or other to protect the poor. There is no man, whether rich or poor, who does not desire, nay, feel proud of the name to be called charitable and benevolent. But it is evident, and generally admitted that all the laws a government can make in relation to the poor, are inadequate and insufficient to the purpose. The difficulty is mainly this: that no civil law can ever find the point where to establish the line between the worthy and the unworthy sufferer—between the timid and the bold. He who, by misfortune or disease, is thrown on the public charity, is likely to meet in the poor-house a companion whom he would have shunned in society, as a man void of principle, enslaved to his passions and appetite, which reduced him to want. There is something degrading in this, to which a good man, though poor, will not submit; and rather than share the society of the wicked, he will not ask the county for support, but stay at home, if he has a home, and suffer; and where is the civil law to relieve him, over and above ten dollars? This picture needs no argument to establish its reality. Look around you, brethren, and you may find similar cases, perhaps in your immediate neighborhood.

But if civil law is inadequate to the wants of the poor, the needy and the afflicted, then must the philanthropist step in and supply the deficiency. This maxim was true centuries ago, and hence we find at the remotest state of civilization, benevolent societies of divers casts and names, but all resting on one and the same basis, which is, "that my fellow man shall not suffer if I can prevent it." As the race increased, so did the institutions of benevolence, and among them stands conspicuous the Order of Odd-Fellowship, almost generally acknowledged as an institution elevating in its principles, moral in its tendency, prominent in its efficiency, and tried in its expediency. A true Odd-Fellow must be charitable and benevolent; and this leads me to the second question prefacing these remarks: "How is it to be understood in our Order?"

Ours is a happy lot, my brethren. The good we intend is not based on selfish motives or narrow abstractions. We do not discuss or practice charity on utilitarian principles. We don't ask where a man is borne before we assist him in distress; our motto is, "First our brother, next the whole world."

Be it ever far from us, that false charity that only gives to be noticed. Never shall the truly needy be sent away from an Odd-Fellow's door without help; and while it is our duty to assist a brother in distress, we are morally bound to extend our munificence and bounty to our fellow men to the best of our abilities; and the reward will for ever dwell in our own conscience.

The wise and good of former ages have gained the admiration of the world by their noble deeds; but none were ever truly great, if charity and benevolence were not the primary movers of their actions. A retrospective view of the history of the past gives us the most striking proofs, that without the practice of charity no nation ever prospered, no man was ever truly happy. If a man be not charitable, he must be selfish—if he be not benevolent, and cares nothing for the welfare of his fellow men, he must be proud. There is no medium between the two. I have said that without the practice of charity no nation ever prospered, no man was ever truly happy. Can any one read the writings of our immortal Washington without being convinced of this fact; without being filled with esteem and veneration for the father of his country? Every word, every sentence, breathes the spirit of love and charity. To free his beloved country, his oppressed fellow citizens, from the absolutism of a foreign king, to render them free, happy and prosperous, with the least possible sacrifice of human life—this was his aim, and after he so gloriously attained it, he retires from the scene, ever continuing his charitable deeds in humble retirement.

It is not my place to expound the life of a Washington, but I would merely point at him as the greatest model of a virtuous man known in history since the time of Christ. And let me tell you, that for the observer of the human character, one fact remains incontrovertible, and too clear to admit of dispute; that his spirit still lives within the heart of this people—and may it never die, that spirit of charity so successfully engrafted in their bosoms, and in a great measure is due, by the grace of Almighty God, the unparalleled prosperity of this infant nation.

But while we profess before the world that charity is one of the main attributes of our Order, is it not our duty to make it manifest by our deeds? should we not, must we not act accordingly, or fall? What can be thought of a man who professes one thing and doeth another—who blows hot and blows cold, in one breath—who receives you in his arms with the fashionable phrase, "O, my dear friend, how happy I am to see you!" while to himself, he says, "I wish you were in China!" Should you ever meet with such a character, would it not strike you at once that he had never entered an Odd-Fellows' hall? and if he did, he is an unworthy member.

Within these walls we are told that charity is one of the main features of our Order. So it is; but it is not all, and the mere practice of it, without the true moving cause, is not sufficient, and, apt to degenerate, our Order demands that we should understand the moving cause, the why and wherefore, and what is it. Let us reason for a moment. It is a self-evident truth, believed by all, that man was created to be happy, and to render others happy—created to do good. No one ever denies this. We, collectively, like any other religious and benevolent institution, are summoned to do our share in the great work of ameliorating mankind; we have all voluntarily assumed this responsibility, hence we must be charitable and humane, not because the cause demands it, not because others are, not because of an expected reward, but because it has become our imperative duty, because we are initiated in the purity of its motives, because we cannot be worthy Odd-Fellows without being charitable men; and thus, my brethren, I understand charity, as connected with our Order.

A certain man once went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, who stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead; and by chance, first a certain Priest, and then a Levite, came also down that way. Both saw the helpless sufferer, covered with blood, but they passed on the other side of the road, and went their way and left him.

Now let us pause for a moment, and ask who were the Priests and Levites of those days? They were the officers of the Jewish Church; they considered themselves the very perfection of human society; in their conceit, none were holy and good but they. From the high position which many of them so unworthily occupied, they looked down on their fellow-men, as being their inferiors, treated them with contempt, and called them corrupt and wicked.

Vice, like virtue, is contagious; and while the spirit of a Washington has descended to us, in the full rays of its splendor, so the spirit of the Levite is, spider-like, creeping its way to, alas! too many little souls. They are those that style themselves the exclusives; and, comparatively few as they are in numbers, they never have been the friends of Odd-Fellows.

But the whole story is not told yet. We left the poor man half dead, by the wayside. Soon after this Priest and Levite had passed by, without tendering him their sympathy and aid, not even a word of consolation, behold, there came a Samaritan, a stranger, one of the sect of the city of Samaria; and when he saw the wounded, he had compassion on the man. He went and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him; and on the morrow, before he parted, he left money with the host, and said, "Take care of him, and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I return I will repay thee."

Need I tell you which of the three travelers was the Odd-Fellow, if not in name yet in the spirit? Our Saviour tells us, "Go thou and do likewise."

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF ODD-FELLOWS. -CIRCULAR.

To the I. O. of O. F. of the City of New-York:

BRETHREN: WE herewith transmit you a copy of the CONSTITUTION of the ODD-FELLOWS' LIBRARY, recently adopted by a Convention of your Representatives. Books of subscription will soon be opened and circulated, when it is confidently expected that most of the Odd-Fellows in this city will enter their names, and press our noble enterprise forward with earnest zeal.

We suppose that the subscription—i. e. the entrance fee of Fifty Cents each—will amount to nearly five thousand dollars, which sum will give the Institution an excellent start; while the annual dues of Fifty Cents will be ample for the future exigencies of the Library.

We cannot but hope, nay, we believe that every brother in this city will become a member of this Library, and thus be entitled to all its privileges. The price of admission is exceedingly small, as are also the annual dues, so that the poorest of our members can have access to it. It will be to them an intellectual treasure, more valuable than silver and gold, at which they can always apply, and whence they can draw a fund of enjoyment and solid peace, of which no reverses can rob them.

A LIBRARY, extensive and cheap, like the one we propose, will be invaluable to our Order. A great majority of the Odd-Fellows of this city are young men, and not a few of them are mechanics, who need the means of intellectual culture. The Library, with its books and popular lectures, is precisely what will supply this need. Its rooms will be a favorite place of resort. Hundreds, and perhaps thousands, who have now no connection with any library, and no taste for reading at all, will here acquire a relish for intellectual pursuits, and become ambitious of obtaining those mental treasures which abide for ever.

W. H. DIKEMAN, Chairman.

A. C. L. ARNOLD, Secretary.
New-York, March 28, 1849.

CONSTITUTION OF THE NEW-YORK ODD-FELLOWS' LIBRARY.

ARTICLE I.—NAME.

THE Name of this Association is the "New-York Odd-Fellows' Library."

ARTICLE II.—MEMBERSHIP.

Any Odd-Fellow belonging to any recognised Lodge, may join this Library Society, and be entitled to its privileges on paying the sum of FIFTY CENTS entrance money, and the further sum of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS semi-annually—viz: on the first of June, and the first of December of each year—but if on the first of July or the first of January of each year, any dues shall remain unpaid, the delinquent shall cease to be entitled to the aforesaid privileges, until he shall have again paid FIFTY CENTS entrance money as a new member.

unless he be excused by the Trustees on account of sickness or absence from the city.

ARTICLE III.—REPRESENTATION OF THE ORDER.

This Library shall be directed by a Board of Ten Trustees, who shall be elected by Representatives from all the Lodges in which there are subscribers. The subscribers to the Library at the last semi-annual meeting in each Lodge, shall choose Representatives as follows: Less than fifty subscribers, one Representative; over fifty and less than one hundred, two Representatives; over one hundred, three Representatives. The Representatives so chosen shall meet in Convention once a year—viz: on the second Wednesday after their election in December, to hear the Report of the last Board of Trustees, and choose a new Board. The Convention shall deliberate concerning the Library, plans for its improvement and increase, and also concerning the intellectual instruction and entertainment of Odd-Fellows, and other modes. Provided, nevertheless, that this Convention do now proceed to elect Ten Trustees to serve until the annual election.

ARTICLE IV.—GOVERNMENT.

The Government and management of the Library shall be vested in the ten Trustees chosen by the aforesaid Representatives, which Trustees shall elect one of their number Chairman and another Secretary. They shall elect a Treasurer and appoint a Librarian from the Order at large.

ARTICLE V.—SALARY.

The Librarian shall receive such yearly salary, (payable quarterly,) and give such bonds as the Trustees may determine.

ARTICLE VI.—ROOMS.

Suitable rooms shall be provided for the Library in the Odd-Fellows' Hall, if possible—one apartment being devoted to the purposes of a Reading Room—the rent of which rooms, together with other necessary expenses, shall be provided for out of the funds of the Library.

ARTICLE VII.—DUTIES OF OFFICERS.

The Chairman shall preside, and be entitled to a casting vote. The Secretary shall record the minutes of each meeting of the Trustees and Representatives, and prepare an annual statement to be presented to the Lodges, under the approval of the Trustees. The Treasurer shall give security in the sum of two thousand dollars for the safe-keeping and proper disbursement of funds, whether regularly received or by donation. He shall pay all drafts properly and legally made, and shall report each month to the Trustees the state of the Treasury.

ARTICLE VIII.—DUTIES OF LIBRARIAN.

It shall be the duty of the Librarian to take the entire charge of the Library. He shall purchase such books as are authorised or directed by the Trustees. He shall keep accurate lists of all books, pamphlets and magazines, and see that a yearly Catalogue is prepared for the use of the members. He shall also keep a record of all books presented to the Library, and the names of the donors. He shall register in a book kept in the Library, the names of all members, with their residences, and shall in no case deliver a book to any one till his name shall have been so registered. He shall carry out in minor matters, such regulations as may be made by the Trustees.

ARTICLE IX.—MEETINGS OF TRUSTEES, AND THEIR DUTIES.

The Trustees shall meet on the first Wednesday of each month for the transaction of the business of the Library. It shall be their duty to direct and authorise the purchase of books by the Librarian, and to give drafts on the Treasurer, signed by the Chairman and Secretary, in payment for the same. The ten Trustees shall constitute a Board of Direction, with full power to appropriate funds, enact by-laws, and conduct the affairs of the Library. In case any vacancy should occur, the Board shall have power to fill the same. The Trustees shall enter upon their duties immediately after their election by the Convention of Representatives.

ARTICLE X.—HONORARY MEMBERS.

Any person not a member of the Order, on being reported by the Librarian as having made a donation of Fifty Dollars, or books to that amount, shall be entitled to all the privileges of the Library as an honorary member, subject to the regulations of the Library.

ARTICLE IX.—AMENDMENTS.

No part of this Constitution shall be repealed, annulled, altered, or amended, unless a proposal in writing be submitted to the Representatives at their annual session, when, if two-thirds of the Representatives present vote in favor of the motion, it shall be adopted.

LESSONS OF LIFE.

WE have all read of the ingenious philosopher who would fain have instructed Rasselas, in the art of flying; his wings which were unable to support him in the air, were however, amply sufficient to save him from drowning when he had been precipitated into the lake. This is not a bad illustration of the folly of men, who set out in life with an egregiously erroneous estimate of their own capabilities. Many men entertain ambitious views, which their genius is insufficient to accomplish, for in the pursuit of fame, we aspire too high, and thus in our vain endeavors to grasp a shadow, we negligently forego possessing ourselves of the substantial reality. The capabilities of men are often like the wings of the philosopher, unable to realize his air drawn projects, but are still amply abundant to be an assistance to him in attaining a social position, alike honorable to himself, and serviceable to the community. Like nations, men have a destiny to fulfill, and for the most part it must be through a culpable negligence of their own interest, that they fail to attain that stand in society, to which their talents justly entitle them. In the absurdity of their vain-glory, petty intriguing politicians imagine that they possess acquisitions which would entitle them to fill the highest offices in the State; artists, sculptors, actors, all aim at being considered a great maestro, and thus they "fume and fret," and waste their time, their energies, and happiness, in the pursuit of an object, which to them, is but an ignis fatuus—a rank, and position which they do not really deserve. Let it not be supposed that these remarks apply to others than the vain-glorious aspirants for fame, and those who do not "know themselves;" far be it from us, to check by any means, the commendable exertions of those, whose views are bounded by reason and moderation; on the contrary, we deeply regret that disappointment but too often attends on their meritorious endeavors. The frustration of a man's projects, or all the "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune," should not deter him in prosecuting his social or political progress; that ill success, which men so often meet in life, should rather stimulate him to more energetic action, act as an incentive to perseverance, and mould his capabilities to the form most adapted for the eventual attainment of success.

Yet in this "battle of life," we frequently behold the finest talents unappreciated, and overwhelmed by the blighting influence of adversity, and neglect, the kindly affections of the heart scorched by the searing blast of poverty; "while the cold heart to ruin runs darkly the while." The struggles of life are oppressive, but we are all subject to the same vicissitudes of fortune, alternately prosperity or adversity, the latter should engender perseverance, and to the disappointed, we will add, struggle, hope—yes, hope on, hope for ever.

THE ORDER IN INDIANA.—A correspondent says that Columbia Lodge, No. 58, of Indiana, is in a very flourishing condition. It is composed of excellent materials, and will command the respect of the community.

Glances at Men of Seventy-six.—No. 1.

BY WINSLOW TRACY.

PATRICK HENRY.

"It is the mind that makes the body rich;
And as the sun shines through the darkest clouds,
So honor 'feareth in the meanest habits.'"

AMONG those of our proud land who have reared for themselves on the solid foundation of real merit, a fame which shall stand, a monument of glory, "amid the solitudes of time," no one has commenced lower and risen higher than Patrick Henry. In claiming for Mr. Henry this proud station, I would not detract in the least from the dearly-bought and well-deserved fame of his worthy compatriots; many of whose names appear more conspicuous on the page which records the great events of our country's history. In the hearts of their countrymen, in the thanks and plaudits of the millions who are yet to come along the track of the future, to enjoy these glorious privileges and civil liberties, there is glory and honor enough for them all. Their names have not been written in the sand, that the first gale that sweeps along the plain might bury them in oblivion. They have been interwoven with the very fabric of our free government, and can be erased only when that shall have crumbled and wasted away in the vortex of political dissolution.

The heroism of a Washington might lead a brave people to victory. The wisdom of a Jefferson direct the decisions of sage legislators; but it required the eloquence of a Henry to arouse that feeling of patriotism which prompted the heroes of Seventy-six to that soul-trying struggle for freedom. And when the American people cease to do honor to his name, we shall behold them in chains—weeping at the tomb-stone of liberty. He was the first American legislator who opposed the odious and obnoxious stamp act. When the Continental Congress had assembled, he first dared to break through the gloomy cloud of fearful anxiety which overhung that venerable body, and portrayed with unequalled skill the oppression of the colonial wrongs. He first exclaimed, the "war is inevitable; let it come." He proposed and headed the first military movement in his own native State, in support of the cause of independence. He was the first Republican Governor of the State of Virginia. Then may we not agree with America's great statesman, in saying, "Mr. Henry certainly gave the first impulse to the ball of the revolution?" That first impulse was given in a speech by Mr. Henry, in the House of Burgesses of Virginia, in which the character of the King, for the first time in America, was publicly arraigned and denounced. It was during this speech that he gave utterance to that memorable sentence, which created against him, from the minions of an arbitrary Prince, the cry of Treason! He said, "Cæsar had his Brutus, Charles I. his Cromwell, and George III. may profit by their example."

Patrick Henry is a prominent example that Greek and Latin alone do not form the man; that true greatness is native in the man, not dependent upon external conditions. At twelve years of age he was an idle fishing boy—at fifteen a clerk in a counting house—at twenty honestly delving the dusty earth with his own hands to obtain a livelihood—at twenty-four a bankrupt merchant—at twenty-seven suddenly bursting from obscurity into a rich popularity, by a bold, noble, and astonishing display of those mammoth powers of mind, which had so long remained shrouded in darkness by the mantle of his own sublime contemplation—at forty the first orator in America, and, in the language of Thomas Jefferson, "the greatest orator that ever lived."

There is something in genuine eloquence at once so supremely grand and majestic, as to constrain us to confess it the summit of human dignity. The artist may please the eye, the musician the ear, the poet the imagination, and the inspiring power of song, and the sweet melody of the vocal harp, attuned in harmonized unison, may warble forth their loftiest strains, and gratify for a while the finer feelings of our nature; but it is left to the orator to combine all these supereminent powers in thought, word, and action; for the orator to strike all the pleasure-giving chords of our beings, nature, and make them vibrate symphonies of delight to the human heart.

The cunning of logic may convince the understanding. Eloquence does more. It unlocks the human heart, unhinges obstinacy, hurls down superstition, arouses to real and engaged activity, elevates, charms, and enraptures all the ennobling energies, sways the judgment, "and shakes the human soul."

Such was the power wielded by Patrick Henry; and never was a power wielded in a better cause, and with better success. His genius was an accurate mirror of the human heart, and reflected in all its protean-like shapes and chameleon hues, which enabled him to spring the chord appropriate to the occasion, and always command the feelings of his hearers. His eloquence came from the full fountain of his understanding, and flowed in a channel far superior to the splendid decorations of art, because it was nature's own.

At times, like the limpid stream, it purred along the grassy dale, murmuring in tones of silvery sweetness; then, in comic playfulness, dashing down some little steep; then swelling into a broad stream, winding and rolling onward through beautiful woodlands and verdant landscapes, enriched by the choicest evergreens of fancy, tintured by the various colorings of passion—then making many circumlocutions, unobstructed, in the extensive field of argument—then in matchless grandeur, like the roaring cataract, with boundless force, plunging down a huge precipice, overhung with high rocks and craggy mountains, or the deep torrent, swift and irresistible, overwhelming opposition in the depths of its waters. He did not resemble the eccentric meteor, which shoots along the sky, dazzles and sinks below the horizon, but exciting our wondering curiosity. Nor did he resemble the silvery moon, effulgent with borrowed light; but like the sun, he shone with his own original luster—like that emblem of superior greatness, he ever presented the same appearance. He was always the ardent lover of liberty—the patriot, the philanthropist, and the orator. He rose with the splendor of the morning sun, illuminated an ever-glorious day, and set amid the grandeur of moral sublimity.

His motives pure—his objects noble—his achievements great—he won Liberty for his countrymen, and immortality for himself.

His last appearance in public forms an anecdote which, as related by his biographer, is illustrative of the whole man. Thinking his country needed his services as a legislator, he offered himself as a candidate in his county. As he appeared to his constituents on the morning of the election, the people thronged about him in a mass, and gazed upon him with that feeling of awe and reverence with which the great and noble benefactors of mankind are ever beheld.

A clergyman present, raising his voice in reproof against the people, said, "Why do you follow Mr. Henry about with so much adoration—he is not a god, but a man."

Mr. Henry replied with a pathos which suffused all to tears who heard him. "No, no, indeed, my friend, I am not a god, but a poor worm of the dust, as fleeting and unsubstantial as the shadow of the cloud that floats over your field—it disappears, and is remembered no more for ever."

THINGS IN MOBILE, ALA.

MOBILE, March 26th, 1849.

WITHIN the past ten days we have had all the gradations in our weather, from "Summer's heat to Winter's cold." Ten days ago summer had commenced in earnest. Ice cream, sodas, and ginger pop were all the rage. White hats and thin clothes were the fashion. To-day the tender bud of hope puts forth, to-morrow it blossoms, but the third day there comes a frost, a killing frost, and out it down. Now over-coats and furs are comfortable; ice cream and soda have taken their departure for a time, and hot whiskies are again in vogue. We have had a slight frost for two nights, but not enough to injure fruit. Notwithstanding the cold, however, we have green peas, cucumbers and strawberries in market, and we will soon have all the vegetables and fruits of the season. Our city, as usual, is alive with amusements. The John Smith is here with Stone & McCallow's mammoth circus, and, as usual, are drawing crowds; they leave on Saturday, bound north. Mad. Cailly undertook to give one grand concert, on Monday night, but it was no go. Your people may afford to give a dollar to hear Fanny Kemble read Shakspeare, because it is fashionable; but people are not quite so fashionable here, they think more of the "castings" than fashion; consequently the Madam had to postpone her concert, as she was too unwell to sing to twelve persons, including "dead-heads." Our theater closed about the 1st of February, after a miserable attempt at a season under the management of Deering, since which time our old friend Caldwell has sold it to two of our citizens for $10,000, cash, and cheap at that. It is now open under the management of Tom Brown—don't you know Tom?—every body knows him here—he was a perfect novice in the business, but energy and perseverance will do wonders; he will soon be as familiar with contracting with the profession as he was with the cotton broker; be as intimate with traps, scenery, and the smell of orange peel, as he was with cotton samples, cheeks, and pony expresses. He opened with the Monplaisirs, and they proved a card. The Heron family are now the rage—they are "some pumpkins"—and I trust that Tom's pocket will be as well filled as his theater. Dodge with his splendid dioramas left yesterday, satisfied I presume with his visit here. Ex-President Polk passed through our city last week, and I have no doubt was perfectly satisfied and gratified at his reception; it was all any one could wish.

Our Grand Lodge and Grand Encampment meets on the 15th of April, at which time the elections take place. I will advise you of their doings.

Yours, in F., L. & T., ALPHA.

SAMARIA ENCAMPMENT, No. 14.—In our list of Encampments, published last week, we put the above mentioned Encampment down as suspended, which was an error. This Encampment was expelled previous to the decision of the G. L. U. S. on the validity of the new constitution of N. Y. S. Subsequently the members petitioned to the Grand Encampment of N. Y. to be reinstated, which was done by G. P. J. R. Taylor, in person. We would also state for the information of members in good standing, in this State, and members from other States that Samaria Encampment meets at the Grand Encampment Room, National Hall, Canal-street, on the 1st and 3d Saturday of every month until the 1st of May, after which the place of meeting will be in Rooms No. 88 Canal-street, and that the patriarchs would be happy to receive a visit from any brother who may wish to visit them. This Encampment is flourishing finely.

We are indebted for the above information to Bro. S. C. Moore, S. W. of Samaria Encampment.

GONE.—The Symbol, a paper published at Boston, has given up the ghost. The Yankee Blade, the excellent paper of our talented friend and brother, Mathews, has swallowed it up.

A GLANCE AT EUROPE.

ANOTHER arrival from the Old World, and a gossip of fourteen days news is the most important cargo brought by the Niagara. The sky looks rather dark over France—a new revolution is on the eve of bursting over that country, and God knows when and how it will terminate. Louis Napoleon is no better situated in the Presidential chair than Louis Philippe was on the throne of France. The modern Bonaparte despises the people, and has united with the aristocracy and the middle classes. He has already forgotten that he was elected President by the voice of the poor people of France. Capital punishment, concerning political affairs, was abolished by the glorious revolution of 1848, and now we see the guillotine restored in that country against the red republicans of the insurrection of June.

In Italy they are marching against their enemies, and the Republic of Rome continues to be united as ever. In Austria they have had a liberal constitution, and the war has not yet ended with the Hungarians.

ENGLISH COMMERCE.

The alarming state of Europe has created a great decline in all the commercial branches over England. The Cotton market was dull and depressed; but two days before the sailing of the Niagara, the news from India being more favorable, quite a reaction was created in all the principal articles of commerce in general.

ENGLAND.

The tory party has met with a failure in their peculiar burdens on land. Mr. D'Israeli is decided to bring forward his proposals again and again; but it remains to see to what point of depression agricultural produce will fall. The financial reform movement was supported by a small minority, and Mr. Cobden has lost all hopes of reducing the army and navy for the benefit of the State. There is a great movement in the House of Commons, in Order to disclergify Clergymen, and to abolish the infamous bill which condemns to imprisonment every minister of the English Church who preaches in dissenting Chapels. It seems that the great events in India have alarmed the government, and aroused the British feelings, so long kept in abeyance. England has united with France against any intervention in the affairs of Italy, and we believe that John Bull has plenty of troubles at home, without acquiring any more abroad.

IRELAND

Is continually starving, and ravaged by the cholera morbus. But in spite of the misery of the people, and the desolation of that unfortunate country, the Priests, the greatest scourge of the Island of Erin, have made large collections for the Pope, and robbed the poor Irish laborers of their last penny to pay mercenary troops to butcher the Romans, in order to restore the Pope on his Pontifical throne. When will the Irish, in general, imitate the Italians in throwing off the yoke of Roman hierarchy and English despotism? They have sacrificed their land, and abandoned their noble leaders in the sacred cause of Irish rebellion, and at present are willingly disposed to build, with their last penny, a tyrannical power over the Republic of Rome. Oh! tempora! oh! mores!

FRANCE

Is threatened with a bloody revolution. If the people are victorious in this attempt for ameliorating their situation, we do not know what great consequences will be derived from this social movement. Persecutions against true Republicans are attempted, as during royalty, and as the murderous instrument of human destruction, the guillotine, has been restored in France, I believe that it will disappear, not only with Louis Napoleon, but will carry away many thousands of new victims. Louis Napoleon had to use clemency, and to commute capital punishment to imprisonment for life; and this act of humanity and justice would have acquired for him the love and support of all the French population. He may return again to exile, if he succeeds in escaping from the muskets of the fierce democrats of France, or from the guillotine. It is said that the army of the Alps has been increased, and in case Russia should persist in her war-like operations, the French army will cross the Alps and enter Italy. The State trials at Bourges are proceeding with great solemnity, and the abolition of clubs has been decided by the slender majority of 378 to 339, the division being taken by ballot.

ITALY

Is decided to have war with Austria. It seems that the Italians and the Magyars have formed a league against the enemies of their countries—the hateful Austrians. Charles Albert has prepared every thing for a new campaign, and all the other States of Italy are decided to enter the field of battle against their oppressors. The Italian army will consist of 800,000 men, while the national guard will remain in the cities and on the frontiers. The Holy Office of the Inquisition has been abolished in Rome, and over the Roman States. In the city of Faenza the people have burned down the palace, having seized and sealed all the important documents found in that nest of tortures. The Roman Government has given orders to demolish the Inquisition of Rome, and restored the miserable prisoners to liberty, and among them there was found a bishop, who had been buried in a dark and damp dungeon for thirty years. All the papers found at the Holy Office will be published in a short time, and certainly we shall know more about that infernal institution. Several bishops and cardinals were arrested for having attempted to excite the people against the Republican Government. Giuseppe Mazzini, the chief leader of Young Italy, it is said, will be named Dictator of the Republic of Rome.

HOLLAND

Has lost her king, but too soon found another, who, under the name of William III, has gladly succeeded his father, who died with the consolation of having reduced the country and public treasure to a state of misery. When Holland was a republic it was one of the greatest and richest nations on the earth; having a king, she is almost forgotten by the rest of the world, and has lost every vestige of ancient glory and grandeur.

AUSTRIA

Has a liberal and truly democratic constitution, decided and granted by the Assembly of Kremzier, for the whole Austrian empire. It is difficult to know how this constitution may work when reduced to practice; it will be a source of continual misunderstanding between the people and the Emperor. This constitution places in the hands of the Austrian people ample means of securing a name of political freedom, scarcely inferior to any other country in the world.

HUNGARY

Prosecutes a fiery war against Austria; they have adopted a guerilla warfare, and their union with the Italians will secure them great success.

GERMANY.

The cessation of the armistice between Prussia and Denmark has been officially announced to the foreign powers, and the Danes are firmly resolved to support what they call their rights, and to have a fight with the Germans. A correspondent in Berlin, however, on the 20th, writes that a proposal has been made to renew the armistice for three months.

THE ROMAN REPUBLIC

Is preparing to march against its enemies, and to sustain its independence to the last. An army of 15,000 men is marching to the frontier of Austria, to co-operate with the legions of Charles Albert, to expell the barbarians from the beautiful plains of Lombardy. Important documents, emanating from Gaeta, the present seat of the Pope, have been found in a convent of Spoleto, in the Roman States, addressed to the superior of this religious house, and to the priests of the town, to prepare themselves to preach a crusade and extermination against the Carbonari, and their wives and children. These advices recall to our memory the times of the persecutions against the heretics of France and other countries, and against the Liberals of the Roman States under the former Popes. Italy, at the present time, has need not only of all her children, but also of the succors of all the friends of freedom, in every part of the world. Rome shall stand in spite of the shameful and bloody attempts of the ultracatholic demagogues; and we must thank the creators of this glorious republic for having destroyed for ever the temporal power of the Pope, which was a disgrace to human kind. SECCHI.

AN ODD-FELLOW'S ATHENEUM IN BROOKLYN.—Our brothers in Brooklyn seem determined not to be outdone in good works. A movement has been started for the foundation of a casino—embracing a library, reading-room, &c., where frequent lectures, addresses, debates, concerts, and entertainments, will be held for the benefit and amusement of the Order. We believe there is no reading-room now in Brooklyn, and certainly the plan proposed must meet with universal approbation. More of its progress, next week.

THE SOMERVILLE AND ELIZABETHTOWN RAILROAD.—A few days since we rode over this road as far as the "White House," where it terminates for the present. This point is about fifty miles from New York, so that passengers new, for Easton, Pa., have only twenty-five miles of staging. We learned from the Conductor of the road, a gentleman to whom we are under obligations for many items of information regarding the country, and the history, progress and condition of the road, that surveyors and engineers are, next week, to commence operations on the residue of the distance, and that the route will speedily be extended to the Pennsylvania line. This railroad is destined to be one of the very best investments in the country. The travel is now immense, and will steadily increase. We understand that a new boat is to be put on the line between New-York and Elizabethtown.

THE money market, which for some time has been exceedingly stringent, has grown easier upon the favorable news from Europe, aided by other causes. Good paper sells from eight to nine per cent. per annum, and short loans are made at seven per cent. A small amount of specie came in the Niagara from Halifax, and a large remittance is expected by the steamer, due at the close of the week. This influx of coin, added to the large payments soon to be made, by merchants from the north and west, cannot fail to give an easy money market soon. In addition to other causes, the receipt of gold from California will also give relief to the market. Two sales of railroad bonds have been made recently. Of Erie railroad bonds, 7 per cents., $500,000 sold at 85a85½ per cent.; and $87,000 New York and New Haven railroad, 7 per cents, at 92a92½ per cent. Government Stocks are in demand, and close firm at the annexed quotations. Treasury notes 108½; United States, 6's, 1867, 110.

A. J. H. DUGANNE, Esq.—We received, a few days since, a call from this distinguished poet and romancer. Mr. Duganne has written, of late, some of the best poems we have in the English language. He is now engaged on a new tragedy, which we predict will be most successful. His "Lyidian Queen," a play whose merits has already been acknowledged by the public, is to be played in Baltimore, next week. The principal character is to be sustained by Miss Julia Dean, an accomplished lady and actress.

BOSTON VIA STONINGTON.—This route still continues the favorite line to Boston. The Vanderbilt and Rhode Island steamers are among our first boats, and we assure travelers that they will find this line the safest, speediest, and most comfortable. Capt. Stone, Mr. Walker, Mr. Morse, and Mr. McConklin are exceedingly popular in their respective departments.

BARNUM AND THEOLOGY.—Mr. P. T. Barnum, the enterprising and successful proprietor of the American Museum in this city, has recently challenged a clergyman of Connecticut to a theological discussion. This is a new idea; but we have no doubt it would prove a profitable speculation, if it were made a part of the entertainments at the Museum. Mr. Barnum is a universal genius. We understand the clergyman has declined, probably fearing to fall into the hands of such a lion as Mr. B. is.

A NEW PAPER.—A new semi-monthly journal of literature and art, to be called "THE MESSAGING-BIRD," is to be issued in this city about the 1st of May. This paper is to be edited by one of the first poets and journalists of the age. This journal will, no doubt, create a great excitement in the literary world.

The town of Bellville, Mo., now contains 3,118 inhabitants; and there were, during the year 1848, one hundred and twenty-five houses built. Ten years ago it was a forest.

The Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church has passed a resolution, recommending that the property question in dispute between the Northern and Southern branches of the Church, be submitted to arbitration.

A letter has been received at Pittsburg, Pa., from Rev. Theobald Matthew, the great Irish apostle of temperance, announcing his intention to pay his long contemplated visit to this country in April next.

The Sheriff of Rockbridge County, Virginia, in attempting to quell a disturbance which happened at the Lexington court, received a severe, if not fatal shot, from a pistol, the ball entering the jaw. Paxton, who committed the crime, is now in jail.

A bill to authorize married women to wear their husband's unmentionables, was introduced into the Senate of Wisconsin, by Mr. Botkin, the Whig candidate for United States Senator, and lost, receiving two votes to 13 in the negative.

At Chicago, Ill., recently, a man was sent to the penitentiary for one month for murder, and a woman one year for stealing four yards of Alpaca. Woolen goods are valuable in that section, while life stands considerably below par.

The Senate of Wisconsin has passed a resolution, instructing their Senators and Representatives in Congress to ask for an amendment of the Federal Constitution, to the effect that the United States Senators may be elected by the people.

The depot building of the Worcester and Nashua Railroad, at Clintonville, Mass., together with one hundred cords of wood, and two freight cars, has been destroyed by fire.

Special Notices.

S. T. CLARK, who has for the last nine years been connected with the "New-York Express," will in future be associated with Mr. J. R. CHAMPTON in the publication of the Gazette of the Union and Golden Rule. The long experience of Mr. CLARK in connection with a leading New-York daily newspaper, will, it is confidently believed, make the Gazette of the Union and Golden Rule more valuable to its patrons.

TO LOCAL AGENTS.—We have heretofore received very efficient aid from our Local Agents, and many of them are still rendering us much service by increasing our circulation and collecting dues. There are others from whom we have heard nothing for many weeks. We again ask your assistance in extending the genuine principles of Odd-Fellowship. We often experience much inconvenience from the failure of agents to report to the office, probably because but little has been done, and delaying until more is accomplished. If but two names are obtained, please forward them. Punctual correspondence is essential to the proper transaction of the business of the office; and subscribers are often disappointed and deprived of their rights by its omission. Will you not now renew your efforts as formerly, and see that our interests and the interests of the Order are properly cared for within the sphere of your respective agencies?

ERRATUM.—An error in the numbering of our paper occurred last week, of which we desire the reader to take particular notice. The No. was printed 16 instead of 14, the right No. This may create confusion in writing for No. 16, there apparently being two of that No. to the present Vol. To avoid this, correspondents in sending for back numbers, should always designate them by their Whole No. only, instead of the Volume No. Let them remember this.

Humorous and Amusing.

MISCELLANEOUS ENIGMA.

ENIGMA.

Beneath my shade a prophet sat—
 A prophet, too, of old—
 And of a mighty city's fall
 To all around foretold;
 And soon—too soon, alas! it fell;
 But ruin'd, ere complete,
 I to a nothing dwindled down
 Beneath the prophet's feet.
 Years have roll'd on, the monarch Time
 Has other realms laid low;
 Yet the famed plant which bears my name
 Continues still to grow.

REBUS.

One of the four Evangelists who strove
 To teach mankind the gospel truth to love;
 The dark-hued native of a burning clime,
 By a fell passion led direct to crime;
 A fair Italian city, and a tone
 That often answers softly to our own—
 Add these initials, and you'll find a guest
 Too deeply cherish'd in the human breast.

How DAVID PRICE CURED HIS WIFE'S SHOCKING BAD TEMPER.—David, a man of meek and kindly spirit, had long suffered from the patter-clatter, never-ending, scolding tongue of his worser half.

One day an herb-doctor greeted David at his work with a "Well, Master David, and how be you?"

 "Oh, I be very well, thanks to ye; but my wife's not so very nicely."

"Indeed," said the gatherer of simples, with a quick ear for an ailment, "what my be the matter wi' she, Master David?"

"Well," said David, in his usual dry and quiet way, "she hev a bad breaking out about the mouth now and then, that troubles her and me varry sore, I sure ye, Master Doctor."

"Well," said the latter, "I could make a grand cure of her, I'll warrant; I hev a salve 'at I makes fra the juice of the juniper tree, and by biling up a vast o' different kind o' things 'at quite cures that in no time."

"Deed," said David, "and what might your charge be, now, for a box o' that 'intment 'at would quite cure her?"

"Oh, said the herbalist, looking anxiously up in David's face, "only a matter of a shilling."

"Well, that's dirt cheap," said David. "If you cures her I'll give you eighteen pence—there, now."

With this offer the doctor set off home to prepare his nostrum, and straightway hied the very next day to David's house, box in hand. There he found Mrs. Price, and went at once to business.

"Well, Mrs. Price, your master tells me that you hev betimes a bad breaking out about the mouth, and I've brought a box o' fine 'intment 'at will cure ye."

With this announcement Mrs. Price fired up, at once seeing her husband's jest, raised the brush with which she was sweeping the floor, and pummeled the doctor to her heart's content, even following to beat him a field from her house, he screaming out all the while:

"Oh, Missus Price! be you gone mad?"
 From that day, however, Mrs. Price has been wholly cured of her scolding habits. David has only to look up in her face and say, "I'll get a box of that 'intment, and there's an end to the matter. David honorably paid the doctor his eighteen pence, and treated him to make him forget his pummeling. The whole of these circumstances are strictly true.

RUSTIC IMPUDENCE.—A worthy farmer at Trull, near Taunton, was lately, on a Sunday afternoon, aroused from the solace of his fireside and cider-cup by his servant maid, who had brought into the passage of the house two youths, whom she had detected stealing apples. The culprits sued for pardon, alleging that they had only taken a few in their pockets; but on being asked what they intended doing with the sacks found on them, admitted that, "they intended to take a few home for mother to make dumplings." The farmer threatened the offenders with due punishment, and in the course of his address expatiated on the extravagated nature of their trespass by stealing on the Sabbath, and observed that if they had wanted a few apples, and had come to him to ask for them, he would have given them a pocket full. Having promised never to repeat their depredations, they were dismissed. The next Sunday the good-natured man was again called from his easy-chair by his servant, who announced that two young chaps wished to speak to him.

"Well, my lads," said he "what do you want?"

"Pleas, zur," said the applicants, "we be the two boys that you said last Sunday you would give some apples to, if we ax'd vor 'em, and so we be com'd, and have brought the grist-bag to carry home some to mother!"

Whether they got the apples, or were served with a crab-stick, we are not informed.

"PERSEVERANCE," said a lady, a friend of ours, to her help, "is the only way you can accomplish great things."

One day eight apple dumplings were sent down stairs, and they all disappeared.

"Sally, where are those dumplings?"

"I managed to get through them, ma'am."

"Why, how on earth did you contrive to eat so many dumplings?"

"Persevering, ma'am," answered Sally.

A MEAN MAN.—We have heard of mean men in our day, but a correspondent of the St. Louis Revue mentions one, to whom must be yielded the palm:

"Talk about mean men! Why, there's that Bill Tompson, he's the meanest man I ever heard on!" (Bill was a constable there.) "Why don't you think he had an execution against me for a little matter of groceries, and he came out and levelled on my old 'oman's ducks, and he wanted me to drive 'em for him, and I told him to ketch 'em himself; and he chased 'em round and round the house, and every time he'd ketch a duck, he'd set down and wring its head off, and charge mileage!"

A SAILOR, calling upon a Liverpool goldsmith, asked him what might be the value of an ingot of gold as big as his arm. The shopkeeper beckoned him in a back room, and primed him with grog. He then asked to see the ingot.

"Oh," said Jack, "I haven't got it yet, but I'm going to California, and would like to know the value of such a lump before I start."

The jeweler started him out of the shop.

On a recent moonlight night, a mother had the following observation made to her by her son:

"It maun be a nonsense, mither, about there bein' folks i' the moon!"

"What way, my man?"

"Ou, because, how could they crush themselves thegither when it's only half-moon?"

Mamma, grinning:

"May be the folks are like spy-glasses, shut and themselves in."

RATHER SEVERE.—An empty coxcomb, after having engrossed the attention of a company for some time, with himself and his petty alliances, observed to Dr. Parr that he could never go out without catching cold in his head.

"No wonder," said the doctor, pettishly, "you always go out without any thing in it."

THEATRICAL.—Her majesty, it is known, presented Mr. Charles Kean with a magnificent ring, for his services as manager of the Victoria Theater, Windsor. On the day the papers containing this information reached New York, the ring was missing from Mr. Kean's house. It has, however, since been discovered, sticking in Mr. Macready's gizzard.—[Puppet Show.

AN IRISH CALCULATION.—There are 1000 men in the Cork workhouse without a shirt. "It would require 22,000 yards of calico," says a member of the board, "to give the paupers a single change of linen."

DESCRIPTIVE.—A young dandy, who sported an enormous mustache, asked a lady what she thought of his looks.

"Why," said she, "you look as if you had swallowed a squirrel, and left the tail sticking out of your mouth."

GAZETTE OF THE UNION
AND GOLDEN RULE.

THE ORGAN OF THE ORDER,
 Published under the auspices of the M. W. Grand Sire!

It will contain, from week to week, the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of the State of New-York, and also of other States; accounts of Celebrations, Institutions of new Lodges, and occasionally, a complete Directory of all the Lodges in the Union.

Office of the Grand Secretary Grand Lodge State of New-York:

ONE FELLOW'S HALL, CITY OF NEW-YORK, }
 March 13, 1849.

To District Deputy Grand Masters, Officers of Lodges, and Brethren:

In consequence of the many complaints made to this Office of the failure of Deputies, Officers of Lodges and Members to receive communications which have been issued from this Office, and of the failure to receive many communications which have been intended to reach this Office, for several months last past, and which have been transmitted by Deputies, Lodges and individuals, you are therefore notified and requested to address all communications intended for the Grand Lodge, Grand Master, or Grand Secretary, to BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Box No. 838, Post Office, New-York, and in all cases to be particular that Letters and Documents are properly mailed, in order that a failure of papers intended for this, or sent from this Office, to reach their destination, may be traced to the proper cause.

Fraternally yours,

BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Grand Secretary.

BALDNESS CURED.

East Boston, Feb. 8, 1847.

MR. WILLIAM BOGLE.—Dear Sir: For several years past, my wife has been troubled with baldness on the crown of her head, about six or seven inches in circumference. After repeated failures of other so called remedies, and by the advice of friends, she was induced to use your HYPERION as a wash, for the purpose of restoring her lost hair, and I am happy to say that its effect has been to cause the hair to grow all over the part affected. She has used only two bottles, and that very irregularly; had she used it often and more regular, I am convinced that the growth of the hair would have been accelerated. I am, sir, yours respectfully,

SUMNER F. BARRETT.

BOLECTIC MEDICAL AND SURGICAL OFFICE,
No. 127 Chambers-st., New-York.

I. ALL CASES OF DISEASE in any part of the HUMAN SYSTEM, INTERNAL or EXTERNAL, whether in MEN, WOMEN or CHILDREN, will be EXAMINED, and COUNSEL or ADVICE given freely to all, by the Physicians in attendance.

WITHOUT CHARGE.

II. Patients will find our EXAMINATIONS, and the mode by which we arrive at a knowledge of their diseases—as also our TREATMENT, unlike those of any others which they may have heretofore known or tried.

III. Our REMEDIES or TREATMENT will be found the most pleasant, safe, simple, and efficacious that can be used. No confinement to the sick room—no hindrance from business,—no danger from colds,—and no injury to the constitution,—but, on the contrary, IMPROVEMENT at once.

IV. All the Medicines we prescribe are made in our own CHEMICAL LABORATORY, as we cannot rely on the Drugs sold in the shops, in consequence of almost universal ADULTERATIONS. Our remedies being prepared in the most pure and concentrated form, but little is used or needed to cure the worst cases.

V. We claim, by our UNUSUAL SUCCESS, to be masters over all curable diseases—particularly in all SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS—the DISEASES PECULIAR TO WOMEN—the HEREDITARY DISEASES OF CHILDREN—and all those most HOPELESS and DESPERATE cases in male or female which have defeated the best efforts of the most distinguished medical practitioners, as the more than ten thousand cases, whom we have successfully treated, can testify.

VI. THOSE DISEASES which are almost invariably treated in the first stage with Balsam of Copiava, Capsules, Cubebæ,—with injections of solutions of Nitrate of Silver, Borax, Alum, Sugar of Lead, Sulphate of Zinc,—with Bougies, Catheters, and Caustics,—and in the second stage with Yellow or Black Washes, Blue or Mercurial Ointment, Blue Stone or Lunar Caustic, externally,—and with Calomel, Blue Pill, Red Precipitate, Corrosive Sublimate, Hydriodate of Potassa, Sarsaparilla Syrup, and other like cheats and slops, internally—we say before Heaven and Earth what we know and can demonstrate by hundreds of cases, that by such treatment and means these diseases have never, and can never, be healed—they deceive the patient, disguise the disease by driving it into the system to other and more important parts,—they produce Strictures; Abscesses in the Kidneys; Piles; Fistulas; Catarrhs; Gravel; Diseases of the Eyes; Loss of Hair and Hearing; Rheumatic Pains; Decay of the Flesh and Bones; Ulcers in the Limbs, Throat, Head, Neck, Nose and Palate; Disease of the Liver and Stomach; with CONSUMPTION OF THE LUNGS, or WHOLE SYSTEM; and thus render either the whole life of the patient miserable, or hurry him to a premature grave.

Without using any of the above named Quackish, Swindling and Murderous Remedies, we PROMISE to every case we treat a PERMANENT and RADICAL cure FOR LIFE, by a very simple medicine, which is without taste or smell, which neither purges nor vomits, nor hinders from business, nor exposes the patient in any way whatever. Testimonials to these Facts we can furnish from persons who were carried out of the Broadway Hospital to die as hopeless cases, and many others of like character, whom we have cured.

VII. FISTULAS cured invariably WITHOUT AN OPERATION. Of the hundreds of cases of this disease which we have known, we have never seen one which had been cured with cutting with the knife—though nearly all had been cut out once, twice, or more times. Cutting never cured a case—it is false, delusive and cruel. References will be given to cases in this city which have been successfully treated of the most terrible forms of Fistula ever known.

VIII. Cases of SURGERY, MIDWIFERY and DENTISTRY attended to in all their departments—Tumors, Cancers, Dislocation, Fractures, Wounds, and Injuries of every kind treated with safety and success.

IX. ALL DISEASES OF THE EYES AND EARS treated without PAIN or PERIL, and with UNEQUALLED SUCCESS.

We invite all the afflicted, however hopeless their cases may appear, or whatever their disease may be, or however many physicians or remedies they may have tried, to put our knowledge and skill to the test in an examination of their case,—it will cost them nothing,—and then they will be prepared to know whether we can treat them successfully or not—for if we do not find, to their satisfaction, the cause or origin of all the difficulties in the case, we will own that the cure is not in our power, and hence put them to no expense. Most physicians treat symptoms—we go to the root, and thus succeed where others fail.

NEVER DESPAIR till you have given our Remedies and Treatment an honest trial.

Patients visited at their residences when required.

SCROFULA, RHEUMATISM, STUBBORN ULCERS, DYSPEPSY, SALT RHEUM, FEVER SORES, ERYSIPELAS, PIMPLES, BILES, MERCURIAL DISEASES, CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS, LIVER COMPLAINT, BRONCHITIS, CONSUMPTION, FEMALE COMPLAINTS, LOSS OF APPETITE, GENERAL DEBILITY, &c.

THE PROPRIETORS having spent much time

in bringing this preparation of Sarsaparilla to its present state of perfection; and the experience of fourteen years has furnished them the most ample opportunity to study, in their various forms, the diseases for which it is recommended, and to adapt it exactly to their relief and cure. Patients who wish a really good Medicine are invited to give it a trial, and satisfy themselves of its superiority, and the invaluable property it possesses of arresting and curing disease. The bottle has been enlarged to hold one Quart, and in its present improved form may safely claim to be the best and cheapest medicine of the age. Its progress to the fame it has attained may be traced by a long line of facts and cures, that stand as landmarks and beacons for the invalid, pointing the way to the haven of health; and what it has already done for the thousands who have used it, it is capable of doing for the millions still suffering and struggling with disease. It purifies, cleanses, and strengthens the fountain springs of life, and infuses new vigor throughout the whole animal frame.

DYSPEPSY CURED.

The following testimonial, from a gentleman so well known as Mr. Cox, requires no comment, and recommends itself to all similarly afflicted: NEW-ORLEANS, Dec. 18, 1848.

Messrs. A. B. & D. SANDS—Gentlemen: Having experienced the most beneficial effects from the use of your Sarsaparilla, it gives me pleasure to add my testimony to the numerous spontaneous effusions of grateful hearts which you continually are receiving.

My case was dyspeptic, or rather I may term it a weakness of the digestive organs. For more than a year, I was troubled with wind upon my stomach and its frequent eructation, together with producing a spasmodic contraction of the heart, often gave me much annoyance. After trying various remedies without avail, I commenced with your Sarsaparilla. Before I had used half a bottle, almost every symptom of this disagreeable complaint had vanished, and in a few weeks its continued use effected a complete cure. I therefore confidently recommend it to all persons affected in the same manner, and have reason to believe that many who are suffering under a supposed disease of the heart, if they would take your Sarsaparilla, in a few weeks would find themselves restored to health in both mind and body. I remain yours, very truly,

JOHN V. COX, 93 Lexington Avenue.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA IN PRUSSIA.

The Proprietors of this valuable Medicine have just received an order from our esteemed friend and correspondent, Theodore S. Fay, Secretary of Legation to the Court of Prussia, for the use of a member of the Royal Family—a copy of which we herewith lay before our readers.—[Home Journal.

"U. S. LEGATION, BERLIN, Nov. 30, 1848.—Gentlemen: I wish you to send two dozen bottles of your Sarsaparilla, for the use of his Royal Highness Prince Waldimir of Prussia, to this Legation, as soon as possible. It is necessary that he should receive it immediately; therefore, please send it by first steamer. The bill can be made out in the name of the Prince, and sent with it: Your obedient servant,

"THEO. S. FAY."

SCROFULOUS AFFECTION OF THE EYES.

SOUTH KINGSTON, (R. I.) Oct. 11, 1847.—Messrs. SANDS—Gentlemen: My little daughter, when one year old, was attacked with a scrofulous humor on her face, which soon after extended into her eyes, causing almost total blindness in one of them, and disfiguring her whole face. I employed two physicians to attend her, who exhausted their utmost skill to give her relief, but it all proved useless, and finally one of them remarked to me that he had known of some striking cures effected by Sands' Sarsaparilla, and advised me to try it. I obtained one bottle, which she commenced using, and before it was all used up it had effected an entire cure. It is now over four years since she was cured, and there has been no reappearance of the disease, and we are satisfied that it is a perfect cure. It gives me great pleasure to add that I can recommend it to any sufferer from a similar complaint.

Respectfully yours,

GEORGE ROBINSON.

THE NEW-YORK SUN'S ART UNION! A SPLENDID ENGRAVING, AND THE NEW-YORK WEEKLY SUN one Year

for One Dollar, besides One Thousand Magnificent Prizes distributed among those who Subscribe!—BEACH, BROTHERS, Publishers of the Weekly Sun, as a testimonial of their appreciation of the vast and rapidly increasing patronage bestowed upon that Dollar Newspaper, will make a gratuitous present of a large and elegant full length engraving, beautifully printed on fine paper, of General Zachary Taylor, President of the United States, to every subscriber, (whether a new one or one who renews an old subscription,) whose name is entered upon the subscription books between the first day of January, 1849, and January, 1850. They will also distribute among the subscribers ONE THOUSAND PRIZES, varying in value from $25 to $1—the total value amounting to two thousand dollars! The very great expense attendant on this liberal distribution of prizes and splendid Portraits of President Taylor, in full military uniform, &c., renders it imperatively necessary that only one name should be entered for each dollar sent. Those who subscribe in clubs will please designate the names of such as are to be entered upon the books as candidates for the prizes, &c.

THE ONE THOUSAND PRIZES To be distributed among the subscribers to the Weekly Sun, will comprise a rich selection of costly and valuable works in the several departments of Literature, History, Biography, Voyages, and Travels, Domestic and Moral Economy, Essays, Belles Lettres, &c., including most of the well known publications of Harper and Brothers.

Those who draw prizes will have the privilege of making their own selections from the catalogue which is furnished to each subscriber. To insure the fullest advantages of the above prize distribution, subscribers should send in the amount of their subscriptions without delay, as the names are registered in rotation, and those first in order will be entitled to the early impressions of the engravings of General Taylor, &c.

For a more detailed account of the above plan, the reader is referred to the Extra Sun's Art Union, which may be obtained free of charge by any person addressing (postpaid) the proprietors.

THE NEW-YORK WEEKLY SUN Is the best as well as the cheapest family newspaper ever presented to the American public.

In addition to its usual features of interest, beautiful Engravings, &c., the Weekly Sun for 1849 will be enriched by a succession of ORIGINAL PRIZE STORIES, written by eminent American authors expressly for this paper, for the premiums of $250.

The subscription price being ONLY ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, any person may receive a copy, at any time, by sending the direction and enclosing the money by mail. (Postmasters will frank the letters.)

CLUB SUBSCRIPTIONS, when sent to one address, are received at the following rates: Five copies for $1—eleven copies for $2—twenty five for $18—and seventy-five copies for $50. When an order is sent for copies requiring them to be forwarded to more than one address, one dollar will be charged for each subscription.

Letters and Communications (always postpaid,) should be addressed to BEACH, BROTHERS, Sun Establishment, New York. 1m246

DR. S. P. TOWNSEND'S COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA.

The Most Extraordinary Medicine in the World!!
This Extract is put up in Quart Bottles; it is six times cheaper, purer, and more pleasant, and warranted superior to any sold. It cures without vomiting, purging, or debilitating the Patient.

THE great beauty and superiority of this Sarsaparilla over all other medicines is, that while it eradicates the disease, it invigorates the body. It is one of the very best

SPRING AND SUMMER MEDICINES ever known: it not only purifies the whole system and strengthens the person, but it creates rich, new and pure blood, a power possessed by no other medicine. And in this lies the grand secret of its wonderful success. It has performed, within the last two years, more than 100,000 cures of severe cases of disease; at least 15,000 were considered incurable. It has saved the lives of more than 10,000 children the past two seasons in the city of New-York alone.

10,000 Cases of General Debility and want of Nervous Energy.

Dr. S. P. Townsend's Sarsaparilla invigorates the whole system permanently. To those who have lost their muscular energy by the effects of medicine or indiscretion committed in youth, or the excessive indulgence of the passions, and brought on by physical prostration of the nervous system, lassitude, want of ambition, fainting sensations, premature decay and decline, hastening toward that fatal disease Consumption, can be entirely restored by this pleasant remedy. This Sarsaparilla is far superior to any Invigorating Cordial, as it renews and invigorates the system, gives activity to the limbs, and strength to the muscular system, in a most extraordinary degree.

Consumption Cured.
Cleanse and Strengthen. Consumption can be Cured. Bronchitis, Consumption, Liver Complaint, Colds, Catarrh, Coughs, Asthma, Spitting Blood, Soreness in the Chest, Hætic Flush, Night Sweats, Difficult or Profuse Expectoration, Pain in the Side, &c., have been and can be Cured.

Spitting Blood.
 New-York, April 28, 1847.—Dr. S. P. Townsend: I verily believe your Sarsaparilla has been the means, through Providence, of saving my life. I have for several years had a bad Cough. It became worse and worse. At last I raised large quantities of blood, had night sweats, was greatly debilitated and reduced, and did not expect to live. I have only used your Sarsaparilla a short time, and there has been a wonderful change wrought in me. I am now able to walk all over the city. I raise no blood, and my cough has left me. You can well imagine that I am thankful for these results. Your obedient servant,
WM. RUSSELL, 65 Catharine st.

Dyspepsia.
 No fluid or medicine has ever been discovered which so nearly resembles the gastric juice or saliva, in decomposing food, and strengthening the organs of digestion, as this preparation of Sarsaparilla.

BANK DEPARTMENT, ALBANY, May 10, 1845.—Dr. Townsend—Sir: I have been afflicted for several years with the Dyspepsia in its worst forms, attended with sourness of stomach, loss of appetite, extreme heartburn, and a great aversion to all kinds of food, and for weeks (what I could eat) I have been unable to retain but a small portion on my stomach. I tried the usual remedies, but they had little or no effect in removing the complaint. I was induced, about two months since, to try your Extract of Sarsaparilla, and I must say with little confidence; but after using nearly two bottles, I found my appetite restored, and the heartburn entirely removed; and I would earnestly recommend the use of it to those who have been afflicted as I have been.
 Yours, &c. W. W. VAN ZANDT.

Great Blessing to Mothers and Children.
 It is the safest and most effectual medicine for purifying the system, and relieving the sufferings attendant upon childbirth, ever discovered. It strengthens both the mother and child, prevents pain and disease, increases and enriches the food; those who have used it think it is indispensable. It is highly useful both before and after confinement, as it prevents diseases attendant upon childbirth. In Costiveness, Piles, Cramps, Swelling of the Feet, Despondency, Heartburn, Vomiting, Pain in the Back and Loins, False Pains, Hemorrhage, and in regulating the Secretions, and equalizing the Circulation, it has no equal. The great beauty of this medicine is, it is always safe, and the most delicate use it most successfully.

Scrofula Cured.
 This Certificate conclusively proves that this Sarsaparilla has perfect control over the most obstinate diseases of the Blood. Three persons cured in one house is unprecedented.

Three Children.
 Dr. S. P. Townsend—Dear Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that three of my children have been cured of the Scrofula by the use of your excellent medicine. They were afflicted very severely with bad sores; have taken four bottles; it took them away, for which I feel myself under great obligation.
 Yours, respectfully,
ISAAC W. CRAIN, 106 Wooster st.

Opinions of Physicians.
 Dr. S. P. Townsend is almost daily receiving orders from Physicians in different parts of the Union. This is to certify, that we, the undersigned, Physicians of the city of Albany, have, in numerous cases, prescribed Dr. Townsend's Sarsaparilla, and believe it to be one of the most valuable preparations in the market.

SONNETS.

I.—FRIENDSHIP.

THERE were twin trees, with branches intertwined,
Roots interlocked, and summits raised toward heaven;

And they grew green together, in the kind
And genial airs of spring—the dews of even—
Each shared with each, and the sweet matin-song
Of early lark, was first upon their boughs.
Alike the gentle shower, and tempest strong,
And autumn's frost, and winter's withering snows
They felt, until the whirlwind's voice awoke,—
Then writhed together, struggling with its wrath;
But all in vain—they wrestled, bowed and shook—
Destruction would not pause upon its path;
And strain'd from earth, with roots upturned and bare,

And branches still embraced, they fell together there.

II.—LOVE.

A moldering turret, long besieged by time—
Rifted and creviced by his slow approach,
Stood beautiful in ruin. There did climb
Its thridded walls a greenest ivy—such
As clings around deserted things—and soon
Winding its tendrils through the shatter'd pile,
It clung the closer where decay had done
Its work most rapid. Still, even with a smile,
It twined itself around each loosening stone:
So Love, around the wreck of wealth and power,
Its soft, prevailing strength, the closer brings,
And lives as green in dark misfortune's hour
As when in pleasure's haughty bower it springs—
Though wreck and ruin fall around it, still it clings.

III.—TRUTH.

The morning twilight rolls its misty shroud
O'er dewy earth, and through the illusive veil—
A thousand shapes, distorted, seem to crowd,
With glimmering indistinctness, on the sight.
Forests, like giants, robed or clad in mail—
Rocks, that like turrets, frown in the gray light,
Rise like a spell from some enchanted wave;
But lo! the king hath oped the gates of day,
And where his rays are shot, disparting wide,
Roll the thin vapors from his glance away,
With all the glory of their phantom pride.
Thus Error's thin deceptions flee the ray
Of Truth's pervading sun, and all its forms
Are roll'd like mist away beneath Truth's holy charms.

Original American Romance.

THE BRAVO'S DAUGHTER; OR, THE TORY OF CAROLINA. *

A Romance of the American Revolution.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY AUGUSTINE J. H. DUGANNE.

The sun was rising to high noon, and the heat of battle was rendered fiery by the scorching beams that showered down upon the combatants. The American soldiers, all grimed with smoke and powder, tore their shirts from their backs, and fought thus half naked. For a moment a man would leave his gun, rush to his canteen for a gulp of water, take a long breath, and then hasten back to the combat. If for a moment, nature, well nigh over-tasked, half faltered, the brave defender would cast his eye aloft, where waved his country's flag amid the battle-smoke, and with a thought of his wife and child at home, toiled on and fought uncomplainingly.

The city was now entirely concealed from the view of those upon the island, by the vast burden of smoke which had rolled up the river, and settled upon the surface of the water. Yet, although he could behold them not, every soldier knew that thousands were intently watching and listening to the dreadful din of the engagement.

Moultrie, calm and collected amid the dizzy scene, smoked his pipe, as he inspected his defenses, or sat coolly arranging his plans, while the bombs and cannon balls whizzed and fell around him. Every now and then, with a few preparatory whiffs, he would take the pipe from his mouth, to give an order or speak a few brief words of encouragement to his gallant men, and then replacing the short stem between his teeth, proceed unconcernedly in his indulgence, as if he were on a piazza in Charleston, rather than under the fire of a hundred British cannon.

Courage like this is infectious. Not a man of the American line but caught the spirit of his bold commander. In silence and determination every gun was worked.

Marion's post was at one extremity of the fort, least defended by the hastily constructed breast-work. There, surrounded by his valiant men, some of whom had been with him in many a fierce conflict with the red foemen of the old wars, the partisan officer pointed the guns with his own hands, served out the fast decreasing ammunition, and kept up the spirits of the patriots by his own undaunted example. Jasper fought beside him, and the sergeant's athletic form was scarcely recognizable, so blacked and burnt was it with the powder and sweat which covered him. There was, in truth, little to distinguish him from the negro, Cæsar, who was actively engaged, sometimes in assisting at the gun, sometimes as impromptu aid-de-camp, to bear a sudden message to the other officers. In the intervals of his labors the black kept up a constant fire of dry remarks upon everything that occurred about him, laughing and showing his white teeth as indifferently as if there was not the least danger of their being knocked, by a cannon shot, down his throat.

"Ky hi!" he said, as a rift in the smokey clouds discovered to those who stood at the embrasure, that three of the British vessels were fast among the shoals, and had hoisted signals of distress. "Ky, massa Jasper, we gib 'em some, by-and-by. We'll poke fire into 'em!"

"Here, you nigger, look out for my coat," said a fine-limbed young fellow, who stood on Jasper's right, holding a match, while Marion firmly sighted the gun.

As he spoke the soldier pointed to a blue coat, then the uniform of the regiment, which had been thrown carelessly over one of the merlons, and was now sliding gradually off.

"Me have him in a jiffey," cried Cæsar, swinging himself around, and raising his hand to stay the fall of the coat.

But at this moment a cannon shot came whizzing along, with its strange singing noise, and striking the collar of the garment, lifted it bodily from the merlon, and bore it over the heads of the soldiers.

Cæsar fell back as if he had been struck by lightning, while his open mouth and dilated eyes expressed the most ludicrous astonishment and alarm. On sailed the blue coat through the air, like a big swallow-tailed bird, and the soldiers along the entire western line, desisted as if with common consent from their work, and broke out into one of the loudest and freest laughs that ever made the air ring with merriment.

There, in the midst of that terrible strife, with the bomb shells and cannon balls raining around them, and the roar of three hundred cannon in their ears, those brave men, without a thought of danger, gave way to the impulse of mirth, which this curious incident had produced.

"Cæsar, you black rascal, why did'nt you stop that ball?" cried the soldier to whom the coat belonged, shaking his fist at the negro, with a mock look of anger.

"Ky!" exclaimed the black, slowly recovering from the alarm into which he had been thrown. "Ky! what a shot! It might ha' carried off dis chile, for sartin sure. Golly! look at the coat, massa McDaniel!"

The soldier looked in the direction which the negro indicated, and beheld his coat firmly lodged in the branches of a live oak tree, some distance to the rear of the entrenchments.

"No harm's done," said the bold fellow, coolly handing his match to Jasper, while he stooped and drank from a bucket at his feet. "The coat has only changed pegs, so as not to be in so exposed a situation. However, Cæsar, you look out that those thieving cannon balls don't make love to it altogether."

"Oh, yea, massa McDaniel, me look out for dat," answered the black.

"And look here, you scamp, be off and get a supply of Jamaica," said Jasper, kicking over the bucket, which the last draught of McDaniel had emptied of its contents.

"And request the colonel to have it strong and sweet," remarked Marion, with a grim smile. "The poor fellows here are half-dead with the furnace-like heat. Be off, now, Cæsar."

"And look ye, Cæsar," said McDaniel, as the negro passed him, "can't you manage to get back my coat from yonder tree? It's a new one, and belongs to the State."

"Ky!" cried the black: "me hope there's no more cannon balls comin'. Dey has a peculiar way of frightenin' dis darkey. Howsomdever, me gets the coat for you, Massa McDaniel."

So saying, and burdened with the importance of his double commission, Cæsar started off to the center of the fortifications, where sat Colonel Moultrie, pipe in mouth, superintending the mixing of a huge tub of "grog," composed of Jamaica spirits and water, to the preparation of "half-and-half," and sweetened with molasses, in the manner that the Yankees manufacture "black-strap." The colonel was in the most calm and placid state imaginable, albeit that the sweltering rays of a Carolina sun were blazing all around him, and at the same time an attack of gout under which he was laboring, smote him at intervals with the most agonizing twinges. But not one who looked upon the brave commander could detect anything but the most determined sang-froid and good humor—save, indeed, when some spasm of pain, sharper than the rest, forced an involuntary exclamation from his lips.

"Well, Cæsar—you want more grog. What were you all shouting and laughing for, like madmen, a moment since?"

"Golly, wish Massa Moultrie had seen it," chuckled the negro, as he deposited his empty bucket beside the tub. "Ky, what a shot dat was, for sartain sure!"

"Well, Cæsar, what was it?"

"Why, you see, massa, dat ar' Sergeant McDaniel's soger-coat got took up by de cannon ball, and off she fly into yonder oak!" and the negro pointed to where, in the distance, could be seen the military coat, dangling from a branch of the tree.

Moultrie joined heartily in the laugh of those around him, as they heard Cæsar's detail of the manner in which the coat was snatched almost from his grasp, and then ordering the black's bucket to be refilled with the fragrant beverage, proceeded, in his playful way, to superintend the manufacture of the article, while continually giving his orders to the men at the black-muzzled twenty-fours, and dropping words of encouragement to the half-fainting, poor fellows, who had sustained the heat of the morning's action.

Cæsar, loaded with his bucket of grog, proceeded on his return to Marion's post, but recollecting the commission of Sergeant McDaniel, to regain his coat, the honest negro thought that he would make a trifling detour from his direct path, in order to gain the rear of the fort, where was the oak tree that had arrested the marauding cannon ball.

At this stage of the engagement the fighting on both sides was awfully severe. An incessant cannonade was kept up by the two fifty-gun ships, which, with springs on their cables, rode at anchor off the fort; and one of which, the Bristol, was the flag-ship of Sir Peter Parker. Supporting these, with the whole force of their metal, were four heavily-mounted frigates; while a bomb-ketch, with the significant title of the "Thunder," brought her terrible machinery to bear upon the island, and vomited her blazing shells in a continual shower into the fort.

The interior soil of the fort towards the rear, and opposite the near strip of land called "Long Island," was formed of swampy earth, and soft morass, interspersed with a patch of solid ground, from which sprang a thick growth of myrtle and palmetto-trees, bordered by scattering live oak trunks.

Across this swampy portion the negro took his way, in order to reach the tree, on which the soldier's coat still hung. Carefully balancing the bucket of punch, Cæsar picked his way along, untroubled by the hail of shot which rattled over him; and exchanging, as he went, quick repartees with the wearied soldiers, who passed him every moment, breathing themselves a brief space, away from the ramparts.

"Take care of the bomb shells, smutty face," said a half-naked rifleman, who was cutting a palmetto stick to replace a ramrod that had been carried from his hand by a chain-shot.

"And take care of the grog even if you should kick the bucket," remarked another wild looking fellow, who was munching a quarter loaf.

"Hi-yi," cried Cæsar, "neber you mind. Dis soldier-chile ar'n't afeard of Jonny Bull-dog."

"Take care, Sambo!" exclaimed the first speaker, as a heavy shell appeared above their heads, describing its curving descent amid the smoke with a line of light. "Look out for your head, you black scamp!"

Cæsar glanced aloft and beheld the terrible implement of war hovering immediately above him, and ready to surge down upon his apparently devoted skull.

"Ky!" yelled the black, springing, with a sudden effort to the right, and sinking up to his waist in the black mud of the morass.

At the same instant down crashed the heavy bomb shell, burying itself completely in the mire beside him, and becoming extinguished instantaneously by the moist ooze of the swamp.

"Dat fire is put out for sartain sure," cried Cæsar, struggling to regain his footing, and still firmly holding the bucket, which had lost scarce a gill of its refreshing contents.

"You've had a narrow escape, darkey," remarked the soldier who had been munching his bread. "Now give us a taste of your grog, and get along with you."

So saying, the man assisted Cæsar upon terra-firma, and helping himself to a mug of the liquor, with which he washed down the last morsel of his loaf, turned away toward the batteries.

But the negro had had sufficient experience of the dangers of swamp navigation, under a shower of shells, to make him little anxious to pursue his course toward the location of McDaniel's coat; so, hastily relieving himself of as much of the black mud as he could easily detach, he once more caught up the bucket, and returned to Marion's quarters.

Hot and heavy was the battle at this point, which was, in fact, one of the least covered portions of the fortifications. But Marion was there, and his undaunted demeanor was reflected from all his brave men. At the moment of Cæsar's appearance with the supply of refreshment, many a longing look was cast at the brimming bucket, by the well nigh exhausted cannoniers. But at that moment, too, Marion beheld, through a break in the rolling cloud of smoke, that the commodore's ship had swung half round, and presented her entire stern to a raking fire. Quick as lightning every gun was pointed, and brought to bear upon the exposed vessel. The word passed like electricity along the line, and a murderous fire followed—every shot of which reached its destination.

"Look to the commodore!"

That cry was answered by a volume of flaming jets, and a crashing explosion that shook the entire island. Then followed a wild shout from the fort's defenders, and then came a dead silence.

That silence was unbroken for the space of five minutes. It was during this interval that the last remaining round of powder was served out to the defenders, and a dispatch immediately sent to Governor Rutledge, at the city, for a new supply. The British, listening for a new discharge, and hearing it not, fancied that the ammunition of the Americans was entirely gone, and a loud cheer from the frigate's crew attested their anticipation of a speedy triumph.

But they reckoned without counting. The next moment came a rush of flame and crashing shot from the whole front of the island, that dealt ruin and destruction through their ships and crews. Their cheers were silenced at once.

But they answered! They answered with the united metal of five ships. The island rocked to its center with the tremendous explosion. The smoke was lifted suddenly up and dispersed above the heads of the combatants, forming, as the sun's rays struggled through it, a canopy like yellow gauze.

The strange scene of battle was, for a moment, visible to all. The forest of British masts rising out of the dim atmosphere, with a thousand banners streaming from them; the grim forms of the opposing fighters; the rude line of fortifications; all could be, for an instant, discerned. And in the center of the American ramparts, their brave defenders could behold, floating calmly and serene over the strife, the fair flag of Carolina, which Moultrie himself had designed—a single field of blue, with a silver crescent in the right corner.

Marion pointed to the beautiful banner, as its folds unrolled and waved over the defenders. Jasper's breast heaved, and the brave Sergeant McDaniel, springing before the embrasure, raised his blue foraging cap from his manly brow.

At this instant came another terrible broadside from the foe. The iron storm swept over the ramparts which protected the American soldiers. But the gallant McDaniel's breast was before the embrasure, near which he stood, and as he raised his cap to greet the flag of freedom, a cannon ball rushed through the aperture, and stretched him dying before his comrades.

Jasper was at his side in a second, and Marion grasped his hand as he fell. The poor fellow's mouth and nostrils were gushing blood. He strove feebly to rise, but could not, and the arms of two soldiers raised him from the platform.

"I die," he murmured, as he was borne away, while his eye gleamed with the last fire of patriotism. "I die, comrades, but you fight on—for liberty and our country!"

At this crisis a low, fearful murmur ran through the American ranks, and all eyes were turned, as if instinctively, toward the flag. It hung, seemingly, by a single splinter, trembling and ready to fall. A cannon ball had shattered the staff, and Moultrie's silver crescent was hidden from the view, as the folds waved in the air. The next moment it fell without the ramparts, and upon the beach.

The hearts of the Americans sank within them, and a new shout of exultation rose from the enemy's crews.

But Jasper beheld that flag!

Jasper, while his bosom yet swelled with the proud delight with which he had beheld the fair banner unroll above the conflict, saw, with a stifled cry, its fall. He leaped upon the battlements; he raised his hand as if in appeal to heaven, then waved it to his countrymen, and plunged downward to the beach.

The crashing broadsides of the British ships daunted not Sergeant Jasper. The furious shower of bombs, cannon balls, and other missiles that plowed the ramparts and beach around him, stayed not the brave soldier's course. He passed along the entire length of the batteries, until he reached the banner. Then, while the four hundred hearts above him stood still from anxiety, he knelt beside that flag and disengaged it from its shattered staff.

The man seemed to bear a charmed life, for not a shot struck him, though hundreds fell thickly around. He called for a sponge-staff to be thrown from the fortress; and there, upon the beach, fastened it to the recovered banner. Then, waving it over his head, Jasper mounted the fortifications, and planted it once more proudly over his comrades' heads—the fair flag of America.

Thousands, on the island and in the city, had witnessed the disappearance of that banner, and their souls had sunk within them. But such a mighty shout as arose from Sullivan's Island when the blue folds spread themselves again to view, never was drowned by the roar of artillery. It was the AMERICAN HURRAH!

THE PASSING BELL.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

"Tis shut of eve; around me wave the flowers;
The merry birds troll forth their vesper hymn,
Leaf-cradled safely in their dark green bowers;
The distant trees appear like shadows dim.
Marched along the twilight's starry brow,
To hear yon bell's sad sound, and, at each pause,
to bow.

I hear the distant din of laughing boys,
As home they journey bearing boughs of May;
Then comes the far-off city's ocean-noise,
Swelling and falling like the waves at play;
And on mine ear bursts loud above that hum,
Yon dull, dead, dreary bell's slow-swinging, tomb-toned boom.

But who is dead? nought here that tale can tell:
The quiet kine around me silent lie,
The night breeze creeps along each wild flower's bell,
No more the bleating lambs bound lightly by;
The hawthorn homes of lute-tongued birds are still,
While yon heart-chilling bell peals loudly o'er the hill.

Is some old man torn tottering to the grave,
Who seldom left his hearth, but sat in gloom,
Watching the swinging pendulum's measured wave, Counting those strokes that nearer brought the tomb,
Who had seen three-score springs, for aye now past,
Yet never once had thought the next might be his last?

Or some poor pauper, kept on niggard pay,
Scarce clothed or fed while he on earth did stir;
Who'll to the grave with speed be borne away,
Scarce clothed in death, so thin his house of fir:
Down the cold earth they'll drop his wide-chinked bier,
No pause, no sigh, no friend to shed a farewell tear!

Or some fair maid who oft had thought of spring,
And gazed with hope upon the wintry sky;
Oft heard in fancy the first blackbird sing,
And saw imagined flowers round her lie;
Thought of green walks, and morning's rosy breath,
Nor deemed thus soon she'd fall a prey to hungry Death?

Perchance some youth had won her heart to love,
And she had smiled when sunny days drew near,
And sighed for green-arched woods, where cooed
the dove,
Answered by falling waters cool and clear;
Had seen the virgin primrose angel-eyed,
And when the pale flower droop'd, her beauty with it died.

Might not that bell have flung its death-cold peal
Upon her ear before the spirit fled—
Causing a tremor o'er her limbs to steal?
How would she gaze on those around her bed!
Grave-shouting bell! thy sound would on her rest
Like pitchy darkness dropped on noon-day's sunlit breast.

Oh! it is hard to die when the young trees
Burst forth in beauty with their emerald buds—
When the first blossoms tremble to the breeze,
And bird to bird calls through the flowery woods,
When silvery clouds sail o'er the sleeping wave—
Oh! it is hard to lie deep in the silent grave.

Deep in the grave, far, far beneath the flowers,
From shady lanes, and walks with those we love—
Those whose light feet still dance in leaf-roofed bowers;

Haunts of the nightingale, and low-voiced dove,
The glens, and glades, and dells where violets
bloom:

All these to be exchanged for the cold, voiceless
tomb.

To be pent up within a narrow cell,
With damps, and coffin-worms, and silent death,
Where not one ray of light can ever dwell,
And if we wake, no air to give us breath;
Year after year to lie 'neath that gray tower,
From whence the watchman, Time, looks out, and calls the hour.

To-day a thousand forms walked forth in white,
A thousand feet did tread the mazy dance,
A thousand eyes beamed blue, and soft, and bright,
And in the ring did lip to lip advance.
Even now I hear the dancers gaily bound,
While I am here alone, listening to yon sad sound.

Alone! alone!—why should I wish them sad?
Time hurries on, his brow deep wrapt in gloom.
Brief is the sunny beam that makes us glad:
'Tis but the ray that glances on the tomb,
Mocking its depths with transitory light,
Then vanishing away in deep, eternal night.

Hush! voice of death! thou makest my blood run cold;

The very wind seems frightened as it blows,
And the dark earth a grave, but made to hold
All it contains; the darkness darker grows
And warns me home, awhile to rest my head,
Then join the unbroken sleep, amid the silent dead.

Popular Tales.

THE FATAL MISTAKE.

AN ITALIAN TALE.

It was mid-day in Verona; the season, summer; the air, warm, close, voluptuous, between the double lines of stately palaces which adorned the magnificent old city, but quickening into life and playful activity, as it stole over the gardens and terraces which fringed the broad and rapid Adige.

The streets were hushed in the mid-day quietude of southern climes; the few pedestrians loitered with noiseless steps; the richly-chiseled marble palaces, (their projecting balconies shaded with overhanging drapery, unruffled by breeze or zephyr,) seemed to slumber on the deep-cast shadows; the long-bearded, tattered mendicant reposed with closed eyes against the church pillar, or encumbered the cool steps, where the sun's rays fell not, nor found access.

In such an hour, what makes the noble count—the brave Lorenzo Della Scala—quitting his palazzo, seek to breathe the hot air of the streets? Trace Verona through, who should be held happier than Della Scala? Of illustrious birth, claiming descent from rulers of the city in the olden times, with wide-spread reputation, acquired by the conduct of armies in Germanic warfare, he returned to his native place, still young, though of years beyond the opening flush of manhood, to live in the respect of the citizens, to taste the enjoyment of long-neglected wealth, amid the splendor of a Veronese palazzo, or the deep seclusion of forest-girt villas and pavilions. Scarcely domiciled in his patrimonial mansion, he fell in love with Bianca Guidoni, sole daughter of the count of that name. Lorenzo first beheld her at a fiesta di campagna, at her father's suburban villa, was smitten with her youth and beauty, while the nascent passion was enhanced and piqued by the indifference and coldness with which she—the center of a host of worshippers—treated their lavish attentions. Such pride, and reserve, he thought, would well become the house of Della Scala; and so—impetuous in love as in war—he sought the maiden, poured forth his passion, and construing her embarrassed replies favorably, betook himself to her father, by whom he was accepted as his future son-in-law.

The Count Guidoni, anxious not to compromise the offer of so rich a suitor, or suffer accident or contingency to intervene, hurried on the marriage, as regardless of the presumed or known state of his daughter's affections as a despotic father, or Italian noble—whose word in his own household was law even to death—could by harsh, precipitate conduct evince. So Bianca was wedded, and, amidst the costly magnificence which distinguished the ceremonies of the Veronese nobility, installed mistress of the Palazzo Della Scala.

Why, therefore, in the third week of marriage, should the noble Lorenzo be found walking lonely through Verona's streets at an hour consecrated by the Italians to repose, or the quietude of domestic intercourse? Certainly it bespoke a restless spirit. The count was indeed sorely troubled, his pride hurt by the indifference of his young wife. Though the wooing was short, and certainly on his part rather unceremonious, he had married the countess for beauty, in utter absence of sordid motive or consideration; and believing, in his pride, it must be confessed, rather than in his judgment, that he had made a favorable impression on her affections, his expectations of wedded happiness were as feasible as ardent. But, alas! for short-lived hope—the affection was not reciprocated. Bianca was dutiful, obedient, attentive to his wishes—no wife could be more so—yet her conduct was ever cold, constrained, and devoid of affection. He missed the happiness he sought, which he perhaps thought his due after years of warlike fatigue, and often wandered forth a secret prey to discontent and gloomy forebodings.

In this mood, chance and desire of solitude led him to the margin of the Adige, to seek amid the shade of the river's embowered banks the tranquillity which he found not at home. To avoid recognition by a group of cavaliers lounging, after the fashion of the hour, in a pavilion near to and overlooking the circling stream, though high above his banks, he bent his steps to a small path which intersected, amid flowering shrubs and underwood, a narrow space between the base of the edifice and the edge of the water. As he was passing beneath, his footsteps unheard on the soft velvet turf, the echo of his own name from the pavilion caused the count to pause.

"For rarest beauty," continued the speaker, "I give the palm to Ubaldini—her face is Juno's own. The Signora—I mean, as you may suppose, the old man's wife, Signora Cavalcanti; she, I allow, is peerless in form and figure; but Della Scala I would crown Queen of Grace and witching elegance!"

"Bravo, Guiseppe!" cried another, "thy eloquence is warm and luscious, like the hour; but Della Scala is too cold and reserved for my fancy; I worship the Cavalcanti—my very soul is in bondage to Signora Cavalcanti. O! that I could wrest her from the old man's arms!"

"And what is the harshness of thy fate to mine?" uttered a fresh voice, in deep sepulchral tone, mocking the passion of the last speaker. "My very body is in bondage to Signor Cavalcanti—I owe old Plutus eight thousand crowns—O! that I could wrest my attested bond from the old man's money chest!"

Lorenzo had been absent many years from his native city; his acquaintance with youthful cavaliers of his own rank was necessarily very slight, and of the prevailing themes of scandal, and of its victims, he was almost wholly ignorant; but it was easy to perceive he was listening to a group of young coxcombs, endowed with the arrogance and mendacity characteristic of the class; and Della Scala would fain have walked onward with a sneer on his mustached lip—but no! he was no longer master of himself. A thorn was in his side—the venom of distempered fancy already at work—and he heaved a sigh of self-reproach, as he felt himself riveted to the spot.

"It would be well for the peace of our poor Visconti," exclaimed one in a sentimental tone, "if he could transfer his passion to his universal idol, Cavalcanti—but he has been frantic since his return from Spain, to find his Bianca wife of the proud count."

"What does the lover deserve who seeks the Spanish shore, when he should be watching nearer home?" asked Giuseppe.

The reply of Visconti's friend was to the purpose, that he believed himself safe in that quarter, so long as Francesca, the artful, intriguing Francesca, attendant and waiting-woman of Bianca, remained faithful to his interests. She had sufficient art to scare away a fresh lover, and was in the pay of Visconti.

As the young cavalier proved himself so well acquainted with his friends affairs, and seemed much disposed to babble thereon, he was not suffered to remain silent, but plied with fresh questions, till the whole detail of the lover's history was laid bare to the chagrined and enraged listener beneath. It appeared Guidoni was not altogether ignorant of his daughter's attachment; but as he had never countenanced the Signor Alberto Visconti, he was not disposed to make his love for Bianca an obstacle to the suit of the rich and illustrious Della Scala. The repugnance of the daughter, and the finesse and stratagem of the waiting-maid, were of no avail against a despotic father, more especially in the absence of the lover, who might have conjured a more desperate resistance to paternal authority.

"I know Visconti well," exclaimed his friend, "and he would never have suffered the shame of that marriage if he had been in Verona."

"Indeed!" muttered Lorenzo between his teeth. His hand grasped the hilt of his poniard, but he quickly recovered his presence of mind, and was again an attentive listener.

"It matters little," observed one of the party sarcastically, "what he would have done if he had been here, the all-important question is, what will he do now? Can you answer that, Signor Jeronimo Fabrizio?"

"Can you tell when the fox was ever caught sleeping?" replied Fabrizio, contemptuously. "Visconti has too much prudence, caution, and reserve, to suffer his plans to travel to your ears!"

"If he show as much prudence in future movements as he exhibits caution in choice of a confidant," remarked the other, "he will speed as well as those ought to do who deposit secrets with the discreet Signor Fabrizio!—but see!—the pinnace heaves in sight—who will follow me?"

"Stay, you have forgotten, signor," exclaimed his antagonist, in anger, "take that with you."

Lorenzo, from his place of concealment, heard a slight, whizzing noise, as though a missile had been flung by Fabrizio at the offender. It was followed by the reiterated cries of the party that they would have no quarreling on that day, but all should embark in the pinnace. The count took occasion of the confusion, and stole away unperceived.

"His Bianca!" muttered Della Scala, as he walked gloomily onward. "Visconti's Bianca! Have a care, Alberto Visconti! thy ancestors and mine fought for the mastery of Verona; wilt thou revive the old feud?"

But anger gave way to grief, as he contemplated the abyss in which his happiness was wrecked. The coldness and constraint of Bianca were now fearfully, harrowingly, accounted for. Why was he kept ignorant of what was already common talk? Had the house of Della Scala no friend or kinsman to warn its chief? Was he, then, a dupe of the avaricious Guidoni? But if he were a dupe of the old man, shall he continue blind to the threatened practices of Visconti? Let him look to it, and dread the vengeance of Della Scala!

The count's thoughts gave accelerated speed to his movements; he retraced his way to the city, endeavoring to conceal, by open brow, the agony of his heart. The streets of Verona were now alive with the busy steps of citizens—the stately signor or magnifico walked heedless of the continually recurring mendicant's prayer from porch or pillar, par amo di Dio, while the signora, whether masked, veiled, or disclosing her features, accompanied by ancient attendant or youthful waiting-maid, tripped up with livelier step, yet found leisure to listen to and requite the vagrant's appeal—perchance through pure charity—perchance out of propitiation—perhaps invoking indulgence toward sinful nature—or, may be, as deed of atonement for past peccadillo. Approaching the church of San Zeno, Lorenzo saw, among others, ascending the steps, a lady so much resembling the Countess Bianca, in figure and deportment, that he felt certain of the identity. He smiled with contempt. For whom prays she? if for herself, it is well—she needs it; for her father, for me? no, no! the one she deems a cold, tyrannical old man; the other, an obstacle to her passion. For Visconti, dare she offer prayers! Ah! let both beware!

He entered the church, still impelled by jealousy, lest her visit to the sanctuary were the fulfilment of an assignation, and prompted by savage curiosity to pry unseen on devotions, which to him, wore the semblance of profanity and mockery. In the spacious interior, there was scarcely a chapel or shrine without one or more votaries, deeply absorbed in silent prayer, all unheeding of the many visitors, whose only aim was to escape the wearisomeness of idleness, or enjoy the cooler air and pavement of the holy precincts. Lorenzo at length beheld the lady he sought, kneeling at the entrance to a small chapel, decorated with a large painting of the Blessed Virgin, represented in the act of bestowing alms on the aged and destitute. He approached stealthily, and stopping at only a short distance from the suppliant, stood gazing at her with strong yet suppressed emotion. Her veil was uplifted—the face presently averted momentarily from the shrine; he drew back to avoid being seen, but the clatter on the pavement caused her to look in that direction—it was not Bianca! To escape the imputation of being a spy upon the lady's actions, he feigned to have been deeply engrossed with the pictorial embellishment of the shrine; but the fair dame once disturbed, renewed not her devotions; perhaps being frightened by the presence of the cavalier. She crossed herself devoutly, and hastily withdrew.

What tempts Lorenzo to linger before that picture? He looked long, earnestly, sadly, even till a tear came to the eye! True, it is the Holy Virgin assuaging the sorrows of crowding petitioners, while others, recipients of relief, are hastening joyfully away. The Catholic hierarchy, with subtlest policy, ever employed the ideal breathing pencil of genius to array the Virgin with tenderness and grace more than human, so that the portraiture wore a divine beatific aspect. Was it this character that moved Lorenzo? Not wholly, but the secret charm was in the strong resemblance borne to the Countess Bianca. They were her features, be-attified, purged from trace of earthly passion. The masters of the art were accustomed to paint from nature, even for ideal subjects; perhaps an ancestress of Bianca was chosen "to sit" for the representation on which Della Scala now gazed. He looked, the eyes of Bianca beamed mildly, innocently upon him, suffused with that divine, tender light, snatched only by genius in moments of inspiration. The heart of the Italian was softened, jealously was buried in saddened admiration. Should he not, he at length asked himself, yet endeavor to win Bianca to the bosom of her lord? It was not her crime that she loved another ere she beheld him. She was yet innocent in act, if not in intention, and might yet be recovered to a sense of duty first, and then affection! One jarring discord alone broke the harmony of his thoughts; it was as the images of Visconti and the pert, intriguing favorite of Bianca stole upon the mental vision. His fingers crept toward his breast, his lips writhed, but anger lasted only a moment—he bent reverently and lowly before the shrine, and left the arching domes of old San Zeno.

Evening approached, and the count was ascending the staircase which conducted to the principal floor in the Palazzo Della Scala, with the intention of visiting the countess, when Francesca suddenly presented herself in the act of passing down. The count had taken a secret dislike to Francesca, even before he heard her character so freely commented on in the pavilion; her features were handsome, her form light, elegant, attractive, but an expression of deep cunning and espiègterie, from which the face was never wholly free, counterbalanced the effect of high personal charms—at least in the eyes of a husband whose wife had chosen such an attendant. Francesca started on seeing the magnifico: she murmured a few words expressive of intention to acquaint the countess of his approach, and was about to retreat up the staircase for that purpose, when Della Scala seized her by the wrist.

"Nay," he exclaimed, looking intently at the girl, "I will be my own herald; you may retire."

Francesca uttered a slight scream, accompanied by a contortion of features expressive of physical pain, which first made the count aware that he had unconsciously grasped her wrist with extreme violence; it was, indeed, a grip worthy to embrace throat of Turk or Tartar in mortal conflict, but far beyond the endurance of alim Christian maiden. He smiled at this proof of emotion, and told Francesca, in kindly strain, that she should have a bracelet of gold to hide the bruise. The waiting-woman's evident eagerness to prepare her mistress for the visit re-awoke Lorenzo's jealousy; but pride and love strove with the bitter passion, mastered it, and so Della Scala determined not to intrude his suspicions on the countess's privacy, but retired to his own chamber, and sent an attendant to notify his purposed visit.

Bianca rose to meet her lord, but she could not sustain his ardent glance; her eyes fell, her step faltered, and she could scarcely find speech to welcome him. He led her to the window which overlooked the garden of the palazzo. The perfumed air, rich with the fragrant breath of flowers, was wafted over the saloon; the red light of the departing orb of day threw its golden shafts across the cool verdure of the lawn, flickered over the scroll-work of the chamber, lit up and surrounded the face of Bianca with a halo which concealed its deadly paleness and dismay. The count gazed with admiration; illumined by the rich glow, the features became angelic, like the Madonna of the shrine.

"Bianca," he exclaimed, "when the guests unmask to-morrow at midnight, at the Palazzo Cavalcanti, let these pearls reflect the softened luster of a brow—Verona's boast and Della Scala's pride!"

"How large and lustrous!" said Bianca, bending over the gift, the rather that her eyes might not encounter the glance of Lorenzo; "such as these, nay, not so large, came lately from Aleppo, brought there by the Indian caravan, and were sent to Venice. Not finding a buyer there, the goldsmith came to Verona with his rich freight, and every day, as the countess tells me, Count Ubaldini feasts his eyes upon them, tells his wife at evening what a rich second dower he will bring home on the morrow, but when morning comes he shakes his head, talks of the mortgage on his forest lands, and bids her wait another day."

"I know it well, Bianca," rejoined Lorenzo, "these are the pearls which Ubaldini dallied with, and now his countess loses. I bought them this afternoon, after a prayer for the welfare of our house, put up in old San Zeno."

"I cannot go to Cavalcanti's house; O! no! I am sure not," cried Bianca, hysterically; "O! pray excuse me!" And she burst into tears.

Lorenzo, at first deeply angered by the sudden intimation of staying away from Cavalcanti's festa, was softened by her tears; and leading the countess away from the window, grew alarmed at her continued hysterical sobbing. With vain fondness he believed her heart was touched, that it struggled against its affection for Visconti, that she was moved by the solicitude shown by him to whom alone affection was due. He endeavored to soothe her by painting the future in the brightest colors, displaying sources of happiness yet at command; but his eloquence proved in vain, its reiteration seemed to add to her misery. She pleaded illness, and prayed to be left alone, that repose would bring back her wonted spirits, which had, she knew not how, fallen into a melancholy train. If Della Scala would but leave her till the morning, she said, sinking on her knee, she would meet him with happier face, and thank him for all he had done to make her happy.

"The Countess Della Scala," exclaimed Lorenzo, in a tone grave, though not unkind, "is not a child asking a blessing of a parent. Let her remember her own dignity; the most illustrious in Verona; to her all hearts vow honorable fealty and courtesy. It is hers to command, not to entreat! Signora," he added, with an attempt at a smile, "I obey your request, and take my leave; yet fail not to send for Agostino."

He led her to a seat, and again pressing her to command the attendance of the house physician, quitted the saloon with the deference of a gallant lover.

Bianca reposed on a rich couch, her beauty disordered with weeping. It was night, and the saloon was illumined by the many-branching luster. Francesca stood beside her mistress.

"This is no more than I expected, signora, from his visit," said the favorite, "a demon's fire glowed in his eyes when I met him, which made me tremble for you, signora—the incarnate brute!"

"Whom mean you, Francesca?" cried the countess, starting up.

"Whom should I mean, signora, but the count?" replied the girl.

"You do him wrong, Alberto does him wrong; you are both bent on my ruin," cried Bianca, with eyes flashing indignation; "have I not told you all he said, how tenderly he spoke, those princely pearls he gave? Alas! ungrateful wretch that fate has made me!"

"Yes," uttered Francesca, with a sneer, "and I can boast his gifts, a gold bracelet, and for what? Look at this arm, signora; this is the work of the tender Count Della Scala! There may not be more generosity in the gift to the mistress. But let us forget the proud tyrant. I have news, good news in store; Alberto prays to see you this evening in the garden, at the same hour he saw the signora last night."

"Did I not solemnly declare, Francesca," cried Bianca, grasping her maid's arm with frenzied agitation, "did I not vow that last night should be the first and last interview I granted Alberto—till—till—"

"Till the signor was prepared to carry us both off to some happier land," cried the attendant; "I know it well! but my lady gripes as tightly as the count."

Bianca flung off the woman contemptuously.

"I meet rare treatment at all hands!" remarked Francesca, in petulant tone; "I had well nigh forgot the signor's letter."

"Where, where is it?" cried Bianca with eagerness.

The countess snatched her lover's epistle, and retiring to a distance, read it o'er and o'er till her eyes melted into tears. Francesca watched with secret joy the effect of Visconti's soft pleading. Bianca's heart again renewed the fetters which bound her to her first love.

"Yet I cannot, dare not see him to-night!" exclaimed she, unconsciously giving utterance to the thought.

"I dread telling poor Alberto this," said Francesca, who overheard the soliloquy; "not see him! How often has he lamented to me his bitter fate, deprived of the delight when you stole to see him, after the old Count Guidoni had gone to rest; and those moonlight walks on the shore of the lake in the Tyrol! Poor signor! he is not the same gentleman he used to be before his fatal journey. Did not my lady mark the change?"

In this strain continued the artful Francesca, when she found Bianca was touched, bringing to fond memory all happy, blissful records, when love was innocent, or guilty of no higher crime than refraining to seek a harsh father's disapproving glance. Bianca's heart was torn in twain: Lorenzo's generosity, still more, his lofty disinterestedness, won upon her gratitude, if not her love. But alas! she had, as she confessed, yielded the previous evening to an interview with Visconti. It took place in a balcony which overlooked the garden, whither her daring lover had ventured, spite of the imminent danger. Reluctantly she consented; assent was only won by Francesca declaring Alberto's intention, in the event of refusal, to force his way through the palazzo and die at her feet. But this fatal meeting served to rivet the links of a passion now criminal. Alberto, warned of her irresolution and wavering, was not slow to detail his scheme of flying with her and Francesca to Spain, where were situate his lately acquired estates, and to gain possession of which had caused the disastrous journey. Once beyond reach of Della Scala, or the Veronese or Venetian authorities, leisure would be afforded to set at work his interest with the Spanish court to procure a dispensation from Rome, annulling her marriage with Lorenzo, on the plea of being forced to the union by a despotic father, when she was, as it might be well averred, secretly betrothed to the absent Visconti. Francesca, in such a suit, would prove an invaluable witness, her zeal readily supplying what was wanting in her testimony. The time selected by Alberto was nightfall, when all Verona would be in commotion with the bustle of guests approaching the magnificent masked festa. The countess and her attendant might easily pass through the streets, masked, without especial observation, and repair to the spot where Visconti would be waiting with horses and servants. A sloop, well manned, was in readiness at a small port, and would be under weigh as soon as they were on board, long ere pursuit was available. The countess, as Alberto suggested, might accompany Della Scala to the palazzo, mix a while with the guests, then retire to where the faithful Francesca stood prepared to escort her mistress. Nay, if the signora thought Lorenzo would grow jealous if he missed his wife's mask at an early hour, it might be remedied by hiring one, in the same costume, and bearing resemblance to the figure and style of the countess, to wear the disguised honors of the house of Della Scala. Several, he knew, would play the part to admiration, and take a pleasure in it, without knowing more than need safely be told.

Such was the nature of the proposed elopement, consented to by Bianca amid weeping and fainting. Attend the festa! accompany Lorenzo, to quit him with such bitter mockery, she could not! He was, indeed, worthy of a love which she could not requite—but his affection she dare not so coldly insult. Then must she plead illness! Poor Bianca! with lover, dearly loved, at thy feet, threatening to slay himself if thou dost not link thyself with his fortunes; and the artful serpent of thy own sex, with skilful pleading, making the worse appear the better reason, what snares beset thee! It was the day subsequent to this interview that witnessed the meeting we have narrated, between Bianca and her lord. Noble Lorenzo! wert thou not a day too late! What might not have been hoped, if thou hadst displayed thy generous feelings but one day earlier.

The distracted Bianca was but too glad when Della Scala quitted her presence—she was humbled, even to the dust, by the consciousness of her criminal hypocrisy—penetrated with a keen sense of the wrong and misery she was about to inflict on one who, at her hands, deserved a happier fate. It was Visconti's letter which, while a prey to remorse after Lorenzo quitted her, had recalled her resolution and rekindled the lamp of life and affection. That handwriting! the sight of which, in days gone by, gave such intense delight, now renewed old and irresistible associations. He should linger, he said, through the evening, hovering near the palazzo with the hope that she would grant even but a moment's interview; but if cruel prudence forbade, then let her remember, that on the evening of the morrow, so soon as Della Scala had departed—a sharp watch should be kept on the count's exit—he would repair to the little balcony, close to the door leading to the domestic offices, and ring the bell as a signal for Francesca to appear above. On receiving assurance that no obstacle interposed delay, his intention was to retire immediately to the shrine of Santa Croce—a wayfarer's ruined chapel beyond the walls of the city—where horses and two faithful domestics would be in waiting. It might excite suspicion, he said, if he joined the countess immediately she quitted the palazzo. But should any obstacle occur—as Della Scala through sickness or jealous feeling staying at home, or remaining on the watch—then let Francesca await his appearance beneath the balcony, but forewarn him by signal at the post whence he intended to watch the count's departure. Impressing these precautionary measures on Bianca, the epistle relapsed into the lever's strain. Francesca, beholding her mistress resolute not to see Visconti that night, and foreseeing the danger of too much pressing, which might occasion a relapse favorable to Lorenzo's happiness, she immediately undertook to pacify Alberto with the assurance that all matters should be ordered as advised.

Night closed upon the Palazzo Della Scala, but peace and calm repose were banished from its walls! Lorenzo, on leaving his countess, quitted her with mind ill at ease. He was vexed that he had not succeeded better with Bianca; there was a mystery in her conduct which he could not unravel. It was plain his munificence, joined to solicitude which she could not mistake, moved her—had caused distress of mind, to cover which she pleaded sickness. But yet, there was no effort made to soothe him, to carry hope to his heart! How delighted would he have been with the bare intimation that she must strive to regain health to accompany him the following night! But no, on bended knee she pleads fatigue, and craves till to-morrow—to join in his pursuits, share his happiness? alas! no—coldly to thank her lord for all he had done to make her happy. Restless with these sad reflections, he sought not chamber or study, but strayed out in the cool air of evening. Occasional solitude had become habitual. While general of a numerous and well disciplined army, many a time had he strolled at night, alone, through the camp, reviewing past enterprises, maturing the steps of future achievement. Now, in Verona's streets, was brought to mind how oft in the hush of the tented field had he thought of home, of the happiness that might be enjoyed there!

But who is that damsel tripping by so stealthily! The air and step are familiar to the count. It is Francesca! Whither strays she? Her appearance in the street at that hour, when evening is fading into night, bodes no good. He watches closely—follows her steps, hidden by the shade of lofty walls. She is accosted by a cavalier—they confer a while—he hands a letter, which she places away carefully, and then returns toward the palazzo. The cavalier departs in an opposite direction. Lorenzo hangs on his footsteps, tracks him from street to street, till the stranger halts at the portal of the dwelling in which Signor Visconti has resided since his return from Spain.

"Thy hour, Visconti, has not yet come," muttered Lorenzo, as he turned on his heel; "but it approaches on quickened wing."

The dark cloud again lowered over the domestic fortunes of Lorenzo. He could not, would not, believe Bianca in correspondence with the enemy to his peace; but he could not avoid the conviction that, as Visconti and Francesca were in league, the billet given to the latter was intended for the eye of the countess. Another pang! What if there were indeed a connection between this secret correspondence and the expressed intention of Bianca to absent herself from the masked revel? A planned assignation while he was in the halls of Cavalcanti? He could not pursue the train of thought—it was too harrowing, and suicidal of happiness.

The count was visited next morning by the family physician, to report the state of Bianca's health. The disorder, he said, was neither imminent nor dangerous; a lowness of spirits and melancholy; in fact, hysterics. To Lorenzo's question, whether she could bear the fatigue of a visit, the physician thought it advisable—though his opinion was formed from a wish hinted by the countess, rather than from the nature of the malady—that the count should defer seeing the patient. But she had one request to make, one favor to ask the count.

"Ah!" exclaimed the pleased magnifico, "it is granted ere asked."

It was to the effect, as the learned doctor said, that the count would not defer his promised pleasure of partaking of the festivities through her indisposition. It would add to her illness and distress, if she knew he stayed away.

The count let fall a bead-roll of gold, which he had been passing through his fingers.

"Is monsignor sick?" exclaimed the physician, remarking the paleness and agitation of his patron.

"No!" replied Lorenzo, impatiently. "Tell me, did the countess herself say what you have just recounted?"

The esculapian replied, that he had already quitted the signora's chamber ere the request was entrusted to his delivery by the waiting woman, Francesca.

"The accursed fiend!" exclaimed the count, emphatically. The physician betrayed a discreet surprise; but Lorenzo bade him be silent as death as to what had escaped his lips. He was then commissioned to return to the sick chamber and make happy the invalid with the assurance that Della Scala should be found among the maskers that night, and would carefully absent himself from the side of his sick wife's couch.

"Monsignor!" exclaimed the medical retainer, in an expostulatory tone.

"Nay, then, soften it as you will, Signor Agostino," rejoined Lorenzo, with a curl of the lip.

Evening approached, and the count stood alone in his dressing-room, contemplating in silence a magnificent suit of apparel, the costume of a mixed monastic and warlike order of German knighthood, of which he was a leading dignitary. This was the array chosen to adorn a form worthy to sit beside the peerless Bianca, on an occasion in which he felt touched by vanity, to display to his countrymen how improved was the half-forgotten youth who, in years long past, had forsaken the vales of sunny Italy, and dolce far niente existence, for the turbulence of grim war—how worthy to match with the loveliest mate Verona boasted!

The rich robes were presently flung aside with a bitter smile. He selected a far humbler suit, a close habit of dark velvet, sprinkled by the embroiderer's hand with leaves of gold, which, with cloak, domino-mask, and cap, without plume or decoration, completed an equipment that rather betokened intention of intrigue or adventure, than desire of reveling in the merriment and grandeur of the scene.

"Now the fox against the fox, if it must be so!" exclaimed the count sorrowfully. Over the dark cloak he threw a military mantle of bright scarlet, and surmounted the close velvet cap in ordinary with a plumed hat.

Though loth to indulge in suspicion, yet once suspecting, Lorenzo exhibited a wary, subtle spirit, which had oft outwitted the warlike foe, and now rendered him a dangerous adversary to Visconti. He made no confidant, employed no spy, lest the honor of Bianca should be compromised; but, acting on the impression that his departure would be watched, kept a wary eye, searching everywhere through the gloom in his progress to the mansion of the Signor Cavalcanti. Foiled in the survey, he entered the wide-spread doors, but turned aside from the halls of revel, and doffing mantle, mask, and plumed hat, found exit by the garden gate, and was again in Verona's streets, the dark cloak shading the face and hiding the well known figure of the count. He approached stealthily his own domicile, sometimes forced to turn aside to avoid being recognised in the glare of torch and flambeau, lighting beauty to the scene of gaiety.

The night was gloomy, but quiet—the Palazzo Della Scala in view. Should he—yes, the thought must have utterance, though it choke him—should he but find Visconti within? A shade moves along the wall; it pauses, turns the western angle, stops beneath a balcony projecting from a window, which, Della Scala remembered, gave light to a corridor leading to Bianca's suite of chambers. Will the intruder dare scale the palazzo? The count approaches warily, his hand on his poniard. Is it Visconti? No, for the stranger pulls the chain affixed to the bell—it is a love affair with some menial of the household. Ah no, it is the enemy to his honor! Lorenzo has caught a glimpse of his face. "Bianca, hasten, our moments are precious!" murmured Alberto, unconscious of his chiding soliloquy being overheard.

"Ah! that name profaned by thee!" exclaimed the count, seizing his rival by the throat.

"Della Scala!" cried Alberto, in utter alarm and confusion, feeling for his weapon.

"Visconti!" rejoined Lorenzo. The sharp dagger's stroke was the sole echo to the exclamation.

"The traitor's path—the traitor's law!" muttered the count, as he flung the inanimate, bleeding corpse out of view from the balcony window.

The frame of Lorenzo shook with the strong indignation of his soul; should he rush in, and wreak vengeance on—whom? Francesca? Bianca? Were they both guilty? Had he proof of Bianca's guilt? The window opened above, and the count stepped moodily beneath the balcony, with scarcely mastery over his feelings to practice the dissimulation. "Signor, are you below?" was whispered by the well-known voice of Francesca. Della Scala ground his teeth in silent rage; he could not speak, but his very soul was bent on knowing to what extent the tempted as well as the tempters had erred; so he thrust up his hand to intimate his presence. No words were spoken, but he felt a billet placed between his fingers, he grasped it, and the window was immediately closed. Lorenzo withdrew to the lamp suspended over the side entrance to the offices.

Good heavens! what sees he? it is the handwriting of Bianca! her own slightly traced, delicate characters! In one hour from the present, she will quit the palazzo with Francesca, meet him behind the ruined Santa Croce chapel, to fly to a happier land—may God forgive her flight!

Lorenzo was unnerved, and reclined stupified against his palazzo—it was a total wreck of happiness he experienced—no hope, no sympathy. He wept for the ruin which had fallen, which love had blinded him to! But vengeance was yet unsatisfied, its torch could only be extinguished by the punishment of all, the tempter and the tempted, the destroyer and the destroyed!

In one hour! the time was but short to prepare the means of vengeance. He had no near kinsman, no cherished friend, in whom he might confide; he was almost the only scion of the ancient house whose name he bore. With a sigh he called to his aid Roberto, a military valet who had shared the dangers of his many campaigns. By Roberto's assistance the corpse of Visconti was removed to a place of security, and the trustiest household retainers of Della Scala arrayed in secret under cover of the night.

In Bianca's dressing chamber was a silver crucifix, before which she had often bowed in prayer. How fearfully and askance she now looked at it—now, while the ready, active Francesca was preparing for flight! Poor Bianca! she would have knelt, but dare not. Sunk on her couch, she turned an idle eye on the rapid movements of the waiting maid.

"Signora, I am ready, pray have courage for the last effort!"

"Would I knew the end of this! I fear the count will die of grief!" said Bianca.

"Not he; the race of them are made of sterner stuff," replied Francesca, "but I know the ending, I have had it foretold. The signora has heard of her they call the Sybil, who lives in a tower in the Strada di Vicenza?"

"I know her not," replied the countess, with a vacant stare.

"I will relate all to the signora as we walk to the Santa Croce," said Francesca, who, seeing the necessity of acting a resolute part, tendered her arm to assist her mistress to rise. Bianca obeyed the gentle force, she cast a look toward the toilet over which hung the crucifix, but amid the golden coin which Lorenzo had placed at her disposal, her eyes encountered the casket which held his peerless gift. She hurried away, while the maid thought her mistress uttered a slight cry.

Beyond the wall of Verona, to the northward, far from any habitation, stood the ruins of the Santa Croce, where in ancient times, had dwelt a small brotherhood of monks, whose principal vocation was the dispensation of food and shelter to poor travelers, more especially pilgrims coming from the far north to visit the miraculous shrines and relics of Italy. Hither wended alone, not without fear and trembling, Bianca and her attendant, both concealed from the recognition of prying eyes by masks, and shrouded in riding-mantles.

"See, signora, they are coming to meet us!" cried Francesca, to encourage her mistress. She pointed out three horsemen who emerged from behind the ruins. The chief approached; and dismounting, placed his finger across his mask, a signal accompanied by a half turn of the head in the direction of his companions, as though he were afraid the voice of Bianca or her maid would be recognised, and wished to impress the necessity of silence. He conducted the countess, with great show of tenderness, to a commodious litter, whose burthen was borne by two horses harnessed abreast.

"I fear Alberto expects pursuit. How he trembles! His hand quite shook as it grasped mine," whispered Bianca to her attendant, as the latter was placed beside her mistress; "horror surrounds me—I dread evil will befall us—I feel cold, forlorn—pray for me, Alberto," exclaimed the grief-stricken lady, now addressing her lover, as he drew close the curtains of the litter and was preparing to mount.

"Pray for us both, Bianca!" replied he, in a low voice, as he spurred forward to take the lead.

The night wore on in gloom, but occasionally the wind made a rent in the driven cloud rack, and the moon or stars peering through, distinctly marked the character of the territory in which they traveled. On the left lay the broad river, on the right a hilly country, softened by vineyards, gardens, villas, and backed by mountains which mingled with the Tyrolean masses.

Often, during the journey, did Bianca silently wonder Alberto came not to the litter to soothe her, while the same feeling found vent in Francesca in loud lamentation, mixed with reproaches against the whole tribe of unfeeling lovers. Left to their own consolation, however, they came to the conclusion that it behoved Visconti to be ever on the alert, and that he could not trust himself with tender thoughts. The road after a while grew more rugged and uneven, and the litter was much jolted. On drawing aside the curtains, they found themselves ascending a steep, winding hillside, shadowed by over-hanging forest trees. Gloomy and more gloomy grew the path, the sound of rushing water was heard, and turning a sharp angle, they crossed a bridge spanning an abyss, beneath which roared the sullen cataract. Branching from this road, the cavalcade entered a dense forest track; and emerging thence, Francesca, who had been on the look-out, uttered a cry of delight on beholding the facade of a country palazzo with long colonnade. Lights gleamed to and fro—indication of guests being expected—and even Bianca felt a comparative freshness of spirits, which she had been a stranger to during the journey. Crossing a sluggish canal, they halted beneath the piazza. Lorenzo came forward, assisted Bianca from the litter, and led her into a handsome vestibule. Francesca was prevented following her mistress by one of the horsemen, on some plea unheard by Bianca.

Lorenzo, without unmasking, conducted the countess from the vestibule to a saloon brilliantly lighted.

"How grand! Is the villa thine, Alberto? Would I had the spirits to be pleased with this splendor! But why retain the mask, is there a meaning in it? some sportive fancy? Alas! the occasion is unsuited for mirth!"

Lorenzo only replied by placing his finger across the mask, and leading the astonished countess to a second saloon; it was yet more magnificent, and elicited her admiration.

"Have you guests, Alberto? Are we safe so near Verona?" exclaimed she.

He replied only by pointing to a half-closed door, from which gleamed forth light. They entered—it was the most superb saloon of the suite. She looked round in amazement. The most conspicuous decoration was a large portrait, representing a youth in hawking costume. She started. "How like it is to him!" exclaimed Bianca, "let us leave this room, dear Alberto, those eyes follow me!" and she assumed a winning, playful look, to persuade him to return.

"It is him—and I am he!" cried the figure in a stern voice, while the falling mask disclosed the face of Della Scala.

Bianca's hand was held in the firm grasp of Lorenzo. Her features yet retained somewhat of their mirthful expression, as though conviction of the awful change came slowly—was too great for the mind to realize. Bereft of utterance, she gazed on the unexpected apparition—appalled, petrified with dismay—and as horror gradually fixed its seal on her features, her form shrank crouching from the fixed gaze of Lorenzo. He loosened his grasp, and with a wild cry, she sank to the floor.

"Bianca Guidoni!" exclaimed Della Scala.

"Lorenzo! O! cover me, earth!" cried the unhappy lady, burying her face in her hands. She heard him move, and beholding in imagination the uplifted poniard, threw herself on her knees, imploring by silent gesture his mercy. To and fro he several times passed before her, with slow step, as though debating the mode of revenge—his stern, unbending glance cast upon her beseeching figure, while the thick breathing denoted the inward struggle of his soul. Tears at length came to her relief, and she ejaculated—"Have you brought me here to die?"

"Why wantest thou to know, hast any parting wish?" asked Lorenzo.

"O! spare Alberto, if he is thy captive!" she exclaimed, "judge him not too harshly; we loved when love was no offense, and did intend to fly together beyond my cruel father's reach. I crave only mercy for him! with me is the fault, let mine be the penalty; it was I who tempted him!"

"Liar!" cried Lorenzo fiercely; "it was he who tempted thee; but he is dead!"

Bianca shrieked fearfully, as though her soul had flown, and she fell to the floor in a deep swoon. Lorenzo contemplated her prostrate form in silence. Tears fell from his eyes.

"Yes, he is dead! and dead be now my revenge! O Bianca!" exclaimed the count, bearing the insensible lady to a couch, "if we had known each other earlier, how happy might have been our fate! Farewell! and since thou knowest it not, one more adieu!"

Bending over her, Lorenzo for the last time placed his lips to hers, and fled the saloon.

Francesca, by the count's secret order, had been hurried into the litter and conducted back to Verona, whither Della Scala repaired, having first conveyed his instructions to the household respecting the countess. After a long conference with Count Guidoni, followed by interviews with the kinsmen of Visconti, (whose domestic at the Santa Croce had been captured and held in durance by Della Scala's retainers, who took their post,) and with the authorities of the city, he quitted Verona—quitted Italy, a forlorn, unhappy man, seeking, in the military struggles of European warfare, the happiness he missed in domestic life.

Bianca found an instance in the clemency of Lorenzo in her permitted retention of the honors and privileges attached to the house of Della Scala, together with the life-use of the villa to which she had been conveyed. But she preferred the penitential seclusion of a convent, and lived to regret and mourn, not the fatal mistake of Francesca, which betrayed the lover's plans, but her own fatal mistake in yielding to temptation, which urged her to fly to the indulgence of a criminal affection, from hallowed bonds, which cannot be broken without infringing laws both human and divine.

Francesca, unworthy of Lorenzo's vengeance, was banished the state of Verona, at the instance of Count Guidoni, while the sad history we have narrated was long talked of, and added one more to the time-honored legends of Verona.

THE haunch of mutton may be cooked so as to have the flavor of roebuck venison, by cutting all the outer skin from the meat; and having first rubbed it with olive oil, by soaking in a vessel containing a pint of vinegar, some thyme, a few bay leaves, four cloves of garlic, some whole white pepper, a little allspice, a teaspoonful of bay salt, and a little parsley. Cover the upper part of the joint with slices of onion; turn the joint every morning, still keeping the onions on the uppermost part. Repeat this for four days, and then roast it as venison. The result will be a most delightful dish."

It appears, that in New Zealand, when the marriage ceremony takes place, it is a very old custom to knock the heads of the bride and bridegroom together, previous to their union.

In England, now, it isn't so;
The bridegroom and the bride
To loggerheads but seldom go,
Until the knot is tied.

A USEFUL HINT.—The difference between rising every morning at six, and at eight, in the course of forty years, amounts to 29,200 hours, or three years, one hundred and twenty-one days, and sixteen hours, which are equal to eight hours a day for exactly ten years; so that rising at six will be the same as if ten years of life were added, wherein we may command eight hours every day for the cultivation of our minds and the dispatch of business.

MUSIC OF SPRING.

"THERE'S music in the balmy breath
Of spring, when from the realms of death
She calls the flowers to life again,
And decks with gorgeous hues the plain,
Then wakes to notes of harmony
The grove's enchanting minstrelsy.
There's music in the murmur low
Of gentle waters rippling by—
There's music in the onward flow
Of rivers in their majesty.
There's music in the bubbling fountain—
There's music on the sun-bathed mountain—
There's music on the earth—
There's music in the air—
And music into birth
Is bursting everywhere."

NO NIGHT BUT HATH ITS MORN.

THERE are times of deepest sorrow,
When the heart feels lone and sad;
Times when memory's spells of magic
Have in gloom the spirit clad.
Wouldst thou have a wand all potent
To illumine life's darkest night?
This the thought that e'er in nature
Darkest hours precede the light.

When the world, cold, dark and selfish,
Frowns upon the feeble flame,
Lighted from the torch of genius,
Worth has kindled round thy name;
When the fondest hopes are blighted,
And thy dearest prospects fade,
Think, oh, lone one, scorned and slighted—
Sunshine ever follows shade.

AN ADDRESS TO THE LADIES, ON A VERY DELICATE SUBJECT.

To every one of you, ladies, I believe I can say with a safe conscience,

"I do, as is my duty,
Honor the shadow of your shoe-tye."

I claim, however, that shoe-tyes, to be honored, should be seen. At present they are enveloped in such a longitude of skirt as utterly extinguishes them. Every now and then we find you, ladies, laboring under some monstrous extravagance of attire, as wide sleeves, arachnoid waists, and so forth. Now the reigning solecism is over-long gowns. It is a case which may almost excite some doubts as to the soundness of the feminine understanding, so entirely does it seem to defy all the ordinary rules of common sense. Ah, gentle dames—but let us look into the matter a little in detail.

See yonder elegant lady moving along the pavement, like "Troy's proud dames, whose garments sweep the ground." Very well for the Trojan dames, perhaps, to indulge in such dress in sounding epic; but oh, look at their living imitatrix of modern England! It has been a damp morning, and the flagstones are bespread with a thin paste of mud. Our fine lady's skirts just skim this soft substance, and behold they are thickly dabbled for a few inches upward with mud, which they have also communicated in no small quantity to the shoes and stockings. She dare not now hold up her skirts to save them from further pollution, because that would expose a state of matters about her feet and ankles at which every body's eye would revolt. She therefore walks desperately on, knowing she is always getting worse and worse, yet unable to help herself until she shall reach home, by which time she will be in a state only fit for the consideration of her maid, to whom I leave her. Is this a reasonable treatment either for silk or mousseline de laine? Is it doing justice to a pair of the neatest feet in the world? Is it right to visit mortal shoes and stockings with such indignity?

Or see the same figure in the same place on another day. It is now dry weather, and what was formerly mud is now dust. The same garments sweep up as much of the volatile as they did of the humid nuisance. It does not clag and barken on skirts and feet, but it goes farther, and produces a worse abomination. The masculine imaginations coming up behind dwell for a moment on the dust-bath in which our Trojan dame is indulging, and its unpleasant consequences. For of what is the dust-bath composed? Alas, we all know what matters mingle with the soil of a crowded carriage thoroughfare. It is as a volunteer scavenger that our lady acts, with this remarkable addition to the usual duties of the class, that she chooses to go home laden like a bee with the materials on which she operates. Nor is it inanimate dust alone. In warm weather, the powder of the street is full of insects visible and invisible. Think of a proud and stately gentlewoman gathering an entomological museum about her as she treads the pave. How much obliged must several of the better-known parasites be to her friendly skirts for transporting them into new settlements! Some of them will probably make themselves known to her ere long; others she will be spared knowing, but I can assure her they are there nevertheless.

Were there any irresistible elegance in long skirts, I should, dear ladies, have some little sympathy in your submitting, for its sake, to these inconveniences. But the fact is, that while a train is a fine thing in a state-room, a trailing gown is an unpleasant object to look upon in a street. It is so, because it is felt as utterly inappropriate. We cannot admire anything if it grossly shocks rationality. Long skirts, which can only be an inconvenience and a source of defilement in a street, shock rationality: therefore we cannot admire long skirts in walking-dresses. It is the plainest and most incontrovertible syllogism. Skirts which leave the feet free to move without being touched by them, fulfil the common-sense idea of the matter, and are felt to be handsomer accordingly. There is also what I may call a positive or absolute grace in the neatly-shod female feet seen moving smartly along a city way. A woman should not be a purely bell-shaped object, with the edge touching the ground. The feet are required for a basis in the figure; otherwise a painful sense of incompleteness or imperfection possesses us. I am not prepared to advocate the Sclavonian brevity of petticoat, with a supplement of frilled trousers: perhaps our habits of feeling forbid the hope of such a fashion ever being introduced. But I would certainly recommend that the skirts of walking-dresses should never come within three inches of the ground, whether with supplements or not.

I hope, fair ladies, that you will not think of calcitrating against this friendly remonstrance and advice, on any such weak ground as that it is a matter which we men have nothing to do with. The very reverse is the case: you do pay us the compliment of dressing very much to please us. Knowing this, and grateful for it, we feel that it is but the simplest justice to apprise you, when, from any misconception on your part, you fail in your amiable design. It is only right that we should endeavor to turn you to modes in which you are more likely to succeed. This is the sum of my wishes at the present moment. I have used strong terms, because gentle ones would be of no use; but I mean kindly.

You will perhaps tell me that fashion is imperative, and that, till it changes, you are helpless. I know well that this is an influence against which the individual is in a great measure powerless, though I do not well see why any of you should become an entomological cabinet, or a walking sample of the soil because another chooses. I aim, however, at affecting that general feeling or sense in which fashions take their rise. It must reside somewhere, and I have a good chance of reaching it. The only fear is, that the fashion-instituting power, like some other powers, resides with persons not the most shining in point of judgment, not to speak of taste. In that case, these reasonings will most probably be thrown away. I am, nevertheless, hopeful. The cause of retrenchment of skirts is one which may require agitation, and may not be crowned with speedy success; but it is one founded so clearly in rationality and a just sense of what is beautiful and what is decent, that sooner or later it must triumph. And so, with sentiments of the highest consideration and respect, I bid you, my fair country-women, a tender adieu.—[Chambers' Journal.]

THE GHOSTS.

The night was drear, the clouded moon
Shed forth a misty light;
And all around was wrapt in gloom,
Beneath that starless night.

Within a lone, sequester'd glen,
O'ershadow'd by a wood,
Far from the cheerful homes of men,
A pile of ruins stood.

The night-bird shriek'd, the wind blew cold,
And bodingly did moan
Round the dark-vaulted ruins old,
Where now I walked alone.

Quickly loud yells, with howlings mix'd,
Broke on my startled ear;
My blood ran cold—my limbs transfir'd—
I stood all mute with fear.

Then rush'd I from those ruins old,
Which noisy ghosts delight in;
But turned to look, when, lo! behold!
'Twas two Tom-cats a fightin'!

ON COUNTRY LIFE.

THE approaching season for retirement to the country, which has become an imperative pastime, if not a passion, should put our citizens upon the best track of preparation for its enjoyment. Leigh Hunt, the employment of whose literary life has been, for the most part, to cram as great an amount of pleasure into business and duty as possible, thus discourses of retirement, and some of its friendly means and influences:

"Some of the most stirring men in the world, persons in the thick of business of all kinds, and indeed with the business of the world itself on their hands—Lorenzo de Medici, for instance, who was at once the great merchant and the political arbiter of his time—have combined with their other energies the greatest love of books, and found no recreation at once so wholesome and so useful. Every man who has a right sense of business, whether his business be that of the world or of himself, has a respect for all right things apart from it; because business with him is not a mindless and merely instinctive industry, like that of a beetle rolling its ball of clay, but an exercise of faculties congenial with the other powers of the human being, and all working to social ends. Hence he approves of judicious and refreshing leisure, of domestic and social evenings, of suburban retreats, of gardens, of ultimate retirement "for good," and of a reading and reflective old age. Such retirements have been longed for, and in many instances, realized, by wise and great men of all classes, from the Diocletians of old to the Foxes and Burkes of our own day. Warren Hastings, who had ruled India, yearned for the scenes of his boyhood, and lived to be happy in them.

The wish to possess a country house, a retreat, a nest, a harbor of some kind from the storms, and even from the agitating pleasures of life, is as old as the sorrows and joys of civilization. The child feels it when he "plays at house;" the schoolboy when he is reading in his corner; the lover when he thinks of his mistress. Epicurus felt it in his garden; Horace and Virgil expressed their desire of it in passages which the sympathy of mankind has rendered immortal. It was the end of all the wisdom and experience of Shakspeare. He retired to his native town, and built himself a house in which he died. And who else does not occasionally "flit" somewhere meantime if he can? The country for many miles round London, and indeed in most other places, is adorned with houses and grounds of men of business, who are whirled to and fro on weekly or daily evenings, and who will all find something to approve in the closing chapters of our work. The greatest moneyed man of our time, Rothschild, who weighed kings in his balance, could not do without his house at Gunnersbury. Even the turbulent De Retz, according to Madame de Sevigne, became the sweetest of retired signors, and did nothing but read books, and feed his trout. It is customary to jest upon such men, and indeed upon all retirement; to say that they would still meddle with affairs if they could, and that retirement is a failure and a "bore." Fox did not think so. It is possible that De Retz would have meddled fast enough; nor are energetic men superior, perhaps, to temptations of their spirit in this way, when such occur. But this does not hinder them from enjoying another and a seasonable pleasure meantime. On the contrary, this very energy is the thing which hinders it from palling; that is to say, supposing their intellects are large enough to include a sense of it. De Retz, like Burke and Fox, was a lover of books. Sir Robert Walpole, who retired only to be sick and to die, did not care for books. Occupation is the necessary basis of all enjoyment; and he who cannot read, or botanize, or farm, or amuse himself with his neighbors, or exercise his brain with thinking, is in a bad way for the country at any time, much more for retiring into it. He has nothing to do but to get back as fast as he can, and be hustled into a sensation by a mob.

SUCCESS IN LIFE.—In no department of life do men rise to eminence who have not undergone a long and diligent preparation; for whatever be the difference in the mental powers of individuals, it is the cultivation of the mind alone that leads to distinction. John Hunter was as remarkable for his industry as for his talents, of which his museum alone forms a most extraordinary proof. If we look around and contemplate the history of those men whose talents and acquirements we most esteem, we find their superiority of knowledge has been the result of great labor and diligence. It is an ill-founded notion to say that merit in the long run is neglected. It is sometimes joined to circumstances that may have a little influence in counteracting it, as an unfortunate manner and temper; but it generally meets with its due reward. The world are not fools—every person of merit has the best chance of success; and who would be ambitious of public approbation, if it had not the power of discriminating?—
[Physic and Physicians.]

EARLY SPRING MORNING.—The sun shone out warm and broadly, the crackling holly hedges glittered in the laughing shower of splendor, like a line of cuirassiers with their polished breastplates. The crocus just began to push forward its orange top into light from its close green shell; the snow-drop bent down modestly its elegant and lady-like head away from my rude amorous gaze; the polyanthus, glowing in its cold bed of earth, like a solitary picture of Giorgione on the dark oaken panels of an ancient dreary Gothic gallery; while the fragrant lilacs began softly to spread forth their limber shoots. The short, tender grass,

"Glowing,
Just as from a gentle mowing,
Asking a fair foot to press
On its springing mossiness," was covered with marguerites—"such that men called daisies in our town"—thick as the stars on a summer's night; and as I slowly advanced, a thousand dew-drops, almost imperceptible on close inspection, throw up their dazzling long rays against my eyes, changing their colors, and twinkling in and out, like fiery diamond-sparks set round in an eastern emerald.

SELFISHNESS.—Few people are aware who have not subtly pierced into the complicated motives of the human breast, that the hatred of selfishness may itself become a selfishness as base if not so monstrous as the selfishness on which it pours its burning curses. For what is selfishness but the grudgingly keeping to ourselves that which we ought graciously and gracefully to communicate to others with an open-handed hospitality? Now, what does it matter whether this unmanly avarice clutch and cling to and monopolise the money in our pockets, or the ideas in our brain? Indeed, I know not whether the avarice of the idealist is not the the most dastardly and detestable of the two. Your commonplace miser merely keeps from his fellows the golden image of an earthly monarch; the idealist withholds from them the most beautiful image of the Deity.

THE BAGPIPES.—Dr. Mainzer in a late work defends the Scottish Bagpipe: "The contempt generally thrown upon this ungraceful child of antiquity I do not participate in. This uncouth instrument, low as is its standard among the more perfect and more civilized means of communicating sound, has an interest of a manifold kind, and holds among popular instruments the first rank, as being one of the oldest and most universally known. The bagpipe, limited in its mechanism, poor in its expression, is not on these accounts deficient in the accents of joy and grief; and no instrument has been a closer witness of heroic deeds, none has ever found a warmer echo in warmer hearts! Many pipers have died as heroes; the history of pipe tunes is the history of battles; and these are the bloody records of the history of a country. The pipe deserves more than any other to have its biographer. The interest it lacks in polite society it amply compensates for in popular life. Though unfit for the drawing-room, it was not found unfit for the field of battle. The piano and violin, which reign in the former with a glorious and well deserved supremacy, would, under the thunder of cannon, but miserably supply its place. The principal merit of this instrument, however, remains to be told. Although one of the humblest and coarsest, it is the parent of the grandest, the most magnificent, the most complete—the organ; not without reason called the wonder of art. The bag has grown into the bellows, and two or three pipes into hundreds. The principle upon which the sounds are produced is in both exactly the same."

THE DEAF MOTHER.—The following curious anecdote is related of the Countess of Orkney, who died in 1700, aged 76. Her ladyship was deaf and dumb, and married in 1753 by signs; she lived with her husband, Murrough, first Marquis of Thomond, who was also her first cousin, at his seat, Rostellan, on the harbor of Cork. Shortly after the birth of her first child, the nurse, with considerable astonishment, saw the mother cautiously approach the cradle in which the infant was sleeping, evidently full of some deep design. The countess, having perfectly assured herself that the child really slept, took out a large stone, which she had concealed under her shawl, and to the horror of the nurse, who, like all persons of the lowest order in her country, indeed in most countries, was fully impressed with an idea of the peculiar cunning and malignity of "dumbies," seized it with an intent to fling it down vehemently. Before the nurse could interpose the countess had flung the stone—not, however, as the servant had apprehended, at the child, but on the floor, where, of course it made a great noise. The child immediately awoke, and cried. The countess, who had looked with maternal eagerness to the result of her experiment, fell on her knees in a transport of joy. She had discovered that her child possessed the sense which was wanting in herself. She exhibited on many other occasions similar proofs of intelligence, but none so interesting.—[Anecdotes of the Aristocracy.]

FORTUNES are generally made by taking things coolly. Your man of business that makes a great show and is always in a fluster, may get a fortune after a fashion; but it will not stick by the ribs. Those fortunes are the most solid and endurable which are acquired slowly, and with prudence and forethought. "Think twice and act once," has been the motto of your truly rich men.

The striking peculiarity of Shakspeare's mind was its generic quality, its power of communication with all other minds; so that it contained a universe of thought and feeling within itself, and had no one particular bias or exclusive excellence more than another. He was the least of an egotist that it was possible to be. He was nothing in himself, but he was all that others were, or that they would become.

A LADY noted for her kind feeling, on hearing that the Pope was a fugitive from Rome, exclaimed, "Poor old man, has he got any family?" On the matter being explained to her, she added, "Well, I hope he will marry now."

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1849.

DEDICATION AT WILMINGTON, DEL.

The Dedication of Odd-Fellows Hall, at Wilmington, Del. will take place May 28th. All members of the Order who can make it convenient, are fraternally and cordially invited to be present and participate in the procession. The Order will appear in full Regalia.

By order of the Grand Lodge of Delaware.

CHURCH ARCHITECTURE AND THE UTILITARIANS.

THERE is a large class of persons in our midst, who are in the habit of condemning everything ornamental, gorgeous or grand, and who are ever talking of a "beautiful simplicity." Any thing like magnificence in life, ornament in dress, or grandeur in the architecture or ceremonial of the church, they profess to regard with a holy horror; and, to judge them by their words, we should suppose them ready to barter the most sacred of our altars for money, or something which will minister to their material comfort. How often do we hear Trinity, Grace, and other of our churches condemned as the creations of a worldly pride! How often do we hear repeated the question of that ancient Utilitarian, so severely censured by our Divine Master—"Why may not all these be sold for so much, and the money given to the poor?"

Now all this comes from the fact that the real spiritual significance and import of architecture are not appreciated by these persons. They are prosaic and skeptical men, who have no faith in the imminence of the spiritual, and who cannot rise to the comprehension of the Divine import of the "harmony of sights and sounds."

We have long conceived that the more imposing our churches are, and the more dramatic our forms of worship, the greater will be man's interest in religion, and the more deeply will they be affected by it. Our churches should be symbols or types of the everlasting, have the power to inspire solemn and devout feeling, and be themselves sermons. The most genuine church architecture is that which strives to re-produce, in wood and stone, the great and imposing temple of the world. As we wander among the woods of nature, in the autumn especially, the lively green of the hemlock and cedar, blending agreeably with the scarlet, golden and brown hues of the oak, chestnut and maple—give us impressions similar to those created by the imposing decorations of the venerable religious edifices of Gothic design. Nay, as we pass musingly along, our fancy forms of these varied features—a vast temple of praise and worship, consecrated to the Infinite Beauty.

The Altar is the hill, with its many-colored adornments, which stretches out along the horizon in its majesty; the congregation is the trees, which, agitated by the breeze, seem to bow with touching meekness and deep reverence before it; and the priest is the verdant laurel, which, ever beautiful, fresh, unfading, and unperishing—the symbol of the Eternal—bends down so lovingly from the overhanging rocks and cliffs, and looks out so benignantly upon all below. The mysterious murmur of the trees, and the wondrous cadence of the rippling streams, roll up through the valley, as the tones of a mighty organ, and ring among the hills, as a distant and imperfect echo of that everlasting song, which, "like the noise of many waters," goeth up continually before the Eternal Throne.

Our Gothic Churches are a perfect transcript of this great temple of nature; and, in all their arrangements, repose upon spiritual facts. They shadow forth the Infinite and Everlasting. No one can enter them without feeling that they are truly the "house of God, and the gate of heaven."

A WORD ABOUT EUROPE.

THE latest intelligence, by the Hermann, shows Europe still in a disturbed and unsettled condition. The social elements are all in fearful agitation, and there is reason to believe that our prediction, made months ago, will be fulfilled; and that a fierce and terrible war will sweep over the entire of Europe, and western Asia, breaking up the ancient order of society, and preparing it for a better condition.

From England we have no news of special interest. In France attempts have been made again to suppress clubs and secret societies, but fortunately without much success. True, a law has been created which prohibits them, but it can have no practical effect. These clubs and secret societies are the safeguard of the Republic; and this movement against them looks very suspicious. The State trials are proceeding, but excite no particular interest.

Italy is again plunged into a sanguinary war. The efforts of England and France to renew the armistice between Sardinia and Austria have failed, and these two powers have once more unsheathed the sword. Thus far the Sardinians appear to have had the best of it.

A bulletin has been published in Turin, by the Minister of the Interior, announcing the passage of the Ticino, and the march of the Piedmontese army into Lombardy. The headquarters of the king were at Trecate, a small town on the Piedmontese bank of the Ticino, close to the road leading from Novara to Milan. It was by the bridge upon this road, leading to Buffalora, that the army crossed the river. The passage was unopposed, the Austrians having retired from that point. The road to Milan was reported to have been crowded with the Austrians and their baggage and munitions, in full retreat.

Advices had been received from Voghera, of an attack made by the Austrians upon the Piedmontese, who defended the bridge of Mezzana-Corte, near Pavia. The Austrians were repulsed, after which the Piedmontese partially destroyed the bridge. This news was received by telegraph from Alexandria, on the 21st ult.

Late on the 21st ult., the Minister of War received a report that the fourth division of the army, led by the Duke of Genoa, had advanced as far as Magenta, in Lombardy. When the division approached the bridge in Buffalora, the king himself advanced suddenly to its head, and was the first man to cross the bridge.

Although we have no great confidence in Charles Albert, we yet cannot but hope he will succeed in driving the Austrians from the country.

A French expedition of 12,000 men were ready to sail immediately, should the Austrians set their feet in the Pontifical States.

The latest accounts from Hungary abundantly prove that the Imperialists were not making much headway against the valiant Magyars, as success had lately crowned the arms of the latter, and the Austrians had several times been beaten with considerable loss.

The proposal to appoint the King of Prussia Emperor of Germany, was rejected by the Frankfort Parliament, on the 21st of March. This unexpected decision caused great excitement; and would, it was feared, lead to unpleasant consequences between Prussia and Austria.

The Republic of Palermo had rejected the constitution and proposals made by the King of Naples. The French and British fleets were about to withdraw, and the Sicilians were preparing for the hostilities which would immediately ensue. The King of Naples would, with great difficulty, keep his throne, as a formidable insurrection was about breaking out in Calabria, and the Neapolitans themselves were unquiet.

Russia has filled Poland with soldiers, and Warsaw is so crowded that many regiments have to encamp in the streets.

We shall look for the next news from Europe with deep interest; for we are confident, from present appearances, that the end of revolutions is not yet come. That great epoch seems to be near, which is described in the old myths of the north, and predicted by the Scandinavian maid, the famed prophetess of Volu. "It is the age of storms and swords—wars shall desolate earth, the Aes—i. e. the kings and lords—"shall be dethroned, and a devouring flame shall consume the fabric of the world. But a new earth will rise out of the desolation, clothed with fertility and beauty, where peace, equality, fraternity and love, will dwell for ever." Sleep—sleep in peace, sacred prophetess of Volu! A thousand years hast thou slumbered in thy tomb, where thy bones have been warmed by the everlasting fires of Hecla; but thy voice is heard to-day above the storm and thunder of revolution, musical as the song of Iduna; and thy words, fresh and beautiful, are now marching forth to their glorious fulfillment.

THE ORIGIN OF BELLS.

CHURCH bells were invented about the year 400, by Paulinus, the Bishop of Nola, a city of Campania. Hence the name assumed by a company of Bell Ringers, the Campanalians.

The practice of ringing bells in change, is said to be peculiar in England, but the antiquity of it is not easy to be ascertained. There are in London and other places several societies of ringers, particularly one called the College Youths; and in the life of Sir Mathew Hale, written by Bishop Burnet, some facts are mentioned which favor the report, that this learned and upright judge was a member in his youth. In England the practice of ringing is reduced to a science, and peals (tunes) now known were composed upwards of fifty years ago by one Patrick. This man was a maker of barometers; in his advertisements he styled himself Torricellion operator, from Torricelli, who invented instruments of this kind.

In the time of Clothair, King of France, and in the year 610, the army of the King was frightened from the siege of the city of Sens, by ringing the bells of St. Stephen's Church. In the times of popery bells were baptized and anointed, cleo Chrismatis; they were exorcised, and blessed by the Bishop, from a belief that when these ceremonies were performed, they had power to drive the devil out of the air, to calm tempests, to extinguish fire, and even to recreate the dead. The ritual of these ceremonies is contained in the Roman Pontifical; and it was usual in their baptism to give each bell the name of some saint. In Chauncey's History of Hertfordshire, is the relation of the baptism of a set of bells in Italy with great ceremony, a short time before the writing of that book. The bells of the Priory of Little Dunmow, in Essex, were, anno 1501, new cast and baptized. The bells at Osney Abbey, near Oxford, were also very famous.

In the funeral monuments of Weever, the Antiquary, are the following particulars relating to bells: "In the little Sanctuary at Westminster, King Edward III. erected a clothier, and placed therein three bells for the use of St. Stephen's Chapel; about the biggest of them were cast in the metal these words:

'King Edward made me thirthe thousand weight and three; Take me down and wey me, and more you shall find me.'

But these bells being taken down in the reign of King Henry VIII., some one writes underneath with a coal:

'But Henry the Eighth Will bait me of my weight.'

This last distich alludes to a fact mentioned by Stowe, in his Survey of London: "Ward of Farringdon Within, to wit: near St. Paul's School stood a clothier, in which were four bells, called Jesus bells, the greatest in all England, against which Sir Miles Partridge staked a hundred pounds, and won them of King Henry VIII. at a cast of dice."

It is said that the foundation of the fortunes of the Orsini family in Italy, was laid by an ancestor of it, who, at the dissolution of religious houses, purchased the bells of abbeys and other churches, and by the sale of them in other countries, acquired a very great estate. Nevertheless, it appears that abroad there are bells of a great magnitude. In the steeple of the great church at Roan, in Normandy, is a bell with an inscription, which has been thus translated:

"I am George of Ambois,
Thirty-five thousand in pois;
But he that shall weigh me,
Thirty-six thousand shall find me."

Moscow was formerly celebrated for the number and the size of its bells, many of which were of great weight.

It is a common tradition that the bells of the King's College Chapel, in the University of Cambridge, were taken by Henry V. from some church in France, after the battle of Agincourt. They were taken down some years ago, and sold to Pheeps, the bell-founder of Whitechapel.

In the year 1664, one Abraham Rudal, of the city of Gloucester, brought the art of bell-founding to great perfection. His descendants, in succession, have continued the business of casting bells, and by a list published by them, it appeared that at Lady-day, 1774, the family, in peals and odd bells, had cast to the number of 8,594. The peals of St. Dunstan in the East, St. Brides, Fleet-street, and St. Martin in the fields, Westminster, are in the number.

The uses of bells were various. They were rung to call people to church—on all occasions of festivity and joy, and to announce the death of a mortal. The custom of tolling bells at the death of a person is very old. Its significance was beautiful and Christian. When a poor child of earth was called away, the bell was rung to notify Christians that a brother or sister had passed away, and to remind them of their duty to pray for the repose of the departed spirit. In all the rural districts of New England, the Passing Bell is always heard at a death, and in the solitude of the country its tones are peculiarly impressive. It is a praiseworthy custom, and implies that the dead are yet something to us, and we are something to them; that the friendly ties and sympathies which exist here will survive the grave, and flourish in immortal vigor, and bloom through eternity.

In another department of our journal we give our readers a beautiful poem, by Miller, called the Passing Bell.

AN ERROR CORRECTED.

We insert the following correction with pleasure; and we particularly desire, if any brother discovers an error of this description, or of any kind in our list of Lodges or Encampments, that he will make it known.

Le Roy, Genesee Co., N. Y., April 9, 1849.

PUB. GOLDEN RULE—DEAR SIR: I see by the directory contained in the last No. of your paper, that Le Roy Lodge No. 119 is set down as suspended. As this is an error which may do us harm, I write to have you correct it.

This Lodge is in as good standing as any in the State, so far as regularity and conformity to the laws of the Order are concerned, and has never been suspended. Do us the justice to correct this error.

Wyoming Encampment No. 66 was instituted at this place on the 14th ult. by D. D. G. P. W. W. Willard, of Onondaga District—meets 2d and 4th Wednesdays of each month. Officers for current term: C. F. Bissell, C. P.; Jno. P. Vincent, H. P.; Ira S. Vaughn, S. W.; J. Kimbark, J. W.; A. C. Finney, S.; M. A. Dix, F. S.; S. F. Comstock, T.

Yours, fraternally,

C. F. BISELL.

ADDRESS

Delivered before Covenant Lodge No. 30, and McKendree Lodge No. 32, I. O. O. F., of the State of Mississippi.

BY BRO. WM. WARD, JR.

THE care-worn pilgrim, as he passes through the earth-way of existence, is met on every side by the cold sterilities of selfish and unsympathising life; wherever he may turn, the hypocrisies of his fellow men deceive his warmest hopes, or their indifference chills him with neglect. He looks in vain toward some imaginary oasis, where the fresh green wreaths of Friendship entwine the soul, where the pure fountain of Love may slake their fevered thirst, and where, above them both, the sky of Truth unfolds the radiance of a higher heaven. Too often, like the mirage of the desert, the illusory phantoms that seemed so warm, and glowing, and life-like, rest there, the vain colorings of baseless fabrics, above a barren waste. There is another pang added to his anguish, that of blighted hope. He finds the world's heart callous; that its throbbings are never felt beyond the adamant walls of selfishness and interest. These inevitable barriers rear their grim gates above the entrance, where Friendship and Love should spread their green memorials, and through which sympathy should lead misfortune and her dejected train. All to him is repulsive, save perchance some isolated rivulet gushing from a hidden source, to tell him there is yet left the redeeming nucleus, around which the sympathies and feelings of fallen humanity may cluster and lead on to the ocean of universal benevolence.

But alas! it is here that man is truly fallen—in his sympathies there is no union, no universality; but where they exist it is but the casual outbreak from the time-hardened rock of selfishness and pride, when struck by the rod of affliction; else is but a sad wreck, where Philanthropy mourns amid the relics of human perfection. But even here all is not lost. There, perhaps, a broken column, once almost ideal in its symmetry, rises from the dust of ages. There, too, a riven arch, with its proud entablatures, and the blue sky melting through its openings, rises like a monitor of decay before us; while here, a temple, with its columned aisles and magic proportions, arrest the gaze from the rubbish which the hand of Time has thrown in lavish confusion around his sad domain. All is not yet lost. Though the streams of benevolence may be scattered, though the wrecks of humanity may cover the earth with shivered and distorted fragments, still the waters may be gathered, and the fragments united. Though the mind may be in chaos, its virtues scattered, its feeling made barren by coldness and neglect, those affections are indestructible; they live through all time, and permeate all mind, as they now awaken within us the thrill of pity, or the yearnings and promises of Hope; so generations on whom the dust of successive ages is piled, have felt their impulses and their truth.

The blue-eyed Scythian, the olive Persian, the agile-minded Greek, have felt, in the great chain of existence, the same emotions that the generations of earth now express. They may be quelled, disunited, but never destroyed; and were they directed into one great channel, the care-worn pilgrim might for ever wander in the gardens of happiness and peace. But the phases into which society is thrown, by the colder feelings of our nature, will ever hang like an incubus in dragging down the occasional efforts of those who seek to elevate the moral nature of man by single and discursive means. It is only in union, in association, that these great objects are to be accomplished. One of the emblems of our Order has taught us that union is strength; that one rod alone can be broken, but when banded together they become invincible. Here, then, is one of the great aims and objects of Odd-Fellowship—to incorporate the sympathies of our nature, and to fraternize the world with their well-directed energies. Though we seek not our origin amid the Polytheistic relics of a moldering antiquity, its broad principles were laid in ages far distant, cemented by the hand of time, to endure for ever. We are hidden from the world, its factions, its interests and its prejudices, that we may hand down the charities and better feelings of our nature, in the great bond of human brotherhood.

The time has long past, when the mysteries of a secret fraternity awoke the fears and superstition of the world outside. The weapons of the cavalier are now harmless, and the denunciations of the uninitiated fall unregarded on the world's ear. Suspicion, "the coward's virtue," no longer prying with her secret eyes, shrinks back from the vain inquiry; and baffled curiosity, struck with wonder at the fair proportions of the outer court of our temple, dares not penetrate its inner recesses.

It is true, antiquity, from her mystic lore, has given us some sad examples of her veiled institutions of magic and deceit. They have come down to us, invested with all the terrors of secrecy and delusion; the meaningless mummary of their horrid rites were calculated as food for terror, and to clothe their Priests with all the attributes of the prophet and the fiend; their emblems became talismen and charms, and the world writhed like a giant in the iron meshes of superstition. Isis held Egypt in chains with his deified mysteries, and the terrible orgies of Eleusis fettered the Grecian alike in gloomy bondage. The beautiful curtain was lifted from their mysteries, like the veil from the Prophet of Khorassan, to reveal the distortions of hideousness and horror to the deluded worshiper, whose curiosity was dearly paid by unnatural and deceitful ceremonies.

We call to our aid no terrors, to assume a power over a victim—we invoke no horrors—we claim no magic in our beautiful and impressive rites—our emblems are clothed in no unnatural, no talismanic power; yet they have a lesson which is ever impressing itself on those who seek to learn. The moral symmetry of our Order is only to be traced by a gradual development of its beauty. You might perhaps obtain a fragment from its secret courts, but yet, as well might you judge by a single stone from an unseen edifice, of the beauty and proportion of the whole—as well might you take one link of a hidden chain, and solve the problem of its mysterious length, as to draw one secret from our rites, and learn the beauty and proportion of our beloved Order.

The world, ever prone to judge from its shallow knowledge, complains of our exclusive character, and names our charity, selfish liberality. If to exclude party, sect or caste, the elements of strife, discord and bitterness, the inharmonious strings that jar upon the melody of life—if this is the tenant conveyed in such epithets, we bow in silence to the world's decree; nay, we rejoice in such selfishness as this, and ask no happier lot than to remain exclusive for ever. When it becomes the privilege of all classes of society to mingle together in a work of love; we rejoice that it is a refuge from the bitterness and strife of earth.

Philosophy, with cynic sneer, cannot deride our mysteries, for they are the tenets of its moral purity. Poetry cannot aim its keen and glittering shafts at its winning beauty, for it is full of the eloquence of poetry and truth. Religion cannot warn from its genial paths, for it is its ally and its aid; but if the world's passions and prejudices see fit to brand us with its cuffed and studied epithets, be it so. If they tell us that our benefactions are confined within the pale of our own fold, we reply that here we do more than the world has done, and within the world at least as much. Because we are at times shut out from its motives and interests, it does not prevent us from becoming participants in its petty plans of Philanthropy—it does not sever us from being a constituent part of society in all its actions and its schemes; and were the power and the means beneath the control of our beloved Order, the world would not be too broad for its plan of sympathy and love.

But again, your regal trappings, your decorations, your pompous titles and your glittering pageantry—are these the instruments of charity? are these the tinsel heraldries with which she announces her comings, and arrays her votaries? Do you send her ministering forth amid the squallid leprosy of earth in the habiliments of regal pomp? Oh, no! no! our charities are silent and unseen, our visitings are not heralded by the emblems we choose to wear to make our union more distinct. But why should we not have our decorations? Are not your Churches splendid with their desks, their chancels, their altars, and their pillars? And are not your ministers arrayed in the vestments of their sacred office? And can you find fault with a regalia whose every emblem, nay, whose very colors, teach a lesson of truth and beauty? The haughty stoic, in his robe, the cynic, in his rags, are alike encrusted with a more questionable pride; and the paradoxical Pharisee, while he glories in the thought that he is not like other men, is bloated with his wealth, his honors and his titles. Our titles, at which the world sometimes curls its sneering lip, are only known within our Lodge Rooms; they blaze not upon the world, nor are they used in the world's vain sense. It is enough that we use them in connection with the virtues that should adorn station, and cluster around authority.

The poetry of our Order is one of its peculiar characteristics. It is full of beauty, of regularity, of sublimity, of simplicity. Its persuasive eloquence pleads to our better feelings, and like the soothing tones of a well-strung lyre, lifts the soul in majestic harmony above the cares, the passions and vanities of earth. In the simple ceremonies of our dedication, our funeral services, there is poetry and truth. We have the teachings of man's vanity, his weakness and his bondage; and the glowing glories of his elevation are fresh with beauty, in the eloquent lectures of advancement.

Let us move on, then, in silence and in peace, while surrounded with the passions and conflicts of life. Remember your duties and the obligations by which they are directed. Remember, too, that those sympathies and charities you have sworn to perform toward your fellow-men are as binding and imperative as your commands of secrecy. You cannot, and you dare not, violate the one, and cherish the other as a sacred duty. And above all, let not that brother who has gone down to revel in the allurements and fascinations of vice, stamp with falsehood our lessons of man's high and noble destiny, but arrest him ere the syren winds her last fatal charm around him. It is then, and in such deeds that life has its moral, and is not without its meaning. We say, then, to every true Odd-Fellow—

"So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, that moves
To those mysterious realms where each must take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not like the quarry-slave, at night,
Scourged to his dungeon; but sustained and sooth'd
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

CHLOROFORM IN CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

THE Boston Transcript says: "The question has been asked, whether a sheriff may administer ether or chloroform to a criminal who is about to be executed? The recent executions of criminals in our country have been in a private manner. Formerly it was the custom to make an execution as public as possible, for a terror to the living and to manifest the supremacy of the law. It is now satisfactorily proven that public executions tend rather to harden than to have any good effect on the hearts of men. The death penalty is not mainly dreaded from the pain necessary to its infliction. It is the thought of the untried realities of futurity which makes 'the soul startle at destruction.' How many men do we see who will gladly brave any surgical operation, however severe, if they are confident that it will save their lives! And science teaches us to believe, that there are numerous operations vastly more painful than death itself by the cord.

"The law does not enjoin upon the sheriff to perform his office with all the harshness and cruelty which can be used; but contrariwise it presumes that he will do it with all the possible lenity and consideration for the feelings of the criminal. This mixture of mercy with justice is the only good influence which operates upon the minds of spectators, and others who read accounts of executions, and is the most efficient means of softening the heart of the victim.

"We really cannot see any weighty objection to a sheriff's discharging his duty in the most lenient manner possible; and, if the criminal requests the exhibition of ether or chloroform, it is great cruelty to withhold it from him."

We are glad the humane and talented editor of the Transcript has introduced this subject. There is no reason in the world why the execution of the culprit should not be made as painless as possible. Our laws do not require pain, or torture, but death. It was a custom with the ancient Romans, to give drinks to criminals, to mitigate the pains of death; and the Scriptures give us a precedent.

When our Saviour was crucified, he exclaimed, "I thirst," and they gave him vinegar, mingled with myrrh. Commentators are universally agreed that this mixture was intended to deaden sensibility, and make the agony of the cross less painful.

HINTS TO JURORS,

ON THE MODE OF ASCERTAINING THE TIME OF DEATH.

THE "rigor mortis," or stiffening of the body, commences from one to two hours after death, and, continuing from two to three days, begins to relax, when decomposition sets in. This stiffening of the body does not exist in the joints, as commonly supposed. It is in the muscular system that the rigor mortis, or stiffening, takes its seat; and the contractibility of muscular fibre continuing after relaxation is lost, the stiffened muscles, in passing over the joints, enclose them, as it were, in splints. In producing this effect, the contractibility of the muscular fibres is assisted by coagulation of the fluids contained within the muscular substance. In case of death after a lingering illness, the rigor comes on sooner and remains a shorter time.

Nysten, an eminent surgeon of Paris, made, at the time of the first French Revolution, a series of important investigations, tending to determine the time at which the power of contractility, on the application of stimuli, ceases in different muscles. It is well known that on passing a galvanic current through a palsied limb, or the limb of a corpse recently dead, violent muscular contractions will take place.

It had been a desideratum in physiology and medico-legal science, to determine the succession in which the different muscles lost their power of contractility, and also the average length of time which elapses between the final cessation of the power of breathing and the insensibility of the different muscles to the contracting power of stimuli. For a long time had this knowledge been desired, but veneration for the recently dead, and the attachment of friends to the remains of those whom they had esteemed in life, prevented the performance of experiments necessary to determine the question.

During the reign of terror, when the revolutionary frenzy was at its height, and the scaffolds of Paris groaned beneath the weight of political victims, then men's minds became accustomed to scenes of bloodshed and cruelty, and the finer feelings of the human breast gave way to indifference at human suffering. Votaries of religion were scared away from the temples of their adoration, and commanded to worship the idols of political perfection. Rational hope of present benefit from the fruits of human sympathy was extinguished before the glaring and false light of the visionary ignis fatuus, then leading the misguided multitude through sloughs of disappointment and streams of blood.

The enthusiastic and ardent mind of Nysten perceived that these wholesale butcheries afforded the opportunity for making physiological investigations upon an extensive scale. It was arranged that each victim, after having been submitted to the guillotine, should be dropped through a hole in the flooring into an enclosed chamber underneath the scaffold. Within this chamber Nysten secreted himself, and there, unseen by the populace, conducted his investigations at will. The result of his experiments may be concisely summed up as follows: Irritability was first extinguished in the left ventricle of the heart; next, in the great intestine; 3, in the small intestine; 4, the stomach; 5, the bladder; 6, the right ventricle of the heart. The irritability of the right ventricle continued about an hour; after this the power of irritability was lost in the following order: 1, in the gullet; 2, in the iris, or colored muscle surrounding the pupil of the eye. Next to these the voluntary muscles lost their power of contractility, and first, those of the head and neck, then those in the lower extremities, and thirdly, those in the upper. Last of all the auricles of the heart; and of these, the right auricle retaining its power longer than the rest, has been named the ultimum moriens, or last dying part. The power of contractility was retained by the right auricle about two hours after decapitation of the body. M.

EDITORIAL JEU-DE-MOTS—VERY GOOD.—How can we feel otherwise than happy, after reading the following in yesterday's Post:

"TRUTH STRANGER THAN FICTION."—One of the most agreeable papers in Boston has a Poore editor."

After all our name isn't such a bad one as it might be. The subtraction of the final e would leave us, (as Mr. Shakspeare once remarked) "Poor indeed," but the addition of an a would make us poorer. It isn't, we admit, as Rich a name as that of a collector whose office under ours is, but now that it has been complimented by the Prince of Yankee editors, who is not green, (though the addition of the above-mentioned final a would make him Greener,) we shall take the first opportunity of saying to some fair damsel—

"I give thee all—I can no more—

Though Poore the offering be—

It's been praised in the Boston Post,

High honor that for me!"

Country papers will please copy.—[Boston Daily Bee.

The Boston Daily Bee is one of our very best exchanges; indeed, we always prized it, but never so much as at this time, and we earnestly hope that its editor will always be poor, (Poore) for we are confident that if by being Poore, he should get into limbo, one of the proprietors of the Bee would be generous enough to Ransom him.

CIRCULATION OF CITY PAPERS.—The Sunday Morning News recently asserted that of the weekly papers published in this city, Ned Buntline's Own had the largest circulation. This is a great mistake. The Gazette of the Union has the largest circulation of any of the weeklies, and only one daily paper, The Sun, surpasses it. We not only circulate more papers than the others, but over a larger extent of country. Everybody at the South and West reads the Gazette of the Union and Golden Rule.

ODD-FELLOWS' HALL.—This great temple of Odd-Fellowship is to be dedicated on the 4th of June, when there will be a larger gathering of Odd-Fellows in this city than on the occasion of laying the corner stone of the edifice. We have not yet been informed what is to be the order of exercises.

MERCHANT'S LODGE No. 150.—The brethren of this Lodge celebrated their fourth anniversary on the 10th, with more than their ordinary zest. At an early hour the members, and a numerous party of ladies, assembled at the Lodge Room to hear an address from P. G. Arthur McArthur, of Boston, late a member of the Lodge. His remarks were eloquent and impressive, and gave universal pleasure to his large audience. After the business of the evening was ended, the assembly adjourned to the tasteful saloon of the Clinton Hotel, where an elegant entertainment had been prepared by Bro. Leland. The evening closed with dancing, and the company separated after a season of pleasure that memory will often dwell upon.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP AND THE CALIFORNIA EMIGRATION.—The members of our Order now en route for California, via Panama, true to their obligations, have organized themselves into a relief committee at Panama, and hold weekly meetings. Those who are sick have had extended to them a brother's care, while those who needed pecuniary assistance have found it to an extent that will enable them to push on to the mines without delay.

GRAND LODGE DOCUMENTS.—We acknowledge the receipt of the proceedings of the Grand Lodges of Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Mississippi, and also of the Grand Encampment of Mississippi. A more particular digest will be given in our next.

ODD-FELLOWS' LIBRARY.—This great enterprise is going forward successfully. It is expected that the Library will be opened in June. In connection with this institution will be given courses of literary and scientific lectures.

Amusements.

PANORAMA OF THE HUDSON RIVER.—This is a splendid work of art. It shows a close observation of nature, and a refined and classic taste. It is exceedingly accurate in its delineations, and embodies the most majestic and beautiful river scenery in the world. We have no views in our memory so striking and varied as West Point, here seen from various positions. The lights and shadows, the wild and bold scenery, the picturesque shores adjacent, the associations connected with its history; all impart to it a great charm and interest. Many other towns on the river are most faithfully given, with the country adjacent; and the painter has happily selected those which a lavish nature has stamped with all the attributes of variety and beauty.

NEW ORLEANS SERENADERS.—With all the refinement of nature we have in this admirable troupe a humor unsurpassed. Their burlesque imitation of the Italian troupe has whiled away many an hour most pleasingly; and their new piece, the hit at the Gung's, is played in a style irresistibly comic, and full of fun. The overtures are also well selected, and admirably executed, and their melodies sung with the most charming effect.

AMERICAN MUSEUM.—The attractions at this place continue unabated. Mr. Barnum and Mr. Greenwood are indefatigable in their exertions to amuse and instruct the public. Great Western is still at this place, the Quaker Giant and Giants, and a host of novelties, too numerous to mention, and too extensive to describe.

CHINESE MUSEUM.—We do hope that all of our readers will call and see this collection of Chinese curiosities. Here one may see a perfect picture of Chinese life, in all its varieties, and learn nearly as much of Chinese peculiarities as by a visit to the celestial empire.

NIBLO'S REVIVED.—An elegant saloon is to be erected upon the corner of Prince-street and Broadway, to be completed by the 1st of July. The center of the square is to be adorned with a garden and fountains, and the whole establishment to be made as before, worthy the patronage of the city, and unexceptionable as a place of rational amusement.

Literary Notices.

✂ "CHURCH AND STATE." By Rev. Baptist Noel. New-York: Harper & Brothers. It will be remembered that the author of this work, not long since, held a distinguished position in the established Church, from which he has now seceded. This work contains the reasons which have led him to this result. He discusses with great ability the whole subject of a State religion, and the question of union between Church and State. This work must produce an immense sensation in England, and will be extensively read here. It exposes some curious facts regarding this subject, and we promise our readers a rich treat in its perusal. We have read it with much pleasure and profit.

✂ "NATURAL HISTORY OF ENTHUSIASM." Carter & Brothers. This is a republication of the celebrated work of Isaac Taylor. Although we cannot subscribe entirely to the philosophy of this book, we must admit that it is a product of great merit, force, ability and beauty. Mr. Taylor is a most vigorous writer and able logician, and whatever he writes is always read with deep interest. In this work he discourses of ENTHUSIASM, not in its entirety, but from the religious point of view, or as it is connected with religion. He describes that fictitious piety which, hitherto, has never failed to appear in times of unusual religious excitement or enthusiasm, and also strives so to fix the meaning of the term ENTHUSIASM, as to wrest it from those who use it to their own infinite damage. As a whole, we do not know of a more useful work than this.

✂ "ORIGINAL THOUGHTS ON VARIOUS PASSAGES OF SCRIPTURE." By Rev. Richard Cecil. New-York: R. Carter & Brothers. 1849. We find here, from an able pen, the substance of many sermons, which serve forcibly and interestingly to elucidate passages of Scripture regarded as obscure, or which admit of some latitude of interpretation. The book shows the result of deep study and reflection, a thorough knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and a nature deeply imbued with a spirit of piety and benevolence. We warmly commend it to our readers.

✂ "THE GOLD REGION." New-York: Baker & Scribner. This is a well written little book, in which the author relates his supposititious adventures in a Fairy-Land, somewhere in California, which he calls Aurifodina. He is more fortunate than most of the California adventures; for he is introduced to a city of gold, whose king, Reechamud, (Rich-as-mud) was a very amiable fellow, and whose daughters, Kissame (Kiss-me) and Mi-buta, (My-beauty) our traveler found very entertaining. On the whole, this book is a cure for the California fever.

✂ "BORDER WARFARE." New-York: Baker & Scribner. We commend this book to our readers, as one that is indispensable to a thorough knowledge of some of the most interesting incidents in our country's history. Mr. Campbell has done his work well, and gives us a very valuable and instructive work.

✂ "HERE A LITTLE, AND THERE A LITTLE." New-York: Baker & Scribner. This is an admirable little work for the young. It consists of Scripture stories, thrown into a pleasing and delightful form, which will make it very valuable and interesting to children. Every Sunday School and every family should have a copy.

✂ "MORDAUNT HALL." New-York: Harper & Brothers. This is a standard romance, written in a pleasing and animated style, full of incident, and illustrating a lofty morality. It will well repay a second reading.

✂ "THE CAXTONS." New-York: Harper & Brothers. This is part I. of a new novel by Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer, which promises to be equal to the best of his earlier productions.

✂ "THE MEXICAN WAR." New-York: Barnes & Co. This is a graphic description of the late war, and a history of the adventures of our gallant army in Mexico. It is full of interesting incidents, and is invested with all the charm of romance. It is a valuable work, making an important addition to our national historical literature, and is worthy a place in every family library.

LOCAL INTELLIGENCE.

DEATH OF THE VERY REV. JOHN POWER, D. D.—It is with feelings of the deepest regret, we have to announce the death of this distinguished member of the Catholic Church. As a clergyman, he was esteemed and beloved by his flock, whose spiritual and temporal interests he watched over with more than parental solicitude. He was formerly Administrator, and subsequently Vicar General of this diocese; and, after a long and protracted rheumatic disease, he died on Saturday, the 14th inst., at twenty minutes past four o'clock, P. M. Dr. Power was considered the ablest theologian in the State, as all those who have heard his logical and eloquent sermons, will testify; and in private society, his bland manners and interesting and instructive conversation gained for him the affection not only of those of his own persuasion, but also of the members of every creed in this country, in whose society he so often displayed the rich treasures of a highly gifted and brilliantly educated mind.

SYMPATHETIC REVOLUTIONARY MEETING.—We perceive that arrangements are being made for getting up a great mass meeting of Italians, Poles, Hungarians, Germans, Irishmen and others, to take into consideration the present condition of Europe, and adopt such measures as may tend to advance the cause of democracy in that part of the world.

We are glad of this. It is an excellent movement, and we are confident that it will be attended with beneficial results. It may be thought by some that the struggling spirit of democracy in Europe, could not be assisted by any movement of the kind proposed in this country, so far away from the scene of action; but it can, and most essentially too.

THE SIAMESE TWINS are to exhibit themselves a few days in this city, before their departure for Europe, where they are going. As an exchange paper informs us, to consult the most eminent surgeons on the practicability of an operation to divide the ligament which binds them together. The twins have a fine plantation in North Carolina, and are married to respectable young ladies, (sisters) who have presented their husbands with a goodly number of children. We believe that the most eminent surgeons in this country decided, years ago, that to sever the ligament would produce immediate death.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.—At the recent charter elections, whig officers were chosen for the cities of New-York and Brooklyn, and a new City Charter adopted for New-York.

A work-house is to be established in this city, which will relieve the tax-payers of a large number of guests who now idle their time away at the Alms House. When it comes to work, people prefer to work for themselves.

A new congregation is now forming, to be placed under the ministry of the Rev. Dr. Hawks, formerly of this city; and the large chapel in the New York University, Washington Park, has been secured as the place of worship.

DRAMATIC FUND.—It is said that Mr. Wm. B. Astor has made a donation of $1000 to this benevolent institution for the relief of decayed actors. We doubt it, however—he may have given ten cents.

A NEW PAPER.—We have seen upon our table a new paper called the ERA. It looks well, full of vigor and variety, but a little flashy.

ANOTHER WEEKLY, called the Examiner, has also made its appearance.

STILL ANOTHER.—Gray's Commercial Key, is the title of a paper to be issued weekly, at 44 Ann-street, commencing about the 12th of May. It promises to be a useful journal.

RUBBER GOODS.—We would call attention to the advertisement of the Union India Rubber Company, in another column. This pliable material has been applied to such a variety of uses, that to enumerate all is as idle as to attempt a detailed description of a Chinese Museum. It has been adapted to the use of ships, in their heaviest sails, and is used with equal facility in the shape of bank notes. For the army and navy it has proved most valuable, and is now indispensable to the California emigrants, ten thousand of whom can be supplied at this establishment in a day. Bro. Penfield will be glad to show this museum to all, whether purchasers or not.

WE particularly recommend to our readers the excellent Italian Medicated Soap of Dr. Gouraud, whose advertisement may be found in another column. We know from trial that this soap possesses all the fine qualities ascribed to it. It softens the skin, makes the complexion clear and beautiful, and thus is an indispensable addition to every lady's toilet. The other cosmetics of Dr. Gouraud are equally valuable, and will be found so on trial.

HEALTH OFFICER.—Dr. Francis has been appointed Physician-in-Chief to the Marine Hospital.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

THE Money Market continues very stringent, and borrowers are obliged to pay high rates. The cause of this continued pressure it is not easy to assign, but it may be chiefly attributed to the diminished amount of coin in the banks; which produces, naturally, a reduction in the circulation. The Crescent City, for Chagres, took $150,000 in coin; and a farther quantity goes out in the Falcon. The next steamer from Liverpool, as well as those to come for some weeks, will bring a large amount of specie, which cannot fail to aid the Money Market; assisted as it will be by the receipts of cash from merchants from the interior, who will soon be in the city to make large purchases. Stocks are cheaper than last week, and close at the following prices: U. S. Treasury Notes, 108 1-4; U. S. 6's, 1867, 110 1-4; and Erie Railroad bonds, 97 1-8, cash.

ANSWER TO MISCELLANEOUS ENIGMA IN OUR LAST.—"Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

COL. FREMONT.—The latest intelligence from this enterprising gentleman, informs us that, after leaving his men from their perilous position in mountains, he returned to Santa Fe, where he shipped a new company and proceeded down the Grande, one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles, and thence to the Gila, and down that stream its confluence with the Colorado, thence on a westerly course to the Pacific.

DR. JOHN FRANKLIN'S EXPLORING EXPEDITION.—The British Government, through its consuls in the United States, has offered a reward of $100,000 for discovery and rescue of this long absent expedition. Lady Franklin has also offered a reward of $10,000 for the same purpose.

CANADIAN POLITICS.—The people of Canada of British origin, propose to call a National Convention. The late act indemnifying sufferers by the rebellion, promises to be a source of much trouble, indeed it will not change the government of Canada.

The body of a man supposed to be named George Evans, was recently found murdered near Rockport, Ohio. A bullet had passed through his head. He was supposed to reside at Buffalo, N. Y.

TREASURES OF MOOLTAN.—The treasures discovered in the subterranean chambers of the citadel, appear to be altogether of oriental magnificence and Asiatic profusion. Descending into the cavities in which the treasures of the fortress have been accumulated, the inspecting officer is said to have found opium, and indigo, and salt, and sulphur, and drugs of every description heaped together in endless profusion; enormous hoards of wheat on one hand, on the other almost inexhaustible stores of rice; stacks of ghee vessels brimming with their unctuous contents; bales upon bales of costly shawls and gorgeous silks; chest after chest crammed with scabbards, blazing with gold and jewels; tiers of copper cannisters filled to the brim with gold mohurs. "My poor pen," says a correspondent of the Delhi Gazette, "cannot describe the variety of wealth displayed to the inquisitive eye. Tumbrels, under strong guards, have been moving to and fro with gold coin all day. And, in addition to this, three or four crores of specie were still known to be concealed beyond the amount already discovered—one crore of rupees being one million of pounds sterling."

MICHIGAN TAXES.—Household furniture to the amount of $100, spinning wheels, looms, pews in churches, cemeteries, fire-arms, wearing apparel, school books, library to the value of $160, ten sheep and cows, six swine and provisions, and fuel for six months, are now exempt from taxation.

CALIFORNIA.—Panama dates to the 29th of March have been received by the arrival of the Falcon. The Oregon left Panama for San Francisco on the 18th, with 226 passengers, leaving 1,500 on the Isthmus. Steerage passages in the Oregon sold at $500, and $200 over the general price on board sailing vessels. The California had not arrived at Panama, but was hourly expected. The town continued very healthy.

Ten thousand people are at Independence, Mo., and vicinity, en route for the gold region. From ten to twenty-five wagons pass St. Josephs, Mo., daily, upon the same errand.

The President of the United States will probably attend the Annual Fair of the American Institute.

Scientific and Useful.

Mr. W. H. Smith, C. E., has published a description of an invention by means of which he hopes to insure the establishment and continuance of available harbors of refuge, piers, breakwaters, &c., on all coasts and in all circumstances. The structure is of timber, supported from the top and the sheeting separately, by yielding braces, so arranged and moored to mooring-blocks, and balanced by counter-balance weights, that pressure in either direction gradually strikes the strain on either the blocks or the weights downward into or upon the ground, while it also, in reaction, produces a similar strain downwards on the whole structure, which, moreover, is so connected and separated, so jointed and pivoted, as to admit of a horizontal and spiral freedom of motion throughout. All shocks are thus to be either eluded directly or thrown downward on the solid floor of the sea. Yet the power of resistance is said to be sufficient to overcome a momentum on the counter-balance weights and moorings equal to 2000 tons. Mr. Smith calculates that a harbor which, on existing principles, would cost £50,000, will thus be made for half as many hundreds.

CURE OF CHOLERA.—Mr. Howell, of London, states that he has made an important discovery in the treatment of this formidable disease. In arresting the collapse, which is the last and fatal stage of the disease, Mr. Howell sponges the whole body, and particularly the spine, with turpentine of boiling heat. This powerful stimulant at once produces reaction over the whole body, removing the coldness of the skin, dispenses the cramps, averts the sickness, and enables the stomach to receive medicine and food. In five recent cases of cholera, where collapse had set in, this remedy has been employed by Mr. Howell and his son with triumphant success.

M. Boland, a baker of Paris, has invented an ingenious instrument, called by him the aleurometer, the purpose of which is to indicate the panifiable properties of wheat flour. The indication depends upon the expansion of the gluten contained in a given quantity of flour, when freed from its starch. A ball of gluten being placed in a cylinder to which a piston is fitted, the apparatus is exposed to a temperature of 150 degrees; as the gluten dilates its degree of dilatation is marked by the piston rod. If 25 degrees of dilatation is not obtained, the flour is rejected. The best flour usually gives from 88 to 90 degrees.

A LARGE PRIZE.—The foreign papers brought out by the Canada, announce the death of Mr. Moreton, a wealthy American printer, at Paris. He is said to have left a legacy of two hundred thousand dollars, as a prize for the man who will invent a machine capable of striking off ten thousand copies of a newspaper in an hour. There is a printing press in this city, invented by Mr. Jephtha Wilkenson, which will throw off twenty thousand copies of a newspaper an hour, and fold them into the bargain. It is in the hands of Mr. Moses Y. Beach, in an incomplete state—the inventor, Mr. Wilkenson, having quarreled with that gentleman. It is the most extraordinary invention of the age, and has been fully tested. Mr. Wilkenson, the inventor, is the author of several of the most extraordinary productions the mechanical world has at any time produced. He resided many years in the city of Manchester, England; and was, at one time a Major in the American army.

As storm following storm, and wave succeeding wave, give additional hardness to the shell that encloses the pearl, so do the storms and waves of life add additional force to the character of man.

The suspension bridge over the Danube at Pesth was commenced in 1840, according to the designs and under the direction of W. T. Clark, and has just been completed, at a cost of £650,000 sterling. This bridge has a clear water way of 1,250 feet, the center opening being 670 feet. The height of the suspension towers from the foundation is 200 feet, being founded in 50 feet of water. The sectional area of the suspending chains is 520 square inches of wrought iron, and the total weight of the same 1,300 tons. This is the first permanent bridge since the time of the Romans which has been erected over the Danube below Vienna, it having been considered impossible to fix the foundations in so rapid a river, subject to such extensive floods, and exposed to the enormous force of the ice in the winter season. It now, however, stands as another monument of the skill and perseverance of our countrymen. The bridge was opened for the first time, not to an ordinary public, but to a retreating army, on the 6th of January, by which the stability of the structure was put to the most severe test.

At one period the silver mines of Guadalcanal, Seville, in Spain, produced to the Spanish government £100,000 in duties alone; and from the proceeds of these the palace of the Escorial was built. They were the property of a family named Fuchars; who, not satisfied with the enormous wealth derived from them, secretly took away the ores from a new lode they discovered, without giving notice to the government; and, to prevent imprisonment and confiscation, they let the water into the mines; and for one hundred and fifty years they have remained in the state in which they were thus left by them. About six months ago, however, the mines were purchased by an English company; and a capital of £10,000 was raised to work them. An engine of great power has been obtained, which bids fair soon to drain the hundred and twenty fathoms, and discover the hidden wealth once more. Mr. Nicholas Harvey, who drained the lake of Harlem, in Holland, is among the adventurers.

HOW TO SPLIT PAPER.—Procure two rollers or cylinders of glass, or amber resin or metallic amalgam; strongly excite them by the well-known means, so as to produce the attraction of cohesion, and then, with pressure, pass the paper between the rollers. One half will adhere to the upper roller, and the other to the under roller, and the split will be perfect. Cease the excitation, and remove each part.

The communication by rail is now either complete, or soon will be, via Calais, right through the heart of Europe, including Paris, Brussels, Cologne, Antwerp, the Rhine, Berlin, Warsaw, Leipzig, Vienna, Switzerland, and Venice. Arrangements are already in progress for a grand continuous tour through most of the places just named. Paris is now approximated to London by a time distance of only eleven hours, or a run actually shorter than that to either of its own provincial capitals, Edinburgh or Dublin.

POTATOES.—Professor Wilder, who has been thoroughly investigating the potatoe, solemnly denounces it as an article of food, and says it is the "cause of the moral and physical degradation of the nations that use them." We believe that the Professor is right. We expressed this opinion, in nearly the same words, long ago, although we did not know that any other person had arrived at the same conclusion.—[N. Y. Star.

DEPTH OF THE SEA.—The greatest depth ever reached by sounding was in the Atlantic, 900 miles west of St. Helena, where Sir James Ross found no bottom, with a fathom line of six miles and a quarter in length.

LOUIS NAPOLEON AND HIS FAMILY.

We find in a late Herald, the following description of the position of the President of the French Republic, with regard to his family:

The President is not fortunate in the members of his family or connections, by whom he is surrounded. He had hoped at first, that the Dowager Grand Duchess of Baden, his aunt, could be prevailed on to come to Paris, to do the honors of his court. This lady, however, declined, and at present no lady of his family is put forward to receive his guests—he alone receives them.

It may not be uninteresting to give here a sketch of the principal surviving members of the Bonaparte family, especially of those who are in Paris: The Emperor left four surviving brothers—Joseph, formerly King of Spain; Lucien, Prince of Canino; Louis, formerly King of Holland; and Jerome, formerly King of Westphalia. Of these, the last alone survives. Joseph left a daughter, who afterwards married the eldest son of Lucien. This eldest son is now the Prince of Canino, and holds a prominent position in the newly proclaimed Roman Republic, or the Constituent Assembly, of which he is Vice President.

Lucien left several other children, all of whom still survive. His eldest daughter is the Princess Gabrielle. His second daughter, Letitia, married Mr. Thomas Wyse, the member for Waterford, from whom, after she had had one child, she separated. She has since, however, had a family of illegitimate children. The third child of Lucien bears his name, and is now in Paris. He was elected lately a representative to the Assembly for Corsica, but his election was null and void. The fourth child was Pierre, also elected representative for Corsica, and now in Paris. The fifth is Antoine, who resides in Italy. The sixth, Marie, married to a cousin, and the seventh, Constance, a nun. Such was the family of Lucien, Prince of Canino. The present Prince of Canino, his eldest son, married, as I have stated, to the daughter of Joseph, has eight children, the oldest of whom is now twenty-five years. Most of the younger members of this family have lately arrived in Paris, for the purpose of completing their education.

Louis Napoleon, ex-King of Holland, has left only one surviving son, who is now the President of the Republic. It will be seen, that by seniority, he is not properly the representative of the Emperor, the children of Lucien being before him. By right of primogeniture, the Prince of Canino would therefore be at present the heir of the Emperor. But it will be remembered that when Napoleon assumed the purple, his brother Lucien, a staunch Republican, did not countenance what he considered an usurpation of the liberties of the people: an estrangement took place, and the Imperial decree which declared the members of the Bonaparte family princes did not include Lucien. At a late period, however, Lucien was created, like the others, a French prince; but by the laws of the Empire, priority was given to the younger children, and it is thus that Prince Louis, as son of the ex-King of Holland, is now regarded as the head of the Bonaparte family.

Jerome, the only surviving brother of the Emperor, was declared King of Westphalia in 1807. In 1815, after the battle of Waterloo, he became Prince of Montfort. Having been divorced from his first wife, Elizabeth Patterson, of Baltimore, in the United States, in 1806, he soon afterwards married Sophia, Princess of Wurtemberg, who died in 1838. By her, Prince Jerome had two children, the Princess Mathilde, who married, in 1841, Prince Anatole Demidoff, and the Prince Napoleon, who is a representative for Corsica in the Assembly. After the election in December last, Prince Jerome was appointed Governor of the Invalides, where he now resides. He has, for many years, cohabited with an Italian lady, who passes as his wife, but with whom there has never been any public or acknowledged marriage. The Princess Mathilde Demidoff separated from her husband some time since, under curious circumstances, which are variously reported. It appears that, either by her own solicitations, or by the dictates of his proper will, the Emperor of Russia ordered a separation, and exercising the power which he possesses, as sovereign of that country, interdicted Prince Demidoff from living in the same city with his wife. The Prince is now, or was lately, at Brussels; the Princess lives at Paris, and frequents, as other ladies do, the palace of the President, her cousin. Soon after the proclamation of the President, there was much discussion as to the female members of the Bonaparte family, who should do the honors of the palace. The Princess Mathilde was pointed out, as well by her own rank in right of her husband, as by her near relationship to the President, as the fittest person for this purpose. She was also resident in Paris, and must necessarily be present at the court. It seems, however, that the haute societe demurred to any such arrangements, and it was plainly intimated, that if that lady did the honors, the said haute societe would not present itself at the palace. The difficulty was attempted to be surmounted, as I have stated, by inviting the Grand Duchess of Baden to come to Paris, to do the honors. This lady, however, having declined, the difficulty remained without solution, and it is said that the Prince President left to the choice of the Princess Demidoff, either to be present as other ladies, without exercising any functions or assuming any paramount position, or to leave Paris. The Princess chose the former, and she accordingly now appears at the balls, re-unions, and other receptions of the palace, but with no marked circumstance which distinguishes her from other ladies.

This, however, is not the only embarrassment by which the President is beset. Madame Wyse, with her family, is resident in Paris. She is not received at the palace of the President at all. One of her daughters recently married a certain Count de Saline, whose rank and title she now bears. This lady is also in Paris, and is conspicuous at public balls and other ceremonies, but neither is she received at the palace of the President.

A difference is lately reported to have arisen between the President and his uncle Jerome, in consequence of which the latter does not now appear at the palace.

Pierre and Lucien Napoleon, the sons of the late Lucien, Prince of Canino, belong to the party of the red republic, and they are thus, both politically and socially, estranged from the President.

Lucien Murat, the son of the celebrated Murat, and of Caroline, the eldest sister of the Emperor Napoleon, is now in Paris, and is seen constantly at the palace of the President. He is a member of the Assembly, and a Colonel in the National Guard. His politics are those of the moderate party, and he is therefore in perfect harmony with the President. He lived for many years in the United States, where he married an American lady, who, with her children, are now in Paris.

A FRIGHTENED BOARDER.—We find the following in the Baltimore Clipper:

"A gentleman recently returned from attending, as a witness, at the trial of Tom Hyer, the pugilist, at Chestertown, Kent County, related to us the following most amusing circumstance, which occurred at one of the principal hotels in that place. Among the unusually large number of boarders, there was one whose appetite at table seemed to know no bounds; every dish in his vicinity was cleared by him before any one else could get a taste. The landlord very patiently bore it for several days in silence, indulging in the hope that his boarder's appetite must certainly have an end. But this hope proved delusive; at every meal his appetite seemed, if possible, to sharpen up; till at length the landlord, unable to stand it any longer, ventured to remonstrate with his boarder, and remarked to him, 'My friend, you eat so much that I shall certainly have to charge you an extra half dollar.' 'An extra half dollar?' replied his boarder, with a countenance the very picture of despair—'for goodness' sake don't do that; I'm most dead now, eating three dollars' worth, and if you put an extra half dollar's worth on, I shall certainly sue you for manslaughter.'"

EXTRAORDINARY INCIDENT.—Ten years ago, in the midst of a storm, which had raised drifts of snow, thirteen feet deep, across different spots of road, a traveler set out in a heavy loaded cart from Kinguse, in Badenoch, to cross Drumwacher. A friend and a Newfoundland dog were with him in his cart. Near to Dalwhinnie Inn, the storm turned horse and cart upside down, threw the traveler and his friend into the road, and carried the dog some way over the drift. The traveler's hat, which contained an important letter, was blown away out of sight; and when the dog got back he was sent in pursuit of it. He disappeared in chase, and only returned just as the horse and cart was set upright, nearly an hour after the overturn. The journey was completed by the aid of a band of twenty Highlanders. On examining the hat, the traveler found that the letter had fallen out of it, and escaped the notice of his brave and sagacious dog; and he was put to serious loss by the misfortune. A singular incident remains to be told. The lost letter arrived to its address, a short time since, by post; but the gentlemen to whom it was written was no more—he died about eight years ago, and it was given to the writer. It was found on the banks of Loch Erich, a desolate region about eight miles from Dalwhinnie, by a shepherd, who simply says on the envelope: "Found at Loch Erich side, by a shepherd." It is an surprising preservation, considering the number of years it has lain among the mountains.

INTERMIXTURE OF BLOOD.—In Ulster the people are a mixture of Lowland Scotch from the West, with a smaller proportion of English. The speech is of the Scotch, dialect of English, and the countenance is more of the Scotch type. The people are hard-working and thrifty; so that Ulster, though with the poorest soil and coldest climate, is that province of Ireland where the people are best provided, and in no respect inferior to the northern parts of England. Along the east coast, and in the seaports, the race is a mixture of English and Irish, the English settlers having been mostly from Essex. The higher and middle classes of Ireland are also of a mixed race. The mixed races are remarkable for beauty of form, for native wit, for great readiness and brilliant talent, but not for steadiness or soundness. The mixed English and Irish are among the cleverest and handsomest people in the world.—[Wyld's Popular Atlas.

CURRAN'S DEFINITION OF AN EPIGRAM.

An epigram—what is it, honey?
A little poem, short and funny;
About four lines in length—not more;
Then this is one, for here are four.

LOST REGALIA.—Some months since, a Brother, whose name is not now remembered, borrowed from the then Publisher of the Golden Rule, Mr. E. Winchester, a Past Grand's Regalia. Said Regalia has never been returned. It was of the usual scarlet silk velvet, trimmed with gold bullion, with a gold star on the sash. The person in whose possession it now is, will oblige the owner by returning it to this office immediately.

Special Notices.

TO CLUBS.—Any person obtaining the names of five new Subscribers, and sending us Ten Dollars, shall receive a sixth copy gratis for one year. Upon all subscriptions over five, the person sending the names and money may retain fifty cents as his commission. Payments invariably in advance.

Postmasters are authorized to remit money to Publishers, and all money mailed in presence of the Postmaster, and duly forwarded by him, is at our risk.

In all cases where postage on subscriptions is not paid, it will be deducted from the amount credited to those who send it.

WILMINGTON, DEL.—Subscribers will find their accounts in the hands of Bro. J. L. ROCHE, Agent at this place. New Subscribers can also make payment to him. Terms $2 per year in advance.

TO LOCAL AGENTS.—We have heretofore received very efficient aid from our Local Agents, and many of them are still rendering us much service by increasing our circulation and collecting dues. There are others from whom we have heard nothing for many weeks. We again ask your assistance in extending the genuine principles of Odd-Fellowship. We often experience much inconvenience from the failure of agents to report to the office, probably because but little has been done, and delaying until more is accomplished. If but two names are obtained, please forward them. Punctual correspondence is essential to the proper transaction of the business of the office; and subscribers are often disappointed and deprived of their rights by its omission. Will you not now renew your efforts as formerly, and see that our interests and the interests of the Order are properly cared for within the sphere of your respective agencies?

PHILADELPHIA.

BRO. JAMES J. DENHAM is our Agent for Philadelphia, and duly authorized to procure subscriptions and advertisements, collect dues, and transact any business involved in such Agency. Office No. 101 Cherry-street, above Sixth, near Odd-Fellow's Hall.

N. B. Subscribers who are in arrears will pay their subscriptions to Mr. Denham, as no other person is authorized to receive them, all former Agencies being discontinued.

ST. LOUIS.

BRO. ALBERT G. LEARY is our Agent for St. Louis, Mo., and duly authorized to transact the business of such agency.

MILWAUKIE, WIS.

BRO. A. S. SANBORN is our Agent at Milwaukee, Wis., and duly authorized to receive subscriptions, collect dues, and give receipts therefor.

GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE.

THE ORGAN OF THE ORDER,
Published under the auspices of the M. W. Grand Sire!

It will contain, from week to week, the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of the State of New-York, and also of other States; accounts of Celebrations, Institutions of new Lodges, and occasionally, a complete Directory of all the Lodges in the Union.

Its Literary department will be filled with Original Tales of the highest excellence, prepared by the most eminent writers in our country—Popular Tales; Choice Miscellany; the rarest Gems of Poetry from the English Poets; Sketches of Travel; Anecdotes, &c., &c.; and occasionally illustrated with beautiful Wood Engravings. Being equal in its Literary character to any Weekly in the country, and being thus perfect in its Odd-Fellowship department, it will be worthy of a place on the table of every brother of the Order.

The Gazette and Rule is published every Saturday, at 44 Ann-street, New-York, by CRAMPTON & CLARK, and is under the Editorial Superintendence of Rev. Bro. AUG. C. L. ARNOLD, P. C. P.

All Communications should be addressed to J. R. CRAMPTON, 44 Ann-street, New-York.

I. O. O. F.

Office of the Grand Secretary Grand Lodge State of New-York:

ODD FELLOW'S HALL, CITY OF NEW-YORK,
March 13, 1849.

To District Deputy Grand Masters, Officers of Lodges, and Brethren:

In consequence of the many complaints made to this Office of the failure of Deputies, Officers of Lodges and Members to receive communications which have been issued from this Office, and of the failure to receive many communications which have been intended to reach this Office, for several months last past, and which have been transmitted by Deputies, Lodges and individuals, you are therefore notified and requested to address all communications intended for the Grand Lodge, Grand Master, or Grand Secretary, to BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Box No. 838, Post Office, New-York, and in all cases to be particular that Letters and Documents are properly mailed, in order that a failure of papers intended for this, or sent from this Office, to reach their destination, may be traced to the proper cause.

Fraternally yours,

BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Grand Secretary.

GOURAUD'S LIBRARY OF ROMANCE.

JULIA WRIGHT—CANTO VII.

Such great advantages will serve to show
That Julia Wright had lovers, quantum suff,
Or might have had, if every brainless beau
Had been allowed to breathe his rapid stuff;
But Julia's good sound sense led her to know
Two lovers for one woman were enough
From whom a partner for her life to choose—
And even one of these she must refuse!

GOURAUD'S ITALIAN MEDICATED SOAP has been instrumental in procuring many a fair girl a good husband, who otherwise might have pined hopelessly under the blighting influence of a Pimpled, Tanned, Freckled, Sallow or Rough Skin! GOURAUD'S POUDES SUBTILES will eradicate every vestige of superfluous hair from the face, neck, arms and brow. GOURAUD'S LIQUID ROUGE imparts a delightful color to pale cheeks and lips. Dr. Felix Gouraud's renowned preparations can only be obtained at his Cosmetic Depot, 67 Walker street, first door from Broadway, not in Broadway. Remember this.

LUXURIANT HAIR.

BOGLE'S HYPERION FLUID.—One bottle of this truly valuable liquid is worth more than its weight in gold. There is no quackery in its composition; but healthy and efficacious ingredients, calculated to effect all that it professes. Baldness will at once depart, and a luxuriant growth of hair take its place. Gray hair will return to its pristine brilliancy—weak hair become strong and vigorous, and the skin take a proper and healthy action, by the use of the inestimable Hyperion. As an article for giving softness to the hair, and a brilliant gloss, it cannot by any compound be equaled.

For Sale, Wholesale and Retail, by A. B. & D. Sands, 100 Fulton-st.; Rushton, Clark & Co., 110 and 273 Broadway, N. Y. To be obtained of the Proprietor and Manufacturer, Wm Bogle, 277 Washington-st., Boston, and of the principal Druggists and Perfumers in the United States and Canada.

GEORGE W. ZIMMERMAN.

VENITIAN BLIND MANUFACTURER, No. 61, Arch-st. above Second, has constantly on hand a general assortment, which for finish and workmanship cannot be surpassed, to which he invites the attention of purchasers. BARD & BROTHERS.

MANUFACTURERS OF DIAMOND POINT-ED GOLD PENS, and Gold and Silver Pencil Cases, 101 WILLIAM-STREET, and 1 COURT AVENUE, Boston.—The highest premium ever awarded for Gold Pens was given to Bard & Brothers at the last fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanical Association at Boston; also, the highest premium at the Franklin Institute, Philadelphia. 3m339

SOAP AND CANDLES.

JOHN D. LEE, Manufacturer, Nos. 61 and 63 Roade street, New-York, has constantly on hand a large assortment of the above articles, which he will sell at the lowest market prices, warranted equal, if not superior, to any manufactured in the city; delivered or shipped without charge for boxes or cartage.

MERCHANTS, GROCERS, COUNTRY DEALERS and FAMILIES, who are in want of the above articles, will find it to their interest to call on him before purchasing elsewhere. 3m348

HAVANA AND PRINCIPE CIGARS.

JAMES SADLER, No. 234 BROADWAY, (3d door above American Hotel).—The attention of my friends and the public is respectfully invited to the above large, spacious and elegant Store, where they will find at all times a splendid and choice stock of genuine Havana and Principe Cigars, of the most celebrated Brands. Also, an extensive assortment of Virginia Cavendish Tobacco of the favorite brands; genuine Turkey Smoking Tobacco, &c. &c. The trade supplied on reasonable terms. 3m245*

ECLECTIC MEDICAL AND SURGICAL OFFICE,

No. 127 Chambers-st., New-York.

I. ALL CASES OF DISEASE in any part of the HUMAN SYSTEM, INTERNAL or EXTERNAL, whether in MEN, WOMEN or CHILDREN, will be EXAMINED, and COUNSEL or ADVICE given freely to all, by the Physicians in attendance, WITHOUT CHARGE.

II. Patients will find our EXAMINATIONS, and the mode by which we arrive at a knowledge of their diseases—as also our TREATMENT, unlike those of any others which they may have heretofore known or tried.

III. Our REMEDIES or TREATMENT will be found the most pleasant, safe, simple, and efficacious that can be used. No confinement to the sick room—no hindrance from business,—no danger from colds,—and no injury to the constitution;—but, on the contrary, IMPROVEMENT at once.

IV. All the Medicines we prescribe are made in our own CHEMICAL LABORATORY, as we cannot rely on the Drugs sold in the shops, in consequence of almost universal ADULTERATIONS. Our remedies being prepared in the most pure and concentrated form, but little is used or needed to cure the worst cases.

V. We claim, by our UNUSUAL SUCCESS, to be masters over all curable diseases—particularly in all SCROFULOUS AFFECTIONS—the DISEASES PECULIAR TO WOMEN—the HEREDITARY DISEASES OF CHILDREN—and all those most HOPELESS and DESPERATE cases in male or female which have defeated the best efforts of the most distinguished medical practitioners, as the more than ten thousand cases, whom we have successfully treated, can testify.

VI. THOSE DISEASES which are almost invariably treated in the first stage with Balsam of Copiava, Capsules, Cubeba,—with injections of solutions of Nitrate of Silver, Borax, Alum, Sugar of Lead, Sulphate of Zinc,—with Blisters, Catheters, and Caustics;—and in the second stage with Yellow or Black Washes, Blue or Mercurial Ointment, Blue Stone or Lunar Caustic, externally,—and with Calomel, Blue Pill, Red Precipitate, Corrosive Sublimate, Hydriodate of Potassa, Sarsaparilla Syrup, and other like cheats and slops, internally,—we may before Heaven and Earth what we know and can demonstrate by hundreds of cases, that by such treatment and means these diseases have never, and can never, be healed—they deceive the patient, disguise the disease by driving it into the system to other and more important parts,—they produce Strictures; Abscesses in the Kidneys; Piles; Fistulas; Catarrhs; Gravel; Diseases of the Eyes; Loss of Hair and Hearing; Rheumatic Pains; Decay of the Flesh and Bones; Ulcers in the Limbs, Throat, Head, Neck, Nose and Palate; Disease of the Liver and Stomach; with CONSUMPTION OF THE LUNGS, or WHOLE SYSTEM; and thus render either the whole life of the patient miserable, or hurry him to a premature grave.

Without using any of the above named Quackish, Swindling and Murderous Remedies, we PROMISE to every case we treat a PERMANENT and RADICAL cure FOR LIFE, by a very simple medicine, which is without taste or smell, which neither purges nor vomits, nor hinders from business, nor exposes the patient in any way whatever. Testimonials to these Facts we can furnish from persons who were carried out of the Broadway Hospital to die as hopeless cases, and many others of like character, whom we have cured.

VII. FISTULAS cured invariably WITHOUT AN OPERATION. Of the hundreds of cases of this disease which we have known, we have never seen one which had been cured with cutting with the knife—though nearly all had been cut once, twice, or more times. Cutting never cured a case—it is false, delusive and cruel. References will be given to cases in this city which have been successfully treated of the most terrible forms of Fistula ever known.

VIII. Cases of SURGERY, MIDWIFERY and DENTISTRY attended to in all their departments—Tumors, Cancers, Dislocation, Fractures, Wounds, and Injuries of every kind treated with safety and success.

IX. ALL DISEASES OF THE EYES and EARS treated without PAIN or PERIL, and with UNEQUALLED SUCCESS.

We invite all the afflicted, however hopeless their cases may appear, or whatever their disease may be, or however many physicians or remedies they may have tried, to put our knowledge and skill to the test in an examination of their case,—it will cost them nothing,—and then they will be prepared to know whether we can treat them successfully or not—for if we do not find, to their satisfaction, the cause or origin of all the difficulties in the case, we will own that the cure is not in our power, and hence put them to no expense. Most physicians treat symptoms—we go to the root, and thus succeed where others fail.

NEVER DESPAIR! you have given our Remedies and Treatment an honest trial.

Patients visited at their residences when required. All DR. BEACH'S BOOKS and MEDICINES for sale at this office.

Office open from 8 o'clock, A. M., to 8 P. M. Sundays from 9 to 10 A. M., and from 7 to 8 P. M.

WRIGHT'S INDIAN PILLS

THIS Superior Medicine may be had in part as follows:—At Dr. Wright's Offices in Philadelphia, 169 Race street; New-York, 288 Greenwich-street; and Boston, 198 Tremont-street—and by 20,000 Agencies in North and South America, England, France, and Germany. Agents whose supplies become exhausted, can obtain a fresh lot at the Philadelphia rates, by addressing any of the above Offices. Care should be taken not to confound this medicine with other articles of similar name, so as to prevent disagreeable consequences; and in no case should it be purchased from individuals who cannot vouch for its genuineness. 240

IN QUART BOTTLES,
For Purifying the Blood, and for the Cure of
SCROFULA, RHEUMATISM, STURBORN ULCERS, DYSPEPSY, SALT RHEUM, FEVER SORES, ERYSIPELAS, PIMPLES, BILES, MERCURIAL DISEASES, CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS, LIVER COMPLAINT, BRONCHITIS, CONSUMPTION, FEMALE COMPLAINTS, LOSS OF APPETITE, GENERAL DEBILITY, &c.

THE PROPRIETORS having spent much time in bringing this preparation of Sarsaparilla to its present state of perfection; and the experience of fourteen years has furnished them the most ample opportunity to study, in their various forms, the diseases for which it is recommended, and to adapt it exactly to their relief and cure. Patients who wish a really good Medicine are invited to give it a trial, and satisfy themselves of its superiority, and the invaluable property it possesses of arresting and curing disease. The bottle has been enlarged to hold one Quart, and in its present improved form may safely claim to be the best and cheapest medicine of the age. Its progress to the fame it has attained may be traced by a long line of facts and cures, that stand as landmarks and beacons for the invalid, pointing the way to the haven of health; and what it has already done for the thousands who have used it, it is capable of doing for the millions still suffering and struggling with disease. It purifies, cleanses, and strengthens the fountain springs of life, and infuses new vigor throughout the whole animal frame.

DYSPEPSY CURED.

The following testimonial, from a gentleman so well known as Mr. Cox, requires no comment, and recommends itself to all similarly afflicted: NEW-ORLEANS, Dec. 18, 1848.

Messrs. A. B. & D. SANDS—Gentlemen: Having experienced the most beneficial effects from the use of your Sarsaparilla, it gives me pleasure to add my testimony to the numerous spontaneous effusions of grateful hearts which you continually are receiving.

My case was dyspeptic, or rather I may term it a weakness of the digestive organs. For more than a year, I was troubled with wind upon my stomach and its frequent eructation, together with producing a spasmodic contraction of the heart, often gave me much annoyance. After trying various remedies without avail, I commenced with your Sarsaparilla. Before I had used half a bottle, almost every symptom of this disagreeable complaint had vanished, and in a few weeks its continued use effected a complete cure. I therefore confidently recommend it to all persons affected in the same manner, and have reason to believe that many who are suffering under a supposed disease of the heart, if they would take your Sarsaparilla, in a few weeks would find themselves restored to health in both mind and body. I remain yours, very truly,

JOHN V. COX, 92 Lexington Avenue.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA IN PRUSSIA.

The Proprietors of this valuable Medicine have just received an order from our esteemed friend and correspondent, Theodore S. Fay, Secretary of Legation to the Court of Prussia, for the use of a member of the Royal Family—a copy of which we herewith lay before our readers.—[Home Journal. U. S. LEGATION, BERLIN, Nov. 30, 1848.—Gentlemen: I wish you to send two dozen bottles of your Sarsaparilla, for the use of His Royal Highness Prince Waldimir of Prussia, to this Legation, as soon as possible. It is necessary that he should receive it immediately; therefore, please send it by first steamer. The bill can be made out in the name of the Prince, and sent with it. Your obedient servant,

THEO. S. FAY.

SCROFULOUS AFFECTION OF THE EYES.

SOUTH KINGSTON, (R. I.) Oct. 11, 1847.—Messrs. SANDS—Gentlemen: My little daughter, when one year old, was attacked with a scrofulous humor on her face, which soon after extended into her eyes, causing almost total blindness in one of them, and disfiguring her whole face. I employed two physicians to attend her, who exhausted their utmost skill to give her relief, but it all proved useless, and finally one of them remarked to me that he had known of some striking cures effected by Sands' Sarsaparilla, and advised me to try it. I obtained one bottle, which she commenced using, and before it was all used up it had effected an entire cure. It is now over four years since she was cured, and there has been no reappearance of the disease, and we are satisfied that it is a perfect cure. It gives me great pleasure to add that I can recommend it to any sufferer from a similar complaint.

Respectfully yours,

GEORGE ROBINSON.

DR. S. P. TOWNSEND'S

COMPOUND EXTRACT OF

SARSAPARILLA.

The Most Extraordinary Medicine in the World!!

This Extract is put up in Quart Bottles; it is six times cheaper, pleasanter, and more potent, superior to any sold. It cures without vomiting, purging, or debilitating the Patient.

THE great beauty and superiority of this Sarsaparilla over all other medicines is, that while it eradicates the disease, it invigorates the body. It is one of the very best.

SPRING AND SUMMER MEDICINES

ever known: it not only purifies the whole system and strengthens the person, but it creates rich, new and pure blood, a power possessed by no other medicine. And in this lies the grand secret of its wonderful success. It has performed, within the last two years, more than 100,000 cures of severe cases of disease; at least 15,000 were considered incurable. It has saved the lives of more than 10,000 children the past two seasons in the city of New-York alone.

10,000 Cases of General Debility and want of Nervous Energy.

Dr. S. P. Townsend's Sarsaparilla invigorates the whole system permanently. To those who have lost their muscular energy by the effects of medicine or indiscretion committed in youth, or the excessive indulgence of the passions, and brought on by physical prostration of the nervous system, lassitude, want of ambition, fainting sensations, premature decay and decline, hastening toward that fatal disease Consumption, can be entirely restored by this pleasant remedy. This Sarsaparilla is far superior to any.

Invigorating Cordial,

as it renews and invigorates the system, gives activity to the limbs, and strength to the muscular system, in a most extraordinary degree.

Consumption Cured.

Cleanse and Strengthen. Consumption can be Cured. Bronchitis, Consumption, Liver Complaint, Colds, Catarrhs, Coughs, Asthma, Spitting Blood, Soreness in the Chest, Electric Flush, Night Sweats, Difficult or Profuse Expectoration, Pain in the Side, &c., have been and can be Cured.

Spitting Blood.

New-York, April 28, 1847.—Dr. S. P. Townsend: I verily believe your Sarsaparilla has been the means, through Providence, of saving my life. I have for several years had a bad Cough. It became worse and worse. At last I raised large quantities of blood, had night sweats, was greatly debilitated and reduced, and did not expect to live. I have only used your Sarsaparilla a short time, and there has been a wonderful change wrought in me. I am now able to walk all over the city. I raise no blood, and my cough has left me. You can well imagine that I am thankful for these results. Your obedient servant, WM. RUSSELL, 65 Catharine st.

Dyspepsia.

No fluid or medicine has ever been discovered which so nearly resembles the gastric juice or saliva, in decomposing food, and strengthening the organs of digestion, as this preparation of Sarsaparilla.

BANK DEPARTMENT, ALBANY, May 10, 1845.—Dr. Townsend—Sir: I have been afflicted for several years with the Dyspepsia in its worst forms, attended with sourness of stomach, loss of appetite, extreme heartburn, and a great aversion to all kinds of food, and for weeks (what I could eat) I have been unable to retain but a small portion on my stomach. I tried the usual remedies, but they had little or no effect in removing the complaint. I was induced, about two months since, to try your Extract of Sarsaparilla, and I must say with little confidence; but after using nearly two bottles, I found my appetite restored, and the heartburn entirely removed; and I would earnestly recommend the use of it to those who have been afflicted as I have been. Yours, &c. W. W. VAN ZANDT.

Great Blessing to Mothers and Children.

It is the safest and most effectual medicine for purifying the system, and relieving the sufferings attendant upon childbirth, ever discovered. It strengthens both the mother and child, prevents pain and disease, increases and enriches the food; those who have used it think it is indispensable. It is highly useful both before and after confinement, as it prevents diseases attendant upon childbirth. In Costiveness, Piles, Cramps, Swelling of the Feet, Dependancy, Heartburn, Vomiting, Pain in the Back and Loins, False Pains, Hemorrhage, and in regulating the Secretions, and equalizing the Circulation, it has no equal. The great beauty of this medicine is, it is always safe, and the most delicate use it most successfully.

Scrofula Cured.

This Certificate conclusively proves that this Sarsaparilla has perfect control over the most obstinate diseases of the Blood. Three persons cured in one house is unprecedented.

Three Children.

Dr. S. P. Townsend—Dear Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that three of my children have been cured of the Scrofula by the use of your excellent medicine. They were afflicted very severely with bad sores; have taken four bottles; it took them away, for which I feel myself under great obligation. Yours, respectfully, ISAAC W. ORAIN, 105 Wooster st.

Opinions of Physicians.

Dr. S. P. Townsend is almost daily receiving orders from Physicians in different parts of the Union.

This is to certify, that we, the undersigned, Physicians of the city of Albany, have, in numerous cases, prescribed Dr. Townsend's Sarsaparilla, and believe it to be one of the most valuable preparations in the market.

CHAPTER X.

THE FATHER.

"My daughter! Oh, my deuce!"

"Oh! my daughter!"

SHAKESPEARE.

"WHERE is Captain Rivers?" had been the exclamation of Moultrie, as, standing once more upon the ramparts of the fort, he surveyed the brave men around him. "Jasper, where is the gallant young captain?"

"He is not here," was the low response. "He returned not with us."

"What say you, major—Rivers missing? My brave young volunteer! It surely is not so!"

"It is too true, I fear," answered Marion. "He must have been left on board that fatal ship, and perished in the explosion; or, perchance, sunk in attempting to reach the boats."

"He may not be lost," cried Jasper, hastily; "let me man a boat, and descend the river once more!"

"It would be useless, my brave Jasper. The seaward tide runs strong, and the fog is setting over the waters. But we will have one more shot at those retreating scoundrels, to avenge the gallant Rivers."

And as he spake, Marion seized the breech of a gun, and depressed it, so as to range the muzzle in the line of the retreating flag-ship, Bristol. He waved the smoking match around his head, and then applied it to the priming. The heavy charge rushed through the embrasure, and sped on its fatal way.

History itself has recorded the effect of that destructive cannon shot, the last defying thunder of the patriot defenders, on that terrible day, and wielded by the hand of Francis Marion.

It rushed like a messenger of death in the track of the proud two-decker. It entered her cabin windows and struck dead two British officers—then, speeding on, ranged the entire length of the ship, sweeping the seamen in its path, till finally it burst through the fore-castle, and buried itself in the sea.

Marion smiled grimly as he saw that the well-aimed shot had told; and then, folding his arms, turned silently away. But Jasper, who had been narrowly scrutinizing, amid the gloom around them, the forms of the assembled men, now suddenly discovered that the dark-faced volunteer was also missing. He hurriedly spoke to Marion.

"What say you?" exclaimed the major. "He must be here. I myself saw him as we returned."

But the man Orrall was not to be found. He had unaccountably disappeared; and his absence, by all but Jasper, was looked upon as most mysterious. The lynx-eyed sergeant, however, had cast no favorable eye at first upon the suspicious looking volunteer; and now his absence, in connection with the fate of Captain Rivers, filled the gallant Jasper's mind with vague suspicions. He knew that the man could have left the island in one of the many boats that were fastened in a small creek at the rear; and doubted not that this could explain his disappearance.

"There is some foul play here," he muttered to himself. "I will be on the look out for that dark-faced volunteer."

Sergeant Jasper was correct in his suspicions of the mode of Orrall's escape from the island, and from the scrutiny which, no doubt he feared to meet, in regard to his officer's uncertain fate. The bravo had, immediately on the return of the detachment, possessed himself of a small skiff, and under cover of the deepening fog, effected his escape unobserved. Rowing rapidly up the river, he arrived at length at the bend in the stream, which curved around his own dwelling; and drawing the little boat into a narrow creek, covered with the brushwood that grew thickly over the rock, the bravo entered the passage which, as we have said, communicated with the cave, and thus penetrated into his own dwelling.

On arriving beneath the floor of the cabin, he had lifted the loose fragment of plank with the utmost caution, in order to avoid disturbing his daughter, who he anticipated would at this hour be retired to rest. He had enjoined upon her, as was customary with him, when leaving the child for so long a period as a whole day, not to unbar the door of the hut, nor even to approach its only window, so fearful was that strange father of the least accident happening to his worshiped blind girl. The sound of a singular oblong instrument of music, a sort of rude lute, which he had taught her to play, usually greeted Mat Orrall when he returned at night to his dwelling, and the fact of all being silent as he emerged quietly from the floor, satisfied him now that the child was sleeping soundly in her singular bed. He hastily struck a light and lit the pendent lamp in the middle of the room; then, with a soft step, approached the caboose.

The velvet curtains hung closely together, and the father, with a cautious hand, lifted them to look at his slumbering child.

She was not there!

Matthew Orrall gazed at the couch as if petrified. The small pillow was unruffled and the bunting drawn smoothly over the bed. It had not been pressed that day.

The bravo turned, and with one bound reached the door. It was unfastened, and as he noticed this with a stifled groan, he observed also that a small scrap of paper was fixed within the hoop of the lock. He clutched it nervously, and with misty eyes read the few lines that were inscribed, evidently in a disguised hand.

"Your child is safe, but must be separated from you. At some future day she may be restored to you. Till then, she will remain in good hands."

The bravo read and re-read these words, then with a terrible cry he crumpled the paper in his hand. That cry was indeed fearful to hear. It was not like the voice of a human being, but rather like the howl of a tigress, robbed of her young. Then up and down, with fierce strides, the bravo traversed his deserted apartment, beating his forehead with his clenched hand, and muttering at times, then yelling aloud, the most fearful imprecations.

At last he grew more calm. He wiped away the foam which had gathered upon his dark lip, and going to the couch of his child, threw back the curtains, and bowed himself upon her pillow. He hugged that simple memento to his breast, and kissed it passionately, muttering all the while, in broken tones, "Alice, Alice—my child, my child!"

It was a most powerful love indeed, that this bad man cherished for his helpless daughter—a love wound about with every fiber of his heart. But it was the same fearfully-strong affection that the wild beast entertains for its offspring—changing not the natural fury of its nature, but only developing its passionate instincts.

Mat Orrall at length arose from the couch, with a sullen scowl upon his brow, and an evil gleam in his eyes, that boded some settled purpose. He went to a small box, that was fastened beneath the table, and unlocking its lid took from it a brace of heavy pistols, which he sat himself down to load. This done, he placed them in the pocket of the rough coat which he wore, and with them deposited a broad-bladed, leather-sheathed knife. Then, with a moody smile, he turned, cast one more look at the deserted couch of the blind girl, and left the house—first, however, securing the rude door by locking it upon the outside.

He pursued his way through the lonely streets, for the entire population were at this hour crowding the wharves and beach, to behold the retreat of the British, and directed his steps toward the house of Robert Atree. The peculiar knock, a concerted signal between the young tory and his secret visitors, gained him immediate entrance into the room which we have before penetrated, and in which he now found Atree awaiting his evidently anticipated arrival.

"What news, Matthew Orrall?" cried the young man, drawing the bravo in, and quickly bolting the concealed door behind him. "I know those infernal rebels have beaten off the ships, but in the devil's name what good news have you to offset that?"

"Rivers is gone," muttered the bravo.

"Hah!" cried Atree, drawing a long breath; "you have done it then? Speak further, man; what mean you? How is he gone?"

"Sunk in seventeen fathoms of waters, with a dirk-stab in his side," answered the ruffian, eyeing Atree with an ominous look.

"Hah! well done, Mat! you are always sure in your work," cried the tory, while a gleam of fiendish exultation flashed from his blue eyes. "This makes all right, though the rebels have gained a temporary advantage. You are a trusty friend, Matthew Orrall. Drink now, man: drink a brimming glass to our lasting good opinion of each other."

Saying this, Robert Atree filled a goblet of spirits, and handed it to the bravo.

But Matthew Orrall clutched the glass and dashed it to the floor. Then, before Atree could retreat a step or recover from his surprise, the bravo sprang upon him, and wound his iron fingers about his throat. The young man reeled backward, and sank heavily upon the floor; and over him, with his knee upon his breast, fell the pirate.

"I want no rum, Robert Atree! I want your blood; or—or—"

"Help!" gasped the tory. "Mat, Mat, what would you do? What is it you want?"

"My child—Alice! my child!" muttered Orrall, in a terrible voice. "Robber that you are, give me back my Alice!"

He drew the broad-bladed knife from his pocket, and lifted it threateningly above the head of Atree.

"Your child—what mean you, Mat Orrall?" murmured the young man, almost strangled by the ruffian's clutch. "Villain, would you murder me?"

"Ay! I will murder you, if you give me not back my child," hissed Orrall between his set teeth, releasing slightly his pressure on Atree's throat, and allowing the blood to circulate more freely through the distended veins. "Where is she? Robber, where have you concealed her?"

"I know not, Mat—you are mad! You know not what you do. I have not seen your child!"

"You lie—you lie!" shrieked the bravo. "No one but you knew of the child. It is some damning scheme you have contrived to get me in your power. Ay, it was your hand-writing—villain that you are, to steal away my child! But, you shall die! You shall die this moment if you reveal not where she is!"

Matthew Orrall's eyes burned like coals of fire, as they glared above the writhing features of the tory. He held the knife aloft, and nerved his powerful arm for the fatal blow.

Atree beheld it. He knew that in the present excited state of the bravo he was more a tiger than a man. He caught the demoniac light of those flaming eyes, and the gleam of the broad blade that threatened him. But the young tory was no coward, nor did his presence of mind desert him, though he felt himself like an infant in the strong man's grasp. His resolve was quickly formed.

Suddenly he appeared to sink back, and struggled no longer. His head fell to the floor, and in a calm voice he murmured:

"Kill me, Mat Orrall, murder your friend, if it please you."

With these words his limbs and strained muscles slacked at once, as if incapable of further resistance. He appeared to have resigned himself to the impending blow.

The bravo paused. He had not looked for this, and it disconcerted him. Supposing that he should slay Atree, would that restore to him his lost child? He hesitated a moment, then withdrew his hand from the young man's throat.

"Get up, Robert Atree," muttered he, "and answer me like a man."

The tory, who had calculated the effect of his ruse de guerre, which was indeed likewise a forlorn hope, rose to his feet, with his face black with blood, and his brain reeling to its center. He threw himself into the chair, and seized his own yet untasted glass of spirits, and drank a few mouthfuls to moisten his parched throat. Orrall remained opposite to him, grasping the flashing knife.

"Well, Matthew," said the young man, carelessly adjusting his neckcloth, and wiping the perspiration from his forehead, as he regarded the still threatening attitude of the bravo. "Well, Matthew, now that you are somewhat less frantic, I suppose we can arrive at some understanding of this matter. What is it you want? What has happened to your child?"

"Do you ask, Robert Atree?" cried the pirate father, in a fierce tone. "What is this?" he continued, stretching out his left hand, which still compressed the scrap of writing that he had found in the door of his hut. "Deny it not—it is your hand-writing!"

Atree took the paper between his fingers, and scanned the manuscript, as careless as if the man who presented it had not just held a dagger to his breast.

"Well, Matthew," said he, quietly, "it seems your child, Alice, has been stolen—abducted."

The bravo fairly quivered before the cool composure of the young tory. He spoke not a word.

"And you thought I wrote this miserable scrawl?" resumed Robert Atree. "Really, Matthew Orrall, you do my chirography great injustice. Just do me the favor of glancing over those papers, and compare the writing," he continued, tossing a pile of manuscripts toward the end of the table. "You will perceive, instantly, that my letters are vastly better formed."

"Oh, you bloody villain!" muttered Orrall between his teeth. Then he continued aloud: "Robert Atree, answer me—as a true man, do you know aught of my child?"

"Not until you tell me, shall I be able to know what you are talking about," replied Atree. "If indeed your daughter be abducted, I sympathise with you deeply, and will aid you all I can in recovering her—that is, if you will keep your fingers off my throat."

"Where, then, Robert Atree, or satan—I know not which to call you—where, then, is my Alice?"

"That I cannot answer, my friend. I know so little of your past history, that I cannot tell what object some of your past acquaintances may have in stealing your child. But, in the name of common sense, Orrall, what should I do with so useless an appendage to my bachelor establishment as a little blind girl?"

The young man's face beamed, as it were, with an irrepressible smile, at the ludicrousness of the fancy. Mat Orrall smiled also, but it was with his bitter sneer.

"Well, well," he muttered, "perhaps I was too violent, and wronged you—if so, I'm sorry; but," he cried with a fearful oath, "if you deceive me, I'll have your heart's blood, Robert Atree!"

The tory's handsome face did blanch for a moment, as he caught the infernal expression of the bravo's eye, in uttering that terrible threat. But he quickly mastered his fear, and returned the other's look with a nonchalant air.

"I'm sorry for your loss, and for your suspicions of me," he remarked; "but nevertheless I am not angry, though you have scratched my neck and tore my frill most shockingly. And if my money and assistance can serve you, you shall have them both. And now, Matthew Orrall, are we friends once more?"

"Till we are foes, to the death," answered the bravo, taking the white hand which his employer extended.

"And you'll join me now in a glass of spirits?" Orrall drank with one gulp the liquor which Atree poured out; but the scowl left not his brow a moment.

"Mat, you are a desperate man, and I trust we shall not quarrel again. Now tell me, is Rivers out of the way?"

"I've earned a thousand pounds," muttered the bravo.

"That's an odd way to answer my question; but I suppose it tells the story. You shall have the money, Mat."

Robert Atree pointed, as he spoke, to a bag which lay upon the table, and resumed:

"You see you would have secured your reward even had you murdered me. I trusted you, Matthew, and the gold was ready for your hand."

"I have earned it," replied Orrall.

"And, as I have said before, you shall have it; but not to-night; you have chosen to wrong me by your suspicions. I choose now to wait till the morrow, and learn if Rivers be really dead."

"Hah!" growled Orrall.

"It is my whim—just as choking me was yours, a short time since. Indulge me in it, my friend."

"You are the devil's own," muttered the bravo. "When shall I have the gold?"

"To-morrow night, Mat, if you will come for it."

"What if I take it now?"

"Then you and I part for ever."

"Enough. Good night," said Orrall, turning to depart.

"Another glass, Mat."

"I'll drink with you to-morrow night," answered the bravo, as he shot back the bolt, and opened the secret door. "Till then, I'll seek for Alice."

With these words, and with the same black scowl that he had worn through the interview, Matthew Orrall left the apartment.

Robert Atree smiled quietly to himself for a moment, until he had refastened the door. Then his whole frame shook with a tremor of passion.

"The dog!" he cried—"to dare; but I will ruin him—I'll—"

He dashed out another glass of liquor and drank it off.

"But the girl I have safe," continued the young tory. "I have her where all the cunning and boldness of Mat Orrall will not penetrate. If my schemes work I'll sweep the poor wretch from my path, as I would a toad, ere he voids his venom on me. Now, I must use him. And first for the fair Louise Arnould, or the Widow Rivers!"

VERSES

Composed by Chedloak Tichbourne, of himself, in the Tower of London the night before he suffered death, who was executed in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, for treason, in 1684.

My prime of youth is but a frost of cares,

My past of joy is but a dish of pain,

My crop of corn is but a field of tares;

And all my goodies is but vain hope of gain.

The day is fled, and yet I saw no sun;

And now I live, and now my life is done.

My spring is past, and yet it hath not sprung;

The fruit is dead, and yet the leaves are green;

My youth is past, and yet I am but young;

I saw the world, and yet I was not seen;

My thread is cut, and yet it is not spun;

And now I live, and now my life is done.

I sought for death, and found it in the womb,

I look'd for life, and yet it was but a shade;

I trod the ground, and knew it was my tombe;

And now I die, and now I am but made:

The glass is full, and yet my glass is run;

And now I live, and now my life is done.

CLIMATE OF NEW ZEALAND.—The following extraordinary facts relating to the effects of the climate of New Zealand upon exotic vegetation are recorded in the minutes of the lords' committee on colonization. Plants which in Europe are annuals become perennials. This has been observed to be the case even of barley, beans, &c. The wheat is remarkably good, and grows exceedingly high, the stalk being so strong that it has the power of resisting any ordinary wind, and is never laid. It is alleged also to have produced fifty bushels to the acre. The natives never grow wheat in large quantities. The myrtle and the fuschia are large timber trees. Cabbages grow close to the sea-shore, with a heart eleven inches in diameter, and radishes become larger than mangel-wurtzels, as big, in fact, as a man's leg.

Incidents of Travel.

VISIT TO THE COLISEUM.

ONE night or morning I was suddenly wakened by a furious rain, and as it died away, I saw by the light in my window, that there was a small moon. It was a joyful discovery. I had been repining at my not having made the famous trip to the Coliseum by moonlight some time previously, and I could not remain another month. I sprang eagerly out of bed, and thrust my head out of the window. It was a singular, wild-looking night, presenting the aspect of black clouds fringed with narrow strips of moonshine, and the glimmer of a few stars through the crannies contrasting with the gloom like the light in a picture of Rembrandt; the sort of nocturnal weather in fact that one thinks of child-stories of conjurers and evil spirits—such as one would fancy should have succeeded the storm in which the hero of Burns escaped from the witches. My watch was paralytic; the Roman clocks, with dial plates of twenty-four hours, commencing and changing with Ave Maria or twilight, are a complete puzzle to a stranger; and in blissful ignorance of the hour, I hastily equipped, and succeeded, in waking the porter. He rubbed his eyes, then stared at me as if to detect insanity, muttered some very significant words about robbers, as if to give fair warning, and seeing me resolute at length unbarred the street-door. Assassinations, though much diminished, are not even so rare as they might be in Italy. By our joint calculations it was somewhere between midnight and daylight, and though I knew that since the poet's famous description this moon excursion had become quite fashionable, yet the adventure all alone, at so very late an hour, when I came to reflect upon it, in the cool street, seemed to have about it something of danger as well as romance, and I comforted myself with the companionship of a respectable stick, my tried friend in the Alps. I turned for a moment for one earnest gaze at the Column of Trajan, then by a winding way escaped from the houses of the modern city into a kind of common, surrounded with ruins—the site of the ancient Roman Forum, and passing beneath the Arch of Titus along the edge of the Palatine Hill and the Palace of the Cesars, I presently reached the Arch of Constantine, when just before me, like some immense towering fortress, more impressive in the stillness and gloom of night, was the Coliseum.

By this time the moon shone out, and there remained but a few flitting clouds, that seemed determined to rain, and floating in mid air, like spirits, filled the earth beneath with changing lights and shadows. It seemed more impressive, and less like day than the glare of a full moon in a cloudless sky. I appeal to all poets, and tender people too, if moonlight is not improved by being a little damp? The face of nature, like the human face, is, doubtless, more interesting after weeping.

The world is already familiar with the ordinary daylight description of this wonderful structure, and most are likely aware that it is a slightly oval amphitheater, more than a hundred an fifty feet high, and estimated to have originally covered about six acres of ground, and to have been furnished with seats to accommodate more than eighty thousand spectators—that it was commenced by Vespasian and finished by Titus, in the latter part of the first century, by the labor of Jewish captives; and that for four succeeding centuries it was the scene of gladiatorial combats, and other bloody spectacles of the taste of a warlike and cruel people. To the modern visitor one of its most touching associations arises from the circumstance that it was the spot where Ignatius of Antioch and multitudes of the early Christian martyrs were thrown to wild beasts. Majestic as its ruins now are, it is said but about two thirds of the original pile remain. It endured the devastating changes of a fortress in the middle ages, and served as a quarry for several palaces, till about a century since, with a view to its preservation, it was solemnly consecrated by Benedict XIV.

to the memory of the Christian martyrs who had perished there.. The arena is now ornamented with rude representations of the Saviour's passion, a pulpit in which a monk occasionally preaches, and a cross in the center, for each knee of which an indulgence is promised for two hundred days.

I never felt more vividly the fitness of the midnight hour for lone contemplation. Above were but the moonlit sky and the silent stars; and around, frowning more grimly in the gloom of midnight, like deserted piles in the city of the dead, were some of earth's proudest monuments. How eloquent was that stillness! The watch-dog had forgotten to bay "beyond the Tiber." Not an echo died upon the breeze that whispered plaintively amid the leaves of the ivy and the ilex, and the crumbling arches on the Palatine Hill. The owl had ceased her wail in the buried mansions of Augustus, and the damp vaults of the "golden house" in which Nero had once reveled. Where cohorts in shining armor had gathered, with their eagles proudly waving, and music, and the shouts of assembled nations had rent the air at the elevation of the triumphal arches of Titus and Constantine, was now not a human voice nor a habitable dwelling.

If with the waving of a hand the spirits of the mighty dead could have been summoned from their graves to gaze upon the little that remained of what had been once their pride, what a lesson would it have been upon the vanity of human ambition! Yet who can estimate the sum of mortal agony which these few relics had cost!

The busy fancy conjured up strange phantoms. It needed little effort to fill again the empty seats of the deserted Coliseum with a multitude, rising like a forest on a mountain-side—to picture the tyrant emperor, the Roman guards, the vestal virgins, and the senators in the sumptuous seats, nearest the arena, and the various ranks in their costumes, receding away to the slaves far above—the hush of suspense—the advance of a bearded, tottering old man, just torn from the parting embrace of a venerable matron, and a trembling maiden, and toward whom every eye is directed—the glaring eyes and roar of the hungry beast—the moving of the lips, and the upward look of that meek face, as if in faith he saw the martyr's crown—the terrific bound—the victim quivering beneath the jaws of the furious beast on the sand—the spouting gore, staining the white locks—the demon gaze of the multitude mingled here and there with a compassionate face, in tears, and the cruel, drowning shouts of thousands of heathen voices. It was but an idle dream. The dimness of night and the silence of desolation were again around me. I heard but my breath and the beating of my own excited heart.

Both my imagination and my feet had traveled a good distance for so late or early an hour, and I naturally began to think of returning.—Walking round to the side of the Coliseum, toward the Arch of Constantine, and casually looking homeward, I perceived a real human being, that was no optical illusion, making directly toward me, in the shape of a tall figure that, with a little feeding would have done for the English horse-guards. He wore a cloak and slouched hat, fit for representation of Guy Fawkes, or the picture of the assassin, and was dressed inferiorly in white (a discovery for painters), which with advancing steps, by moonlight, was particularly effective. I then recollected the porter's warning, and determined to sound his intentions by taking a little circuit. He closely followed. Just as I began to think seriously of showing my defenses, and demanding explanations, unexpectedly I stumbled upon one of the pope's sentries, whom I succeeded in puzzling with bad Italian till my interesting and possibly harmless follower had passed.—Presently day began to break and I returned to my hotel.—[Dr. Corson's Loiterings in Europe.]

THERE is no destruction worse than to overpraise a man; for if his worth prove short of what report doth speak of him, his own actions are ever giving the lie to his honor.

THE honest man will rather be a grave to his neighbor's errors than expose them.

Gems of Thought.

THERE is something repugnant to me, at any time, in written hand. The text never seems determinate. Print settles it. I had thought of the Lycidas as of a full-blown beauty, as springing up in all its parts absolute, till in the evil hour I was shown the original copy of it, together with the other minor poems of Milton, in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge. I wish they had thrown them in the Cam, or sent them after the latter cantos of Spencer, into the Irish Channel. How it staggered me to see the fine things in their one!—interlined and corrected, as if their words were mortal, alterable, displaceable at pleasure—as if they might have been otherwise, and just as good—as if inspiration were made up of parts, and those fluctuations successive, indifferent. I will never go into the workshop of any great artist again, nor desire a sight of his picture till it is fairly off the easel. No, not if Raphael were to be alive again, and painting another Galatea.—[C. Lamb.]

It is well to let the imagination contemplate splendors hanging over past times; the soul must stretch itself somehow out of its cramps; but this may be done without committing crying positive injustice toward the present. It may be allowable in poetry to treat ancient thieves with respect due to true men; but the poet has no business, more than the police-officer, to treat true men, his neighbors, as thieves.

LEARNING is like a river, whose head being far in the land, is, at first rising, little, and easily viewed; but still, as you go, it gapeth into a wider bank; not without pleasure and delightful winding, while it is on both sides set with trees, and the beauties of various flowers. But still, the further you follow it, the deeper and broader it is; till, at last, it inwaves itself into the unfathomed ocean; there you see more water, but no shore—no end of that liquid fluid vastness.—[Feltham.]

THE man of genius and the virtuous man always suggest to our fancy a larger portion of talent and a still more perfect line of conduct than they display to our observation; indeed, it may be pronounced, that if there are any who cannot imagine something beyond the excellence which they see exemplified in practice, such persons are wholly unable to appreciate its real worth.

SOME minds are proportioned to that which may be dispatched at once, or within a short return of time; others to that which begins afar off, and is to be won by length and pursuit.

To be descended of wealth and titles fills no man's head with brains, or heart with truth; those qualities come from higher causes. 'Tis vanity, then, and most condemnable pride for a man of bulk and character to despise another of less size in the world, and of meaner alliance, for want of them; because the latter may have the merit, where the former has only the effects of it in an ancestor; and though the one be great by means of a forefathers, the other is so too, but by his own. Then pray which is the bravest man of the two?—[William Penn.]

In the labyrinth of the world they will have found that appearances are not guides—that a face cast up toward the moon does not more certainly infer an amiable or susceptible disposition, than a contracted brow cast down over a ledger of bad debts.

WISE men are instructed by reason; men of less understanding by experience; the most ignorant by necessity; and the beast by nature.

HARMLESS mirth is the best cordial against the consumption of the spirits; wherefore jesting is not unlawful if it trespasseth not in quantity, quality or season.

RELIGIOUS controversy sharpens the understanding by the subtlety and remoteness of the topics it discusses, and braces the will by their infinite importance.

THE MURDERED POST-BOY.

A SINGULAR INSTANCE OF THE FALLACY OF CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

BY W. H. MAXWELL,

AUTHOR OF "LIFE OF WELLINGTON," "STORIES OF WATERLOO," &c.

It is a general and wholesome belief that sooner or later retributive justice is attendant upon crime—and whether its character be grave or mitigated, a sort of ad-valorem penalty will be invariably exacted. In offenses against property, delinquents under rare and fortunate circumstances have escaped the penal consequences; while in those against the person—we principally allude to murder—by wondrous agencies, accident, or, as we believe it, Providence, when all detective powers have been tried and found wanting, the mystery that shrouded the damning deed has been dispelled—some wanting link to the chain of evidence miraculously supplied—and the malefactor, as the laws of God and man require, consigned to that fate which his offending had justly merited.

A thousand cases to evidence this fact might be adduced. There is not a corner of the land that would bear its isolated evidence to instance the verity of our statement, and during a life not unusually prolonged, striking instances within our knowledge have occurred. One, that I shall allude to, is the reminiscence of a "satcheled schoolboy"—in the other twain, by accident, I may write, pars fui.

Some thirty years ago—were I under a rigid cross-examination I fear that an admission of two or three extra ones might be elicited—an appalling murder was committed near the school in which I was indoctrinated, and that, too, in a part of Ireland where familiarity with crime did not abate aught of its atrocity. When the great commander was furnished with a bill, by a Jew, for a hat, alleged to have been supplied by the Israelite to his heir apparent, he repudiated the claim by the simple but conclusive remark, that "the Duke of Wellington was not the Marquis of Dourou;" and in the forthcoming narrative the English reader must be reminded, and also keep in mind the fact, that Armagh is not Tipperary. In the former department of the Green Isle, murders are infrequent. In the latter, "wild justice," as a sneaking scoundrel designated wholesale assassination, at a radical meeting, is a matter of such every-day occurrence, that with some particulars of the shooting, a coroner's inquest, a most respectable wake, a statistical description of the premises, with the post-mortem appearance of the body, and an account of the funeral, at which the murderer most probably had personally attended, the drama closes. In ten days some fresh murder obliterates the memory of the past one—another and another follows fast—and Thuggism in the south of Ireland, to use a cockney phrase, is so "perfectionated," that by a shooting tariff on the sliding scale, professional gentlemen, who—will furnish an estimate for the removal of an officious herd, or his more obnoxious master, who, strong in his oppression, would still maintain that exploded doctrine—namely, that a man has a right to do what he pleases with his own, and in accordance with that tyrannical belief, demands and enforces payment of his rents biennially.

In early life a deed was done that frightened the "black north," as Connaught-men call it, from its propriety. A murder of the foulest character was perpetrated in open day, in a populous district, and on the public high road. The story of the accursed deed is briefly told, and carries with it a moral to jurymen not to be forgotten.

Stage-coaching was confined in days gone by to the great roads, and the mails ran over the connecting lines of country only, transmitting thereby bags to places on the flanks of the grand route, either by the agencies of pedestrian letter-carriers, or, were the lateral distance considerable, relays of mounted post-boys. At that period, the several towns inland of Newry were thus communicated with, and the Armagh mails, with those of all the minor dependencies, were dispatched early each morning, encased in huge leathern bags, and entrusted to the custody of any urchin old enough to keep both the king's highway and the saddle, during his short transit to the assize town.

It was a sweet summer morning, when, before the great mass of the community were on foot, the little post-boy was seen riding with his epistolary and political charge through the suburban street by which he invariably quitted the town. A man walked beside him with his hand resting on the pommel of the lad's saddle—and had Ireland been searched, one of more evil reputation could not have been produced within a twelvemonth.

In his appearance the post-boy's companion looked every inch the blackguard; and if low larcenies, habitual drunkenness, and a pugnacious temper, would form the beau ideal of a ruffian, Nature's imprint was an honest one. Doolan, as he was called, led a vagabond life, but in the hurry of shipping business, he was now and then employed, from sheer necessity, as a quay-porter, and as gladly got rid of when the temporary pressure was ended. These, his honest earnings, were, as his companions knew well, altogether unequal to the expenditure of a prudent man for half the week, and to one so reckless as Ned Doolan, they would scarce suffice for half a day's consumption. How the remainder of his supplies were obtained, men might guess pretty accurately, for he consorted with the most depraved characters of both sexes, and never had a fixed abode.

Such was the outcast's unhappy reputation, and with it his personal appearance was in thorough keeping. He was over six feet high, with remarkably broad shoulders, while his face was singularly repulsive. His features were coarse,—his complexion dark and sunburnt—he never looked you in the face, and a bissection of an eyebrow, received, probably, in some drunken affray, had given to the ensemble of the whole countenance a villainous expression, that, without any shade of evidence to establish guilt, would, in Irish opinion, warrant a jury upon oath to transmit the proprietor to the gallows. Such, on the morning we have alluded to, was the companion of the Armagh post-boy, as he, poor youth, unsuspecting of impending danger, rode whistling from the town.

Everybody knew Ned Doolan, for the wretched man had attained a ruffian notoriety, and on this memorable morning, twenty persons, whose avocations had made them early risers, remarked him in company with the lad. To see him astir at any hour was not remarkable. A worn-out night-bird, he was most likely, as was his custom, repairing to some meadow with the shelter of a hedge, to sleep off the effects of his late debauch.

Seven miles from the town stands the church of Loughgilly, and close beside it are two or three public-houses and a smithy. Before you reach them there is a bending in the road, and from the inner angle of the sweep a beautiful well of limpid water trickles into a natural basin that receives it from the bank above. For long forgotten years that bubbling fountain has slaked the thirst of the wayfarer and his beast. God has graciously destined it for man's relief—but man foully desecrated its holy purpose, and rendered it the scene of murder.

Living, the boy rode on until he was hidden from the view of a woman employed in bleaching flax, by the curving of the road we have described, while, concealed by a thick hedge, she had seen the poor youth pass slowly by, accompanied by a tall and ill-visaged stranger. In half an hour there was a direful outcry. The crystal waters of the lonely well were now an ensanguined puddle—and the boy, with a fractured skull, was discovered in a basin, where the murderer had endeavored to conceal the corpse of his innocent and unoffending victim. The mail bags were abstracted—but they were soon afterwards discovered half plundered of their contents, and hidden in a neighboring thicket, whither the doer of the felon deed had no doubt removed them, for safe examination, while he rifled his booty.

With lightning speed the fearful news was bruited over the adjacent country, accompanied by an accurate description, as given by the flax-spreader, of the man who passed her within half a dozen paces, in company with the murdered boy. Half-way between Newry and the fatal well, some early carriers had encountered the twain—the lad singing like a mavis, while his companion, with slouched hat, averted his face from the drivers, looking, or affecting to look at some object in an adjacent field. His personal appearance, however, was sufficient to establish the murderer's identity—and clothes, height, carriage, all and everything confirmed suspicion. Twenty witnesses deposed to their having seen the outcast porter accompany the murdered boy. A rigid search was instituted. Every known den of infamous celebrity was visited. Doolan was absent from his usual haunts—and who, with damatory impressions already raised, for one moment could entertain a doubt that Doolan was the criminal? And yet, the while, the doomed vagabond was innocent; and at the very moment when every tongue proclaimed his guilt the wretched man was not a gun-shot distance from the town, crouched underneath a haycock, and buried in drunken sleep.

Accident discovered the spot where the poor fellow had laid himself down to steep his misery in forgetfulness, and snatch a brief interval of feverish repose. A boy who had been gathering berries from the brambles, on detecting the sleeper, rushed with speed to the town, and announced the discovery of the murderer. Half a dozen active men proceeded to the place described—and there indeed lay the felon. His capture was easily effected, for they had pinioned his arms before he was awake, and while all unconscious that he was a prisoner. Like an owl startled into garish daylight from the thick brake where he had been reposing until evening and his hunting hour should arrive, the attested outcast stared wildly around, and to numerous and discursive interrogatories, his replies, as might be expected, were wild and incoherent, and hence his drunken ramblings were naturally mistaken for vague evasions of the crime imputed. None held a doubt touching his guilt—and while all advocated a trial by Lynch-law, the only difference in opinion lay between hanging and drowning. As for either of these pleasant alternatives, by which Mr. Doolan might have shuffled off this mortal coil—a canal on one hand, and the sturdy arm of an ash-tree at the other, afforded excellent conveniences. Fortunately a choice between these ordeals was dispensed with, and the timely arrival of a couple of peace-officers, whose pursy proportions were too well defined to admit their keeping pace with the lighter-heeled rabble, saved the supposed delinquent in the nick of time, who, but for official intervention, would have very speedily, to use Irish parlance, have made a hole in the water, or cut a caper from an ashen-bough.

Accompanied by the curses of the multitude, Doolan was transmitted to the county jail, and at the next commission formally arraigned for murder. Of his guilt none entertained a doubt, while the tenacity with which, as it was supposed, he held to the possession of the stolen property, denied the robbery, and utterly repudiated the charge of murder, were merely considered as additional evidence of the wolfish disposition of a being in nothing human but in form.

In Ireland, doubtful events are generally decided by a wager; ten to one was freely offered in backing a conviction—and jaunting-cars were largely engaged by people who occasionally took a little pleasure in the hanging line, to enable them to witness the execution without the trouble of a long walk.

The day of trial came—the suspected murderer entered the court—and as he mounted the bar to be arraigned, from every side scowling looks were turned on him; women recoiled; none breathed a "God pardon him!" and yet his manner—strange as it may appear—was firm and assured; while, all undismayed, he gazed around him with a smile. Men murmured,

"What a hardened ruffian," and a conscientious jurymen whispered to his fellow: "You won't leave the box, I hope? Anybody who looks that scoundrel in the face needn't listen to evidence or charge. I left Mrs. ——— rather poorly, and shall be anxious to hurry over the mummery of a defense—if the scoundrel would really venture to inflict one upon us."

I need not dwell upon evidence that too all who heard it seemed conclusive; and everything united to lead to a fixed conviction that the wretched man's days were numbered. The counsel assigned the prisoner—for the poor man could not have feed a barrister had life been dependent on his advocacy—executed his duty with evident reluctance. All the witnesses, including townsmen, carriers, and the flax-dresser, all swore positively to Doolan's identity, and, in legal requisites, the chain of evidence was complete. The judge charged breast-high against the prisoner, and the jury, pro forma, retired to their room, intimating, however, in five minutes, through a halbert man, that their verdict was agreed upon. As they re-entered the box, the judge—one of the old-school hanging ones—fumbled under the cushion for his black cap; while the clerk of the crown cleared his voice for the two important queries that were to follow—namely, "whether the jury were agreed in their verdict," to be followed by the matter-of-form question of what the doomed man had to say to arrest the sentence of death and execution.

In criminal proceedings this to the panel and the auditory must be, in sooth, a trying moment, and his must be a callous heart that can hear the brief sentence which terminates a life—guilty even as that life may have been—without feeling and evincing some emotion; and it demands more stoic indifference than innocence can call up, or more ruffian hardiesse than generally a desperate malefactor can assume, to listen to the brief address which distinctly announces all earthly hopes and cares are limited, and that in a few brief hours the criminal shall be with those that have been. The jury entered their box slowly, one by one, and while some looked anxiously toward the judge, others fixed their eyes upon the culprit. "Gentlemen, are you agreed upon your verdict?" exclaimed the clerk of the arraigns. "How say you, is—"

Before the question could be completed, a scene very unusual in a court of criminal justice was unexpectedly enacted. A jurymen, of superior intelligence, had keenly regarded the expression of the convict's face and the rude dignity of his bearing, as, leaning with his arms rested between the bar's spikes, he calmly waited until that simple word was spoken which should consign him to an ignominious death. A passage in the trial came forcibly to his, (the juror's) memory at the same time. When the flax-dresser swore positively to the prisoner's identity, Doolan begged her to look at him with attention. His request was complied with.

"Am I the man?" he coolly demanded.

"You are," returned the woman, in a decided voice.

The culprit gave a melancholy smile—"May God forgive you!" he responded. "You are swearing an innocent life away—but you believe what you say, and I forgive you."

A sudden conviction of the prisoner's innocence flashed strongly across the juror's mind; while, to the surprise of the whole court, and the great indignation of the gentleman who was so anxious to return to his sick lady, after consigning the prisoner to the place from whence he came, the panel were sent back to their room, and desired to re-consider the evidence. Evening was closing fast, and this conscientious scruple of a jurymen, much as it might have annoyed a tender-hearted husband, was ten-fold more afflicting to the learned judge. While his lordship still held his fingers on the black cap, and had mentally arranged the opening of a feeling address which should be termed by the provincial papers exceedingly affecting, the sheriff passed a little slip of paper on the point of his rod of office over a score of heads, and as the representative of majesty hurriedly perused the billet, a change came over his countenance. The note was very Irish, and as Shakespeare has it, "brief as woman's love,"—but lively interest lay in every line. Thus ran the mystic scroll:

"My Lord—There's a beautiful salmon come direct from Drogheda this moment by 'The Lark.' Won't it be regular murder should the fish be over-boiled, while a pig-headed jurymen, forsooth, must consult his conscience on a question that you have already and so ably settled for him, cut and dry? Would your lordship blow up the fellow, or lock up the whole batch?"

At such a moment, when life and death were trembling in the scale, and human existence hung doubtfully on the yielding temper or the firmness of the most solitary man, the most trifling occurrence did not pass without keen observation. When the billet met the judge's eye, his rotund cheeks mantled with a smile—but as he read, quick and capricious as an April day, sunshine gave place to storm, and dark was the scowl that evidenced judicial displeasure.

"Mr. Sheriff, are the jury likely to soon agree?" inquired the man in scarlet and ermine. "All are unanimous but one, my lord, and nothing will induce him to accede to the united opinion of his fellows."

"Lock the jury up!" After their unremitting efforts through to-day the bar must feel fatigued—as for me, I could sit here till cock-crow—but God forbid that I should inflict the penalty of individual obstinacy upon gentlemen who seem evidently worn out by their exertions."

Now, the said bar were a jovial and united fraternity, who dealt weighty blows in public upon each other—and while simple country gentlemen imagined, in the innocence of their hearts, that these uncompromising advocates were arranging their wills, and preparing for mortal arbitrament in the morning, had they, some hours afterward, peeped into the bar-room, "the keen remark and tart reply" were all forgotten—for there Sergeant Snobson and Mr. O'Flummery were seated cheek by jowl. The sergeant had cautioned the jury from giving any credence to the statements of his learned friend, who, hurried on by professional zeal, looked unfortunately upon facts as very secondary matters; while, contra, Mr. O'Flummery admitted that counsel should do their best for clients; but while a suppressio veri might, under some circumstances, be tolerated, he did think that an advocate was not called upon to bolster up premeditated perjury by an assurance that he (Snobson) believed all the witness swore—although it was intimated to him, (the sergeant) as he (O'Flummery) was advised, that the witness must be handled very tenderly, he (witness) having returned fresh from Australia, after a second visit to the colony, and being actually in transitu, homewards, and within a degree or two of the line, on the very evening that he described himself in Phil Braddigan's hostelry at Ballybay, engaged in drinking scalteene with the traverser.

The sweet hour i'-th'-night had come—and, Asmodeus-like, we'll have a peep at all the dramatis personæ. The thickest enclosure to penetrate was poor Doolan's—for though not actually condemned, into the cell of that name, for better custody, the jailer had unceremoniously bestowed him. He sat on a wooden bench—ate ravenously of some coarse food—while a little man, in dusky clothes, addressed some scriptural admonitions, to which the culprit listened with marked indifference.

"My brother," said the little man, "how shall I rouse thee, in this, the eleventh hour, to a sense of your situation?"

"Ah!" replied the malefactor, "there is some sense in that. It's not near so late as you think. Slip out, like a brick as you are, and fetch in a pint of the best. Ask for malt, unmixed—if we want water, there's plenty in the pitcher there."

Closely were the jury under lock and key, and as strictly all creature comforts were by law inhibited. Rooms have windows as well as doors—and through the back one, a hot supper and a basket of divers invigorating fluids were being carefully introduced by a rope. Mac-heath fancies "a man will die bolder of brandy;" and jurymen may, by double vision, see their way out of a legal labyrinth that otherwise would be impenetrable. Such was the present case. The refractory juror had his doubts rapidly dispelled while discussing a couple of tumblers, but the third removed altogether the film from his eyes. He saw matters now as his eleven brothers did, and a notice of his adhesion was about to be transmitted to judge, when the arrival of a courier, "fiery hot with speed," was announced by the door-keeper of the grand jury room—and a dragoon, who had evidently ridden hard, was forthwith introduced to the presence, and delivered a sealed packet to Lord N——.

What were the contents of that packet we shall in due time disclose—all that we shall hint is, "that between the cup and the lip"—the adage says—that slips are not infrequent; and, if Jock Hangman had counted on a job, Mr. Doolan, as fate decreed, was not the personage upon whom that functionary should operate at present.

But why leave the gentle reader to undergo agonizing suspense when a few brief paragraphs shall dispel the mystery?

Never had the learned judge listened with worse grace to a recommendation to mercy, than that with which Baron ——— received the packet; and greater was his mortification still as his eyes glanced rapidly over its contents. A deserter, who for many months had evaded detection, had been discovered by an escort of his own regiment, tired and asleep in a lonely public house, where, in their return to head-quarters, the soldiers had halted for refreshment. The fugitive when recognized, was handcuffed, and searched, and a number of bank-notes, with a pocketful of letters, which as yet he had not found time to open, were found upon his person; while, either under an impulse of conscience, or the surprise of finding himself a captive, he made at once a full confession of his crime—exchanged places with Doolan in the jail—and was hanged at the next commission.

This unexpected occurrence damped the hilarity of the bar-table, and general was the mortification of all. Lord N—— had thrown away a long and eloquent speech—and the high sheriff, who had backed the gallows against the prisoner at heavy odds, was observed to sigh deeply as he transferred a ten pound note to the Crown solicitor. A general gloom pervaded the late "right merrie meeting"—and of all concerned, judge, jury, crown prosecutors, and counsel, pro and con, none of these functionaries stood the disappointment with Christian resignation like the hangman, and he bore up like a trump, in his hour of tribulation, putting his faith entirely in "rum and true religion."

Often have I seen Doolan afterwards—and, in a personal and moral effect, his marvelous escape was singularly marked. In one week from the evening of his trial, his coal-black hair was changed to silver-gray—and although he lived twenty years afterward, he never crossed the threshold of a public-house, nor did whisky pass his lips.

SONNET—RASH OPINIONS.

BY CALDER CAMPBELL.

We judge too rashly, both of men and things,
Giving to-day's opinions on the morrow
Utter denial, while we strive to borrow
Hollow apologies that—like the wings
Of butterflies—shows many colors. Sorrow
Hideth its tears, and we disclaim its presence
Where it hath deepest root; Hate softly brings A smile, which we account Love's sweetest essence;
Simplicity seems Art; and Art we deem
White-hearted Innocence—misjudging ever
Of all we see! Let us, then, grant esteem,
Or grudge it with precaution only; never
Forgetting that rash haste right judgment mars:
What men count but clouds may prove bright stars!

* Earl Rosse's telescope proves that what were deemed nebulae, are in reality clusters of stars.

In the sovereignty of our minds we make mankind our quarry; and in the scope of our ambitious thoughts hunt for prey through the four quarters of the world. In a word, literature and civilization have abstracted man from himself so far that his existence is no longer dramatic—and the press has been the ruin of the stage, unless we are greatly deceived.

The Family Circle.

RESIGNATION.

BY HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

There is no flock, however watched and tended,
But one dead lamb is there!
There is no fireside, howsoever defended,
But has one vacant chair!

The air is full of farewells to the dying,
And mournings for the dead;
The heart of Rachel, for her children crying,
Will not be comforted!

Let us be patient! these severe afflictions
Not from the ground arise,
But oftentimes celestial benedictions
Assume this dark disguise.

We see but dimly through the mists and vapors;
Amid these earthly damps,
What seem to us but dim funereal tapers,
May be Heaven's distant lamps.

There is no Death! what seems so is transition;
This life of Mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
Whose portals we call Death.

She is not dead—the child of our affection—
But gone unto that school
Where she no longer needs our poor protection,
And Christ himself doth rule.

In that great cloister's stillness and seclusion,
By guardian angel's led;
Safe from temptation—safe from sin's pollution,
She lives, whom we call dead.

Day after day we think what she is doing
In those bright realms of air;
Year after year, her tender steps pursuing,
Behold her grown more fair.

Thus do we walk with her, and keep unbroken
The bond which nature gives,
Thinking that our remembrance, though unspoken,
May reach her where she lives.

Not as a child shall we again behold her;
For when, with raptures wild,
In our embraces we again enfold her,
She will not be a child;

But a fair maiden, in her Father's mansion,
Clothed with celestial grace;
And beautiful, with all the soul's expansion,
Shall we behold her face.

And though at times, impetuous with emotion,
And anger long suppressed,
The swelling heart heaves, meaning like the ocean,
That cannot be at rest;

We will be patient! and assuage the feeling
We cannot wholly stay,
By silence sanctifying, not concealing,
The grief that must have way.

THE AMERICAN MAIDEN.

THE whole course of her education is one habitual lesson of self-reliance,—the world is not kept a sealed book to her until she is tolerably advanced in years, then to be suddenly thrown open to her in all its diversity of aspects. From the earliest age she begins to understand her position, and to test her own strength—she soon knows how to appreciate the world, both as to its proprieties and its dangers—she knows how far she can go in any direction with safety, and how far she can let others proceed—she soon acquires a strength of character to which the young woman of Europe is a stranger, and acts for herself while the latter is yet in leading-strings. All this would tend, were her entrance in society a little longer delayed, or were the sway which she acquires over it somewhat postponed, to impart a much more sedate and serious character to American social intercourse than it possesses. The latitude of action here referred to necessarily involves a free and habitual intercourse between the sexes. This is permitted from the very earliest ages, and never ceases until the young girl has left her father's house for that of her husband. The freedom thus extended is one which is seldom abused in America, and is more an essential feature than an accidental circumstance in a young woman's education. The young man invites her to walk or ride with him, and her compliance with the invitation is a matter solely dependent upon her own humor; he escorts her to the concert, or home from the party, the rest of the family finding their way thither or returning home as they may: indeed, I have known the young ladies of the same family escorted by their male acquaintances in different vehicles to the same party, where they would make their appearances perhaps at different times. Nor is this confined to cases in which the young men are recognised admirers of the young ladies, a friendly intimacy being all that is required to justify invitation on the one side, and compliance on the other. A young woman here, would regard such conduct as a disregard of the proprieties of her sex; if it were looked upon as such in America, it would not be followed. The difference arises from the different views taken in the two hemispheres by young women of their actual position. In America, it neither impairs the virtue nor compromises the dignity of the sex. It may be somewhat inimical to that warmth of imagination and delicacy of character, which, in Europe, is so much admired in the young woman, but it is productive of impurity neither in thought nor conduct. —[Mackay's Travels in the United States.

PARENTAL DISCIPLINE.—When parental discipline destroys filial love, it is bad. Veneration is a mixture of fear and love, and is created in every well-organized child by strict discipline and kindness on the part of the parent. But a parent who is always beating, always frowning, scolding, and commanding, and never coaxing and caressing a child, can only be feared, and, ultimately disliked. Children can never be beaten into goodness, any more than nations can be persecuted into orthodoxy. They generally love their mothers best, because they are the most indulgent; but at last they find that indulgence is weakness, and then they learn to disobey the old lady, as they call her. They fear the father because he is stern and severe; and at last they dislike him, and avoid his society for his want of sympathy. Were the weaknesses of both parents combined in one, they would make a virtue. The joint and cordial co-operation of the two sexes makes the best discipline for children; but we are sorry to say that there is very little of that co-operation to be found. The mother is generally a shield from the father, and her opposition always increases his severity, while his severity increases her indulgence. Children cannot be well reared, unless parents are well married.

WOMAN.—A truly superior woman is she who knows enough never to ask a ridiculous or mistimed question, and who never obstinately opposes sensible men; such a woman knows how to keep silence, especially with the fools whom she might rally, and with the ignorant whom she might humiliate. She is indulgent to absurdities, because she does not care to show her learning, and is attentive to what is good, because she seeks instruction. Her great desire is, to understand, and not to teach; her great art (since it is acknowledged that there is art in the interchange of words) is, not to bring two proud antagonists together, eager to display their skill and to amuse the company, each maintaining a proposition whose solution no one cares to arrive at, but to throw light on all useful discussion, by encouraging those to take part in it who have something to say worth hearing.

LITTLE THINGS.—Great virtues are rare: the occasions for them are very rare; and when they do occur, we are prepared for them; we are excited by the grandeur of the sacrifice; we are supported either by the splendor of the deed in the eyes of the world, or by the self-complacency that we experience from the performance of an uncommon action. Little things are unforeseen; they return every moment, they come in contact with our pride, our indolence, our haughtiness, our readiness to take offense; they contradict our inclinations perpetually. It is, however, only by fidelity in little things that a true and constant love to God can be distinguished from a passing fervor of spirit. [Fenelon.

A Beautiful Poem.

THE SOUL'S PASSING.

It is ended!—all is over!

Lo, the weeping mourners come—
Mother, father, friend and lover,
To the death-encumbered room;
Lips are pressed to the blessed
Lips that evermore are dumb.

Take her faded hand in thine—
Hand that no more answereth kindly;
See the eyes were wont to shine,
Uttering love, now staring blindly;
Tender-hearted, speech-departed—
Speech that echoed so divinely.

Runs no more the circling river,
Warming, brightening every part;
There it slumbereth cold for ever—
No more merry leap and start,
No more flushing cheeks to blushing—
In its silent home the heart!

Hope not answer to your praying!
Cold, responseless lies she there.
Death, that ever will be slaying
Something gentle, something fair,
Came with numbers soft as slumbers—
She is with Him elsewhere!

Mother! yes, you scarce would chide her
Had you seen the form he bore,
Heard the words he spoke beside her,
Tender as the look he wore,
While he proved her how he loved her
More than mother—ten times more!

Earthly father! weep not o'er her!
To another Father's breast,
On the wings of love he bore her—
To the kingdom of the blest;
Where no weeping eyelids keeping,
Dwells she now in perfect rest.

Friend! he was a friend that found her
Amid blessings poor and scant;
With a wicked world around her,
And within a heavenly want;
And supplied her, home to guide her,
Wings for which the weary pant.

Lover! yes, she loved thee dearly!—
When she left thee loved thee best!
Love she knew alone burns clearly
In the bosoms of the blest;
Love she bore thee watches o'er thee—
Is the angel in thy breast!

Mourners all! have done with weeping!
I will tell you what He said,
When he came and found her sleeping,
On her heart His hand He laid:
"Sleep is, Maiden, sorrow-laden;
Peace dwells only with the dead.

"Wend with me across the river—
Seems so bitter, is so sweet!—
On whose other shore for ever
Happy, holy spirits greet:
Grief all over, friend and lover
In a sweet communion meet!

"Is it bitter, father, mother,
Lover, friend to leave behind?
All their blessed loves, and other,
Come with me and thou shalt find—
Where thy spirit shall inherit Perfect love and perfect mind.

"Love that is to mortals given
Struggles with imperfect will;
Love alone that homes in heaven
Can its perfect self fulfill—
Where, possessing every blessing,
Still it grows and greatness still!

"See, I bring thee wings to bear thee
To the blessed angel home;
Dear ones dead for ever near thee,
From thy side no more to roam;
Love increased, wait thou blessed,
Till the living loved ones come!

"O'er the river!"—Lo! she faltered
While He took her by the hand;
And her blessed face grew altered
As she heard the sweet command.
Father! lover! all was over!—
So she passed to Spirit Land!

LET me not promise too much, nor raise too high expectations of my undertakings; I had rather men should complain of my small hopes than of my short performances.—[Bishop Hall.

Choice Miscellany.

STANZAS.

Where shall I follow thee, wild floating Symphony?
I cannot wander in ether away!
While the soft volumes of vibrating harmony
Melt into atmosphere, here I must stay.

Where thy tuned circles end man cannot know,
Fading in distance the numbers live on;
Now joyful, now sighing, their sweet currents flow,
And space must be passed ere the music be done.

In the far empyrean sound voices of earth,
To God the Creator low echoes are borne;
Each varying cadence appears a new birth,
The cry of a child is a pathway forlorn.

Farwell! ye lost notes, I can hear ye no more;
In vain would I follow your airy retreat;
So my heart chants a dirge for the strain that is o'er,
Or a psalm to welcome another as sweet.

SWISS CRETINS.

High up the most elevated valleys of the Alps, amid scenes where all else is grand and beautiful, man often degenerates to a pitiful, deformed creature, or a chattering idiot. In the words of Shakspeare, a "hideous wallet of flesh," grows upon the front of the neck, enlarging what is technically termed the thyroid gland, and forming what in Switzerland is called goitre; or the head becomes misshapen, the countenance vacant, the limbs stunted, the speech indistinct, and the intellect shattered; and the victim is termed a cretin. In some of the worst localities, such as the Vale of Aosta on the Italian side of Mont Blanc, Sion Orsieres in the Canton of Valais, almost every family is more or less affected.

I have a vivid recollection of a morning walk in one of the most infected villages of the Canton of Valais. I inquired the way from the first tottering deformed creature I met in the street, and he replied with a vacant stare, and uncouth sounds. Idiot children, in rags, were lying on the ground, basking in the sun, with just instinct enough to stretch out their hands to beg; and the filth of the stricken place was most offensive. These affections have been variously attributed: to the drinking of snow water, the carrying weights on the head, filthy habits, the impregnation of the water, and the like; but the observations of Sir Astley Cooper and others lead to the belief that they are caused by the impure air generated in very confined valleys. It has been lately discovered, that by sending infected children very young, to a healthy locality, and subjecting them to suitable treatment, they can often be cured. With this benevolent design, Dr. Guggenbuhl, a Swiss philanthropist, whom I had the pleasure of meeting, has recently founded a hospital for the cure of these affections, in the Canton of Berne. This institution is near the pretty village of Interlachen, and the beautiful lakes Thun and Brienz, in view of the Jungfrau and the most magnificent peaks of Oberland. It is an interesting fact, that the treatment of these affections by Dr. Coindet, of Geneva, a few years since, led to the discovery of the medicinal use of iodine, one of the greatest boons to the afflicted of the present century. —[Dr. Corson's Loiterings in Europe.

THE HEART.—There are some errors which are of an anatomical nature. There is a common misunderstanding as to the position of the heart, though it is common enough to talk of the heart being in the right place. People say the heart is on the left side; but in reality it inclines only a little to the left, being almost immediately behind the breast-bone or sternum, and is situated higher than I think is generally conceived by non-professional people. The breast-bone is the bone with which the ribs are articulated at the front of the chest, and immediately behind the breast-bone lies the heart, surrounded of course by its proper coverings. I have known people imagine the stomach to be immediately at the termination of the windpipe, because the feelings of indigestion are often referred to this point. In respect to the heart, the term ossification, applied to disease of the heart, is generally but imperfectly understood. There are people who think the heart is literally and completely changed into bone. A person would, however, die long before such a change could be brought about. There are however, some very extraordinary cases related by Corvisart, Burns, Haller, and others, in which large portions of the heart were replaced by ossific deposits. In general, however, when ossification of the heart is spoken of, it is merely meant that the valves of the heart are impeded in their action by ossific deposits, and instead of falling in a manner to close the orifices over which they are situated, remain to a certain extent patulous.

Among this class of anatomical errors is that which we sometimes find people run into, of supposing that they have what they call a narrow swallow. Such people cannot take pills. The same people will swallow much larger bodies with ease. I have several times been called to children who have swallowed marbles and other large bodies, while the mothers have asserted that their throats were too narrow to admit the passage of pills. In these cases there seems a want of consent in the muscles of deglutition with those of the mouth and palate, and this must proceed from a mental feeling, sometimes difficult to overcome.

A ROBBER LOVER.—Mr. Walsh furnishes, among other matters, for the National Intelligencer, the following story of a somewhat romantic love-match, and its awkward termination:

"Madame Brelot, a thriving blanchisseuse (washerwoman,) of the Rue de Bievre, had a fair daughter, who, like all her sex of the same age, which was tempting eighteen, was very fond of balls and other gallantries. The good mother was indulgent but prudent, and while she permitted her lovely damsel to attend these scenes of amusement, always took care to accompany her. At a Sunday's dance, about a month ago, at the Quatre Saisons, Mlle Eugene met with a partner so genteel and gallant, that he won the hearts of both mother and daughter; and the favored youth was received into their domestic circle as a suitor. The preliminaries were at length so far arranged for a marriage between the lovers, that Madame Brelot drew one thousand francs from the savings' bank to purchase a suitable outfit for the young couple. Alas! for the uncertainty of human prospects! Two evenings ago, when the expecting bride and her mother returned home, after a day spent on their knees, not at church, but in their washing barge, near the point de l'Archeveche, they found that their dwelling had been broken open, their locks forced, and not only the one thousand francs, but every other article of value carried off. This was indeed a dire disaster; but the severest out of all was a sheet of paper, conspicuously fixed to the chimney glass, on which was written, in too legible characters, 'I might have taken both your daughter and her dower, but I content myself with one, and leave you the other.'"

THE AVERAGE INCOME OF MEN.—We once took a notion to find out the average annual income of the inhabitants of the most favored countries of Christendom. We opened McCulloch's great work on Great Britain, and found his estimate for each person in England to be £16 a year or about 22 cts. a day; and for each person in Ireland £6 a year, or 8 cts. a day. We looked into Chevalier's admirable lectures on French Political Economy, and his estimate for each person in France is about $45 a year, or 12 1-2 cts. a day. Our own census estimates the average product of the richest State in the Union at $110 for each person, or 30 cts. per day, while our whole country taken together, slave States and all, yields an annual product of but $62 for each person, or about 17 cts. per day.

When we consider the the great inequalities of fortunes, and that the above sums are all that each person would receive were the incomes of all estates equally divided among all the people, we surely cannot think that the mass of men in this favored century are in any great danger of being surfeited. How miserable must be the pittance of great numbers, when even if the wealth of the Astors and Bedfords, &c., were to be thrown into the common fund, the average would be much less than $100 a year for each person.

Without presuming to vouch for the entire accuracy of statistical tables, we venture two remarks upon the above statements:

1. Let persons amply provided with the essential comforts of life, forbear their too frequent repining, and sympathize more with the great mass of the less favored, and thus take at once a lesson in charity and contentment.

2. Last of all, let the policy be maintained in the church, and State, and home, that shall quicken the intelligence, industry and sobriety that are the sources of genuine wealth. Then, although there may be less rum, and tobacco, there will be a far greater average income in Christendom.—[Christian Enquirer.

GALVANIC RINGS.—A little while back it was very much the custom to wear what were called galvanic rings for the relief of rheumatic and other pains. Even granting that these rings have a galvanic action, I do not myself see how they are to cure such complaints. Perhaps they are intended to act like charms. Formerly, rings were very much used to charm away diseases. Pettigrew tells us that Paracelsus had a ring made of a variety of metallic substances, which he called electrum. 'These rings were to remove cramp, palsy, apoplexy, epilepsy, or any pain. If put on during an epileptic fit, the complaint would be immediately cured.' Sometimes rings were formed from the hinges of a coffin. 'Andrew Boorde,' he continues, who lived in the reign of Henry VIII., says, 'the kynges of Englande doth halowe evry yere orampe rynges, which rynges worn on one's finger doth help them which hath the crampe.'

In the Gentlemen's Magazine for 1794, we are told that a silver ring, which is made of five sixpences, collected from five different bachelors, to be conveyed by the hand of a bachelor to a smith that is a bachelor, will cure fits.

None of the persons who gave the sixpences are to know for what purpose, or to whom they gave them. Bachelors were not, however, the only contributors of these charms.

The London Medical and Physical Journal for 1815 notices a charm successfully employed in the cure of epilepsy, after the failure of various medical means. It consisted in a silver ring, contributed by twelve young women, and was constantly worn on one of the patient's fingers. It seems, then, that the practice of curing diseases by metallic rings is by no means new. A short time ago I attended a gentleman for a rheumatic complaint, who all the time wore one of these galvanic rings. I do not know whether he attributed his recovery to the ring or his medicine, or whether he divided the credit.

UTILITY OF FLIES.—But if you are too irresolute to bathe all over frequently, and too careless in changing your soiled for clean clothes, and thus become covered with the excrementitious matters of dried on perspiration; then even the kind brutes will take pity on you, and the flies, lice, and fleas will become useful to you, by generously rooting up and tearing off this unwholesome coating that smothers the life of your skin. Although this coating of condensed perspiration may be as transparent as varnish, and may even allow your skin to shine through it elegantly; still it is dirt, and as such conducts away your vital warmth, like the earth when one lies down in the fields; so that you are enveloped in the ground and taking cold all the time that you are unwashed, and while these most industrious creatures are urging you to cleanliness.—[Dr. Stevens' Lectures on the prevention of Idiocy.

A GENTLEMAN was lately inquiring for a young lady of his acquaintance. "She is dead," very gravely replied the person to whom he addressed his inquiries. "Good God! I never heard of it—what was her disease?" "Vanity," returned the other; "she buried herself alive in the arms of an old fellow of seventy, with a fortune, in order to have the satisfaction of a gilded tomb."

HOPE ON.

HOPE on, for while the earth is moving,

There's time for change, and time for fortune too;
There's time for loved ones still to be more loving,
For warm friends growing warmer and more true;
There's time for distant friends to grow more dear,
There's time for enemies to pass away,
There's time for new friends on thy path to appear,
There's time for cloudy night to usher brighter day.

Hope on, for there's no hour that passes by
Into the darkened vale of stormy time,
Laden with sorrow's tear, or stifled sigh,
But herald's joy to some within our clime;
And though thy troubles press thee sorely now,
As they have done for years, still bear thee on,
And peace's amaranth wreath upon thy brow
Shall be for fortitude a glad guerdon.

Hope on, there is a calm delight in thinking
That life contains a something worth our care,
That we have courage—arming us 'gainst drinking
The cordial strongly urged upon us by despair;
Live in exalted hope—hope, persevere,
Shun inactivity—anticipate thy rest,
And then be sure the wish'd-for hour is near,
And evermore thy future will be blest.

GOLD.

I ONCE knew a lady who married a rich man. I was in her company one evening, when the conversation turned on marrying for money, and I remarked, that however desirous ladies might be like Bell and Congreve, of making "good matches," I considered vanity in a woman a stronger passion than avarice, and I believed that few ladies would marry a man named Snooks, however wealthy he might be. But it seemed I was rash in expressing this opinion, for the lady alluded to personally denied it, and said that (her good man, of course, out of the question) she would have married a man named Snooks for fifty thousand pounds. Anxious to ascertain, if possible, the exact negative value of the name of Snooks, I gradually decreased the bribe, and by the result it appeared that she was not sure she would have done it for less, but she was certain she would have been called Mrs. Snooks for ten thousand pounds.

I have since heard this ingenious confession repeated. Doubtless the lady thinks that statements so candid ought to be preserved, but if she takes my advice she will take care that they are not preserved in "family jars."

Of the state of her husband's mind during these observations, I would rather not give my opinion, lest she should see this anecdote, and it might cause her a little uneasiness. I do not mean to say that many ladies are like this most candid of her sex, (for I should tell you that she was perfectly serious) but I give it as one of the many instances I can furnish of the general love of gold.

I know a rich old man who disinherited his daughter because she married. Her future husband had been introduced to her by her father, whose particular friend he was till the old man discovered that the youth had gained his daughter's affections, when suddenly he changed his manner toward him. They married, and her father disowned her.

The lady's lover was in every respect her equal—no objection could be made against his character or position. She was not an only child, and her father had no "better match" for her. What, then, you will ask, was his objection? Why, he would have been required to make her a present on her wedding-day, and he could not part with his gold; thus he has caused much misery to his daughter and her husband, and the consciousness of his own bad conduct has weighed upon his mind, and made him a morose and miserable man.

In a town not many miles from Birmingham, lives a wealthy old lady, now ninety-six years of age. For the last twenty years a family have been living with her, who, though quite unrelated, have supplied the place of relatives, remaining constantly with her, till at last, by the force of habit, they became necessary to her. Doubtless they never calculated on her attaining such longevity, or they might have hesitated at so long a period of service, even for the certainty of her money at the end of it. The family who stoop to such a course as this have not even poverty to offer for an excuse. They consider themselves among the élite of the place; the head of the family was a fashionable surgeon, whose position and income rendered him independent, and nothing but a greediness of gold beyond ordinary could have induced him and his wife for twenty years to sacrifice every comfort to the whims of a fretful and capricious old woman; yet this they and their children have done with a patience and perseverance betraying a depth of meanness one is sorry to see in human nature. I am happy to say that at present writing, the old lady has excellent health, is in possession of all her faculties, and I trust will still enjoy many years of life.

These circumstances are well known in the town alluded to, yet the family of the surgeon are not sneered at behind their backs, or publicly neglected; on the contrary, they are courted—respected; and it is natural it should be so, for the world entertains a fellow-feeling toward them.

A poor widow became house-keeper to a rich man. Now this man, rich as he was in thousands, did not despise the pence, and he learned that his house-keeper had a small sum of money—her little all. A man who greatly loves gold, likes to have yet more and more within his power, though it be not his own; so this rich man told his house-keeper that she had better place her money with him, and let the interest accumulate, when she should get it all at his death. Now the poor widow thought within herself that by thus showing her confidence in her master he might be induced to leave her a little more than the actual amount due; at all events, she thought it worth the trial, so she gave him the money. But the rich man died suddenly, leaving no will, and his riches went to his next heir, who was cognisant of the whole transaction between the widow and the old man. Counting upon this, the widow went to the heir, and demanded from him her money, but she had nothing to show for it, and the heir said he was sorry he couldn't assist her, as he thought it very likely that his uncle had repaid her; but commiserating her apparent poverty, he gave her five pounds!

O gold! omnipotent art thou! Equally powerful over old men, poor widows, and spendthrift heirs—we bow down and worship thee, O gold, most powerful! Many more anecdotes could I give you, good reader, but it is surely needless to multiply instances of what you see daily passing around you. Do not men, not driven by poverty, but avarice, go 17,000 miles to scrape gold from the waters of the Sacramento? Do we not hear that there are men who gain their accursed bread by farming children at 4s. 6d. per week, and poor law guardians who do not hesitate to deliver these friendless creatures to the tender mercies of such men? Have you not seen at stated periods, in the journals, an advertisement of which the following is a copy.

"At Mr. — academy, — near —" (the place is omitted to avoid the advertisement duty,) youth are boarded, clothed, provided with books, and educated for the professions or mercantile pursuits, at £20 a year. No vacations unless desired, and no extras."

And this advertisement does not stand alone, there are others similar to it. A man undertakes to board, clothe, provide with books, and educate a boy, without reference to age, for a less sum than is paid to a London footman. And there are no vacations unless desired. Well, that is honest, at all events; it at once discloses the object of the school, and inscribes over its portals, in unmistakable characters, "Whoso enters here, leaves hope behind."

To come nearer home—do we not see people, careless of humanity's claims, patronise those omnibusses in which they can be conveyed for a little less money? The daily amount of duty paid by such vehicles is high, and to support himself, the proprietor of those cheap conveyances must employ miserable, broken-down cattle, whose protruding bones give evidence of age at which they are unfit for such hard work; but the respectable man goes home to his family, pays his threepence, and never troubles himself about the tortures of the poor animals that drag him there. No; "that's the owner's affair, not his." And perhaps the same man would feel very indignant next day if he saw a boy kicking a donkey. How small is the difference between the two will be known one day.

I could preach to you many a long sermon from the text of gold; but I fear, like other long sermons, they would have little effect. You would but go home to criticise the preacher with a better appetite for your dinner. This is essentially a utilitarian age, and men strive after what they call the real and tangible, as if there was not as solid a reality in immaterial things as material. Sentiment has given place to matter-of-fact—the beautiful to the useful, and people call it a change for the better.

Let any one take up a bundle of old letters written fifty years ago, and note the redundancy of affectionate expressions and flattering inquiries which they contain. Would he have the courage now to use such terms to a friend, however dear? Not he; he would expect to have his expression of love called, in the cant of the day, "humbug." Nature has now-a-days fallen into disrepute, so we wear over our hearts a case called fashion, which answers the double purpose of impeding their action and concealing the distressing objects from our sight.

I do not mean to defend the ultra sentiment which prevailed at the close of the last century; but, in escaping from that we have fallen into the other extreme—a change however, is at hand. In the constantly extending culture of music and others of the fine arts—in the increasing popularity of poetry of a high class, ay, and in the advancement of human knowledge, we see evidence of a change. In the tone of private society, the best criterion, we see the slow, but steady progress of a change. So the world goes round, probably but to reach the other extreme, and feel once more the consequent reaction.

And the popular writers of the day, who at once follow and encourage the tastes of the hour, will die away and be forgotten. It has been well said, that those who write for the hour must not be surprised if with the hour they perish. The now popular cant and wit on which such books depend for their brief existence will then be no longer understood, and you will see nothing but dry ashes. And writers of another stamp will read them, or go back to the tales of other days so similar to our own, with the difference that we can travel a little quicker, and know a little more the state of affairs in the moon.

I shall probably hear that by these papers I have given unintentional annoyance to certain respectable gentlemen. Seeing the title of "gold," they will expect an article on the currency, or something new from California; but finding it was only a humble attempt to lower the value of money, they will lay it down in disgust. Yet the subject here treated of is worthy of being laid before them by the highest intellects the world can boast, and worthy of their best consideration.

After all that can be said to you, good readers, against the pursuit of gold, by able pens, in a more extended sphere than mine, you will still go on refusing to be convinced, or if convinced, refusing to relinquish your fascinating enemy. You will shut your ears to the still small voice, and labor on your little journey, scraping the dirt by the roadside, till you are benighted on the way. And your sons and daughters will, in their turn, toil a little through the same mire and clay till they also disappear in the darkness. Sometimes a friend tries to stop them by a sermon or a song, but they take no heed; they pass away, leaving no trace, and their life is a tale that is told.

In conclusion, to express my own thoughts, let me borrow the verse of a sweet singer, Barry Cornwall:

What is gold unless it bring
More than gold has ever brought?
What is gold if to it cling
Narrower vision, meaner thought?

Some there be who feel no pain,
So the baser mark they shun,— Shouting, when their end they gain,
"Joy is joy, however won!"
To us diviner dreams are given—
To us a sweet-voiced angel sings,
"What were earth without its heaven,
The soul without its wings?"

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 5, 1849.

HISTORY—MACAULAY'S ENGLAND.

We refer to this admirable history of Mr. Macaulay, for the purpose of saying a few words regarding the peculiar charm which has given it its immense popularity. The work is evidently faulty and inaccurate in many particulars—it often gives a false coloring to events, distorts some historical facts, and does injustice to individuals; yet it is the most popular history of modern times; and is read by all parties, with pleasure and profit. And more, with all its faults, it is, after Bancroft's History of the United States, the most perfect history of modern times.

History, in general, is defective in this, that it takes note of marked and startling events—those great dramas in which nations, princes, cities, armies and classes, have played conspicuous parts; but the slow and progressive causes of those events remain unnoticed and unrevealed. The historian often imagines that he sees in a battle, gained or lost, the cause of a revolution; whereas the revolution had already taken place, in fact, and the battle is only its manifestations. Another defect in history, is that it deals more with actions than with men, and when it does cast its eyes upon individuals, it sees them in an exaggerated form—it shows man as he is before the world—it does not follow him to his house, to his family, to the social circle, to his place of study or of toil. It describes him only as he appears upon the great stage of action—in theatrical costume, so to speak. This is a serious defect in history; for those great events on which the eyes of nations are fixed, and which command the attention of all succeeding ages, can only be properly appreciated and comprehended by seeking their moral causes in the lives of individuals. Here alone can be found the key that will unlock the secret of history, or reveal the significance of the facts it records. Herodotus is, in our opinion, the true model of historians. Flowing, artless, full of those details, that are the least calculated to interest, he always charms his readers, and carries them along with him. So Plutarch, although he wrote simple biographies, is one of the best of historians. He does not disdain small things, and trifling details; and he is so happy in the choice of his facts, that very often a word, a smile, or a gesture suffices to characterize his hero, or illustrate an entire epoch. Hannibal, with one word, raised the departing courage of his frightened army, and his soldiers marched laughing to the battle, which made him master of Italy. Agésilas, riding a stick with his children, is seen more truly than in the character of conqueror. Alexander swallows a medicine without hesitation and without remark, although he has been privately told that his physician, bribed to destroy him, had mixed with it a deadly poison. This was the greatest act of Alexander's life. Philopæmen, concealed by his mantle, cut wood in the kitchen of his host. Here is the true art of historical painting. We learn more of the real life of society, of the moral condition of an epoch, and the real causes of the great revolutions, and events that convulse nations, from these apparently trifling details, than from any other sources.

Now here is the real excellence of Macaulay. His history is crowded full of the most interesting incidents, and the most charming details. With him we visit the humble dwelling of the laborer, the castles of nobles, and the private chambers of princes and kings. Not only does he describe battles and mighty events, which made the world shake at the time, but nearly every page of his work is enlivened by some incident, which reveals the hidden life of the people—the invisible moral causes, of which these revolutions and battles are the effects.

The work of a historian is a divine one; for it is in history, more than any where else, that the Almighty reveals his mysterious purposes with regard to the destiny of humanity. Ever does God hover over the human race, controlling all events, and guiding them to issues of general good. He, therefore, who attempts to record and explain those events, should approach his work with reverence; and ever have a sacred regard for the truth. In this respect Mr. Macaulay stands far above any other English historian. If he fails to represent all the truth, there is nothing intentional in it. He always writes with earnestness, sincerity and in good faith.

Mr. Macaulay comprehends thoroughly the true idea of history. He every where presents pictures of society in detail, and by these outward facts he judges of the interior life of the people, and reveals the great law of progress. By this method he finds that the English heart is much more philanthropic, more christian to-day than it was three centuries ago. The following extract is in this spirit:

“It is pleasant to reflect that the public mind of England has softened while it has ripened, and that we have, in the course of ages, become not only a wiser but also a kinder people. Formerly if an offender was put in a pillory, it was well if he escaped with life from the shower of brick-bats and paving-stones. If he was tied to the cart's tail, the crowd pressed around him, imploring the hangman to give it to him well, and make him howl. Gentlemen arranged parties of pleasure to Bridewell, on court days, for the purpose of seeing the wretched women who beat hemp there, whipped. A man pressed to death for refusing to plead, a woman burned for coining, excited less sympathy than is now felt for a galled horse, or an over-driven ox. Fights, compared with which a boxing match is a refined and humane spectacle, were among the favorite diversions of a large part of the town. Multitudes assembled to see gladiators hack each other to pieces with deadly weapons, and shouted with delight when one of the combatants lost a finger or an eye. No where could be found that sensitive and restless compassion which has in our time extended a powerful protection to the factory child, to the Hindoo widow, to the negro slave, which pries into the stores and water casks of every emigrant ship, which winces at every lash laid on the back of a drunken soldier, which will not suffer the thief in the hulks to be ill-fed or over-worked, and which has repeatedly endeavored to save the life of even the murderer.”

A WORD FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF ODD-FELLOWS.

THERE is nothing more destructive to the success of Odd-Fellowship than the spirit of opposition to recognized authority, which is often originated and fostered in Subordinate Lodges. Hours are spent frequently in useless argumentation upon questions in which, however they may be decided, not one cent of pecuniary interest is involved, and neither friendship nor charity promoted.

The delightful associations in which all the finer feelings find a hearty response from every brother present in the Lodge Room, when the work goes smoothly on, and nothing occurs to mar the genuine spirit inculcated by fraternity—the pleasing recollections induced by being engaged in efforts to relieve the sufferings of humanity, or educate the bereaved orphans of some brother whose remains we have recently followed to their resting place, the grave—how speedily are these and kindred emotions dissipated, if but a single word, a breath of discord pervade the brotherhood. The reason for this is obvious. The practice does not correspond with the profession. With these professions Odd-Fellows are acquainted, and if each performs his duty faithfully, the Order will continue to flourish, and still more rapidly to advance, dispensing blessings as it goes.

Strong opposition to Odd-Fellowship has been almost everywhere manifested; still, as fostered by an unseen, but powerful influence, its course has been onward. In Connecticut, and other portions of the Eastern States, perhaps the most strenuous efforts have been made to arrest its progress—by those, too, whose best efforts would have been exerted for the same end, had the method for its accomplishment presented itself in some other form. They sincerely supposed such organizations productive of evil, and conscientiously opposed them; they would be foremost in their efforts to make men better citizens, by inculcating principles of sobriety and benevolence, and thus raising the standard of morality. In a word, they would accomplish individually, what Odd-Fellows seek to do, aided by organization and the strong bond of fraternity.

The principal reason assigned for such opposition is, and ever has been, that Lodges hold their meetings in secret. This is of vital importance to the permanency and identity of the Order; and such identity is indispensable to the accomplishment of its benevolent designs. Odd-Fellowship seeks not, with trumpet-tongue, to advertise its deeds of charity, its offices of kindness, its sympathy in a brother's weal or woe; yet despite its unassuming character, its fruits are still apparent, and no proof is necessary that the germ whence these fruits spring is pure. The page of inspiration makes no exception of Odd-Fellowship, but asserts, “by their fruits ye shall know them.”

From Panama and San Francisco, the intelligence received indicates the comprehensive spread of genuine Odd-Fellowship; and its whole past history is conclusive proof that the Order has nothing to fear from outward opposition. Its attacks do not retard its progress, and although its spirit is unresisting, its component parts made up of the finer and more delicate qualities, still it remains unharmed. But let discord come within its ranks, and intrude within the walls of the Lodge Room—let its breath pollute its hallowed atmosphere, and occupy the time which ought to be spent in devising plans for the furtherance of benevolence, and from that period, as fast as such influence is permitted to spread, so rapidly Odd-Fellowship declines—fraternal feeling cannot brook such intrusion, and alas! for the sick brother whose sympathy is expecting a response from a Lodge in which division and disunion exist! Alas! for that orphan whose education, even limited, depends upon such support.

Every brother should, with untiring care, watch the beginning of these evils, and guard his Lodge diligently against them. The divisions now existing in the Order, tend to confirm the truth of these statements; for in those Districts where these difficulties are most general, much indifference, and even total apathy upon the subject is manifest. We pretend not to know or devise the best means for correcting these evils; but we do know, that if every individual was faithful to his promises and duty as an Odd-Fellow, such evils could not exist.

GRAND LODGE OF PENNSYLVANIA.—The annual election of officers took place April 24th, in the G. Lodge of Pennsylvania. Below are the names of the officers elect: Henry S. Patterson, M. W. G. M.; George S. Morris, R. W. D. G. M.; Wm. H. Witter, R. W. G. W.; Wm. Curtis, R. W. G. S.; F. Knox Morton, R. W. G. T.; Wm. A. Wells, R. W. G. R. to G. L. U. S.

CHURCH ARCHITECTURE.—The editor of the New-York Path Finder, a most useful journal, and which often contains some gems, although it makes no pretensions this way, copies a portion of an article of ours bearing the above title, and approves of its spirit. We are pleased to see this evidence of a growing taste in our community, in regard to architecture, and hope the editor of the Path Finder will aid us in accomplishing something for such a result.

DANCING.

BEING asked the other day, our opinion on the exercise of dancing, with regard to its harmfulness or innocency, we replied that it was both. Frequent balls, we are decidedly opposed to. They always tend to excesses which are ruinous to health and morals. But dancing for an hour, as a part of the amusement of an evening, is not only unobjectionable, but really an agreeable and healthful exercise.

Many persons have considered dancing as entirely evil, and destitute of any positive good. We do not agree with those. Others have labored to prove its effect of an opposite tendency; and, indeed, it has been attempted to establish that dancing is wise by the following deduction:

First.—Dancing is exercise.

Second.—Exercise is serviceable to life.

Ergo.—Dancing is serviceable to life.

First.—Dancing is serviceable to life.

Second.—Whatever is serviceable to life is wise.

Hesiod is a great admirer of dancing, and says, "that the gods have bestowed fortitude on some men, and on others a disposition for dancing."

Our readers, of course, will understand that we are now speaking of dancing as a temperate exercise, and not of those excesses called balls.

Of all amusements at present known in this country, dancing is the most ancient, and of itself both innocent and refined—practiced as it has been by the Egyptians, the Grecians, and the Romans. Men, too, celebrated in every respect for their virtues, so far from being averse to the art, have always been ready to cultivate this pleasing accomplishment. Socrates, Homer, Plato, and Professor Porson, were all its advocates; indeed, Socrates admired dancing so highly that he learnt it when an old man. The man also to whose words we look with reverence and respect, and which are allowed to hold a lofty station in the sacred volume, has distinctly told us, that "there is a time to mourn and a time to dance."

In the first place, how is dancing injurious to morals or health? The only argument urged in support of this position is, that some few persons who have indulged in this art have been not only immoral, but unhealthy individuals. While we are willing to admit that some few persons have gone beyond the boundary of prudence, we cannot ascribe such to the evils of dancing. Were we disposed to use such a weapon, we might apply it to the most sacred and valuable institutions. The existence of a Johanna Southcote, or a Judge Jeffries, does not bring religion or law into disrepute, but only shows the natural disposition of the individuals. Abuse is certainly evident in this art, and is equally so in other arts and institutions. But, to be brief, every virtue has its evil, and gold has its dross; and before we disclaim against such a polite art, it would not prove unprofitable were we to minutely examine our own inclinations. We have already admitted that abuse will force itself into the Dancing Academy, ("the world's a school of wrong.") but in no other degree than this: that dissipated and evil-disposed persons, who occasionally intrude themselves, manifest a disposition which is, in themselves, already created.

Wherever vice exists it is impossible to be hidden, for any period, from the contempt of discerning men by any false means; and when discovered, no longer engrosses their patronage.

"Vice is a monster of such odious mien,
That to be hated needs but to be seen."

But is dancing of this nature? or does it not receive nourishment from a very great number of individuals, whose lives are regulated by the rules of religion and sound morality?

O. U. A.—ORDER OF UNITED AMERICANS.—We have received several numbers of a journal devoted to the interests of this Order. It is well conducted, and promises to be a favorite with those for whom it is intended.

MAY-DAY IN NEW-YORK.

MAY-DAY was celebrated in this goodly city, as usual, by a grand "turn out" of—furniture. The day was, as some young ladies say, "splendid." It was harvest-time for cartmen and furniture carriers. No doubt, many of them did a smashing business. Housewives were on the move betimes, and we venture nothing in saying, were glad when the day was over. The poor horses, too, did eat that Saturday night's portion with such gusto! and the straw upon which they lay did feel so soft. Oh, May-day is a great time—stirring scenes are enacted then. Franklin said that three moves were equal to a fire. True, every word of it. By the time the third is accomplished, there is as much lost and broken as there would have been by one fire. And then the temper is so tried in moving. Servants and cartmen will not handle things carefully, and housewives cannot help scolding. And such is May, or Moving-day. Who doesn't rejoice that it "comes but once a year?"

If there was ever a city or town afflicted by an incurable evil habit, then New-York is the one. The practice of being turned inside out and upside down every returning May-day, is one of the most ridiculous habits any people can acquire. Many ludicrous and lugubrious anecdotes might be told illustrating the miseries of this universal moving.

The following is the most graphic description of it we have ever seen. We know not the author of the lines:

First of May—clear the way!
Baskets—barrows—bundles;
Take good care—mind the ware!
Betty, where's the bundles?

Pots and kettles,
Broken victuals,
Feather beds,
Plaster heads,
Looking glasses,
Tow mattresses,
Spoons and ladles,
Babies, cradles,
Cups and saucers,
Salts and castors.

Hurry, scurry—grave and gay—
All must trudge the first of May.

Now we start!—mind the cart!
Shovels, bed-clothes, bedding,
On we go, soft and slow,
Like a beggar's wedding.

Jointed stools,
Domestic tools,
Chairs unback'd,
Tables crack'd,
Gridiron black,
Spit and jack,
Trammels—hooks,
Musty books,
Old potatoes,
Ventilators.

Hurry, scurry—grave and gay—
On we trudge the first of May.

Now we've got to the spot—
Bellows—bureau—settee;
Rope untie—mind your eye—
Pray be careful, Betty.

Look, what's there?
Broken ware;
Decanters dashed,
China smashed,
Pickles spoiled,
Carpets soiled,
Sideboards scratch'd,
Cups unmatch'd,
Empty casks,
Broken flasks.

Hurry, scurry—grave and gay—
Get you gone! the first of May.

SPRING.—Spring has at length visited our city. The green grass nods gaily in the Park and on the Battery, and the verdant leaves begin to appear on the trees. The surrounding country puts on its robe of flowers, and on every hill and in every valley is heard the sweet music of birds. Surely we may sing with the Hebrew poet:

"The winter is over and gone,
The flowers appear on the earth,
And the time of the singing of Birds has come."

WOMAN.

READING over a little French work, by a distinguished author, we were so struck with his relation of women seen in the Saint Pelagie, the prison in France where the criminals are confined, that we cannot forbear giving a free translation of sentiments founded upon observation, and radiated in the principles of nature.

"Wherever misfortune casts her persecutions, woman comes upon the scene to neutralize her power. Between her and suffering there exists a mysterious bond, which she appears to have neither the will nor the power to break. Without wishing to take away the merit of that delicate, touching sentiment, which makes a part of her being, and which is the fountain from which springs all her goodness, a person in a light, jesting moment would almost say that the compassion of woman is nearly allied to the feeling of coquetry; for pity and tears suit her so well, the sight of misfortune gives an expression so tender and gracious to her features, that one is almost tempted to believe that she shows herself good, but to appear the more beautiful.

"One knows not the whole influence of woman—knows not the grand principles of goodness which occupy her soul, and what ingenious resources her mind will furnish to embalm and soothe the wounded spirit, unless they have known her in the frightful retreats of the prison, where misery and suffering appear to be the whole portion of existence, but from which hope is never excluded as long as she is permitted to enter.

"Deprived of liberty in many parts of the globe, she feels no resentment against the tyrants who have fettered her freedom, but on the contrary, with all the warm principles of inherent affection, clings still closer to their hard and unfeeling bosoms. Her mission is to sweeten our cares, to indulge our caprices, to calm us and render us better. She may sometimes prove unfaithful at the period of prosperity, but is always true in the hour of adversity.

"To illustrate the opinions that I have advanced, I will appeal to history. There I will find the touching events that encompasses the name of Eponina, who followed her husband, Sabinus, from cavern to cavern, and who, at last, perishes so cruelly by the order of Vespasian. I can cite also, as interesting and forcible examples, the names of Arria and Agripina, the wife of Germanicus.

"More near us, no less a sublime and beautiful illustration, I can find the noble daughter of the Chancellor Thomas Moore, who wished to share the prison of her illustrious father, and accompanied him upon the scaffold; that after having purchased, at the price of her whole fortune, the bloody head of her unfortunate parent, was accused of treason, for preserving this sacred relic in her cabinet—of reading incessantly his works, thereby fostering and encouraging sentiments hostile to the existing government. Intrepid in the presence of her judges, it was not her life, but the character of her father that she defended with so much eloquence, when a reproach was uttered against it. Such carelessness of self in the hour of danger, such noble and heroic devotion to paternal memory, so softened and tempered the minds of her judges, that she escaped judgment.

"It is scarcely necessary that I should speak of Mademoiselle de Scuderi, who, that she might convey to the unfortunate Pleasson, confined in prison, letters and ink necessary to write his justification, made use of a crowd of means more spiritual, more like fairy creations, than those found in the most imaginative romances.

"I need not refer you to the pages of the revolution, where lives recorded for time and posterity, the generous devotedness, the sublime actions, the touching cares, the dangers cleared, the sorrows sweetened, which have elevated to the first rank the character of the French women who lived in those discordant times.

"I need not recall the angelic devotedness of Madame de Lafayette, in the prisons of Olmutz, of Madame de Lavallette, in the same situation, and of another lady of that name, who met her death in America. History has already consecrated these glorious names; she has touched them with her magic wand, giving them an eternal youth.

"I will bring you now to see spectacles that are apparent to your senses; that are among us, and will, perhaps, more fully illustrate the touching character of woman, than the antiquated array of bygone examples. I wish to take you to the prison of Sainte Pelagie, on a Thursday or Sunday, which are the days that the unfortunate captives are permitted to receive the visits of their parents and friends.

"I will here make a remark founded upon observation, that women, when their mission is to the unfortunate, appear to have no other thoughts agitating their mental world, but those of sympathy and love. All, it matters not of what class or degree, appear to come but for one object—to soothe and comfort. All appear to possess, in an equal degree, the charming art to alleviate misfortune, to sustain courage, to inspire hope, and, in a word, to pour upon the wounds of the heart the balm which alone their ingenious delicacy can prepare.

"Among the large mass of women collected in the Sainte Pelagie, I was shown a young girl, who had come, twice a week, on foot, from Nanterra, to visit her amant, in prison, and to bring him little delicacies of which he was fond. It was hailing the day that I saw her, and I made the inquiry why she had turned out in such inclement weather? I listened with delicate compassion to the little falsehoods her heart suggested, to lessen the merit of her devotedness: 'that it did not rain at the time she departed from home; that when the shower commenced, she had the happiness of meeting mother Francois, and that good milk-woman had taken her in her little covered cart, and conducted her almost to the Sainte Plagie.' All the while she was relating this, her garments were dripping in the rain, and she made a significant sign to an old man who accompanied her, not to contradict her.

"Upon another bench, in the saloon of the prison, I saw a woman yet almost beautiful, though in the decline of life, pressing to her heart, with grief and tenderness, two conflicting passions, which only woman knows how beautifully to blend, a young man, whose crimes had consigned him to captivity; the husband, who accompanied her, turned with anger and contempt from a son whose conduct had called the blush of shame to his cheek, and dishonor to his name; and taking advantage of the moment his back was turned, the pitying and loving mother slipped a purse into the hand of her son, which she had concealed in her bosom.

"I recognized, in every woman that I saw in that frightful place, the same mission, the same holy expression of love and pity lighting their features, and reflecting the tempered rays of hope and consolation upon the hearts that were darkened and bowed with misery. Mother, daughter, spouse, friend or mistress were occupied with a common care and common solicitude.

"Maternal tenderness, filial pity, love and friendship, are not the only virtues which occupy the female heart. There have been many instances in which the sex have performed feats of courage and patriotism—been guided by a chivalric sense of honor that would have elevated the most exalted heroism. I will cite only one illustration, which occurred during my sojourn at Sainte Pelagie. It is the letter of Madam —, to her husband, which I will give at length, for the benefit of the reader.

"You know to what a degree you are dear to me—you are now in a place of security, but there is an accusation resting against you in the court, connecting you with infamy. I wish you, then, to return, to render yourself a prisoner to answer the charge, since there are no other means for your justification. Your judges are men possessing the weaknesses of humanity—your innocence may not be apparent to them—you may lose your life; but I know you too well to suppose that you would put it in the balance against the loss of your honor, of mine, and that of your children.' Suffice it to say that the husband returned, was tried and acquitted.

"Our entrance to Sainte Pelagie was marked by two frightful events—the execution of M. Magallen a Poisy, and the suicide of a young and beautiful girl, who, with a pistol, shot herself twice in the breast, influenced by a feeling of jealousy toward her husband.

"My observations at Sainte Pelagie have warranted me in making the following remark: That the Great Arbitrator of human destiny has placed in the heart of woman, in her generous cares, in her tender solicitudes, a compensation for all our griefs, for all our dangers, and every evil of life."

EUROPE.

SINCE our last we have received intelligence from this distracted continent, which goes, too, toward confirming our prediction that European society is approaching a crisis, and that a general and sanguinary war will soon overturn the whole social order.

Italy is still in arms, and although despotism has apparently triumphed, liberty has really made some progress, and the people have gained some advantages. Russia and Turkey seem to be on the point of an open rupture, and war may be expected to take place between these two powers at any moment. In this aggressive movement towards Turkey, Russia will be aided by Austria. When this takes place, France and England must move; and the whole European Continent will again resound with the cry of war. So far, tyranny has been triumphant, every where but in Hungary, where the patriots have, as yet, withstood the power of Russia and Austria.

In Ireland, the cholera and famine again threaten to decimate the people. On the whole, the prospects of Europe are exceedingly gloomy. A dark cloud rests upon that convulsed land: the elements of a terrible storm are gathering with fearful rapidity, and every moment we may expect to hear the echoes of its thunders, and see the gleamings of its lightnings.

While on this subject of Europe, we cannot refrain from copying the following judicious remarks from the London Examiner:

"We will not despair of Italy. Its sole monarchic army has been beaten. The republican leaders, undisciplined and disorganized, have merely indulged in vociferation and despair. But between these two extremes, of the old armies and the new mob, there exists a large, intelligent, and well-provided class, whose opinions even restored monarchs cannot treat in the old fashion. If the King of Prussia must put up with Democratic chambers, and the Emperor of Austria grant a representative government, the princes of Tuscany and Naples cannot go back to pure absolutism. Neither can the Pope, nor even the Viceroy of Lombardy. There must be a change, there must be a concession, there must be room and air for a certain degree of municipal and political freedom to develop themselves. And Italy wants half a century of such preparation for either independence or representative government.

To such ends as these, English and French influence will now be strenuously exerted. Such influence has been powerless hitherto, owing to the arrogant belief of the Italians that they could provide for their own security and government, independently either of their native princes or of foreign intervention. The defeat of Charles Albert, however, dissipates that vision; and even democrats must listen to counsel, or must abide by the inevitable result of summary expulsion.

Now, therefore, most truly, is the time for beneficent interference on behalf of Italy; an interference, not menacing or armed, or in aid of idle resistance, but pressing those several compromises, without which military force and violence will be let loose to massacre and plunder Italy, as at Messina."

AFFAIRS IN CANADA.

THE storm of revolution which has swept over Europe has, it appears, reached our shores. Canada, as our readers have already learned, is in a state of high fermentation. The Parliament Houses have been destroyed, the Ministers mobbed, the Governor General and his officers pelted with rotten eggs, and the government and the authority of Queen Victoria seem to be nearly at an end.

All these movements, no doubt, indicate pretty clearly what is the real destiny of Canada. Annexation is openly spoken of, and many years will not pass before the whole North American Continent will own the sway of the stars and stripes. Even the Royalists in Canada meditate this, as the following extract from a letter to the Tribune, shows:

"God only knows where the thing is to end. The Government have plenty of force, if they have the nerve and discretion to use it; and I hope it will go no farther, for this burning of houses is not only bad in itself, but may be retaliated; and I have no idea that any one has formed any plan of action beside kicking up enough row to cause the present government to resign, or to withdraw the Rebel Losses Bill. At the same time should the troops 'fraternise,' or should the mob be attacked and gain any advantage, I should not be surprised to hear something about annexation. Nobody, that I know of, desire it for its own sake; but all think it must come one day or other; and if they saw the opportunity to effect it without bloodshed, would do so now, rather than risk a harder struggle at another time. Loyalty indeed has become a farce, since the men who sustained the crown in 1837 are made to pay the rebels for the losses they brought on themselves.

"I had almost forgotten to mention, as a farther proof of the way things are managed, that the Government wanted to stop the transmission of political news by the Telegraph to Upper Canada, but as the Directors would not consent to discontinue their messages, the Government submitted. I expect half the Members of the Executive have run away from town."

THE MONEY MARKET, for the week past, has continued to show an improving appearance, and the rate of interest is now lower than has been known for a long time. The continued accessions of specie, by the city banks, from the interior, as well as from Europe, aided by a cessation of the demand for duties for the Custom House, has given them a renewed disposition to extend their discounts, and no good paper is now rejected. The specie now in the city is full seven millions of dollars, an amount that forbids the return of the late extortionate rates of interest. The rate of sterling bills has advanced rapidly, and the best names now command 108 per cent., a price that checks any farther import of specie, other than that now arranged for. Stocks have been improved by the high prices current in England, and are held firmly at the advance. Treasury Notes close at 110, cash; United States 6s, of 1868, 112 3-4; Ohio 6s, 106 1-2; and Pennsylvania 5s, 83 1-2, and in demand for England.

A large amount of money was disbursed on account of interest, on the 1st of May, which as usual tends to keep the price of money cheap. From present appearances, a comparative abundance of money may be anticipated, which will continue until the importations for the autumn trade drain the banks of their coin, and force a reduction of the currency.

GRAND LODGE OF NEW-YORK.—It will be noticed that an adjourned session of the R. W. Grand Lodge of the State will be held on Tuesday evening next, at which a punctual attendance is requested. We would remark to brethren throughout the State, that the official report of the Grand Lodge Proceedings will be found in the columns of this paper at the earliest moment.

GRAND SECRETARY'S OFFICE AND POST OFFICE.—These offices have been removed to the second story of the Odd-Fellows' Hall, a fact which all having business to transact will do well to remember.

BANNER PRESENTATION AT MALDEN, MASS.

Our worthy co-laborer, the Boston Odd-Fellow, contains an interesting account of these ceremonies, that took place on the evening of the 12th ult. The banner was presented by a lady, Miss Wood, who pronounced a neat and appropriate address on the occasion. The reply on behalf of the Lodge, was made by Bro. F. J. Fay. We give below the concluding paragraphs:

"I would say, then, to every young man, who aspires to become useful to his fellows, or eminent in the Republic, that this institution offers to him inducements to be found in no other as yet conceived by human wisdom. Its prospects for the future, are as glorious as its influence must be enduring. It is constantly strengthening its position, by a most devoted and patient exertion. When it ceases to visit the widow in her afflictions, protect, support and educate the orphan child of a deceased brother, or send its agents to administer to the wants and necessities of the sick and dying, it will itself die; its vitality will have departed. It seeks not to enrich itself by the labor of others, but is itself a faithful and efficient laborer. Woman's quick perception could no more fail to discover and appreciate its merits, than could her generous nature withhold its approval, after she had weighed it in a balance, and found it worthy. Such, in brief, is the character of an institution, in the name of which we have the honor to receive from the hands of its fair donors, this rich and elegant banner, and as we gaze upon so exquisite a production of taste and art, we hardly know which most to admire, the beauty and appropriateness of the design, or the manner of its execution—both may well challenge our admiration. Among the significant emblems with which it is embellished, we recognize occupying the most prominent position, as its truths should in every heart, a representation of the Book of Books. As Odd-Fellows, we would bow reverently before the shadow of its inspired pages; we greet it as the bulwark of our institution. It is the companion of every Lodge room, and has witnessed the vows we have made, and the pledges we have made, to be obedient and faithful in the discharge of duties, made imperative upon all by its commands. No device, it seems to us, could form a more appropriate accompaniment to that sacred volume, or more beautifully illustrate its great moral teachings, than the one you have selected. It is indeed a scene of the truest friendship; and one more touching or truly sublime, was never sketched by the pencil of art, or scanned by mortal eye. 'A friend in adversity'—who, I ask, has not felt the need of such a friend as that? and who, that enjoys the sweet satisfaction of having proved such, cannot exclaim with the poet,

Who blesses others in his daily deeds,
Shall find the healing that his spirit needs;
For every flower in another's pathway thrown,
Confers its fragrant beauty on our own.

"In return for such unbounded generosity on your part, we can only pledge a more zealous devotion to the service of a cause which you are pleased to consider entitled to your confidence and respect, and the leading principles and duties of which these emblems and mottoes so vividly portray. We promise ever to cherish this sparkling gem with devoted hearts, and preserve it untarnished as an offering rendered by the purest love, to the noblest charity. No rude hand shall be permitted to seize upon or mar its beauty; but as a band of brothers, now marshaled under its silken folds, and united by the golden links of Friendship, Love and Truth, feeling duly sensible of its intrinsic worth, and the exalted source from which it originated, we shall ever esteem it a pleasure as well as a duty, to guard it with an unfaltering and sleepless watchfulness."

ODD-FELLOWSHIP IN VIRGINIA.—A little more than three years ago, Loudoun Lodge was established in Leesburg. Previous to that time the society was almost unknown, and its character entirely so. Since then, three other Lodges have been established in the county, viz: Liberty Lodge, at Lovettsville; Evergreen Lodge, at Waterford; and Snickersville Lodge, at Snickersville; and these have acted as drains upon Loudoun Lodge. The latter, however, still numbers some seventy members. Among these, we believe, there have not been at any time, nor are now, more than three or four whose circumstances would exempt them from the necessity of daily labor, as mechanics, farmers, &c. Yet they have just purchased for cash, and are having fitted up, a Hall, the cost of which will be $900; and they have several hundred dollars still on hand. Nor have they failed to perform their duty toward sick brethren and brethren in distress.—[Loudoun Whig.]

PEARL OF DAYS:

OR A HYMN TO THE SABBATH.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE.

PEARL of days! pearl of days! all days excelling:

Joy to the sad thy returning morn brings;
From high vaulted temple the anthem is swelling,
Adoration and praise to the great King of kings.
From castle and cottage, from ship on the ocean,
In far distant climes, amid solitudes drear,
In unison rises, with heart-felt devotion,
The voice of thanksgiving, the anthem and prayer.

Pearl of days! pearl of days! at thy first early dawning,

Blessed by God, and hallowed by him evermore,
With extatic joy sang the sons of the morning,
"Let all things on earth the Creator adore!"
From mountain and valley, from deep-shaded forest,
The song of the angels rose joyous and clear.
Thus heaven and earth, raised in one grand chorus,
The song of thanksgiving—"Pearl of days, thou art here!"

Pearl of days! pearl of days! we hail thee with gladness—

The foretaste of heaven, to children of hope—
Bringing rest to our labors and joy to our sadness,
The morn when our Saviour his prison-bars broke.

From the tomb he arose, over death all victorious,
Again with his presence his people to cheer;
To Him, now on high, and to God the most glorious,
We raise our thanksgiving—"Pearl of days, thou art here!"

Literary Notices.

—"MARDI." New-York: Harper & Brothers. This is a new work by Melville, the author of Typee. It is written in his peculiar style, and although it does not possess the highest literary merit, it is a very readable book. Melville's thought is not deep, but graceful; and one is not tempted to criticise severely what amuses, if it does not instruct. The following extract is a specimen of the best portion of the work:

THE STORY OF YILLAH.

"In the verdant glen of Ardair, far in the silent interior of Amma, shut in by hoar old cliffs, Yillah the maiden abode.

"So small and so deep was this glen, so surrounded on all sides by steep acclivities, and so vividly green its verdure, and deceptive the shadows that played there, that, from above it seemed more like a lake of cool, balmy air, than a glen: its woodlands and grasses gleaming shadowy all, like sea groves and mosses beneath the calm sea.

"Here, none came but Aleema the priest, who at times was absent for days together. But at certain seasons, an unseen multitude with loud chants stood upon the verge of the neighboring precipices, and traversing those shaded wilds, slowly retreated; their voices lessening and lessening, as they wended their way through the more distant groves.

"At other times, Yillah being immured in the temple of Apo, a band of men entering the vale, surrounded her retreat, dancing there till evening came. Meanwhile heaps of fruit, garlands of flowers, and baskets of fish, were laid upon the altar without, where stood Aleema, arrayed in white Tappa, and muttering to himself, as the offerings were laid at his feet. When Aleema was gone, Yillah went forth into the glen, and wandered among the trees, and reposed by the banks of the stream. And ever as she strolled, looked down upon her the grim old cliffs, bearded with trailing moss.

"Toward the lower end of the vale, its lofty walls advancing and overhanging their base, almost met in mid air. And a great rock, hurled from an adjacent height, and falling into the space intercepted, there remained fixed. Aerial trees shot up from its surface; birds nestled in its clefts; and strange vines roved abroad, overrunning the tops of the trees, lying thereon in coils and undulations, like anacondas basking in the light. Beneath this rock, was a lofty wall of ponderous stones. Between its crevices, peeps were had of a long and leafy arcade, quivering far away to where the sea rolled in the sun. Lower down, these crevices gave an outlet to the waters of the brook, which, in a long cascade, poured over sloping green ledges near the foot of the wall, into a deep shady pool, whose rocky sides, by the perpetual eddying of the water, had been worn into a grotesque resemblance to a group of giants, with heads submerged, indolently reclining about the basin.

"In this pool, Yillah would bathe. And once, emerging, she heard the echoes of a voice, and called aloud. But the only reply was the rustling of branches, as some one, invisible, fled down the valley beyond. Soon after, a stone rolled inward, and Aleema the priest stood before her, saying that the voice she had heard was his. But it was not.

"At last the weary days grew longer and longer, and the maiden pined for companionship. When the breeze blew not, but slept in the caves of the mountains, and all the leaves of the trees stood motionless as tears in the eye, Yillah would sadden, and call upon the spirits in her soul to awaken. She sang low airs, she thought she had heard in Oroolia; but started affrighted, as from dingles and dells, came back to her strains more wild than hers. And ever, when sad, Aleema would seek to cheer her soul, by calling to mind the bright scenes of Oroolia the Blest, to which place, he averred, she was shortly to return, never more to depart.

"Now, at the head of the vale of Ardair, rose a tall, dark peak, presenting at the top the grim profile of a human face, whose shadow, every afternoon, crept down the verdant side of the mountain: a silent phantom, stealing all over the bosom of the glen.

"At times, when the phantom drew near, Aleema would take Yillah forth, and waiting its approach, laying her down by the shadow, disposing her arms in a caress, saying, 'Oh, Apo, dost accept thy bride?' And at last, when it crept beyond the place where he stood, and buried the whole valley in gloom, Aleema would say, 'Arise, Yillah; Apo has stretched himself in Ardair. Go, slumber where thou wilt; for thou wilt slumber in his arms.'

"And so, every night, slept the maiden in the arms of grim Apo.

"One day when Yillah had come to love the wild shadow, as something that every day moved before her eyes, where all was so deathfully still; she went forth alone to watch it, as softly it slid down from the peak. Of a sudden, when its face was just edging a chasm, that made it to look as if just parting its lips, she heard a loud voice, and thought it was Apo calling 'Yillah! Yillah!' But now it seemed like the voice she had heard while bathing in the pool. Glancing upward, she beheld a beautiful open-armed youth, gazing down upon her from an inaccessible crag. But presently, there was a rustling in the groves behind, and swift as thought, something darted through the air. The youth bounded forward. Yillah opened her arms to receive him; but he fell upon the cliff, and was seen no more. As alarmed, and in tears, she fled from the scene, some one out of sight ran before her through the wood.

"Upon recounting this adventure to Aleema, he said, that the being she had seen, must have been a bad spirit come to molest her; and that Apo had slain him.

"The sight of this youth filled Yillah with wild yearnings to escape from her lonely retreat; for a glimpse of some one beside the priest and the phantom, suggested vague thoughts of worlds of fair beings, in regions beyond Ardair. But Aleema sought to put away these conceits; saying, that ere long she would be journeying to Oroolia, there to join the spirits she dimly remembered.

"Soon after, he came to her with a shell—one of those ever moaning of ocean—and placing it to her ear, bade her list to the being within, which in that shell had voyaged from Oroolia to bear her company in Amma.

"Now, the maiden oft held it to her ear, and closing her eyes, listened and listened to its soft inner breathings, till visions were born of the sound, and her soul lay for hours in a trance of delight.

"And again the priest came, and brought her a milk-white bird, with a bill jet black, and eyes like stars. 'In this, lurks the soul of a maiden; it hath flown from Oroolia to greet you.' The soft stranger willingly nestled in her bosom; turning its bright eyes upon hers, and softly warbling.

"Many days passed; and Yillah, the bird, and the shell were inseparable. The bird grew familiar; pecked seeds from her mouth; perched upon her shoulder, and sang in her ear; and at night, folded its wings in her bosom, and like a sea-fowl, went softly to sleep; rising and falling upon the maiden's heart. And every morning it flew from its nest, and fluttered and chirped; and sailed to and fro; and blithely sang; and brushed Yillah's cheek till she woke. Then came to her hand: and Yillah, looking earnestly in its eyes, saw strange faces there; and said to herself as she gazed—

“These are two souls, not one.”

“But at last, going forth into the groves with the bird, it suddenly flew from her side, and perched in a bough; and throwing back its white downy throat, there gushed from its bill a clear warbling jet, like a little fountain in air. Now the song ceased; when up and away toward the head of the vale, flew the bird. ‘Lil! Lil! come back, leave me not, blest souls of the maidens.’ But on flew the bird, far up a defile, winging its way till a speck. It was shortly after this, and upon the evening of a day which had been tumultuous with sounds of warfare beyond the lower wall of the glen, that Aleema came to Yillah in alarm, saying, ‘Yillah the time has come to follow thy bird; come, return to thy home in Oroolia.’ And he told her the way she would voyage there; by the vortex on the coast of Tedaidee. That night, being veiled and placed in the tent, the maiden was borne to the sea-side, where the canoe was in waiting. And setting sail quickly, by the next morning the island of Amma was no longer in sight.

“And this was the voyage whose sequel has already been recounted.”

☞ “MIDNIGHT SUN.” New-York: Harper & Brothers. This is a new domestic tale, by Miss Bremer, translated by Mary Howitt, in her usual felicitous style. We hope all our friends will procure this little book, and read it well; it will do them good. It presents a beautiful picture of Swedish life, so full of poetry and stirring romance. Miss Bremer seems to drink in the spirit of the old Sagas and Skalds of her country, and speaks and writes like a new prophetess of Volu.

☞ “PRISONER'S FRIEND.” This work, ably conducted by Rev. Chas. Spear, the American Howard, is one of our most interesting publications. The present No., April, is unusually excellent.

☞ “THE CHRISTIAN INQUIRER.” This is a large, well conducted, and well printed religious paper, published by the New-York U. A., and edited by the Rev. H. W. Bellows. The journal has improved much latterly, and we hope that it will accomplish much good in the sphere for which it is designed.

☞ “AMERICAN PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL.” The April No. of this valuable journal contains several very interesting and valuable papers; among which we notice the following: Character, Organisation, and Biography of Emanuel Swedenborg; Rules for finding the Organs; Animal Magnetism a Science; Phrenological Discussion between Rev. Dr. McNair and O. S. Fowler.

☞ “THE WORLD AS IT MOVES.” This is a weekly periodical, published by Lockwood & Co., corner of Broadway and Grand-sts., and edited by William Wallace. We are delighted with the arrangements and character of this work. It is universal in its range of topics, occupying itself with literature, science, art, industry, and every form of human thought and enterprise. It publishes entire Chambers' Journal, which, with its original articles, makes it an invaluable publication. We wish the editor and publishers abundant success.

Varieties.

THE HOLLAND CUSTOM of placing looking glasses outside the windows, so as to see who is passing the street, without the observer being seen, has been introduced in our city at the New York Hotel, and also at the Irving House. It is a much more modest way of gratifying curiosity than standing on a hotel stoop, and with an eye glass impertinently scanning passers by.

THE IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.—The people in Shelby county, Tennessee, held a meeting some days since, and passed strong resolutions against the further introduction of slaves into that State from Kentucky. One of the resolutions brings the subject to the notice of the ensuing Legislature, and urges upon that body the passage of a law, making it a penal offense to introduce a slave into that State for the purpose of selling him.

REVOLUTIONARY RELIC.—We have been permitted, says the Baltimore American of April 14th, to publish the following letter of General Washington to the late General S. Smith, of this city, but at the time a Lieutenant Colonel in the Maryland Line. The original is in the possession of his son, General J. Spear Smith, and we believe it has never before been made public. The small body of men of his command were transported down the Delaware on a raft, towed by a canoe, and reached the fort unperceived by the enemy. The brave defense of fort Mifflin is well known as one of the brightest passages in the long struggle for independence. Col. Smith kept possession of it for seven weeks, from 28th September to 11th November, despite the combined British assault by land and water, although there was little or no cover to protect his men. The confidence of General Washington was never better placed, nor did Col. Smith give up the command until disabled by wounds and bruises, which made it necessary to remove him to the main land. He was succeeded by a very gallant officer, Major Thayer, who, however, was able to hold the fort only three days, it being a perfect ruin and wholly defenseless. The baron d'Arandt continued at the fort only three or four days, being obliged to retire, from ill health:

HEAD QUARTERS,
Camp near Pottsgrove, Sept. 23, 1777.

SIR: You will proceed with the detachment under your command at Dunks' ferry on the Delaware, if you find in your progress the way clear and safe. When arrived there you will take the safest and most expeditious method of conducting the detachment to fort Mifflin; by water would be the easiest and least fatiguing to your men; and if practicable and safe, will certainly be most eligible; otherwise you will cross the Delaware and march down on the Jersey side to fort Mifflin. In the whole march you will make all possible dispatch—keep your men in the most exact order—suffer no one to straggle—make each officer take a list of his platoon or division, and at the beginning of each march see that every man be present; you will also take every necessary precaution to prevent the enemy's surprising you in your march, by keeping out small van, flank and rear guards, and sentries when you halt.

The keeping of the fort is of very great importance, and I rely strongly on your prudence, spirit and bravery for a vigorous and persevering defense. The baron Arandt will be appointed to the chief command; and when he arrives, you will give him every aid in your power.

A Commissary must be appointed (if there be not one already) to supply the garrison with provisions. And it may be highly expedient to lay in a stock of salted meat, if to be had, and a quantity of bread, flour and wood for at least one month.

Immediately on your arrival make inquiry of the stock of ammunition for musketry as well as artillery, and if either be wanting, lose not a minute's time in getting a supply.

Wishing you all desirable success,

I remain your friend and servant,
G. WASHINGTON.

To Lieut. Col. SAMUEL SMITH.

The Carnival scenes in Rome, during the last celebration, are described as extraordinary. Cars passed along filled with handsome women, dressed in dresses displaying their figures, lighted up by torches, and replying with perfect nonchalance to passers by, in grotesque habiliments. For the first time in the eternal city, the priests have been caricatured at the Carnival. The celebration was not so gorgeous as on former occasions, arising from the absence of the nobility, whom the revolution has scared away, but it is said to have been more amusing.

A RELIC OF A MAMMOTH.—Some workmen engaged in repairing a mill dam on Sugar Creek, in Illinois, found a tusk not long ago, imbedded in the gravel, some six feet below the surface. It is twelve feet long, and nineteen inches and a half in circumference. The base of the tooth was much decayed, and, from all appearances, it must have once been considerable longer, and much larger than at present. It is perfectly white, and resembles ivory in appearance; but it is very brittle, and on being touched with the tongue, sticks like a bone that had been burnt white in the fire.

DIVORCE IN KENTUCKY.—The Kentucky Court of Appeals has decided that divorces granted by act of the Legislature are unconstitutional and void, so far as the rights of property are concerned; and that a wife so divorced without her consent, is, upon the death of her husband, entitled to a dower in his lands and slaves, and to a distributable portion of his personal estate.

LOCUSTS IN TEXAS.—It will be recollected that for several weeks, during the months of October and November last, myriads of full grown insects, called—but perhaps with not entire propriety—grasshoppers, appeared in this region. It was known that they were seen at a distance of at least one hundred miles east and west, and north and south of this place. The air was filled with countless numbers on the wing, apparently migrating southward, and they were to be seen every where upon the ground. The cold weather either destroyed them or caused them to disappear in flight. But doubtless during their presence they deposited their larvae in the earth. With the return of warm weather and since the opening of spring, about a month since, the young of this insect have emerged from the ground in still greater numbers. They were first seen upon the sandy or more porous soils. As yet, but few are provided with wings, not having attained a sufficient growth. We have heard of their presence as far distant as San Antonio, and the neighborhood of La Grange. Scarcely a spot of ground in this section of the State is free from them. Their numbers threaten destruction to the growing crops. Indeed, we have already heard of the loss of whole fields of corn, wheat, rye, oats, and of gardens being laid waste in the course of a few hours.—[Texas Dem.]

EFFECT OF RAILROADS ON PROPERTY.—The increased value of real estate, arising in a section of country by the passing of a railroad through it, is a subject on which data are not yet collected, to establish a general rule. The following is a statement of this increase, in some of the towns in Massachusetts—since railroads were extended to them—during the five years between 1839 and 1845:

Roxbury,	87 per cent.	Lowell,	88 per cent.
Brookline,	50 “	Worcester,	68 “
Cambridge,	38 “	Springfield,	38 “
Chelsea,	128 “	Fall River,	59 “

In Tennessee, the opening of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, 150 miles, at a cost of less than $3,000,000, has, on an average, added $5 per acre to all the land within ten miles on each side of the road. Mountain lands, which two years ago would not command one cent per acre, now sell readily at $1.

ANTIDOTE FOR POISONING.—The London Literary Gazette, alluding to the numerous cases of death from accidental poisoning, and particularly the melancholy fate of the late Royal Academician, Mr. Owen, says: “I venture to affirm, there is scarce even a cottage in this country that does not contain an invaluable, certain, immediate remedy for such events; nothing more than a dessert spoonful of made mustard, mixed in a tumbler of warm water, and drank immediately. It acts as an instantaneous emetic, is always ready, and may be used with safety in any case where one is required. By making this simple antidote known, you may be the means of saving many a fellow creature from an untimely end.”

ROMANTIC.—It is stated that a marriage of a romantic character took place at Lockwood, a village about twelve miles from Cincinnati, on the Miami canal. The daughter of a prominent citizen was betrothed to an industrious young mechanic; but she not being past “sweet sixteen,” the parents opposed the wedding. The objections were removed by a compromise. The nuptials were celebrated, and in an hour the bridegroom took his leave for California, thence to return in two years and claim his wife.

During the exhibition of a menagerie in a country village in Maine, a real live Yankee was on the ground, with a terrible itching to “see the elephant,” but he hadn't the desiderated “quarter.” Having made up his mind to go in “any how,” he stationed himself near the entrance, and waited until the rush was over. Then, assuming a patient, almost exhausted, and with the fore-finger of his right hand placed on the right corner of his mouth, he exclaimed, “For God's sake, Mister, ain't ye goin' to give me my change?” “Your change!” said the door-keeper. “Ya-ees! my change! I gin ye a dollar as much as half an hour ago, and haint got my change yet.” The door-keeper handed over three-quarters in change, and in walked the Yankee, “in funds.”

Now this true anecdote is sent to us as a cute Yankee trick, and so it is; but we should like to know wherein it differs from the meanest theft. Whip us such secondarily wits.—[Knickerbocker.]

The substitution of the English word “station” for the French word “depot,” in such common use for the stopping places of railways, is recommended in the newspapers, as more expressive and better English. Some of them express the hope that in two years there will not be a “depot” in the United States.

Humorous and Amusing.

CALIFORNIAN ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO CAPITALISTS.—The advertiser wishes to sell, at a very moderate price, twenty ingots of pure Californian gold. Tenders, stating the highest price, to be addressed to "I. O. U." Walker's-court, Soho. Upon payment of the money, the advertiser intends to go out to California for the gold.

GOLD! GOLD! GOLD!—It is expected, by the very best judges, that such will be the depreciation of gold, in consequence of the discovery of the Californian mines, that sovereigns will shortly be sold for sixpence each, the advertiser hereby offers to purchase any number of sovereigns at the rate of a shilling a piece. Apply to "Liberal," Silver-st., Golden Square.

TO INTENDING EMIGRANTS.—Should this meet the eye of any gentleman possessing an elegant and commodious town mansion, and a neat and convenient country house, within ten miles of London, and who may intend to emigrate to California, the advertiser hereby gives notice that he would be happy to take charge of the gentleman's residence until his return, using the carriage, horses, cellar, servants, &c., as compensation for his trouble. The proprietors of houses on the wrong side of Oxford-street cannot be treated with.—[Punch.]

A CASE, says the Cambridge Chronicle, was lately decided in one of the courts, by which it is now ruled, that husbands, who lose their wives by railroad accidents, can only claim, in compensation, the amount of any income which may have been cut short by their death. Thus, "virtuous women, who were only crowns to their husbands," will be valued, according to the tombstone cutter's rule, at five shillings. It has been suggested that at railway stations, besides the "ladies' refreshment room," there should be a "ladies' valuation room," with a proper officer in attendance. As the ladies pass, scenes of the following tenor, it is supposed, would also pass:

"What sort of a wife are you, ma'am?"
"Sir?"
"Of what value are you to your husband?"
"Your question is very impertinent, sir. I believe, although I did not bring my husband a shilling, he would be filled with deep sorrow were he to lose me."

"Oh, we have nothing to do with that, ma'am—sorrow does not enter into railway calculations. You may pass."

Another enters.
"Pray, ma'am, how does your husband estimate you?"

"You are as great a brute as my husband, I believe, and that is saying a great deal. I bring him ten thousand a year, which goes back to my relations if I die, as we have no children; and yet the wretch uses me worse than—"

"Station master, quick, quick! Get a special train instantly for this lady, and let a pilot engine go before, and a guardian angel behind!"—[Punch.]

SAVING LIVES FOR A LIVING.—George W. Kendall, of the New Orleans Picayune, relates the following good story:

"A new method of raising the wind was resorted to a few days since, by a couple of precious scamps, which should have succeeded if ingenuity of this kind were entitled to any reward. The sharpest Yankee would not be ashamed of the trick hit upon by these Parisian gamins. About 10 o'clock in the morning—and a tolerably chilly morn'g it was—the passers along the Quai du Marche aux Fleurs noticed a young man, with a very melancholy and suicidal look, standing near one of the bridges alone. Suddenly he cast his eyes upward, as if to take a last view of the skies, muttered apparently as if in prayer for a moment, and then plunged headlong into the river. While all stood paralyzed at the attempt, a young man came up and inquired with great simplicity what was the matter. The individual who was floundering in the turbid current of the Seine, and who had just risen to the surface, was pointed out to him, when at once slipping of his blouse, and ejaculating that he would save the unfortunate or perish in the attempt, he plunged in after him. The bystanders watched, with breathless anxiety, as the heroic youth dove, came up to the surface, and again went under in his endeavors to save the wretch who had attempted his own destruction; and finally, when nearly all hope was lost, the crowd were rejoiced on seeing the suicide brought to shore, with life still in him. Close by was a station where half-drowned persons are restored, and where those who rescue them receive the municipal reward of twenty-five francs. Thither the rescued and the rescuer were borne by the crowd, the latter overwhelmed with the admiration and praise which his gallantry called forth on all sides; but fortunately, just as the demand was about to be given him, and while a subscription for an additional sum was being raised, a policeman stepped up who knew them both. They were brothers, were two of the best swimmers in Paris, and made it a business to go about saving each other's lives for a living!"

I. O. OF O. F.

Office of the Grand Secretary Grand Lodge State of New-York:

ONE FELLOW'S HALL, CITY OF NEW-YORK,
March 13, 1849.

To District Deputy Grand Masters, Officers of Lodges, and Brethren:

In consequence of the many complaints made to this Office of the failure of Deputies, Officers of Lodges and Members to receive communications which have been issued from this Office, and of the failure to receive many communications which have been intended to reach this Office, for several months last past, and which have been transmitted by Deputies, Lodges and individuals, you are therefore notified and requested to address all communications intended for the Grand Lodge, Grand Master, or Grand Secretary, to BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Box No. 838, Post Office, New-York, and in all cases to be particular that Letters and Documents are properly mailed, in order that a failure of papers intended for this, or sent from this Office, to reach their destination, may be traced to the proper cause.

Fraternally yours,
BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Grand Secretary.

OFFICE OF THE GRAND SEC. OF THE GRAND LODGE of the State of New-York, May 1, 1849.

To Subordinate Lodges and members of the I. O. of O. F.:

You are hereby notified that the R. W. Grand Lodge of the State of New-York will hold an adjourned session at the Grand Lodge Room, on Wednesday evening, May 9, at 7 o'clock. You are also notified that the office of the Grand Secretary, and the Post Office have been removed to the 3d story of Odd-Fellows' Hall.

Fraternally yours,

BENJ. J. PENTZ, Grand Sec.

NOTICE.

The members of Hinman Lodge No. 107, I. O. O. F., are notified that this Lodge will meet hereafter (on Monday evenings of each week, at 8 o'clock,) in the Elizabethan Room at Odd-Fellows' Hall, 3d story. The brothers are respectfully invited to attend at our next meeting, as interesting exercises may be expected on that occasion.

F. W. WILLIAMS, N. G.

D. D. T. MARSAALL, S. New-York, May 1, 1849.

I. O. O. F.—BEACON LODGE NO. 228.

The members of this Lodge are notified that their rooms in the new Odd-Fellows' Hall are ready for occupation, and their next and future meetings will be in the Elizabethan Room, on Friday evenings, at 8 o'clock.

By order of the Board of Trustees,
FRANCIS GILBERTSON,
L. K. SMITH,
BENJAMIN S. HILL.

New-York, May 5, 1849.

DIED.

On Sunday, April 29d, of malignant scarlet fever, HARRIET D., aged 5 years. Also on Monday the 30d, of the same disease, NATHANIEL B., aged 7 years, children of BRO. JONAS and MARTHA M. GRISWOLD.

This is a case more than usually afflicting. Bro. Griswold left his family a few weeks since for California, little anticipating the sad event, that has broken the charmed circle of his family, and plunged his cherished companion into the deepest abyss of sorrow. How little does he dream of the terrible cloud of grief that now hangs over his head, which a few weeks since was so bright and happy. Our sympathies are with him, and especially with the bereaved mother, and our prayer is that she may find in religion that effectual consolation which can bind up the broken heart, and heal the wounded spirit.

In Flint, Michigan, April 14th, 1849, WILLIAM E., aged two years and three months, only child of ELIZABETH and JULIA A. FRARY.

"How should we live but in doubt and fear,
How should we anchor our fond hopes here,
How should e'en joy but a trembler be,
Beautiful dust! when we gaze on thee?"

We bend above thy bier, fair child,
And gaze upon thy face,
Where death has forced its bloom away,
But not its angel grace.

Thy brow is crowned with flowers, fair child,
Thy hands are meekly pressed
Above thy heart, whose bounding pulse
Is stilled in holy rest.

Upon thy forehead pure, fair child,
Christ's blessed cross has been,
That cross which marks thee for his own,
And signs the death of sin.

Thou wert beloved while here, fair child.
And now that thou art gone,
Earth's brightest day dark night will seem
To her—the childless one.

For thou wert beautiful and pure,
Her soft-winged only dove,
A birdling yet unfledged, to leave
The warm nest of her love.

In vain the music of the rill,
Of birds upon the tree—
In vain the burning stars of heaven—
Why shine they, without thee?

Yet do we know, that by the stream
Of Life thou wand'rest now,
Thy white hand holds a golden harp,
And glory crowns thy brow.

Then, mother, trust thy child to meet
When life's wild dream is fled;
He lives in glory! weep no more!
Thy bright one is not dead.

GAZETTE OF THE UNION
AND GOLDEN RULE.

THE ORGAN OF THE ORDER,
Published under the auspices of the M. W. Grand Stew.

It will contain, from week to week, the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of the State of New-York, and also of other States; accounts of Celebrations, Institutions of new Lodges, and occasionally, a complete Directory of all the Lodges in the Union.

Its Literary department will be filled with Original Tales of the highest excellence, prepared by the most eminent writers in our country—Popular Tales; Choice Miscellany; the rarest Gems of Poetry from the English Poets; Sketches of Travel; Anecdotes, &c., &c.; and occasionally illustrated with beautiful Wood Engravings. Being equal in its Literary character to any Weekly in the country, and being thus perfect in its Odd-Fellowship department, it will be worthy of a place on the table of every brother of the Order.

The Gazette and Rule is published every Saturday, at 44 Ann-street, New-York, by CRAMPTON & CLARK, and is under the Editorial Superintendence of Rev. Bro. AUG. C. L. ARNOLD, P. C. P.

All Communications should be addressed to CRAMPTON & CLARK, 44 Ann-street, New-York.

Special Notices.

DIGESTS.—We have received a small supply of this valuable work, and are now ready to fill orders, which must invariably be accompanied by a remittance. Price 37½ cts. each.

REMITTANCES.—We hope our friends will bear in mind that the approaching celebration will afford great facilities for the settlement of accounts, and that none will fail to remember us, in the form of a remittance, by any brother who may visit New-York.

BOSTON.—A change has been made in our agency. Messrs. Mudge & Corlies having declined in favor of Messrs. W. H. Sweet & Co., No. 23 Bromfield-st., to whom all payments should be made in future. The long experience of this firm gives us reason to believe that this change will be advantageous to all interested.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Publishers of the "Gazette of the Union and Golden Rule" beg leave to call the attention of subscribers to the fact, that a very large number of accounts are now past due. The terms are $2 per annum in advance—a price which yields a very moderate profit to the Publishers, and this only when promptly paid by all who receive the paper.

Every subscriber who is in arrears a single week upon the receipt of this number, will, we hope, respond, and remit us at once. No pains are spared to make the paper equal to the wants of the I. O. of O. F., and we look for such substantial support from our readers as will not only enable us to maintain the present high position of the paper, but to make it still more valuable.

Postmasters will make all remittances free of charge, and we would earnestly request of subscribers not to depend upon any agent, but to communicate directly to this office.

CRAMPTON & CLARK.

TO CLUBS.—Any person obtaining the names of five new Subscribers, and sending us Ten Dollars, shall receive a sixth copy gratis for one year. Upon all subscriptions over five, the person sending the names and money may retain fifty cents as his commission. Payments invariably in advance.

Postmasters are authorized to remit money to Publishers, and all money mailed in presence of the Postmaster, and duly forwarded by him, is at our risk.

In all cases where postage on subscriptions is not paid, it will be deducted from the amount credited to those who send it.

TO LOCAL AGENTS.—We have heretofore received very efficient aid from our Local Agents, and many of them are still rendering us much service by increasing our circulation and collecting dues. There are others from whom we have heard nothing for many weeks. We again ask your assistance in extending the genuine principles of Odd-Fellowship. We often experience much inconvenience from the failure of agents to report to the office, probably because but little has been done, and delaying until more is accomplished. If but two names are obtained, please forward them. Personal correspondence is essential to the proper transaction of the business of the office; and subscribers are often disappointed and deprived of their rights by its omission. Will you not now renew your efforts as formerly, and see that our interests and the interests of the Order are properly cared for within the sphere of your respective agencies?

LIST OF TRAVELING AGENTS.

BRO. ALONZO WELTON,	BRO. ISAAC H. RUSSELL,
WM. H. FARMCHILD,	FRANK E. TOLSON,
HENRY L. BROUGHTON,	L. W. ALDRIDGE,
CHAS. H. HARRISON,	HORACE LAMB,
SAMUEL H. BARRETT.

We hope our Traveling Agents will be punctual in making returns to us every week, and not compel us to notice any one individually.

VERY FINE.—"I say, Mr. Johnson, did you hear 'bout de catalsep dat befel Phillis?"

"Ob course I didn't; what was it?"

"You see, de doctor ordered a blister on her chist—well, as she hadn't no chist, no how, she put 'um on the band-box, and it drawed her new pink bonnet all out ob shape, and spile 'um intirely."

A clergyman, on a hot, drowsy, summer day, found, on concluding a long discourse, that half his congregation were just waking up from sleep, quietly said: "My friends, this sermon cost me a good deal of labor; you don't seem to have paid much attention to it; I think I will go over it again." And go over it he did, from text to exhortation.

GOURAUD'S LIBRARY OF ROMANOE.

JULIA WRIGHT—CANTO VIII.

The first was Sabretasche, a dashing Cornet, Whose hussar-coat was red as Julia's hair! A moustached, booted, spurred, fire-eating hornet, A sort of General Cummings, one might swear! Whoe'er his prowess doubted, he would scorn it. Rash, foolish man! for pity's sake take care; Or Sabretasche will grind you, blood and bones, Beneath his iron heel—upon the stones!

"The race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong," but GOURAUD'S ITALIAN MEDICATED SOAP will infallibly remove Erysipelas, Scrofula, Ringworm, Eruptions, Tans, Freckles, Sallowness, &c., from the human skin! GOURAUD'S POUDES SUBTILES are all that heart can wish for the extirpation of superfluous hair. GOURAUD'S GRECIAN HAIR DYE will color red, light, or gray hair a glossy black!

BEAR in mind that the genuine preparations of DR. F. FELIX GOURAUD are to be had only at his cosmetic depot, 67 Walker-st., first door FROM, not in Broadway; Bates & Jordan, 120 Washington-st., Boston.

SILKY AND GLOSSY HAIR.

From the New York Mirror.

Of all preparations, oily or spirituous, for the Hair, give us Bogle's HYPERION FLUID. It is properly named Hyperion, for as that shining old Titan, who, ladies and gentlemen, was nobody but the Sun, threw, at his rising, his radiant looks over the summits of the earth, so Bogle's magical fluid produces a crop of silky and glossy hair upon the most obdurate human head. For dandruff, and all similar affections of the head, it is a sovereign remedy. With all this, it is an agreeable perfume, and otherwise a most useful article for the purposes of the toilet. Buy it and try it.

For Sale, Wholesale and Retail, by A. B. & D. Sands, 100 Fulton-st.; Ranshon, Clark & Co., 110 and 273 Broadway, N. Y. To be obtained of the Proprietor and Manufacturer, Wm. Bogle, 277 Washington-st., Boston, and of the principal Druggists and Perfumers in the United States and Canada.

WRIGHT'S INDIAN PILLS

THIS Superior Medicine may be had in part as follows:—At Dr. Wright's Offices in Philadelphia, 100 Race street; New-York, 366 Greenwich-street; and Boston, 100 Tremont-street; and by 30,000 Agencies in North and South America, England, France, and Germany. Agents whose supplies become exhausted, can obtain a fresh lot at the Philadelphia rates, by addressing any of the above Offices. Care should be taken not to confound this medicine with other articles of similar name, so as to prevent disagreeable consequences; and in no case should it be purchased from individuals who cannot vouch for its genuineness. 240

PROF. BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS, OR MEDICATED COMPOUND,

FOR RESTORING, PRESERVING AND BEAUTIFYING HAIR, ERADICATING SCURF AND DANDRUFF, AND CURING DISEASES OF THE SKIN, GLANDS, AND MUSCLES, CUTS, STINGS, BRUISES, SPRAINS, &c. &c.

IN order to convince the public of the efficacy of any curative preparation, in this thinking and reflective age, it is necessary to explain the philosophy of its operation. The process by which Professor Barry's Tricopherous produces such extraordinary results, cannot be understood without a brief notice of the structure and uses of the delicate substances to which it is applied, and in the condition of which it accomplishes the most salutary changes. The connection between the hair and the skin is so close, that the one may be almost deemed a continuation of the other, and hence whatever renovates, restores, and nourishes the hair, must of necessity have a healthful influence upon the sensitive membrane in which its roots are fixed.

The skin, that wonderful envelop in which the sense of touch resides, consists of three layers; the EPIDERMIS or cuticle, a semi-opaque, or almost insensible film; the ARTERIO-CUTANEA, which is a spongy membrane reticulated with nerves and blood-vessels, and forms a sort of shield to the exquisitely delicate TANGA SKIN; and the true skin itself, which constitutes the third layer of the triple envelop. In this tough, flexible and elastic integument, are located the nerves, blood-vessels, &c., which supply sustenance to the hair, and in the derangement of which diseases of the skin originate. The vessels of the true skin supply the sacs containing the roots of the hair with the moisture which sustains the fibres, and the same causes which affect the health of the hair, also affect the health of the skin. This is self-evident to the casual observer, as well as susceptible of demonstration by the anatomist and physiologist; for in all cutaneous diseases, the hair becomes dry and harsh, and falls out in such quantities as sometimes to render the patient partially or entirely bald. Wounds, burns, &c., on the skin of the head, also produce baldness on the portions of the scalp where the injury has been inflicted, thus proving the close affinity and sympathy between the organism of the skin and the hair.

The wonderful restorative and remedial properties of Professor Barry's Tricopherous, are based upon this hypothesis, or rather this fact. It acts through the skin upon the hair, stimulating the inert vessels, opening the pores, imparting activity to the circulation, awakening from their lethargy all the vegetative functions which give life, vigor, and beauty to the fibres, extirpating every particle of scurf and dandruff, and soon clothing even the bald or half denuded head with a thick, glossy, silky, and elastic covering.

But this is only one of the uses of Professor Barry's Tricopherous. The same properties which restore vital and vegetative power the skin of the head are equally beneficial in all cutaneous diseases, or superficial injuries. For cuts, burns, bites of insects, sprains, erysipelas, blotches, pimples, scabies, ring-worm, rashes, scrofula, prickly heat, chilblains, chapped hands, rheumatism, bruisings, scalds, bruises, redness of the skin, and in short all the troublesome and painful external diseases and injuries which are so common in families, and which NOTHING BUT EXTERNAL REMEDIES CAN REMOVE, the Tricopherous will be found a speedy, safe, and unfailing cure. By virtue of its double claim as a renovator and beautifier of nature's choicest ornament, and a potent and invaluable remedial agent, it is entitled to a place on every toilet, and in every medicine chest.

The following testimonials, selected from hundreds of similar import, will serve to show the value of the preparation, and the estimation in which it is held by those who have given it a trial.

COPY OF A LETTER FROM WILLIAM DAVIES,

Corner of Hicks and Atlantic streets, Brooklyn.

BROOKLYN, April 19th, 1849.

PROFESSOR BARRY—Sir: I should be deficient in gratitude to you, and in feeling for others who may be similarly afflicted, if I neglected to inform you that your Tricopherous has entirely removed from my face a painful and disgusting eruption, consisting of large red pimples, with which I had been annoyed for many years. A regular application of the fluid according to the directions, for a little better than three weeks, completely relieved me of the nuisance, and the skin of my face is now as free from discoloration as in my boyhood. Yours truly, WILLIAM DAVIES.

COPY OF A LETTER FROM JAMES FITZGERALD,

New York, April 12th, 1849.

PROFESSOR BARRY—Verily, my dear sir, your Tricopherous is the Admiral Crichton of its class. It not only relieves the head from scurf and dandruff, and imparts beauty and vigor to the hair, but it is, as I can testify from personal experience, a most valuable application for cuts, abrasions, bruises, and those vile eruptions which are so annoying to children in the warm seasons, I have found nothing equal to it in cutaneous disorders; and if what I say is worth any thing to you, publish it and welcome. Your ob't servant, JAMES FITZGERALD.

COPY OF A LETTER FROM DR. LEE,

New York, Feb. 6, 1849.

MR. BARRY—I have no hesitation in recommending an article which I can, of my own personal knowledge, endorse as good; and I therefore state with confidence, that your Tricopherous is what you claim it to be—an article for cleansing, preserving, beautifying, and promoting the growth of the hair.

I find it to be the best remedy I have ever had in my practice for scald head, ringworm, and diseases which the skin is subject to. T. A. LEE, M. D.

The following testimonial is from Mr. Mann, editor of the Scientific American. Comment on such evidence is unnecessary: New York, Feb. 21, 1849.

BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS is an article that we take pleasure in awarding the highest commendations. We do not do it upon the recommendations of others, but from our own personal knowledge of its effects upon the hair; while it tends to keep it healthy, soft and glossy, it also removes dandruff, prevents grey hair, and invigorates its growth in a manner unequalled by any other composition known to us. A person only needs to use one bottle to be convinced of its truth. Sold in large bottles, price 75 cents, at the principal office, 129 Broadway.

THE PROPRIETORS having spent much time

in bringing this preparation of SARSAPARILLA to its present state of perfection; and the experience of fourteen years has furnished them the most ample opportunity to study, in their various forms, the diseases for which it is recommended, and to adapt it exactly to their relief and cure. Patients who wish a really good Medicine are invited to give it a trial, and satisfy themselves of its superiority, and the invaluable property it possesses of arresting and curing disease. The bottle has been enlarged to hold one Quart, and in its present improved form may safely claim to be the best and cheapest medicine of the age. Its progress to the same it has attained may be traced by a long line of facts and cures, that stand as landmarks and beacons for the invalid, pointing the way to the haven of health; and what it has already done for the thousands who have used it, it is capable of doing for the millions still suffering and struggling with disease. It purifies, cleanses, and strengthens the fountain springs of life, and infuses new vigor throughout the whole animal frame.

DYSPEPSY CURED.

The following testimonial, from a gentleman so well known as Mr. Cox, requires no comment, and recommends itself to all similarly afflicted: NEW-ORLEANS, Dec. 18, 1848.

Messrs. A. B. & D. SANDS—Gentlemen: Having experienced the most beneficial effects from the use of your Sarsaparilla, it gives me pleasure to add my testimony to the numerous spontaneous effusions of grateful hearts which you continually are receiving.

My case was dyspeptic, or rather I may term it a weakness of the digestive organs. For more than a year, I was troubled with wind upon my stomach and its frequent eructation, together with producing a spasmodic contraction of the heart, often gave me much annoyance. After trying various remedies without avail, I commenced with your Sarsaparilla. Before I had used half a bottle, almost every symptom of this disagreeable complaint had vanished, and in a few weeks its continued use effected a complete cure. I therefore confidently recommend it to all persons affected in the same manner, and have reason to believe that many who are suffering under a supposed disease of the heart, if they would take your Sarsaparilla, in a few weeks would find themselves restored to health in both mind and body. I remain yours, very truly, JOHN V. COX, 93 Lexington Avenue.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA IN PRUSSIA.

The Proprietors of this valuable Medicine have just received an order from our esteemed friend and correspondent, Theodore S. Fay, Secretary of Legation to the Court of Prussia, for the use of a member of the Royal Family—a copy of which we herewith lay before our readers.—[Home Journal. U. S. LEGATION, BERLIN, Nov. 30, 1848.—Gentlemen: I wish you to send two dozen bottles of your Sarsaparilla, for the use of His Royal Highness Prince Waldimir of Prussia, to this Legation, as soon as possible. It is necessary that he should receive it immediately; therefore, please send it by first steamer. The bill can be made out in the name of the Prince, and sent with it: Your obedient servant, "THEO. S. FAY."

SCROFULOUS AFFECTION OF THE EYES.

SOUTH KINGSTON, (R. I.) Oct. 11, 1847.—Messrs. SANDS—Gentlemen: My little daughter, when one year old, was attacked with a scrofulous humor on her face, which soon after extended into her eyes, causing almost total blindness in one of them, and disfiguring her whole face. I employed two physicians to attend her, who exhausted their utmost skill to give her relief, but it all proved useless, and finally one of them remarked to me that he had known of some striking cures effected by Sands' Sarsaparilla, and advised me to try it. I obtained one bottle, which she commenced using, and before it was all used up it had effected an entire cure. It is now over four years since she was cured, and there has been no reappearance of the disease, and we are satisfied that it is a perfect cure. It gives me great pleasure to add that I can recommend it to any sufferer from a similar complaint. Respectfully yours, GEORGE ROBINSON.

Prepared and sold, wholesale and retail, by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists and Chemists, 100 Fulton-st., corner of William, N. Y. Sold also by Druggists generally throughout the United States. Price $1 per Bottle; 5 Bottles for $5. 246

OLD DOCTOR
Jacob Townsend,
 THE ORIGINAL DISCOVERER
 OF THE GENUINE
TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA

Old Dr. Townsend is now about 70 years of age, and has long been known as the AUTHOR and DISCOVERER of the GENUINE ORIGINAL "TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA." Having spent his life in the pursuit of his profession, he has been compelled to limit his manufacture to those only who had proved its worth and known its value. It had reached the ears of many, nevertheless, as those persons who had been healed of sore diseases, and saved from death, proclaimed its excellence and wonderful HEALING POWER. This is manufactured on the largest scale, and is called for throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Unlike young S. P. Townsend's, it improves with age, and never changes, but for the better, because it is prepared on scientific principles by a scientific man. The highest knowledge of Chemistry, and the latest discoveries of the Art, have all been brought into requisition in the manufacture of the OLD DR.'S SARSAPARILLA. The Sarsaparilla root, it is well known to medical men, contains many medicinal properties, and some properties which are inert or useless; and others, which, if retained in preparing it for use, produce fermentation and acid, which is injurious to the system. Some of the properties of Sarsaparilla are so volatile, that they entirely evaporate, known only to those experienced in its manufacture. Moreover, these volatile principles, which fly off in vapor, or as an exhalation, under heat, are the very essential medicinal properties of the root, which give to it all its value. The

GENUINE
Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's Sarsaparilla
 is so prepared, that all the inert properties of the Sarsaparilla root are first removed, every thing capable of becoming acid or of fermentation, is extracted and rejected; then every particle of medicinal virtue is secured in a pure and concentrated form; and thus it is rendered incapable of losing any of its valuable and healing properties. Prepared in this way, it is made the most powerful agent in the

Cure of Innumerable Diseases.
 Hence the reason why we hear commendations on every side in its favor by men, women, and children. We find it doing wonders in the cure of CONSUMPTION, DYSPPEPSIA, and LIVER COMPLAINT, and in RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA, and PILES, COSTIVENESS, all CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, and all diseases arising from

Impurity of the Blood.
 It possesses a marvellous efficacy in all complaints arising from indigestion, from acidity of the Stomach; from unequal circulation, determination of blood to the head, palpitation of the heart, cold feet and cold hands, cold chills and hot flashes over the body. It has not had its equal in coughs and colds; and promotes easy expectorations, and gentle perspiration, relaxing the strictures of the lungs, throat, and every other part. But its excellence more manifestly seen and acknowledged than in all kinds and stages of

Female Complaints.
 It works wonders in cases of fluor albus or whites, Falling of the Womb, Obstructed, Suppressed, or Painful Menstruation, Irregularity of the menstrual periods, and the like; and is effectual in curing all forms of the Kidney Disease.

By removing obstructions, and regulating the general system, it gives tone and strength to the whole body, and cures all forms of

Nervous Diseases and Debility,
 and thus prevents or relieves a great variety of other diseases, as Spinal Irritation, Neuralgia, St. Vitus Dance, Whooping, Epileptic Fits, Convulsions, &c.
 It is not possible for this medicine to fail to do good; it has nothing in it which can ever harm; it can never sour or spoil, and therefore, can never lose its curative properties. It cleanses the blood, excites the liver to healthy action, tones the stomach, and gives good digestion, relieves the bowels of action, cures the skin, purifies the blood, equalizes the circulation of the blood, producing gentle warmth equally all over the body, and the innumerable preparation; relieves all strictures and tightness, removes all obstructions, and invigorates the entire nervous system. In no other disease, The Medicine you Presumptively Need?

But can any of these things be said of S. P. Townsend's inferior article? This young man's liquid is not to be

Compared with the Old Dr.'s, because of ONE GRAND FACT, that the one is INCAPABLE of DETE-RIORATION and

Never Spoils,
 while the other DOES; it sours, ferments, and blows the bottles containing it into fragments; the sour, acid liquid exploding, and damaging other goods! Must not this horrible compound be poisonous to the system? What! put acid into a system already diseased with acid? What cause Druggists and acid? Do we not all know, that when food sours in our stomachs, what mischief it produces?—nausea, heartburn, palpitation of the heart, liver complaint, diarrhea, dysentery, colic, and corruption of the blood? What is Scrofula but an acid disposition in the blood? What is the humor which brings on Eruptions of the Skin, Scald Head, Salt Rheum, Erysipelas, White Swellings, Fever-Sores, and all ulcerations internal and external? It is nothing under heaven but an acid substance, and, as we all know, the acids, sour acid fluids, which accumulate in the joints and elsewhere, irritate and inflame the tender and delicate tissues upon which it acts! So of nervous diseases, of impurity of the blood, of deranged circulations, and nearly all the ailments which afflict human nature.

Now, is it not horrible to make and sell, and infinitely worse to use this

Souring, Fermenting, Acid "Compound"
 OF S. P. TOWNSEND?

and yet he would fain have it understood that Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's GENUINE ORIGINAL SARSAPARILLA, is an IMITATION of the inferior preparation!!

Heaven forbid that we should deal in an article which would bear the most distant resemblance to S. P. Townsend's article! and which should bring down upon the Old Dr. such a mountain load of complaints and criminalities from Agents who have sold, and purchasers who have used S. P. Townsend's FERMENTING COMPOUND.

We wish it understood, because it is the absolute truth, that S. P. Townsend's article and Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's Sarsaparilla are heaven-wide apart, and infinitely dissimilar; that they are unlike in every particular, having not one single thing in common.

As S. P. Townsend is no doctor, and never was, is no chemist, no pharmacist, knows no more of medicine or disease than any other common, unscientific, unprofessional man, what guarantee can the public have that they are receiving a genuine scientific medicine, containing all the virtues of the articles used in preparing it, and which are incapable of changes which might render them the AGENTS OF DISEASE instead of health?

It is to arrest frauds upon the unfortunate, to pour balm into wounded humanity, to kindle hope in the despairing bosom, to restore health and bloom and vigor into the crushed and broken, and to launch infirmity—that OLD DR. JACOB TOWNSEND has SOUGHT and FOUND the opportunity and means to bring his

Grand Universal Concentrated Remedy,
 within the reach, and to the knowledge of all who need it, that they may learn and know, by joyful experience, his

Transcendent Power to Heal!
 and thus to have the unparelleled satisfaction of having raised thousands and millions from the bed of sickness and despondency to hope, health, and a long life of vigor and usefulness to themselves, their families and friends.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE.
BY CALEB LYON, OF LYONSDALE.

ONE by one the ties are reft us,
That in early life were known;
One by one the stars have left us,
That upon our boyhood shone;
And our hopes relume a pathway,
Brighter by its distance grown.
Tears for tears are sadly streaming,
O'er the hours of pleasures fled;
Tears for tears are darkly gleaming,
O'er the heart's unburied dead;
And our tenderest joy is ever
By the light of memory shed.
Soon, too soon the sea has parted,
Those whose thoughts are on the land;
Soon, too soon the tear-drop started,
From affection's household band—
Meeting never till our spirits
Walk in heaven, hand in hand.

HYMN TO THE MOON.

BY AUG. C. L. ARNOLD.

BLEST star of night! in mildness drest,
And meek sublimity and calm;
Thou wakest within my heaving breast,
A wondrous joy—so sweet and warm!
In solemn night's lone hour and still,
Thou com'st to watch our deep repose,
And cast thy sweet and soothing spell,
O'er hearts oppressed by griefs and woes.
I fain would learn, fair watch, of thee,
If thou'rt a port, for spirits blest—
If thou'rt a land, where all are free,
And weary mortals find a rest!—
If spirits, freed from earthly clay,
In union meet with those afar,
And with them soar through space away,
From moon to sun—to distant star!
—Till far above, to worlds unknown,
Where thought itself can never fly,
They stand before the Eternal Throne,
The central sun of all the sky?
Art thou the place where first repose,
Earth's happy spirits, on their way
To that bright world, where ever flows
The wondrous light of PERFECT DAY!

CHAPTER X.

THE WIDOWED BRIDE.

"Oh had it been but told ye then,
To mark whose lamp was dim—
From out yon rank of fresh-lipped men
Would ye have singled him?" N. P. WILLIS.

THE British had been effectually prevented from carrying out, at this time, their contemplated invasion of the Carolinas. Crippled and dispirited, Sir Peter Parker himself discovered that the "wooden walls of England" were inferior to the American palmetto ramparts; and, with Sir Henry Clinton, who had not even a chance to display his military skill, hastily made all sail for the north.

The inhabitants of Charleston, saved by the valor of Moultrie and his brave associates from their fears of the power of England, and from all the horrors of an evil war, gave themselves up to the wildest manifestations of joy. Deeply sensible of the blessings of peace and freedom, which they had fancied irretrievably periled, they showered their gratitude upon the noble defenders of Sullivan's Island. The gallant Moultrie, loved and esteemed before for the chivalrous qualities which were nurtured to his soul, now become the object of all the honors that his grateful fellow citizens could bestow upon him.

And Marion, the valiant ranger, whose achievements in former years, when the savage foe threatened the infant settlements upon the borders, were remembered gratefully by many a family rescued from Cherokee invasion, shared with his commander the distinctions due to his signal services. And Jasper, was he forgotten?

No! the brave sergeant was not forgotten—for in those days men recked not the rank of the patriot in their estimate of his achievements. The man who fought for freedom, whether he wore a wagoner's frock or a general's uniform, was held in the hearts of his countrymen for what he had done. Would that we measured our patriots by deeds, rather than by words!

Jasper was honored and rewarded by the citizens of Charleston; but the humble soldier had in his own generous bosom a deeper and stronger pleasure than all the favors in the power of man to bestow, could afford him. He possessed the heart of the freeman, glowing with the consciousness of the purest motives, and ready at any time to pour out its richest blood for the cause of liberty. To such men as Jasper honors are nothing, save as tokens that their merits are appreciated.

But the hands of beauty were lifted over that brave man's head to reward him. Mrs. Elliot, that glorious representative of the spirit of our country's fairer sex, presented to the gallant sergeant the colors of his regiment, woven by her own free fingers, and invoked the proud recipients to defend them as long as they could "wave in the air of liberty." And never was trust more fervently repeated, as the bloody battles in which those colors were afterwards borne, have testified to admiring millions.

Governor Rutledge, too, on behalf of the State, gave a sword to Jasper, and as the noble fellow grasped its hilt, those around him could see that his soul was recording a silent vow to merit the warrior's gift, by bolder deeds than ever that which gained it. It was a glorious day for the defenders of Charleston, when their rescued fellow citizens acknowledged their valorous deeds.

But what a black, awful cloud, surcharged with the lightning that withers the heart's hopes for ever, hung over the devoted bride of the hapless Ernest Rivers!

And the bolt fell!

The joy bells were pealing. The patriot soldiers marched in triumph through the streets of Charleston, the banner of Moultrie waving proudly in the morning sunshine. The delirious multitude followed the defenders with cheers and shouts of joy. The trumpets blared, and the rattle of drums startled a thousand echoes.

On came the division of Lee, with their chivalrous chieftain at their head—the long line of brave heroes—with banners and inspiring music; but far more glorious with the gallant spirit that imbued it. On came Moultrie, with the men of Sullivan's Island—Marion with his rangers—every heart throbbled with proud recollections.

But Ernest Rivers came not with his band of volunteers. The flag was shrouded with crape.

Gaily waved the kerchiefs of Charleston's fairest dames, as the patriot army marched beneath their windows and balconies. Their bosoms swelled, and bright eyes wept with joy, as husbands, fathers, and lovers passed before them. It was a carnival day of liberty.

Did the glances of the young bride Louise pierce anxiously through the distant street for a glimpse of her husband's gallant form? Did her heart throb with the proud delight of the anticipated meeting?

Alas! he came not! The shrouded banner rose solemnly where Ernest Rivers should have been; and his little troupe marched silently to the mournful tap of the drum, their exultation dampened by the loss of their cherished leader.

God alone knew the pang that shot through the bride's soul, when her eyes rested on that sorrowful banner. Those around her heard but her agonizing cry, saw but the ashy paleness which overspread her features, as she sank, like one dead, upon the balcony.

The bolt had fallen!

CHAPTER XI.

ST. AUGUSTINE.

"And prisoners, clanking their iron chains,
With tearful eyes, and with throbbing brains."

THE DELVOX.

"WE will now, gentle reader, lift the veil from a series of events, which relate to the fate of the long-lost Ernest Rivers; and for this purpose we must go back to a period of about ten months from that of our story's commencement.

It was high noon, and the vertical sunbeams fell in a shower of fire upon the sandy shores of St. Augustine, Florida, then garrisoned by British troops. The air was close and oppressive, even though the sea breeze at times blew across the narrow mouth of the channel, and somewhat tempered the scorching heat.

Over the towers of the castle hung the red banner of England, flapping heavily around its flag-staff. Scarcely a bayonet glittered upon the ramparts, save when the relief marched slowly from point to point. At other times, the sentinels sheltered themselves in the boxes, or beneath the shadow of the batteries.

Yet, in the heat of that blazing noon, four individuals, each dragging a heavy chain and log, as he moved painfully along, toiled on the castle fortifications. Beneath the full force of the hot sunbeams these wretches, fainting and fatigued, labored to lift huge stones, or wheel hand-barrows of sand from the dry beach to the outworks, which they were repairing.

One of these chained laborers was a fine, soldierly-looking man, with vigorous limbs and broad chest, who appeared capable of undergoing almost any amount of hardship, albeit at this time his features were worn, and his general figure gaunt and thin, like one who had been overworked and half-famished. He was fastened by a cross-fetter to another and younger man.

This other was scarcely turned of his majority, and appeared very youthful indeed beside his fellow-captive, inasmuch as his chin was covered with but the slight down of early manhood, while that of the other, as well as half his face, was hidden by the thick growth of a bushy beard. He was, besides, of a much slighter make, and had evidently been but little accustomed to exposure or hardship. The two were confined, each by a log and chain attached to his ankle, and were besides manacled together by the cross-fetter, which united their separate chains.

The two other prisoners, who were employed upon the fortifications, a short distance in the rear of the point described, were fettered in like manner. One was an elderly man, the other a frail-looking boy—a father and son, by a species of refined cruelty, chained together to witness each other's sufferings. They both seemed rapidly sinking under the excessive heat and the heavy labors which they were performing.

Who were these wretched captives, and what had been the fearful crime for which they now sweltered and toiled beneath a Florida sun?

They were American prisoners!

Their crime had been patriotism, and the courageous defense of human liberty. And not these alone, but hundreds were at that moment sinking beneath the burdens which British tyranny imposed upon every hapless victim whom the fortunes of war had thrown beneath its power.

The hot sunbeams blistered their skin, and caused the blood to boil in their veins. At every yard they moved, they were forced to stoop, and draw behind them the heavy chain and log which confined their steps. They had but one sad consolation in their misery, the mutual rehearsal of their past sufferings.

Thus wore on the tedious hours of toil for the unhappy captives of St. Augustine. And even the severe labors which these men performed, were preferable to bear, rather than the solitary miseries borne by those who were in close captivity in the castle dungeons, without light or air. The log-and-chain workmen, on the fortifications, would at least feel at times the sea breeze fanning their fevered temples—could behold the blue sky, and catch at times a glimpse of some distant sail upon the ocean, bound perchance for their own native shores, where friends and kindreds mourned their unknown fate.

The two first-mentioned captives were engaged, with picks and sledges, breaking the rough edges from huge stones, which were piled around, and fitting them afterwards in the battered and ruined portions of the outward wall. The other couple—the old man and boy—were trundling, slowly back and forth, a wheel-barrow, which they filled with sand, and emptied into a bed of rough mortar, used as cement for the new wall. The father and son seldom spoke a word, but only strove in silence each to lighten the other's labors.

But the two who toiled on the rampart whiled the hours of work in conversation.

"How long, captain, have we been yoked together?" said the elder of these, the one with the bushy beard. "I begin to lose my reckoning of dates, entirely, and shall soon be as rusty as this indispensable ornament," continued he, glancing at his chain, with a grim smile.

"It is one hundred and twenty-six days, precisely," replied the younger prisoner, "since we were first marched out together. Here is the stone which I have notched every morning. 'Tis a rough calendar, but correct."

The bushy-whiskered man struck his pick heavily in the ground.

"By the Continental Congress!" cried he, using a favorite ejaculation of the Whigs, "I'm not going to stand it much longer. I'm wearing body and soul out in this infernal castle. Faith, Captain Rivers, if it had not been for you, I would have escaped or been shot long ago!"

"More likely the latter," said the young man, quietly. "You would have knocked your brains out against the wall, I verily believe, or run against a soldier's bayonet, long ago."

"I wish I had the butt end of one of those bayonets in my clutch for a moment, and this cursed log out of the way: I'd be good for three Britishers at least, or my name's not Tom Evans!"

"Ay, and be stretched the next moment on yonder sods, with a dozen bullet-holes in your corpse. No, Tom, let us hope on a little longer, and perhaps escape may be easy. We have friends in the castle that you know not of, friend Tom."

"What do you mean, captain?"

"Why, there's more than one British soldier who is as weary of mounting guard on these old castle walls, as we are of splitting stone in the ditches. Say nothing, comrade, and perhaps our deliverance may not be so far off as you think."

"By the Continental Congress, captain, you give me some hope! But, how do you know about these Britishers? I wouldn't trust one as far as I could hurl one of these rocks, let me tell you!"

"No matter, Tom," answered the other, with an accent of command which him of the bushy beard seemed to hear with some deference. "Let us at all events hope for the best, and do nothing rashly. And now, comrade, if you please, I would like to hear you relate how you were captured, once more. It will take our thoughts back to home, Tom, for a little while." The young man, as he said this, heaved a deep sigh, and dashed his hand across his eyes, as if to brush away an unbidden tear.

"Well, well, if you wish it," answered Tom Evans. "Perhaps it may cheer us up a little, though hang me if I can think of home and my old mother without feeling my blood all a-fire against these bloody Britishers. However, it's a short story, captain Rivers, and so, here goes."

And while the two Americans, in one of whom at least, the reader has doubtless recognized an acquaintance, pursued their heavy tasks, chopping off with incessant blows, the rough portions of rock, the bushy-whiskered man commenced his narrative.

"You see, captain Rivers," said he, "I had long suspected that smooth-tongued Robert Atree of being a tory in disguise. So I sets myself to watch his maneuvers closely; for, as you know, I was an old ranger under Marion, and understood how to lay low and keep dark."

"Well, about this time there was a fellow joined our camp, that I knew for as big a scamp as a chap of his size could well be. His name was Pappett, and he used to keep a grog-shop on the river-bank. He was a precious coward, too, and so, of course, I knew that he never listed to fight, and as for pay, there was confounded little of that among the soldiers of Congress. Of consequence, captain, he joined for some other purpose, and that, I was sure, couldn't be a good one. So, you see, I watches him; and very soon found Robert Atree and him in close quarters."

"Would you believe it, the infernal tory scamps were in league to steal Gen. Lee's papers, and carry all our plans to the Britishers. I found that out pretty quick, but I kept dark."

"I kept dark till one night when I knew Pappett was to meet Atree near an old oak tree on the river-bank. I dogged him there, and overheard the plotting scoundrels. Pretty soon they went off together, and I, corporal Tom Evans, followed, which was a most unlucky chance for me."

"I came up to Robert Atree, intending, by hook or crook, to make him my prisoner, and carry him back to the camp. But, as luck would have it, the tory escaped, and Tom Evans was caught instead. Pappett had run, as I expected, as soon as he got a glimpse of me, and I quickly mastered Atree; but the devil interposed and saved him, in the shape of something or other, with a pair of black eyes. The first thing I knew was finding myself floundering in the waters of Smith's creek, with a bullet in my shoulder-blade that I shall carry as long as I live."

The soldier rubbed his arm, and made a few grimaces as if to illustrate his point, before he proceeded.

"And then, if I recollect rightly, Tom, you were as near drowning as dying by the bullet-wound."

"Precisely, captain. The water was four or five feet deep, and the banks high and slippery. I found my left arm unserviceable, so I struck out with my right, to gain some point where I could land, and before I well knew what I was about, got into the current, and found myself out in the river. This was a predicament, captain—"

"From which you were saved almost as miraculously as I was," remarked Rivers, who began to get rather tired of honest Tom's prolixity.

"Can't say, captain," replied the soldier, dryly, "seeing as how you never told me how you came here, or anything else about yourself, though we've been yoked together like the lion and the lamb, for four eternal months. However, every one knows his own business best."

"Well, Tom, go on," said Rivers. "And believe me, comrade, if I have refrained from speaking to you of my own hardships, it was not that I distrusted your sympathy, my brave Evans. Go on, and when you have finished, I will give you my own story."

"Well, captain, God bless you, I meant no harm. You see, I found myself drifting out into the river, and my strength dwindling down to nothing, when, all at once, I heard oars. 'Boat,' cried I, 'boat—b-o-a-t.'"

"And it turned out to be a British boat—eh, Tom?"

"Sure enough—I see you recollect all I told you, captain. Well, they hauled me in, just as I was sinking, and there I saw a couple of Johnny Bull sailors, and a tall old gentleman, wrapped in a cloak."

"Which was Lord Marmount, Tom, I think you told me."

L'ENLUMINEUSE;

OR

THE THREE FLOWER-MARKETS OF PARIS.

SCENE I.

THERE are, or there were, three principal Marchés aux Fleurs in Paris—one on the Quay, one on the Boulevard St. Martin, and one on the Place de la Madeleine. These three flower-markets, like every thing else in this world, have their own caste, their own fashion and rank. Getting into railway phraseology as we are, we may designate them as first, second, and third classes. That on the Place de la Madeleine is the first class, at least in point of price, and, therefore, it appertains more especially to first-class people; that on the Boulevard is the second class flower-market, and that on the Quay a third class, where you may find a flower to answer all the purposes a flower was designed for, and pay a third class price for it.

One bright Wednesday, the market on the Quay presented quite a charming spectacle. Flowers are the sole luxury of the poor and hard-working; for young women who pass long summer days at ceaseless needlework, how sweet it is to repose their eyes a moment on a little verdure; to cast a glance now and then on an opening bud, or inhale the fragrance breathed forth from open petals, even on the noisome air of a city lodging! The pale mechanic places a pot of mignonette in his window, and sickly geraniums screen out the little air that can enter a London attic. A superfluity which gives a moment's happiness should be allowed to pass for a necessity. But in France flowers are a necessity to the working people; the humblest house-keeper, when she carefully appropriates her pence to sundry necessities, reserves a sou for the modest bouquet which is to be laid over her other purchases.

The flower-market on the Quay was that of the poor, or working people; and there, on this bright Wednesday morning, might be seen a very poor-looking and very little old man, whose air of decency and careful exterior seemed to say that his poverty arose from the goodness of his heart, and the unworldly character of his mind. His old black clothes, although rain had incorporated some dust in their texture, were scrupulously clean; and what was rather remarkable, especially as the little old man was French, they contrasted in color with the white cravat so carefully disposed around his neck. He was small, thin, and shriveled, with knees and shoulders rather bent, but his dark bright eyes shone with vivacity and benevolence, his lips closed with a smile, and he looked about him on the flowers, the flower-sellers, and flower-buyers, as if he were pleased with them and pleased with himself, and saw some beauty and some goodness in all that he looked upon.

He walked along the Quay, examining the plants near at hand or further off, admiring them at a distance, or plunging his face among them to breathe their odors. At last selecting the most modest of the glowing ranks, he drew up to one of the marchandes des fleurs, who seemed disposed to notice his advances, and pointing to a little pot of violets, said:

"How much for that?"

"That violet? Six sous!"

"Ah! yes, truly! Six sous? You don't say so to me? I am a man of experience!"

"I don't know if you often buy from others, but I know this is the first time I ever sold to you," returned Madame la Marchande, re-arranging her bouquets.

"Ah bah! No Wednesday or Saturday ever passes without my coming here. I adore flowers!" said the little old man, clasping his hands on his breast; "and if I had a garden—oh, if I had a garden!—it should be charming! one flower-basket: but I have only a window, and that not large." All this time the eyes of the little old man were roving from flower to flower, from plant to plant; he smelled some, touched others, but still returned to his first-love, the pot of violets. "Let us see, I offer you two sous for this violet."

"Four; not less."

"But I tell you I am a man of experience. Every second month I change my flower-pot, and it is always the violet; it is not the dearest, certainly, but it is my favorite—it is the sweetest. Hold! there is your money."

"No, no! four sous, not less."

The little old man had it in his hand, the other held forth two sous. On hearing these words he laid down the violet with a look of indignation.

"If the gentleman will not buy it, I will," said a pretty little voice beside him. The old man turned a reproving look on the speaker who had thus come to excite opposition and raise the price of the violet. It was curious to see how that slightly wrathful expression changed as he regarded his opponent. Two sweet and lively black eyes, well opened and full of intelligence, and of a pretty degree of sauciness, looked, with a perfect unconsciousness of all wrong, into his; he saw a small, expressive, though rather retroousse nose, and one of the prettiest mouths in the world, the full, rosy lips, drawn into a smile so widely as to display the pearly teeth that seemed to laugh within it;—he saw, in short, a face at once fresh, pretty, and amiable, three agreeable qualities which could please even our little old man; and this united to the smallest, neatest, most attractive little figure imaginable. The girl was apparently about nineteen years of age, simply, but rather smartly dressed; a pretty colored robe, a coquettish black apron, a shawl tastefully arranged on her very nicely-formed shoulders, and a dainty, but tiny cap, scarcely concealing the rich glossy hair it affected to cover. She was evidently of the working classes—une fille du peuple—but her exact position it would be impossible to assign. Instead of uttering a reprimand, the old man, with one hand placing the disputed pot of violets in hers, with the other pulled of his well-worn hat, and swinging it almost to the ground, said with an air of gallantry which must have antedated revolutionary times:

"I cannot regret that I am not to be the possessor of this flower, since it will belong to one as sweet."

The young girl smiled, with a slight blush: such a compliment, from such a personage, deserved a smile of pleasure.

"Ah, monsieur, pardon!" she cried; "I spoke without thinking I might contradict your wishes. Pray, keep the flower, monsieur, I will not buy it."

"No, truly, mademoiselle, I am too happy to yield it to you, since that gives you a pleasure; besides, she will not take my two sous for it. But, mademoiselle, allow me to return the pleasure of carrying it home for you: the pot is not quite clean; it may soil your robe, or spoil your pretty mittens. I have nothing to spoil, as you see." And the old man glanced over his threadbare habiliments, and down to the tips of his well-cleaned shoes.

The girl regarded him rather curiously, as he held the pot of violets pressed against his side, much after the manner in which a soldier holds his musket; and answered, with some archness:

"Well, sir, I accept your offer, on condition that you will place the violet yourself on my window, and I forewarn you that that window is in the sixth story."

"Mademoiselle, if it was on the tower of Notre Dame I would carry it there with joy!" and then, with a smothered sigh not accordant with his old-fashioned gallantry, the little old man added, from a habit possibly of speaking to himself, "I have nothing else to do just now."

They set off together; the young girl stopped before an old house, and entered a passage as dark as its outward aspect appeared to promise.

"This is the house, sir. Take care, the passage is dark, and the stairs slippery; but when you get once hold of the balustrade you are safe."

The little old man, pressing the pot of violets within one arm, groped with the other to find the auspicious balustrade.

"It is rather high, sir," continued the lively girl, mounting quickly upwards: "rather high,

"Precisely, captain. He was a good old chap, too, for a Britisher, and it were a pity he had such a hard fate, poor gentleman. Well, they took me aboard the—the—"

"Experiment—eh, Tom?"

"Precisely! and it was an experiment, too, for me; for they stowed me away 'tween decks, and poor Tom Evans might have starved and bled to death, for all the hard-hearted rascals cared. If it hadn't been for that old gentleman, Lord what-dye-call-'em, I'd never lived through that night and next day. Poor old chap! he sent a doctor to me, and a piece of chicken."

"That was some comfort, Tom—the chicken."

"It was so! It made a new man of me. The old gentleman came down himself next day, dressed up mighty grand in a scarlet uniform, and looking as proud and tall as General Washington himself. But, Lord save us, captain, death comes to all—both great and small, as we used to read in the primer."

"He was killed during the attack on the fort."

"Precisely, captain Rivers—shot with an eighteen-pound cannon ball. He never spoke after it hit him. O, Lord! how Tom Evans suffered all that day, listening to the roar of cannon, and thinking all the while that the Britishers were going to batter our city down, and, like as not, kill my poor old mother—bless her soul! I hope I shall live to see her once more."

The soldier paused, and tried to appear indifferent. But it was plain that the sudden thought of his mother had made his heart rise till he was almost choking.

"And they brought you here immediately, Tom—did they not?"

"Yes, after trying every way they knew how to get me to 'list under King George. But I told them I'd see them all teetotally—excuse me, captain, I was going to swear. The scoundrels couldn't make a Britisher out of me, so they pitched me into a tender, and the first I knew was being shut up in this infernal old castle of St. Augustine. And now, captain, I'm done my yarn, and, if you've a mind, I'd like to hear yours."

"You shall, Tom," said Ernest Rivers, wiping the perspiration from his forehead, and at the same time perhaps endeavoring to conceal the moisture which gathered in his eyes, as his thoughts reverted to his home and the wife he loved so well. The narrative of his perils and hardships drew many a sympathizing anathema from honest Tom, hurled against the "Britishers," with all the earnestness of his rough nature; but as it was often broken by pauses, we will give it in our own words, as briefly as the recital will admit.

Mrs. Loudon thus addresses a class of her fair countrywomen: "As you are fond of having flowers in the room, you will, perhaps, be glad to know how to preserve cut flowers as long as possible. The simple rules are, not to put too many flowers into one glass, to change the water every morning, and to remove every decayed leaf as soon as they show any symptoms of decay. A more efficacious way, however, is to put nitrate of soda into the water. About as much as can be easily taken up between the fore-finger and thumb, put into the glass every time the water is changed, will preserve cut flowers in all beauty for above a fortnight. Nitrate of potash (that is, saltpeter,) in powder has nearly the same effect but it is not quite so efficacious.

ANTIQUITY! thou wondrous charm! what art thou! that, being nothing, art every thing! when thou wert, then thou wert not. Antiquity, then thou wert nothing, but hadst a remoter antiquity, as thou calledst it, to look back to with blind veneration; thou thyself being to thyself flat, jejune, modern! What mystery lurks in this retroversion? or what half Januses are we, that cannot look forward with the same idolatry with which we for ever retreat! The mighty future is as nothing, being every thing; and the past is every thing, being nothing!—[C. Lamb you see; one hundred and forty steps to ascend."

"I go on without counting," said the old monsieur, managing his breath as well as he could; "but I think we must have nearly finished that number."

"Yes, here is the last," and the young girl, drawing a key from her pocket, threw open the door of a neat chamber, arranged not only with much care, but with somewhat of coquettish pretension. And now the reason of her having made the poor old man to mount to the sixth story became apparent. On a small round table stood all the preparatives for her breakfast; all that had been wanting was a bunch of flowers, and Mademoiselle 'Lena had gone to get some, and had brought home the pot of violets and the little old man; and as she slyly regarded the latter, it was obvious she knew more of him than he knew of her.

"Now, monsieur," said the pretty 'Lena, "I hope as you have carried my violets up that long, dark staircase, you will not object to partake of my modest breakfast. I have given you the pleasure of serving me, now, en revanche, you must let me have that of serving you."

The little old man colored, bowed, stepped backwards, and bowed again. He looked at the breakfast-table, and felt all the hesitation to accept the offer which the consciousness that it was a desirable one sometimes imparts. But a compromise with such delicacy appeared.

"Hah! mademoiselle, mademoiselle!" he cried, starting forward with outstretched hands as 'Lena went to lift the pot of violets, "the bargain is not complete. If I am to share your breakfast, you must permit me to fulfil my task, and place your emblem flower myself in your window. Suffer me to complete my work before I taste your tempting repast."

Leaning together out of the window they arranged the pot of violets.

"Get some water," said 'Lena, as she withdrew; "the earth is quite dry. There, in that caraffe—that will do. Now pour it on—now, get a saucer from the shelf, and put it under the pot to catch the water. Not that one, that is my best saucer—yes, that other is right. Now move the pot a little more in the center, it is not quite straight—it spoils the effect. There! all is right at present; and now breakfast is ready." For, while issuing her orders, the cunning little housekeeper had been engaging the old man's attention, in order that she might make sundry little additions to her simple repast, which she would not have thought of for herself. There was more fruit put on the table, and some small portion of vin ordinaire, and preparations made for a cup of café au lait.

"And now Monsieur Célestine," she said, turning with a smile full of life and sweetness to her guest, "is it possible you have so entirely forgotten me?"

"Forgotten you, mademoiselle!—one never forgets what is so charming. Forgotten you! Since when?"

"Since I was your little pupil—petite drole, you know, who drew figures instead of writing in her copy-book—who was so fond of making puppet shows—eh, monsieur?"

The old man gazed with extended eyes, and arms pressed straight down by his sides, then ejaculated a long and wondering,

"Par exemple! the little 'Lena, who used to fill her copy-book with scenes from the stage, and turn all my pupils into actors and actresses! Par exemple! but, mademoiselle, you are grown a young woman."

A hearty laugh was 'Lena's response.

"Yes, truly, Monsieur Célestine; and will, I fear, grow to be an old one. So now that monsieur has found out at last that it was his little pupil came to bid against him, and raise the price of the pot of violets, he will allow her, en revanche, to give him some breakfast."

The old man advanced a few steps, took 'Lena's hand by the tips of the fingers, bowed low, and pressed his lips upon it.

"Quite a scene, quite a scene!" she cried, with another laugh; and clapping her pretty hands with pleasure, "Allons! let us breakfast."

"And, mademoiselle," said old Célestine, as he commenced with good appetite the offered meal, "your good father, and pious mother, where are they? It is so long since I gave lessons in writing."

"Ah, monsieur, let us not speak of what gives pain!" 'Lena said, hastily, and with a change of countenance which showed that warm feeling lay beneath a volatile manner. "My dear parents! they are no more in this world; it is more than four years since my father left me alone—I was just fifteen then—my good mother went to heaven first."

"An orphan? poor child! And what did you do then?"

"Monsieur Dupré the father, took me to live in his house. I lived there until about six months ago, when Monsieur Dupré the father died, and I could not live with Monsieur Dupré the son—at least, that is to say, not then."

"Poor orphan! poor orphan!" repeated the old man. "So you are alone?"

"Toute seule, toute seule," said 'Lena, smiling through the tears she wanted to dispel. "But then, you see I have so much to do—always at work; and when one works always, why, you know one amuses one's self very well."

"And what do you work at, mademoiselle?"

"Je suis enlumineuse," replied 'Lena, glancing at a side-table, where lay a mass of drawings, rough sketches, and colored figures decked in all rainbow tints. "I illustrate works of fancy," she added, putting back her head, and casting down her eyes with an air of mock pedantry.

"Mademoiselle!" the old man ejaculated, "you illustrate works! that is, you, by your pencil, embody in tangible forms the glorious imaginations which the author shadows forth in words; you transfer ideas into things; you materialize mind—in fact, you illustrate authors!"

Another laugh from 'Lena.

"Oh yes! I represent all the ideas of Blübe Beard while he holds his wife's hair in one hand and his cimeter in the other; and show all the glorious imaginations of Tom Thumb when he was riding on the butterfly's back, and transfer his ideas into form when he is swallowed by the cow with the thistle to which he was tied."

The little old man had rested his joined hands on the table; he was gazing across it full into the sparkling eyes of the pretty enlumineuse, as if lost in amaze, and unable to think whether her account of the bent of her genius were sober matter-of-fact or not.

"Mais enfin," he said at length, "you are connected with literature, mademoiselle?"

"Sans doute," replied 'Lena, assuming a countenance as grave, "since I have just illustrated the story of Mother Goose."

"Well, mademoiselle, and I also, I have never renounced my penchant for literature; I am no longer by profession a writing-master, I am an author only. I have been so for many years, even while I retained the former profession; but now, mademoiselle, now I follow only the glorious career of an author."

"Indeed!" was 'Lena's response—"Monsieur Célestine auteur!" and she made him a low bow of salutation across the table. "Ah! it is a charming title. Your name is then renowned, and I, here so retired from the world, I have never heard of it, not even when I carried home to the publishers my illuminations."

"Mademoiselle, such is the fate of genius," replied Célestine, rather mournfully. "Not that I mean to pretend, no—but after death, ah!" exclaimed the old man, clapping his hands, and throwing up his eyes in an ecstasy of real devotion—"ah! we may say, in more senses than one, that after death comes glory!"

"Then, in fact, you have published?" said 'Lena.

"Mademoiselle, I have wished to publish."

"Oh!"

"It is true: Yes, I have wished to publish; but something—I know not what—we should not be rash: the ancients recommended deliberation; and, besides, the taste of our age is trivial. Yes, it must be confessed it is trivial; it has opened a career for you, mademoiselle—that is natural; but to me, you see—to me, it is not suited: one must wait. I wish to have all my manuscripts ready for the press; but I do not, in fact, expect to see them published during my life; but after my death—"

"Ah! that is noble!" said little 'Lena, in a state of exaltation. "You would wish the book-sellers, or, in short, any one in the world, to benefit by your labors, if you yourself never can do so; but, meantime, if you do not print, my dear Monsieur Célestine, what do you do?"

"I write."

"True; but if you do not teach writing, and if you do not sell your writings?"

"Ah! c'est vrai, c'est vrai!" said the poor little man, shrugging his shoulders with a rather woful look.

"Yes, demoiselle, there is another trial to which genius is subjected in this life; even the noblest, purest, most exalted minds, must stoop to think about meat, and drink, and fire and lodging, and all those poor paltry things, which are quite beneath their attention, but which it is really hard to do without."

"Very hard, indeed," said 'Lena, preparing a little cup of café au lait, and throwing Monsieur Célestine a knowing glance of her laughing eye.

"But then, what is to be done?" he continued; "What is life, for if talent is not employed, if the powers of the mind are to be devoted to gaining food and clothing for the body; or if the fingers only are to be employed in writing, when the thoughts of the soul are not to be transmitted to paper? Ah! dear young lady, it is one thing to trace on paper certain characters which other hands are to copy and then may destroy, and to trace those which you know will live after you, which exalt your own soul, and will exalt those of your fellow-creatures when yours is in eternity. Oh! it is truly different; and when we think of this we do not care to sell our writings, we only wish to know they will be in print."

"Well," said 'Lena, "I rejoice to have met you, for I, too, am ambitious of fame; I wish to commence a brilliant career. You will sympathise with me, you can advise me. My penchant is for the stage—I wish to be an actress."

The old man started; he opened his eyes, but their expression changed to one like that of fear.

"An actress! You pretty child! poor little orphan! you an actress! Heaven forbid!"

"What?" cried 'Lena, "would you discourage me? You say we must follow the bent of our genius, the force of our inspirations."

"True. Genius is a noble thing; and genius will sometimes take the direction of the stage," said the old man, thoughtfully; but then—

"Yes yes," 'Lena interrupted, "my genius has quite run on the stage long since. Why, see now, Monsieur Célestine, ever since I began to illuminate I longed to act; in fact, you know it was acting on paper instead of acting on the boards; and I am sure I should have performed Beauty and the Beast a hundred times over if I had any one to take the part of the Beast—that good Dupré, certainly, might have made a very good Beast. I drew Monsieur Beast walking away from the supper-table the other day, saying,—"Will you be my wife, Beauty?" and Beauty sitting at the table, says,—"No, Beast." And 'Lena's little nose actually looked some degrees more retroussée.

"Do you allude to Monsieur Dupré père; mademoiselle," demanded the old man.

"No; to Monsieur Dupré fils."

"And would Monsieur Dupré fils perform his part to the satisfaction of Beauty if he said,—Will you be my wife?" asked Célestine,

'Lena burst out a laughing.

"Oh? I assure, you so far as that part goes, he has rehearsed it many a time; but it wont do—poor Dupré is nothing in the world but a grocer. Bah? to sell plums and sugar—to be a grocer's wife? No, Beast, no?"

"But Beauty took the Beast after all mademoiselle."

"But the Beast changed into a prince."

"Not until she loved him. Ah, it was her love turned the Beast into the beautiful prince."

'Lena looked down and smiled.

"C'est égal, monsieur," she said, after a pause, "my beast must remain a beast for ever. You see my inclination is for the theater: I long for éclat. Only think, to appear in public, to be applauded by crowds, to wear such charming cos-tunes, to perform such various parts, to hear a young nobleman declare his adoration, to feel one's self a princess! Oh, yes! I must follow my inspiration. I have dreamed of this while illuminating Le petit Poucet! Look you here," and jumping from the table, she ran to fetch a little colored daub of a great butterfly with the wonderful Tom Thumb on its back.

"There! to soar about like le petit Poucet, that is my fancy, and not to be the wife of a grocer."

"But, mademoiselle, petit Poucet got a sad fall; you know the spider's breath put an end to his career. Ah, chère demoiselle; the world is often like the spider's breath to the ardent spirit, the aspiring mind, the feeling heart of youth!"

"So you would discourage me?" "Lena, with evident disappointment, answered. "I thought that you, who felt the fire of genius yourself, would rather promote it in another."

"Ah!" cried Célestine, "it is a noble thing to be called to the aid of Genius, to fan that sacred flame which is not destined to expire with the mortal breath; but then, in fact, the good grocer, mademoiselle, what would he say to your following what you consider to be your vocation?"

"Lena laughed, but she colored also, and looked a little saddened.

"Ma foi!" she cried, "he would say I was not fit to be a grocer's wife, that is all; but I can do without him if I can only be on the stage."

"Mademoiselle," said the old man, "it is an honor to be asked for advice, but it is sometimes difficult to give it, and it is sometimes more difficult to get it taken when given. I will, however, tell you my sentiments. After mature consideration, it appears to me that the married state is not friendly to the exercise of genius, seeing that varieties of cares, occupations, and relationships, tend to prevent that absorption of the mental faculties which is necessary to the production of great works, and the sacred fire of genius grows dim in the distractions of domestic life. Ideas may take root in the scenes of the world, but they must be matured in retirement and abstraction; therefore, mademoiselle, after many years' consideration, I formed an opinion that I am not now disposed to change, namely, that the single state of existence is that most propitious to the human genius. I cannot, therefore, advise you not to incline to the same, although it appears that Monsieur Dupré fils is of a different opinion, and although it may be possible that, during the lifetime of Monsieur Dupré père, you while residing under his roof, may by the influence of propinquity, have been the cause of strengthening that prejudice. I do not, then, combat your disinclination to the marriage state, nor to the particular one of a grocer's wife. You wish to devote your genius to higher pursuits. Good! but chère demoiselle, it is certain that your genius, which first shewed itself in illustrating fairy tales, took the direction of the stage from that simple accident. Now you have another accident, the accident merely of a meeting in the flower-market on the Quay and buying a pot of violets, been brought into contact with a kindred spirit, into communion with a mind that appreciates the sacred fire which glows within your own. Now, may not the path of literature invite you, and draw you from the more glittering, but less noble one, to which your fancy has inclined?"

"Lena kept looking steadfastly at the speaker, but was evidently mystified as to his meaning.

"If I were to read you daily a portion of my works, my child," continued the old man—"I have more than thirty manuscripts quite prepared for the press, but which I am sure will never be put to press during my life-time—if I were to read them to you, your genius would, I think, be led to those pursuits in which I have spent the greater part of my existence."

"Ah! good Monsieur Célestine, your genius is not at all like mine—the sacred fire in your breast burns quite in another manner," said Lena.

"Mine is only like a lucifer match, it will strike fire and be out in a moment; besides, I have no patience, I fear not even your thirty manuscripts would make me content to wait till after my death in order to please the world and to be admired."

Célestine heaved a sigh, and shook his head; he thought there was something wrong, something that required correction in this young mind, but he knew not exactly how to set about the correction; and, alas! it was a fearful risk to leave it to correct itself.

"At least, mademoiselle, you have studied the drama; you have imbibed the spirit of our dramatic poets; you are familiar with Racine, Voltaire—"

"That may be supposed," Lena interrupted; "but, monsieur, my taste is quite a natural one: and besides, it is solely for comedy, and for the comic opera. Vive l'opéra comique!—ah! viola ce que j'aime!"

"Here is what you love, Mademoiselle 'Lena!—but have you really said so?" cried a rather comic voice at the door; and there, peeping through it, appeared a curly black head, and a very sufficiently good-looking face.

"Lena uttered a pretty, affected little cry, and jumped up, and turning her back on the door, hid her laughing countenance in her open hands, and stood exactly as if she were performing a part on the boards.

"Monsieur Dupré fils," she said in a whisper intended for the old man; and, in what is called a play-house whisper, added for the amusement of the other, "Ah, he is here, he has heard me—I have betrayed myself!"

The young grocer entered quite into the spirit of the scene, pretending, and perhaps not finding it difficult to pretend, to take the declaration of her love as if addressed to himself; and 'Lena, though at last she protested that he overacted his part, and though she played her own with a vast deal of coquetry, gave the wondering little old man good reason to imagine that her "No, Beast!" might be by no means so emphatic as she had just pronounced it. He stared at the young actors, and began to doubt whether the pretty enlumineuse was altogether unsuited to a grocer's wife.

The old man and the young lover went away together: the former felt a beam of social love shine into his solitary heart; he thought he had found a kindred mind in that of Mademoiselle 'Lena. Many a time he had sought a literary acquaintance; but always met a rebuff, or on acquaintance, a disappointment: authors and their works are not always alike, more than parents and children. Now he had found this girl of genius and talent who would appreciate him, look up to him; it was the commencement of his social existence. He had something external to think of; he had found something to interest him beyond the reveries of his own drowsy yet still working brain.

"And this Mademoiselle 'Lena," he said, as he walked along with the young grocer, "she is a very promising genius."

"A promising genius! Pooh! we don't want genius! She is a very charming girl; a sweet, dear, good little creature."

"She may make a good actress."

"Actress! parbleu! are you mad, monsieur?—you mean a good wife! Yes, that she will. I love her, I have loved all my life; and despite her coquetry, I believe she loves me in her heart: but she never told me so. Ciel! what would I give to hear her say it! And I could make her happy too, keep her comfortable; she should have done with her fairy-tale pictures for ever. Yes, I feel it, I know it, I could make 'Lena happy!"

"And she?" said the old man, peering up his inquiring eyes into those of young Dupré, "and see, think you she could make you happy?"

"She? oh!" and the young grocer, stretching forth both his arms to their full extent, let them fall across his breast, pressing it with a fervid clasp for his sole response.

"Happiness!" muttered the old man to himself, "happiness! ought it to be sacrificed to fame, or to what we call the good of others? is not the last sometimes a name for the first? 'Lena can do no good on the stage—'Lena can make others happy without fame."

The acquaintance of the little old man and the young enlumineuse progressed rapidly. He was proud to reclaim his pupil, and believed her not to be his literary protegee; she, solitary and unprotected, was pleased with his harmless character and amused with his originality. He heard her recite, he wished to give her lessons in declamation after the manner of the ancients; but 'Lena was disappointed, he did not encourage her taste for the stage, and he mortified her vanity by doubting her talents for it. She had too much lightness of heart, perhaps too much levity of mind, to listen to his reasonings. She began to weary of them, and sometimes she was out when he had climbed up the one hundred and forty steps. On such occasions there was fastened outside her door a little piece of paper bearing the words, Elle est sortie.

But one day the tired visitor perceived that the writing was not 'Lena's, he was too good a critic of that art not to see that it was in a bolder and better hand—a masculine hand; and stopping to examine it he heard voices in her room—they were acting a play, he heard it quite plain.

The old man retired, not a little displeased with the pretty enlumineuse for excluding him. He was too much offended to go to the sixth story very soon again; but he could not retain his resentment; 'Lena had become almost necessary to him. He left the thirtieth revision of his thirty manuscripts, and went forth to see his interesting literary pupil. But the pretty enlumineuse was gone—actually gone; there was no Elle est sortie on the door, the words in great letters were, a Lower. Mademoiselle 'Lena had left her lodgings; no one could tell where she had gone. She was gone—roita tout. Célestine naturally sought her at the house of Dupré fils; but the young grocer looked as sad as himself, and echoed his words:

"What has become of Mademoiselle 'Lena?"

Weeks passed away, and that question remained unanswered. Célestine began to think of the lively little girl as of a sunbeam that broke on his wintry day and caused its absence to be more felt by its brief presence. As for Dupré fils he kept his thoughts to himself.

CONCLUSION NEXT WEEK.

OLD GORDON AND HIS LADDIES.—John Gordon who died near Turriff, Banffshire, some time ago, had attained the age of one hundred and thirty-two. All the travelers who chanced to call at the neighboring inn of Turriff were uniformly directed by the landlady, Mrs. Wallace, to the cottage of the patriarch, "where they wad see," she used to say, "the eldest man i' Banffshire—ay or in a' the world." Among the visitors one day, about the close of harvest, was a young Englishman, who, coming up to the door of the cottage, accosted a venerable looking man employed in knitting hose, with: "So my old friend, can you see to knit at your advanced period of life? One hundred and thirty-two is truly a rare age." "Deil's i' the man! it'll be my grandfather ye're seeking—I'm only seventy-three—ye'll find him round the corner o' the hous." On turning the corner, the stranger encountered a debilitated old man, whose whitened locks bore testimony to his having long passed the meridian of life, and whom the stranger at once concluded to be John Gordon himself. "You seem wonderfully fresh, my good sir, for so old a man! I doubt not you have experienced many vicissitudes in the course of your very long life." "What's your wull, sir?" inquired the person addressed, whose sense of hearing was somewhat impaired. The observation was repeated. "O, ye'll be wanting my father, I reckon—he's i' the yard there!" The stranger now entered the garden, where he at last found the venerable old man busily employed in digging potatoes, and humming the battle of Harlaw. "I have had some difficulty in finding you, friend, as I successively encountered your grandson and son, both of whom I mistook for you; indeed they seem as old as yourself. Your labor is rather hard for one of your advanced age." "It is," replied John; "but I'm thankful that I'm able for't, as the laddies, pur things, are no very stout now!"—[Glasgow Railway Journal.

THE MOTHER.

When storms arise on life's uncertain sea,
And fortune's smiles and youthful joys are past;
When hope is shipwrecked and when lovers flee;
What friend remains still faithful to the last?
Alone a mother!

For fame a warrior sought the gory field—
His wish was met—the laurel bound his brow;
The crowd said, "Hail!" but soon his arms and shield
Bedecked the hero's grave: who weeps him now?
Alone his mother!

A maiden left her humble cottage-door,
To follow Thalia's giddy laughing train;
But age came on, and when she pleased no more,
One friend alone said, "Welcome back again!"
It was her mother!

When first our fathers trod fair Eden's earth,
They ne'er had known the joy of parent's kiss;
How wise that law, for had they dreamt its worth,
E'en Paradise had not been perfect bliss
Without a mother!

Our life begins upon a mother's breast;
Her anxious care its every sweet distills;
By her we're nurtured, fondled, cherished, blest;
And man forgets of life the countless ills
Beside his mother!

RISE FROM A HUMBLE CONDITION.

IN a speech delivered by the Hon. and the Rev. the Dean of Ripon at a late soiree of the Mechanic's Institution, Leeds, a few passages occur worthy of being widely circulated:

"I like to think with pleasure, and satisfaction, and wonder, of the extraordinary advancements, which, in the providence of God, particular individuals have made, who have just been able to apply the operation of the minds according as they were able to exercise them, and thereby to place themselves in extraordinary position both in relation to their own prosperity and to the advantage of the country. It may be a very familiar subject, but it is one which I do like to think of, and I will just allude to it. There was a young man who was the youngest of thirteen children, and his father was a very poor man; and the best that his father could do for him was to apprentice him to a barber. In that humble and praiseworthy class of public life, that respectable individual demeaned himself honorably, as long as he chose to continue in it. He then bestowed his care, and attention, and enterprise upon preparing the beautiful hair of our heads—improving it to that degree that it should be fit to make a wig of. In that he excelled also. Then, gentlemen, he betook himself to the improvement of a weed which I have seen—and which is little more than like a weed—I mean the cotton plant of Carolina. He betook himself to improve the manufacture of cloth made out of that weed. He gained great success, adding merely to the acquirements that he possessed—which you may suppose were very slender—the knowledge which he could pick up by associating with his fellow-men: he gained that success which enabled him to decide the wars of the linen and the cotton, so that a vestment should be made all of cotton. That barber's apprentice, gentlemen, that honorable improver of our hair for the purpose of a wig, was Sir Richard Arkwright, afterwards high sheriff of his county, and who left his family half a million of money. Well, gentlemen, I only put that as one instance of a simple, plain man, honestly following the call of Providence, using the mind according as God's providence gave him the opportunity of drawing forth its resources—throwing himself into the opening which was prepared for him, and thus gaining a prosperity exceeded by no man in this country; and I am sure that language is not equal to say the advantage which our nation has received from his invention, enabling him thus to show the benefit of the exercise of the mind, and talent, and energy, and reflection, and desire for improvement in the humblest station of life. I will mention another case, because I do dwell upon it, I confess, with exceeding interest, from my personal acquaintance with the individual Gentlemen, it is now more than forty years since, in my travels in America, I came to New York, and I called upon the famous General Moreau, with whom I had the pleasure of being acquainted. He said to me, "Well, here's a strange thing! here's a ship to go by hot water! and to-morrow the trial is to be made, and I am invited to be of the party, and my friends. Will you go with me?" I accompanied General Moreau in the first steam-vessel that ever sailed upon the Hudson, in America, under the auspices of Mr. Fulton, the inventor—a man of a similar cast to Arkwright, perhaps with some greater advantages from his early education, but of a similar tone and cast of mind; unsatisfied with what he had done, and what he could do, and always thinking that he could do something better, and thankful for every information he received, and every opportunity he could gain in making progress in some improvement; so that from a painter in portraits, from a designer in a variety of ways, at last he arrived at the extraordinary eminence and success of making the first practical efficient steam-vessel which could navigate so severe a river as the river Hudson. Now, gentlemen, I remember with pleasure standing upon the deck, with Robert Fulton, and dwelling with him on the subject. I remember asking him, "Do you think it will ever be of any good?" I recollect his countenance lighting up almost with anger at the idea that any invention of his could fail of being useful. I remember very well, just as we approached the mouth of the Hudson, just as it abuts on the Atlantic Sea, saying—"What will become of us if we drift out to sea? How is it possible that a vessel of this sort can stand the waves of the ocean?" Well, now, gentlemen, when I compare and bring together that day, with the fact of the steamers now crossing the Atlantic in eleven or twelve days, with a regularity and precision which is almost marvelous—why, how is it possible not to see and to be persuaded that there is not a man that lives, and comes within the arena of popular and scientific institutions like this, who has not opportunity given him of being distinguished by giving his talents, industry, and energy to whatever subject, in the course of his investigations and inquiries the finger of Providence may point out to him? It is impossible to say, unless we believe that we have arrived at the acme and fulfilment of everything for the good of man—it is impossible not to think that we may be conferring some great blessing upon our own country—that we may, through the means of some individual in the very humblest class, whose mind we may touch, by just giving him a perception and an intuition of some combination connected with science and art—we may render him an instrument of great good to his country and the world, and a source of great happiness and pride to himself."

THE SABBATH.—The Sabbath is God's special present to the working-man, and one of its chief objects is to prolong his life, and preserve efficient his working tone. In the vital system it acts like a compensation-pond; it replenishes the spirits, the elasticity and vigor, which the last six days have drained away, and supplies the force which is too full the six days succeeding; and in the economy of existence, it answers the same purpose, as in the economy of income, is answered by a savings' bank. The frugal man who puts aside a pound to-day, and another pound next month, and who in a quiet way is always putting past his stated pound from time to time, when he grows old and frail, gets not only the same pounds back again, but a good many pounds besides. And the conscientious man, who husbands one day of existence every week—who, instead of allowing the Sabbath to be trampled and torn in the hurry and scramble of life, treasures it devoutly up—the Lord of the Sabbath keeps it for him, and in length of days and a hale old age gives it back with interest. The savings' bank of human existence is the weekly Sabbath.—[North British Review.]

ANCIENT IMPLEMENTS OF POPULAR SPORT.

AMONG the suburban outskirts of London city, long since swallowed up in the ceaseless progress that converts green fields into brick fields, and brick fields with the old rural footpaths they have displaced, into paved streets and squares, some memento of former associations still survives, as a memorial of the country that skirted in olden times the city's northern walls.

Clerkenwell Green still sounds as a strange memento of the days gone by, when its gentle pastures and green slopes lay along the River of Wells—as the Fleet Ditch was then termed—while beyond, extended in grassy fields, or still greener morasses, Spitalfields, Moorfields, and Finsbury. Ben Jonson tells us of "the archers of Finsbury, and the citizens that came a-ducking to Islington Ponds;" and many a sly hit by the wits of James' Court at the Cockney rivalry of Robin Hood's feats, shows that these civic heroes were often sorely galled by lighter sharpshooters than the archers of Finsbury Fields.

Even so early as 1590, Stowe complains of the ancient daily exercises in the long-bow by citizens of the city, now almost clearly left off and forsaken; and subsequent enactments of James First proved altogether unavailing in preventing the total abandonment of the yard-long shaft, which had proved the safety and honor of England on many a hard fought field. Just beyond the old site of Moorgate, the Artillery Grounds still preserve a small area rescued from these old archery grounds, for civic feats of mimic war; but a recent chance discovery in the neighborhood carries us back to still older sports and pastimes of the "London prentices" in these extra-mural fields.

In the collection of the Society of Antiquaries at Somerset House, as well as in various private London museums, specimens of ancient bone-skates may be seen, such as in early times, and even, it is believed, to a comparatively recent period, was used by the citizens of London in their favorite winter pastime on the ice. The Serpentine River of former days was an undrained marsh, lying outside London wall, at the long slope by which the endless tide of Paddington and Highgate omnibuses now wend their way to the Angel at Islington. The winter rains accumulated here into a broad and shallow pond, which required no long continuance of frost to convert it into a broad and ample sheet of ice. Toward this the pleasure-seeking crowd of citizens might then be seen jostling one another as they pushed their way through the old Moorgate archway, each carrying in his hands a pair of homely skates, fashioned in most cases of the leg-bone of a horse, with a hole drilled from side to side at the one end, and into the end at the other—the latter probably to receive a peg, by which more effectually to secure the cords that fastened it to the foot. The simple skates, dropped from time to time, and buried in the mud and soil, at first occasioned some little perplexity to the antiquaries of London, when they revisited the light. It is not unlikely, indeed, that they have often enough been found and tossed aside before, as mere musty bones, during the constant excavations in the city and its neighborhood. But now that archaeology has become a science with numerous students and devotees, the barest bone is often found worth picking; and since attention was first directed to the subject, about eight years ago, many such bone skates have been dug up in various districts around London, and particularly in the immediate neighborhood of the city.

The examples which we have seen of these rude specimens, illustrative of the antiquity and progressive improvement of one of the most popular and healthful recreations of our northern writers, were dug up in the year 1839, in Moorfields, near Finsbury Circus, London. Though Moorfields—to use a familiar Cockney pun—are no more fields, the whole area having long since been built over, and laid out in streets and squares, beyond which miles of brick tenements and stone paving extend between it and the open fields—the ground still exhibits, in the course of any excavations by which it is opened up, distinct evidences of its former character as a bog or marsh; and it will presently appear to what uses it was put so long as it retained this character.

Strutt, in his "Sports and Pastimes," while confessing his inability to trace the introduction of skating, into this country, refers to evidence of its existence in the thirteenth century; and adds an opinion, which few will be inclined to dispute, that probably the invention proceeded rather from necessity than the desire of amusement. The rudeness of these bone skates is such as seems to justify the antiquary in assigning to them a very early date; and a curious page which occurs in Fitz-Stephen's description of London, enables us to establish their identity with those used in that writer's own time—that is in the reign of Henry Second—from 1151 to 1189. Fitz-Stephen, in describing the sports of the citizens of London, says: "When that great moor, which washeth Moorfields at the north wall of the city, is frozen over, great companies of young men go to sport upon the ice," &c. After enumerating the various modes of sliding, he adds: "Some are better practiced to the ice, and bind to their shoes bones—as the leg-bones of beasts—and hold stakes in their hands, headed with sharp iron, which sometimes they strike against the ice; and those men go on with speed, as doth a bird in the air, or darts from some warlike engine."

It is rare, indeed, that the antiquary discovers so distinct and unmistakeable a reference, not only to the character and uses of a chance-found relic, but to the exact locality in which it has lain unheeded for nearly seven centuries.

In Bishop Percy's "Five Pieces of Runic Poetry," translated from the Icelandic language, more than one reference occurs to skating, as one among the most essential qualifications of a northern warrior. In "Harold's Complaint" the hero thus enumerates his slighted worth: "I know how to perform six exercises. I fight with courage, I keep a firm seat on horseback, I am skilled in swimming, I glide along the ice on skates, I excel in darting the lance, I am dexterous at the oar, and yet a Russian maid disdains me!"

In M. Mallet's "Introduction à l'Histoire de Danemarck," a quotation is made from the 24th table of the "Edda," in which the following allusion to skating occurs: "Then the king asked what that young man could do who accompanied Thor. Thialfe answered, that in running upon skates he would dispute the prize with any of the countries. The king owned that the talent spoke of was a very fine one," &c.

But a still more definite description of the ancient skate than that referred to, occurs in Olaus Magnus's "History of the Nations of the West." He speaks of it as being made of iron, or of the shank bone of a deer or sheep, about a foot long, filed down on one side, and greased with hog's lard to repel the wet.

Mr. C. Roach Smith, on showing examples of these bone skates to the eminent northern antiquary, Herr Warsaac, of Copenhagen, was informed by him that similar examples had been found in Holland, in Scandinavia, and particularly in the southern part of Sweden. He referred him also to a very curious passage in one of the old Scandinavian mythological songs, in which it is said that Oller or Uller, god of the winter, runs on bones of animals over the ice.

It cannot surprise us to find such early and varied evidences of the practice of skating on the ice among the northern races of Europe, nor of their use of a skate so readily supplied as one of the least-valued spoils of the chase. It seems indeed surprising that a skate so very simple and easily accessible should not still remain in use among our juvenile population, with whom the more refined and complicated modern instruments of steel is sometimes a matter not readily obtained.

No allusion occurs, that we are aware of, among early Scottish writers, to a similar practice among the natives of our northern region, though it cannot be doubted that there also skating was one of the winter pastimes of our ancestry, from a very early period. Gavin Douglas, in the prologue to the seventh book of the "Æneid," gives a most vigorous and picturesque description of the northern winter, in which he depicts both the aspect of nature and the influence of the season on man and beast; but no allusion occurs to such popular pastimes as those to which the earlier Scandinavian and Icelandic poets refer.

Most Scottish readers are familiar with Sir David Lindsay's lively satire on the obsequious courtiers of James Five, which occurs in the "Complaynt":

"Iik man efter thair qualitie,
Thay did solist his majestie,
Sum gart him ravell at the rakket,
Sum harlit him to the hurly-hakket," &c.

The hurly-hakket, more correctly hyrly-hawkie, was a boy's game, practiced in James' time, and later, on the Heading Hill, or ancient place of execution near Stirling Castle. Seated on the inverted bone of a cow's head, the youth descended this slope with thundering speed, to the wonder of the quiet people, and his own no small delectation. On the Calton Hill, near Edinburgh, the game was practiced at the end of the last century with a horse's head; but the skull of the ruminant seems to have been the more normal vehicle, as the name of hawkie is simply the familiar appellation for a cow in Scotland.

It may readily be believed that as the bones of animals were among the early spoils of the chase, they would be adapted in a rude age to many uses for which the devices of modern ingenuity and civilization have found other substitutes. Among the rude savages of the South Sea Islands, as well as among the Kamschatkians and Esquimaux, the bones and horns of many animals are turned to account in the construction of their weapons and implements; and we frequently find among the contents of early British tumuli, evidence that our own barbarian ancestry applied them to the same useful purposes.

It was not, however, for objects essentially useful only, but also for the instruments used in games of chance and skill, that the bones of animals were found applicable by our rude forefathers. In Herr Warsaac's comparison of the "Antiquities of Ireland and Denmark," in the third volume of the proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy, he refers to ancient draftsman of bone, of a hemispherical shape, and with a hole in the flat bottom, which frequently occurs in considerable quantities in Norwegian tumuli, and are also occasionally found in Ireland. They are believed to have formed the implements of gaming among the roving Norsemen, their form being designed to admit of their use on ship-board, so that they might not be liable to misplacement by the rolling of the vessel.

Many allusions of our early dramatists also suffice to show that such games as nine-pins, loggats, skittles, and the like, were originally played with bones. The name of skittles is evidently derived, like the older term kayles, or kayle-pins, from the French quille, a pin. And to the latter game—of which Strutt gives an illustration, somewhat oddly derived from a misapprehension of the fourteenth century—the more modern nine-pins are obviously traceable. Several of these games are enumerated in early English statutes against gaming, particularly in more than one of Henry the Eighth. And a game called closh, which appears to have been nearly identical with nine-pins, is specified in a similar statute so early as the reign of Edward the Fourth.

"Loggats," says Sir Thomas Hanmer, one of the early editors of Shakspeare, "is the ancient name of a play or game, which is one of the unlawful games enumerated in the 33d statute of Henry the Eighth; it is the same which is now called kittle-pins, in which the boys often make use of bones instead of wooden pins, throwing at them another bone, instead of bowling."

In a rare old play of Queen Elizabeth's reign, entitled "The longer thou livest the more fool thou art," a dunce is introduced, who boasts of his skill

"At skates, and the playing with a sheep's joyns."

So, too, in the well-known scene with the gravedigger, in Hamlet:

"That skull had a tongue in it, and could sing once. Here's fine revolution, an' we had the trick to see it. Did these bones cost no more the breeding than to play at loggats with them? Mine ache to think on't!"

These allusions place beyond doubt the use of bones in these popular games of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; and so, too, we find a later dramatic writer of Charles Second's reign, in a play called "The Merry Milkmaid of Islington," making one of his characters address another thus:

"I'll cleave you from the skull to the twist, and make nine-skittles of your bones!"

These latter illustrations may perhaps be considered as having a very slight connection with the subject of ancient bone-skates. They suffice, however, to show to how many uses, which have since been lost sight of, the waste articles of the chase, and of the kitchen, were applied in early, and even in comparatively recent times.—[Chamber's Edinburgh Journal.]

Incidents of Cruelty.

PAPAL PALACE AT AVIGNON.—I started one fine morning, in company with a friend, to visit the palace of the popes. The site is upon a commanding platform of rock overlooking the rest of the town. In the spirit of the age of its erection the heavy pile that frowns upon you as you approach seem to combine in one group the purposes of a palace, a fortress, a church, and a prison. Running out as from a wing of its fortifications are still the crumbling arches of a private bridge across the river, and a secret passage is said formerly to have led to the castle on the opposite shore. The gloomy old palace, with its immense thick walls, is now occupied as a barrack, and the soldiers were burnishing their arms, and amusing themselves in its halls, as if they cared little who had been its former occupants. Priests, and a solitary worshiper or two, were chanting their services in the dimly-lighted cathedral. The exterior rudeness of the architecture of the whole seemed indicative of the decline of the arts at that period, and beyond its rich associations there was little of interest.

Presently we were shown a lofty square tower, with black stains plainly visible upon its inner surface. In the frenzy of the Revolution, some sixty persons, men, women, and priests, dying and dead, were hurled from the top of this tower, and buried in quicklime, and the splash of their blood against the walls had produced the ineffaceable stains upon which we had gazed. Yet this was the work of political fanatics, goaded on by the oppression of centuries—of men who openly professed themselves enemies to Christianity. But we were soon among the memorials of a cruelty diabolical in its deliberateness, and perpetrated in the name of religion herself. We were in the prisons of the Inquisition. There were the narrow, dark, stone cells, where the prisoners were first left for forty-eight hours, to shake their fortitude; there was the place of the sittings of the terrible tribunal; and there were the contrivances to hear the agonized sufferer's whispers as evidence against him. Could the cold stones which we touched have related all they had witnessed of the deeds of men more obdurate than they—could they have given a sum total of the tears, the prayers, the groans, and the blood that had there been expended, it would, doubtless, have been an appalling revelation. But without this they were sad indications enough. Strange feelings came over me as I stood in the room of torture. It was constructed so as to stifle the sound of the victim's cries. There was still the place of the lacerating stake over which he was suspended, and the furnace in the wall to heat the torturing-irons. Man had dared to prescribe the relation which should exist between his brother and his God, and consummated the wrong by shedding his blood; and all this had been done in the name of Him who taught his disciples to love even their enemies, and who sojourned on earth but to heal and to bless! Surely the followers even of the faith thus abused must rejoice that these are but things of the past, and that we live in a happier day.—[Dr. Corson's Loiterings in Europe.]

Choice Miscellany.

THE SPIRIT OF PEACE.

WHERE hath the Spirit of Peace his home?
Loves he o'er earth or ocean to roam?

He dwells in the deep sequestered glade,
Where the lover's step hath a footpath made;
He lurks in the bowers where birds have sung.
To their fluttering mates when the day was young;
By the river's pool 'neath the waterfall,
Where the rock-sprung trees have formed a pall,
Solemn and dark, o'er the depth below,
As best befits its majestic flow;
Where the hidden wild flowers scent the air—
Be sure the Spirit of Peace is there.

By the summer's sea he loves to dwell,
And to note its crisped billows swell;
Or to list to the music ocean makes
When his wave the cavern's echoes wakes;
Or to mark each ship go proudly by,
Like a sea king in his panoply;
Or to reckon the snowy skiffs that swim,
Like ocean birds far off and dim,
Where the calm sea blends with the calmer air—
The Spirit of Peace be sure is there.

In the Highland vale, where the lake lies low,
Encircled by hills of lasting snow;
Where the streams that gladden the valley creep,
Murmuring through channels dark and deep;
Where the red deer stares from the forest forth,
Ere he bounds away to the trackless north;
Where primeval life, with eager gaze,
Looks out on the stranger who treads its ways;
Where the fond enthusiast loves to roam—
There, there hath the Spirit of Peace his home.

In the woods at eve, when the birds are still,
And naught is heard but the tiny rill,
Which noon and night makes music sweet,
As it leaps its brother rill to meet;
Where naught is seen by the straining eye,
But the trees like specters standing by—
I have met with the woodman's lowly cot
Where I thought that the home of man was not;
I have heard his evening praise and prayer,
And I felt that the Spirit of Peace was there.

When the country lies in Sabbath rest,
And the fields are in golden beauty drest;
When the church-bell's notes o'er the valley come,
Like the voice of a father inviting home;
When the aged man is thoughtful seen,
Where the graves of his early friends lie green,
Round the village church in many a heap,
Each with its tenant in slumber deep—
To that humble church in hope repair,
And the Spirit of Peace shall meet you there.

ANCIENT TYRE.

We parted from Kanta an hour before day-break, and ascended several barren and rocky hills, stretching into the sea. From the summit of the last and most elevated of these ascents, Tyre is beheld, appearing at the extremity of a vast and barren elevation. Between the sea and the heights of Lebanon, which here rapidly diminish, extends a naked barren plain of about twenty miles in length, and four or five in breadth, of a yellow tint, covered only with thorny shrubs, browsed by the camels of the caravan on their passage. Tyre is built on a peninsula stretching into the sea, and connected with the continent by a narrow neck of land covered with a golden sand, wafted by the wind from Egypt. This city, at present called Sour, by the Arabs, is situated at the farthest extremity of the above-mentioned peninsula, and seems to rise out of the waves. At a distance, you would still imagine it to be a new, beautiful, white and animated city; but it is nothing more than a fine shadow, which vanishes on approaching it. A few hundreds falling houses in which the Arabs fold large flocks of sheep, and black goats, with hanging ears, which defiled before us on the plain, are all that remain of Tyre! She has no longer a port on the sea, no longer roads upon land; the prophecies respecting her have been long since accomplished.

We traveled on in silence, occupied by the thoughts of this desolation, and of the dust of an empire which we trod under our feet. Passing along the paths between the ruins and the gray and naked hills of Lebanon, which here descend to the plain, we arrived at the city, now flanked by a sandbank, which seems its only existing rampart, but which will doubtless ere long, bury the town under its mass. I thought of the prophecies, and endeavored to bring to my recollection some of those eloquent warnings with which the Divine Spirit inspired Ezekiel. I could not recall the words, but I discovered the meaning in the deplorable waste before my eyes.

I had now before me the "black" Lebanon; but I said to myself, my imagination has deceived me; I see neither the eagles nor the vultures which, according to the prophecies, were to descend unceasingly from the mountains to despoil even the remains of the city, accursed of God, and the enemy of his people. At the moment I made these reflections, something huge, grotesque, and motionless, appeared at our left on the summit of a pointed rock, which advanced into the plain not far distant, close to the route of the caravans; it looked to me like five statues of black stone, placed on the rock as on a pedestal; but from certain motions, almost imperceptible, of these colossal figures, we fancied, on approaching nearer, that they were five Bedouin Arabs clothed in their sacks of black goat's hair, who were looking at us as we passed.

When, however, we came at a distance of fifty paces from the rock, we saw one of the five figures display an immense pair of wings, which flapped with a noise resembling that of a sail shaking in the breeze, and it now became clear that the figures were those of five eagles, of the largest kind I have ever seen in the Alps or menageries of our cities. They did not take flight, but remained unmoved at our approach. Seated like kings of the desert, they seemed to regard Tyre as their proper prey. I could not cease from contemplating this prophecy in action—this wonderful fulfilment of the Divine menaces, of which chance had rendered us witnesses. Never had anything more supernatural struck my eyes or riveted my mind; and it required an effort of reason, not to see behind these five gigantic eagles, the great and terrible figure of the poet of vengeance—of Ezekiel—rising above them, and pointing out to them, with eye and hand, the city which God had given to them for a prey.

I now found that my poetical imagination had exhibited to me the eagles of Tyre less faithfully, less impressively, less supernaturally than the fact warranted.

We arrived at noon, after a march of seven hours, in the midst of the plain of Tyre, at a place called the wells of Solomon. All travelers have described these wells; they consist of three reservoirs of limpid, running water, which issue, as it were, by enchantment, from a low, dry, and barren soil, at the distance of two miles from Tyre. Each of these reservoirs, raised artificially about twenty feet above the level of the plain, is full to the brim, and is indeed continually running over. The excess of the fluid is employed to turn the wheels of mills, and the water is conveyed to Tyre by aqueducts, half ancient, half modern, which have a beautiful effect, seen on the horizon. It is said that Solomon ordered these wells to be made, to recompense Tyre and its King Hiram for the services he had received from that monarch's navy and its artists, during the building of the Temple.

These immense wells are each from seventy to eighty feet in circumference; their depth is unknown, and indeed is said to be bottomless. No one has ever been able to learn by what mysterious channels the waters from the mountains arrive, and there is at least every reason to believe that they are immense Artesian wells, constructed thousands of years before their discovery by the moderns.—[Lamartine's Pilgrimage.

A GENTLEMAN.—There have been various definitions of "a gentleman," but the prettiest and most poetic is that given by a fair girl in New York the other day. "A gentleman," said she, "is a human being, combining a woman's tenderness with a man's courage." But perhaps this is a still truer definition of a poet.

CAVERN AT TREBICH.

An interesting discovery has recently been made in the neighborhood of Trieste, which promises great benefits for that city, where a supply of pure running water has long been a desideratum. The district is composed geologically of sandstone and slate, and what is called karst, or white limestone. The latter is very porous, and full of holes of all dimensions, and is in some places a thousand feet thick. The running streams which traverse the sandstone are thus swallowed up as soon as they reach the limestone district near the coast. Various circumstances led to the conclusion that the holes widened below into large caverns which might contain water, and several of them were examined but without success. "At length," to quote from the Journal of the Geological Society, "an opening of no great width, but sinking perpendicularly into the ground, was discovered at Trebich, about a league northeast from Trieste, which was followed out with great perseverance. The fissure sometimes expanded into a wide cavern, sometimes contracted to a rent of scarce a finger's breadth, and requiring great labor in blowing up the rocks, to enable the workmen to proceed; but it never closed up entirely, and some opening, however small, always remained, keeping up the connection. Sometimes it separated into branches; but by always adhering to the one from which the current of air issued, a very considerable depth was soon attained without any great deviation from the direct course. Once, in a wide part of the opening, all trace of its continuation was lost, and many attempts to recover it, by blowing up the rock, had been made in vain, when the workman, Antony Arich, an intelligent miner from Carinthia, heard during the night a loud roaring and howling, and concluded that the water in the interior, rising suddenly in consequence of heavy rain, was forcing the air through some narrow opening, and thus discovered near the roof of the cave a small fissure, which again led in the right direction. At length, after eleven months' hard labor, Arich reached a very large and extensive grotto, 270 feet high, at the bottom of which, 1022 feet below the surface of the earth, and 62 feet above the sea-level, a considerable stream of running water was found. This lowest opening is still in the bituminous limestone of the karst, but contains, on a stair-like elevation, a considerable deposit of sand, produced by the destruction of the sandstone and slate, over which the river has run its course above ground. The water enters the grotto through a low vault; and flowing among the numerous large blocks which have fallen from the roof, expands into a long narrow lake, on which a small raft was formed to explore its further course, and is at length lost under a vault, which, descending below the surface of the water, put a stop to the investigation. During heavy rain, the water has been already seen to rise 240 feet; but to judge from an old float of a mill-wheel found in a higher part of the hole, it must sometimes attain a height of 300 feet above its usual level."

THE TOMB OF CHRIST.—Mr. James Fergusson, F. R. A. S., in an Essay on the Ancient Topography of Jerusalem, has shown that the tomb now pointed out as that of our Lord cannot be such, but was no doubt constructed in the Middle Ages, for the purpose of imposing on the credulity of the Pilgrims. The real tomb of our Lord, he states, was not, if we refer to the records of the Evangelists, or to the writings of Eusebius, artificially constructed, but was hewn out of the solid rock. That exhibited as the sepulcher is composed of masonry, regularly laid in mortar, and raised above the ground, while the disciples are described as looking down in it. Mr. Fergusson further maintains, that the building now called the Mosque of Omar, must be the original Byzantine Church of the Holy Sepulcher, with some Saracenic additions, that was erected by Constantine; and he shows that the cave, which occupies the spot immediately under the Dome, answers precisely to every description given of the true sepulcher.

GAZETTE AND RULE.

Friendship, Love and Truth.

AUG. C. L. ARNOLD, EDITOR.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 12, 1849.

CHARLES H. HARRISON, who has been acting as our Agent, having made no returns to us, and being, as we are informed, unworthy of such trust, we deem it necessary to caution all against paying him any subscriptions on account of the Gazette and Golden Rule. His former character having been good, we forbear further remarks at this time.

DIXTERS.—We have received a small supply of this valuable work, and are now ready to fill orders, which must invariably be accompanied by a remittance. Price 37½ cts. each.

REMITTANCES.—We hope our friends will bear in mind that the approaching celebration will afford great facilities for the settlement of accounts, and that none will fail to remember us, in the form of a remittance, by any brother who may visit New-York.

A WORD FOR OUR FAIR READERS.—WOMAN'S WRONGS.

It is certainly singular that the profession and practice of the stronger sex with regard to woman, should be so grossly inconsistent. Men, every where and always, have professed to love woman—to revere her as a kind of divinity, as indeed she is, and to recognize her claims to love, respect and support. All literature celebrates her perfections, her beauty and her superiority. The Beatrices, the Lauras, and others, have inspired the noblest and divinest poems ever produced by human genius. Not a romance is written, not a word of poetry is uttered, not a speech is delivered, but proclaims in some sort, the worship of woman.

This all proves that woman does shed a divine radiance over all of life. The tones of her voice echo through man's heart more sweetly than the softest organ strain. The sound of her footsteps is more musical than the Orphic lyre, and her words of love work more wondrous miracles. Without the light of her eyes, the world would be dark and wretched. Her redeeming and elevating influence has been felt by society since the beginning! and without that influence society would have been an infinite desolation! The refined and delicate, the sweet and agreeable socialities, the elegant proprieties that throw such a charm over all society, would have been entirely unknown.

Such is woman! Such is she recognized, in literature, history and art! Such, in a word, do all acknowledge her to be.

Is it not strange, then, that society, which owes her so much, which proclaims her its idol, should, by its customs, and by the operation of its laws, subject her to so many inconveniences, and inflict upon her so many wrongs? Look through this great city, and see the thousands and tens of thousands of heart-broken and hard-working females, crushed to the very earth—the victims of terrible wrong! But to say nothing of that class, so numerous in all great cities, who gain a scanty subsistence by "sewing," we see how unequally the law bears upon man and woman in another condition.

Here is an energetic and industrious woman, with several children to support, for whom and herself she can provide with great ease. But she is cursed with a miserable husband, who cares for nothing but his vicious companions, and their drunken revels. He provides nothing for his family—spends all that his wife can earn, and begs her and her children. And the law gives him the power to do this! He is her master—she is his slave! Accursed law! There are thousands of families in this city cast into the deepest abyss of misery, which, were it not for the oppressive exactions of drunken and spendthrift husbands, would live respectably and happy. Hundreds and thousands of these oppressed women take boarders, and with the aid of friends, get along for a time prosperously, but soon the miserable husband, armed with the authority of the law, manages to rob them of all their hard earnings.

We are exceedingly happy to see that some States have enacted laws which do better justice to woman. In New Hampshire, for example, she is protected from the exactions of a dissolute husband, and has guaranteed to her all the rights of a human being. We sincerely hope the time will come, when woman will everywhere find, in the law, a sure protection—when all the wrongs and inconveniences to which she is subjected will disappear, and when there will be some consistency between our professions of respect and love, and our real practice toward her.

We might, were we disposed, enumerate and particularize many cases where the existing laws and customs of society weigh like a blighting curse upon the whole female sex. But it is not necessary. Every one recognizes the worth of woman, and is ready to do her homage; and it is not unreasonable to hope, that something of this respect will at length descend into our laws, and do justice to the sex. Every sentiment of honor, and justice, and love, ay, and of gratitude, demand it.

A NIGHT IN THE COUNTRY.—PUTNAM LODGE.

On Tuesday evening of last week we visited West Farms, a quiet and rural little village, which lies one mile from the Harlem rail-road, and about twelve miles from this city. We made this visit by the invitation of Putnam Lodge, which is located at this place, and which, on this occasion, had in their elegant and beautiful Lodge Room, public exercises—lecture, music, etc. The audience was very respectable and intelligent, and listened to the address with much attention. The ladies—always excellent Odd-Fellows—appeared to be very much interested. Among them we noticed a large number of noble and intelligent countenances. We observed also, in the hall, Mrs. W—, of this city, a lady of rare beauty and intelligence, with a soul full of music, poetry and sentiment.

The Odd-Fellows of West Farms deserve much praise. There is not a better Lodge in the country—not one which is in a more healthy condition, or which is better instructed in the business of Odd-Fellowship. We wish it prosperity and health.

After the lecture, we rode over to Fordham, that we might take the early train down in the morning. And a charming ride we had. The clouds, which had partially obscured the sky in the early part of the evening, broke away—the clear stars came out, and greeted us with their brilliancy, and the moon, stepping forth from her temple of amber clouds, marched in queenly splendor up the sky, baptizing the surrounding hills and valleys in an ocean of silvery radiance. We know of nothing more charming than a ride in the country by moonlight.

At Fordham we were hospitably lodged at the comfortable hotel of Mr. Berrien. The place of repose assigned us, was so situated that we could look out through the window, and enjoy at the same time a view of both sky and earth—the landscape above and below. The moon was our compagnon de nuit. But as our meditations were more interesting to ourself than it is possible for them to be to others, we shall suppress them; barely saying that we at length went to sleep, with these words of the gifted author of Festus on our lips:

"I have looked at thee, Moon, with a glance,
As in triumphing coldness is given,
And felt, as I saw thee all lonely advance,
There was something, was lonely in heaven!
I have looked at thee, Moon, as I lay
In thy cold and saddening brightness,
And rejoiced, as high heaven rolled shining away,
That the heart hath its desolate lightness!"

THE REAL DANGER OF OUR ORDER.

The intelligence we receive from all parts of the country, represents the Order as exceedingly prosperous. New Lodges are established every day, and what is better, the principles of the Association are every day more understood, and more truly appreciated. The Institution has become a vast power, and its influence reaches to hundreds of thousands of our citizens.

The opposition with which the Order has had to contend, is well nigh overcome; and in many places has ceased altogether. We have now nothing to fear but ourselves. If we allow elements of disunion to ferment in the bosom of our Fraternity, it will not be long ere we burst into a thousand fragments.

We fear there are too many restless spirits among us already. We should be exceedingly cautious how we admit men who have been known to be violent opposers, until they found that their business, their worldly interests would be advanced by a connection with the Order. Against all such we should close the doors of our Lodges. None but the honest, the benevolent, the virtuous, should come into the Order. We repeat, then, our chief danger lies within our Association.

A few years more, and the Order of Odd-Fellows will arrive at its period of trial. When all the enthusiasm of novelty shall have subsided, and the youthful spirit which now animates it, and fills it with zeal, has become sobered by age; and selfishness will no longer be able to take advantage of that zeal for its own purposes, and when all its honors and dignities shall have been exhausted, we shall know who are really for us, and who against us—who have followed the Order for the love of it, and who for the loaves and fishes.

We have large hope, but verily believe a time is near at hand which will sift us "as wheat"—when many that are now of us, and apparently lovers of the Order, and the loudest in proclaiming it, will become its bitterest opposers, and calumniators.

Let the true friends of the Order be faithful, and stand at their posts. Our cause is a holy one, and will advance, brightening more and more through the ages. Opposition from without may retard it, and iniquity within may obscure it, but cannot destroy it. Its mighty voice will still be heard above the storm and strife, "I command you to visit the sick, to relieve the distressed, to educate the orphan, and bury the dead."

SOCIAL AND POLITICAL INFLUENCE OF SECRET SOCIETIES.

We copy the following from Mad. George Sand's remarkable work, entitled The Countess of Rudolstadt. The extracts below are well worth being read, especially by Odd-Fellows, as they contain a most philosophic exposition of the principle of all secret societies. To understand clearly what follows, the reader should bear in mind that it is the instruction or counsel given to the Neophyte, previous to initiation:

"Now we are about to instruct you in your duties toward God and toward us. Learn therefore, beforehand, the three words which are the secret of our mysteries, and which are only revealed to most of our affiliated with so many delays and precautions. You have no need of a long apprenticeship; and yet you will require some reflection to understand their whole extent. Liberty, Fraternity, Equality; this is the mysterious and profound formula of the work of the Invisibles."

"Is that, in fact, all the mystery?"
"It does not seem to you to be one; but examine the state of societies and you will see that, to men accustomed to be governed by despotism, inequality, antagonism, it is an entire education, an entire conversion, a whole revelation, to come to understand clearly the human possibility, the social necessity, and the moral self-denial of this triple precept: Liberty, Fraternity, Equality. The small number of upright minds and pure hearts, who protest naturally against the injustice and the disorder of tyranny, seize the secret doctrine at the first step. Their progress in it is rapid, for with them it is only requisite to teach them the processes of application, which we have discovered. But for the greater number with the people of the world, the courtiers and the powerful, imagine what precaution and discretion are necessary before submitting to their examination the sacred formula of the external work; it is necessary to surround it with symbols and evasions; it is necessary to persuade them that it refers only to a fictitious liberty, confined to the exercise of individual thought, or a relative equality, extended only to the members of the association, and practicable only in its secret and benevolent assemblies; in fine, to a romantic brotherhood agreed upon between a certain number of persons, and limited to temporary services, to some good works, to mutual assistance. For these slaves of custom and prejudice, our mysteries are only the statutes of heroic orders, renewed from ancient chivalry, and offering no attack upon constituted powers, no remedy to the miseries of the people. For them we have only insignificant grades, degrees of frivolous science or of hackneyed antiquity, a series of institutions, exciting their curiosity without enlightening their minds. They believe they know every thing, and they know nothing."

"Of what use are they?" said Consuelo, who listened attentively.

"To protect the exercise and freedom of labor of those who do understand and know," replied the initiator; "this will be explained to you. Listen first to what we expect from you.

"Europe—Germany and France especially—is filled with secret societies, subterranean laboratories in which is being prepared a great revolution, of which Germany or France will be the crater. We have the key, and we endeavor to have the direction of all these associations, without the knowledge of the greater part of their members, and without any one of them having knowledge of our connection with others. Although our object has not yet been attained, we have succeeded in placing our foot every where, and the most eminent among the different associates are with us, and second our efforts. We will procure for you an admission into all those holy sanctuaries, into all those profane temples: for corruption and frivolity have likewise built their cities: and in some, vice and virtue labor in the same work of destruction, without the evil understanding its association with the good. Such is the law of conspiracies. You will know the secret of the Free-Masons, a great brotherhood, which, under the most varied forms, and with the most different ideas, labors to organize the practice, and to spread the notion of equality. You will receive all the degrees of all the rites, we shall give you all the insignia, all the titles, all the formulas necessary for the relations which we shall cause you to establish with the Lodges, and for the negotiations with them which we shall entrust to you; and your profession, your traveling life, your talents, your youth and your virtues, your courage, your uprightness and your discretion, fit you for that part, and give us the necessary guaranties. Your past life, the smallest details of which we know, is a sufficient pledge to us. You have voluntarily undergone more trials than the masonic mysteries could invent, and you have come out from them stronger, and more victorious than their adepts, from the vain forms intended to try their constancy. From this moment we must put you on your guard against the principal disgust attached to your mission. The lower grades of the secret societies, and especially of Masonry, are almost insignificant in our eyes, and serve us only to try the instincts and the dispositions of the candidates. The greater part never pass those first degrees, in which, as I have already said, vain ceremonies amuse their frivolous curiosity. In the following grades are admitted only persons who give us hopes, and yet these are still kept a distance from the end; they are examined, they are tried, their souls are probed, they are prepared for a more complete initiation, or they are given up to an interpretation which they could not pass without danger to the cause, and to themselves. That is still only a nursery, from which we choose the strong plant, destined to be transplanted into the sacred forest. To the highest grades alone belong the important revelations, and it is by them that you will enter upon the career. But the part of master imposes many duties, and there ceases the charm of curiosity, the intoxication of mystery, the illusion of hope. You have no longer to learn, in the midst of enthusiasm and emotion, that law which transforms the neophyte into an apostle, the novice into a priestess. You have to practice it in instructing others, and in seeking to recruit among the clean in heart and the poor in spirit, Levites for the sanctuary. It is there, poor Consuelo, that you will know the bitterness of hopes deceived, and the hard labors of perseverance, when you shall see, among so many greedy, curious, and boasting seekers after truth, so few serious, firm and sincere minds, so few souls worthy of receiving and capable of understanding it. For hundreds of children full of vanity at employing the formulas of equality, and affecting its appearance, you will hardly find one man penetrated with their importance and courageous in their interpretation. You will be obliged to speak to them in enigmas, and to make to yourself a sad jest in deceiving them respecting the fundamentals of the doctrine. The greater part of the princes whom we enroll under our banner, are in this situation; and adorned with vain Masonic titles, which amuse their foolish pride, serve only to guarantee to us the liberty of our movements, and the tolerance of the police. Some, nevertheless, are sincere, or have been so. Frederick, surnamed the Great, and certainly capable of being great, was received as a Free-Mason before he was king, and at that time liberty spoke to his heart, equality to his reason. Still, we surrounded his initiation with skillful and prudent men, who did not reveal to him the secrets of the doctrine. How we should have repented had they done so! We do not allow ourselves to be deceived; we permit these wearied masters, these dangerous friends, to sit upon the thrones of our symbolic temples. They think themselves the pontiff; they imagine they hold the key of the sacred mysteries, as formerly the chief of the holy empire, fictitiously chosen grand master of the secret tribunal, was persuaded that he commanded the terrible army of the franc-judges, masters of his power, of his designs, and of his life. But while they believe themselves our generals, they serve us as lieutenants; and never before the fatal day marked for their fall in the book of destiny, will they know that they assisted us to labor against themselves."

A GLANCE AT EUROPE.

THE late news by the steamer America is highly important and interesting, and our prediction of universal war is fast being verified. Germany is terribly agitated by contending interests—Austria and Prussia both contending for the imperial throne; while in Italy and Hungary the war rages with unabated vigor. The Hungarians are yet successful in their resistance to the Austrians.

France has concluded to interfere in behalf of the Pope. This is an important step, and will lead to important results; and although at first view, it seems strange that a republic, as France professes to be, having just escaped from monarchical rule, should march forth to suppress a sister republic, and re-establish a prince on his throne, there is room to believe that the sentiment of republicanism will not, in the end, be the loser thereby. No one believes, or can believe, that the French government will restore the Papal rule without modification. And if the Pope returns, it will be seen that liberty has still made immense advances. Before, therefore, we judge France harshly for engaging in this struggle in behalf of Pius IX against the Roman Republic, we should wait for results.

In Sicily the struggle has commenced with dreadful ferocity, and a desperate battle took place on Good Friday between the Neapolitan and the Swiss troops and the people of Catania, which continued all night, and ended in the defeat of the Catanians. A great number of them were killed, and the city was afterward sacked and plundered.

The terror caused by this defeat has brought the city of Syracuse to surrender without resort to arms.

But beside wars and rumors of wars, and the political and social dissensions that now disturb the tranquillity and repose of Europe, the cholera is appearing at various points. In Paris great numbers have become its victims. It knows no distinction of persons—it strikes equally the high and low, the rich and poor. Up to the 19th ult., one thousand and twenty-two had died at Paris, of this awful disease.

In Ireland there is nothing but misery, vice and starvation; and in England all is anxiety. Alas! for poor old Europe.

THE CROPS in all parts of the country look remarkably well, and promise abundantly.

LACONICS.

CONTENTMENT.—I know contentment is denied to many, for it comprehends a life of passiveness. To act, to struggle for an object, or to weep because such may not be obtained, is "inherent."

SOLITUDE.—One cannot be happy alone—the dream of retirement from social life is, at best, but a pleasing fancy, which serves to cover up the reality of gloom and desolation, that are the legitimate offspring of an isolated existence.

LIFE.—Thou hast entered life, and cannot be exempt from difficulties, many and painful, perhaps. Pleasure and pain go hand in hand through life. Since then, we may not avoid, it were better to nerve the mind to meet the ills of life, and with open arms embrace all pleasures as they pass. To quote a beautiful simile: "Trials in life are to the mind as rocks in the bosom of the waters." Brighter, and purer, does the stream fall which passes over a rocky bed, than when on clayey bottom it quietly glides along, without unevenness enough to cause a ripple.

THE IDEAL.—Is it idle to waste time and thoughts in reveries? Will converse with the ideal world unfit the mind to enter upon life's sterner duties? No! Such oftentimes, on the contrary, give moments of great happiness. The pleasure which waking dreams shed upon the heart, so far from rendering the real in life more tame, induces contentment, by making us readily pass over, and regard as petty annoyances, the discomfort we may experience; while imagination, ever seeking the solid basis of truth to rest upon, magnifies our every pleasure, and so invests with many an additional charm, the joys that fall to our lot.

MEMORY.—Memory would play a very traitor's part, if she should treasure up the ills we meet with upon one day of life, to cloud all others with a dark remembrance.

POETRY.—They speak of poetry as a gift from the divine hand. Oh! no! It is but the drapery with which an impassioned heart, alive to beauty and exalted sentiment, decks its thoughts.

The appreciation of the soul, of beauty, goodness, and the thousand harmonies of nature, is in truth the fountain-head of all poetic inspiration. When sorrow, care, distrust, or any evil passion has thrown a cloud upon the soul's own brightness, song is hushed; or if 'tis heard, it comes mingled with the wail of mourning—it speaks not the heavenly strains of joy, echoes of the universal anthem of nature, but tones of disappointment, of wretchedness and woe.

REALITY.—The very rainbow hues of fancy that have so oft delighted many hours of revery, will concentrate themselves upon a phantom, 'till so life-like it becomes, it can deceive even clear-eyed reason. But, as in nature, it needs no hurricane to dissipate the clouds, however densely gathered. So with the gathered mists of fancy—it needs no storm of passion, but time, time alone is necessary to dispel illusions, and show their foundation is nothingness. Then all those hopes so brightly beautiful, that rested on illusion for a basis, must wither. How many such joyless lessons the heart must be taught ere it will learn to value everything by the just measure of reality.

GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE.—This excellent paper is the organ of the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows, and contains, from week to week, the proceedings of the Grand Lodge, accounts of Celebrations, &c. Its Literary department is filled with choice Original and Popular Tales, Miscellany, Poetry, Sketches of Travel, &c. It is worthy the support of every brother of the Order.

The Gazette and Rule is published by Crampton and Clark, 44 Ann-street, New York, and edited by Augustus C. L. Arnold. Terms, $2 a year, in advance.

So says the Norwich Republican, an excellent paper, published at Norwich, N. Y. You do us no more than justice, brother. We shall ever aim to make our journal worthy of the cause it advocates.

LETTER FROM A GOLD-HUNTER.

RIO JANEIRO, Brazil, March 7, 1949.

"LAND, HO!" was the joyful exclamation from the look-out, as, early on the morning of the 3d, the distant mountains of Brazil, with Cape Frio on the starboard beam, loomed in the far-off haze, at the distance of sixty miles. The most pleasurable excitement spread itself among us at the welcome intelligence, which only the novice, first fifty days out sight of land, can fully appreciate. This was on Saturday, and we anticipated being able to anchor by the next morning at farthest; but the wind fell, and all that day and Sunday we beat and drifted within view of the coast, experiencing some degree of the bitterness of "hope deferred."

A light breeze on Sunday toward evening carried us within fifteen miles of the city; but as there is a land breeze every afternoon from the mouth of the harbor, and night coming on, we had to lay off all night. The line of coast for thirty or forty miles was in full view, consisting of innumerable mountain peaks, from one to ten thousand feet in height, in most fanciful and beautiful forms; among which the Peak of Cacavado, and the Sugar Loaf, stand pre-eminent as landmarks to inward bound ships. This last peak rises almost perpendicularly from the water, at the left entrance to the harbor, and is 1,800 feet in height. At the distance of ten or fifteen miles, the mountain range presents a remarkable aspect, being that of an enormous human figure, miles in length, lying upon his back, and known as "The Giant of the Bar." The head, face, and chin are almost perfect in outline, as also are the arms folded upon the breast. The Sugar Loaf Peak forms the toes or point of the feet, and completes the figure; so you may judge of the height and proportions of a body that justifies so big a foot. Many of these mountains are at a considerable distance inland, and stand far apart from each other, but which, seen at sea, form a tout ensemble that fails not to strike all strangers, as well as to be a conspicuous guide to mariners.

At about ten o'clock on Sunday evening, the 4th inst., we had the pleasure of a long "talk" with the ship South Carolina, which left New-York ten days later. She had been in sight all day; and till evening, in one of our tacks in opposite directions, the winds light, we had not been able to make each other out. The occasion was a pleasant one to both ships, and the eagerness for "news" exceeded any thing you can well conceive of. We gave her nine hearty cheers on parting for the night, which were returned with spirit.

On the morning of the fifth, we found ourselves drifted fifteen miles out to sea, in a calm, and lay tossing about till noon, when the sea breeze wafted us slowly into port. The entrance to the harbor is a mile in width, the Sugar Loaf on the left, and Fort Santa Cruz on the right. Vessels are hailed at the Fort before being allowed to enter, but no detention takes place. At last the anchor was dropped, the health and custom-house officers came on board—and then all was bustle for the shore. It was two miles from our anchorage to the dock or landing place; but swarms of boats and feluccas came off, and all were safely landed before dark.

We found the town already well-filled with Americans, bound to California, and the addition of three hundred more created no little bustle among the hotel keepers, and their capacity for accommodations was tested to the utmost. These failing, private houses, store lofts, and every other place where a mattress could be spread, were put in requisition, before all were safely stowed. It being Inauguration Day, we found arrangements had been made by the passengers in port for a grand dinner in honor of the occasion, in which we were just in season to participate. Separated, as we were, thousands of miles from "our own, our native land," you may imagine the spirit manifested by the company, in thus celebrating on a foreign shore the induction into office of a new President. The hilarity was kept up till the small hours of the morning, and I venture to say nothing of the kind has ever before been witnessed in Rio. The "hurrahs" were soul-stirring, and the toasts and speeches patriotic and pithy. It was a joyful re-union to all the Americans in Rio, which will long be remembered.

I have been two days in the city, busily engaged in sight-seeing, and I will jot down in future letters my impressions of the city and the people. I am to visit the Botanical Gardens, seven miles out of the city, the most lovely and attractive place to strangers that is to be found in this vicinity, of which you shall have a description.

Adieu.

J. W.

P. S. The ship Architect, from New Orleans, is said to have had six deaths from cholera since sailing, but no new case for the last thirty days. The Christoval Colon was several hours on her beam ends during a violent gale, which she encountered a few days out. She will be detained six weeks for repairs. There are now a dozen vessels in port, one from Philadelphia, the brig Osceola.

SOMETHING FOR YOUNG LADIES.

We expect that by a study of this Floral Vocabulary, some one of fair readers will be able, in a few weeks, to send us a letter in the language of flowers:

Flowers are the alphabet of all angels—whereby
They write on hills and fields mysterious truths.

A SKETCH-ESSAY.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY A CLAIRE VOYANTE.

By one of those seemingly fortuitous circumstances, which attract us into certain places, without any direct operation of the will, my mind was led to a densely peopled court of this city. An antique looking brick house, which had fallen into such neglect as to have become the desecrated dwelling of the poor, arrested my attention, and I felt a strong disposition to enter. I had long thought that these places of human life are not sufficiently studied; and here was an opportunity. There is something so revolting in the filth, the squalor, the abject wretchedness, the loathsomeness, vice and misery, of the semi-human beings, commonly found in such places, that good taste falls back in disgust, when good feeling prompts us to go on. But for the present I was more fortunate than to find the lowest grades of human condition, though none other than signs of poverty met the eye.

Two rooms on the first floor were leased by John Avery, journeyman carpenter. A door of one of these rooms stood ajar, and I caught a view of a remarkably neat and pleasant-looking young woman, dandling a cherub infant on her knee. This apartment was quite free from litter and dust, and the furniture, though scanty, and of the plainest and cheapest kind, was yet arranged with no inconsiderable degree of taste. A fine and thrifty geranium, in full bloom, stood on the window; and the plain deal table really shone with the polish of its many scourings. A small, but well filled and nicely arranged case of books hung on one side of the room, all bearing the marks of frequent and kindly use; but none those of signs of neglect, carelessness, or disguise. In these small things there is much of character; and one accustomed to read it could tell very nearly what might be expected of any family, by a view of its library, whether small or great. And here let me add, that a few books in the house of a poor man, is stronger proof of intellectual taste and culture, than a thousand gilded volumes in the dwellings of the rich. In the one case we are sure that the love must be strong and positive, and indulged at the expense of self-denial in other things; that the books are the one luxury purchased by the sacrifice of many physical indulgences; while in the other, the fine library may have been bought and kept merely for show. The books would be chosen for the splendor of their covers, making part and parcel with the other fixtures of the establishment; and, like them, to be sold at auction when the gilding wears off. They would be reckoned in the same category with gilded china, damask silk curtains, cut glass and plate; nay, would be sacrificed for any of these, if the whole could not be obtained.

The picture was so pleasant that I could not go on without another look, before making a turn in the old-fashioned stairway. The young mother, in the exuberant fullness of life and strength, was tossing up her child; and, as I looked, she was holding it at arms-length over her head, murmuring all the while the low, sweet, broken words of love and endearment, which the infant of even a few weeks old can appreciate very truly. The little one, meanwhile, was laughing and crowing so sweetly, so cunningly, that it was clasped to her bosom in an ecstasy; and I saw a tear fall on its bright face.

How beautiful are these ordinances of nature! How clearly is the benevolence of God seen in the fact that our earliest and most susceptible years are nurtured amid such ministrations!

The hall was completely lined with cards, plates, and "signs" of human labor, of every substance and fashion. There was on one door, written in yellow chalk, "washing and ironing done here, and going out to days work." On another door a little beyond was a small japanned plate, announcing what would be quite paradoxical to country eyes:

"Stamper Court Cottage. Cake and small beer; with cigars, and a taste of ale." But I must forbear, since particulars would require something of a volume.

The second floor was occupied by some five or six families; and the third by twice that amount, as appeared by a slant view at the windows, as I went down. These appeared literally blooming with children's heads, of every size, and every hue, from the deep black locks of the Spanish to the saffron head of the German; while the Irish were represented by all the numerous shades, between the color of a well-ripened carrot, and the dingy white of water-rotted flax. But the bright wild eyes of these unconscious heirs of Promise, were looking out from the thick masses of their tangled hair, confidently and earnestly, as if the little creatures expected something better than they might ever find. Yet, withal, there was in some instances an expression of courage, of patient endurance, caught even thus early from the rough teachers of their sad condition, that seemed to say that they could bide their toil, whatever it should be—that they would take what was given with thankful hearts, and bless God that it was no worse. It was infinitely touching—infinately mournful!

Yet beautiful is this human trust—going forth with the first life of the young heart, to grasp with a loving hand all the softer elements of toil—dreaming not of the good and fair, which are its natural rights; and bowing down, in its meek endurance, embracing its bosom as if they were Blessings. They have no fear of Wrong, no doubt of Good, until taught, by bitter experience, that an unnatural Falsity has occupied the place of dethroned Truth.

When shall the world redeem this deep pledge of confidence, so that the man may, with safety, be as fully, as nobly confiding as the child? It can only be when the monster Juggernaut, the deified selfishness, shall be brought down from his high place, and the God of Love—the only true God—is left to fill his natural and rightful place, in every human heart. And is not that day approaching? Watchmen on the high walls, see ye not a token on the dawn glinting even athwart the depths of midnight blackness? Then be of good cheer, though darkness may gather about her, in robes of tenfold thickness. Right is still omnipotent, and Wrong can no more intercept her destined progress, than clouds can hinder the coming up of the sun, when the hour of rising is at hand. The eye of Faith looks not at, but through and over the mountain mass of difficulties, which every where obstruct and hinder the coming Good; and it sees that they are only permitted to be, in order to console a more excellent, because a positive triumph—a more signal—a perfect victory.

ODD-FELLOWS' LIBRARY AND READING ROOM, BROOKLYN.—This noble work moves on right-bravely. The Trustees met on Friday evening, and resolved to call a meeting of all the Odd-Fellows of Brooklyn and vicinity, next Friday evening, at the rooms of the Association, in the Brooklyn Institute, to subscribe for stock, fill up the Board of Trustees, and place the institution on a permanent basis. We are glad that the Order is called together, and we doubt not that there will be a full and enthusiastic meeting. A better object could not be proposed, nor can anything result in higher good to the Order.

ODD-FELLOW'S LIBRARY, NEW YORK.—This important enterprise meets with great favor in every quarter. The subscriptions are going forward with enthusiasm. The library will probably get into operation about the 1st of July.

ANNIVERSARY WEEK IN NEW YORK.—We do not think the anniversaries have excited so much attention, this year, as on former occasions. Some of the meetings, however, have been very interesting and spirited. In Boston, anniversary week is the last in May.

GRAND LODGE OF MAINE.

PORTLAND, May 5, 1849.

I SEND you a brief account of the doings of the Grand Bodies of I. O. O. F., at their sessions just closed.

The annual sessions of the R. W. Grand Encampment of Maine, and of the R. W. Grand Lodge of Maine, commenced in this city on Thursday, the 8d inst. The number of members in attendance was not as large as at some previous communications; nevertheless, much important business was transacted, and in both Bodies an especial interest in the affairs of the institution of Odd-Fellowship was manifested, and a great desire to further all measures calculated to promote its prosperity.

The session of the R. W. Grand Encampment was commenced on the evening of the 8d inst., M. W. Grand Patriarch Edward P. Banks presiding. The following are the officers for the present year:

Oliver S. Beale, of Bangor, M. W. G. P.
John H. Williams, of Portland, M. E. G. H. P.
Charles F. Safford, of Portland, R. W. G. S. 'W.
Samuel R. Leavitt, of Portland, R. W. G. J. W.
Franklin C. Moody, of Portland, R. W. G. T.
Nathaniel F. Deering, of Portland, R. W. G. S.
W. E. Kimball, of Portland, W. G. S.

F. P. Theobald, of Gardiner, is the R. W. G. R. to the Grand Lodge of the U. S., having, at the last session of that Body, drawn the lot for two years.

The Patriarchal branch of the Order in this State is increasing in numbers gradually, and is in all respects in a healthy condition, although no new Encampments have been added the past year.

The session of the R. W. Grand Lodge of Maine commenced on the morning of the 8d inst., M. W. Grand Master Allen Haines presiding. The following are the officers for the present year:

Elisha Clarke, of Bath, M. W. G. M.
John Trask, Jr., of New Sharon, R. W. D. G. M.
George W. Bachelder, of Gardiner, R. W. G. W.
Harris C. Barnes, of Portland, R. W. G. T.
Benjamin Kingsbury, Jr., of Portland, R. W. G. S.
James A. Milliken, of Columbia, R. W. G. C.
Allen Haines, of Portland, R. W. G. R.
William E. Kimball, of Portland, W. G. G.

The business of the session was of much importance, although principally of a local character. A zealous interest in the affairs of the Order seemed to prevail among all the Past Grands present in Grand Lodge, and the utmost good feeling, and a great desire to harmonize conflicting views was very apparent.

Odd-Fellowship in Maine is well established, and its friends are heartily engaged in promoting its great mission. And it is to be hoped, that here, as well as elsewhere, the institution will be suffered to remain what it now is, in all its essential features. The great danger I apprehend will be found in a desire which appears in some restless minds in the Order, in some portions of the jurisdiction, to raise upon its superstructure something which they seem to imagine is better than that which has been handed down to us; which something, I apprehend, will be found better calculated to destroy than to build up.

HINMAN LODGE.—This Lodge met for the first time, in their new room—the Elizabethan—at Odd-Fellows' Hall, on Monday evening last. An eloquent lecture was delivered on the occasion by P. Benjamin, Esq.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.—The lady of this enterprising, but we fear unfortunate Navigator, has written a beautiful and touching letter to President Taylor, soliciting the aid of our government in an effort to rescue Sir John from his perilous position, if indeed he be not already lost.

DISGRACEFUL SCENE AT THE OPERA HOUSE.—A shameful riot took place at the Opera House, on Monday night, which ended in the expulsion of Mr. Macready from the stage, amid a shower of rotten eggs, chairs, and other missiles.

ANNIVERSARY OF HOSPITALER LODGE No. 205, NEW YORK.—This Lodge celebrated its second anniversary on Friday evening, April 28th. The exercises took place in the elegant Lodge Room, 598 Broadway, which was filled to overflowing at an early hour, by one of the most brilliant audiences, ever assembled together on such an occasion. The exercises are as follows: Voluntary, Organ; Prayer, by Rev. Bro. Evans; Song, by a Glee Club; Oration, by A. C. L. Arnold; Song, Glee Club; Poem, by Bro. Rice; Song; Closing Ode of the I. O. O. F. The exercises were listened to with much attention, and the ladies seemed to be deeply interested. Hospitaler Lodge is one of the best in the city, and is prospering finely.

A DIRECTORY OF ODD-FELLOWSHIP AND BUSINESS.—Brothers Herriek and Souder, manufacturers and dealers in gentlemen's furnishing goods, 95 William-st., have published a directory to the Lodges, located in this city, for gratuitous distribution among their friends and customers. We would advise our friends, whether from the city or country, to call at their establishment, in William-st., and procure a copy. There will also be found, at this place, every article of ready made linen, scarfs, cravats, etc., etc., necessary to a gentleman's wardrobe, which will be sold at reasonable prices, at wholesale and retail.

AERIAL NAVIGATION TRIUMPHANT.—Porter and Robjohn's experiments have proved eminently successful. A beautiful model ship is now being exhibited, in full operation, at the Coliseum, in this city. The California ship is advancing toward completion, and will be ready for departure about the 15th of June.

“HOMÆ PAULINA.” New York: Carter and Brothers. This is a republication of Paley's celebrated work, forming a part of his evidences of Christianity. Its merits are too well known to need any extensive notice from us.

THE EXCELSIOR.—Among our exchanges, there is not a better paper than this. It has always been a most welcome visitor to our sanctum, and often have we honored it with our scissors. It has now, we perceive, presented itself with a new, chaste, and very beautiful head. We wish its talented editor and worthy publishers all the prosperity they can desire.

BROADWAY THEATER.—Mr. Forrest's engagement has been successful at this place, as crowded houses testify. Mr. Forrest is still the favorite. Mr. Marshall is making constant efforts to furnish New York with theatrical entertainments of a high order.

BURTON'S THEATER.—Messrs. Burton and Brougham are, with their varied talent and exhaustless mirth, drawing crowds of the better class of our citizens to this theater, every night.

AMERICAN MUSEUM.—This is the place for families, where instruction and amusement are most happily blended. Under the management of Messrs. Barnum and Greenwood, it never fails in its attractions.

THE MONEY MARKET has continued very easy for the week, and large loans have been made at seven per cent., and a good deal invested upon bond and mortgage at the same rate. The reception of one million of dollars, in specie, from England, added to the imports of gold from California, give renewed confidence to the banks, which have now as much coin as they can use to advantage. Stocks are held more firmly, with a good demand for United States Stocks for England. Treasury Notes close at 110 1-8, cash; Speculative Stocks are in little request, and sell at old prices.

There is a large number of country merchants in the city, and business is as active and satisfactory as usual at this time of the year. Merchants do not buy largely, but pay very well on their old accounts.

The Scrap-Book.

THE KNIGHT'S REQUIEM.

BY MOTHERWELL.

They have waked the knight so meikle of might,
They have cased his corpse in oak;
There was not an eye that then was dry,
There was not a tongue that spoke.
The stout and the true lay stretched in view,
Pale and cold as the marble stone;
And the voice was still that like trumpet shrill
Had to glory led them on;
And the deadly hand, whose battle brand
Mowed down the reeling foe,
Was laid at rest on the manly breast
That never more mought glow.
With book, and bell, and waxen light,
The mass for the dead is sung;
Throughout the night in the turret's light,
The great church-bells are rung.
Oh wo!—oh wo!—for those that go
From light of life away,
Whose limbs may rest with worms unblest
In the damp and silent clay!
With a heavy cheer they upraised his bier,
Naker and drum did roll;
The trumpets blew a last adieu
To the good knight's martial soul.
With measured tread through the aisle they sped,
Bearing the dead knight on,
And before the shrine of St. James the divine
They covered his corpse with stone:
'Twas fearful to see the strong agony
Of men who had seldom wept,
And to hear the deep groan of each mail-clad one
As the lid on the coffin swept.
With many a groan, they placed that stone
O'er the heart of the good and brave,
And many a look the tall knights took
Of their brother soldier's grave.
Where banners stream and corslets gleam
In fields besprent with gore,
That brother's hand the shearing brand
In the van shall wave no more;
The clarions call on one and all
To arm the fight amain,
Would never see, in chivalry,
Their brother's mate again!

THE GRIST-MILL.

BY R. H. STODDARD.

The grist-mill stands beside the stream,
With bending roof and leaning wall;
So old, that when the winds are wild,
The miller trembles lest it fall;
But moss and ivy, never sere,
Bedeck it o'er from year to year.
The dam is steep, and weeded green;
The gates are raised, the waters pour,
And tread the old wheel's slippery steps,
The lowest round for evermore;
Methinks they have a sound of ire,
Because they could not climb it higher.
From morn till night, in autumn time,
When yellow harvests load the plains,
Up drive the farmers to the mill,
And back anon, with loaded wains;
They bring a wealth of golden grain,
And take it home in meal again.
The mill inside is dim and dark;
But peeping in the open door
You see the miller flitting round,
And dusty bags along the floor;
And by the shaft, and down the spout,
The yellow meal comes pouring out.
And all day long the winnowed chaff
Floats round it on the sultry breeze,
And shineth like a settling swarm
Of golden-winged and belted bees;
Or sparks around a blacksmith's door,
When bellows blow and forges roar.
I love our pleasant, quaint old mill!
It minds me of my early prime;
'Tis changed since then, but not so much
As I am, by decay and time;
Its wrecks are mossed from year to year,
But mine all dark and bare appear.
I stand beside the stream of life;
The mighty current sweeps along;
Lifting the flood-gates of my heart,
It turns the magic wheel of song,
And grinds the ripened harvest brought
From out the golden field of Thought.

MAGNETISM AMONG THE SHAKERS.

BY MISS C. M. SEDGWICK.

ONE of the brethren from a Shakersettlement in our neighborhood, called on us the other day. I was staying with a friend, in whose atmosphere there is a moral power, analogous to some chemical test, which elicits from every form of humanity whatever of sweet and genial is in it. Our visitor was an old acquaintance, and an old member of his order, having joined it more than forty years ago, with his wife and two children. I have known marked individuals among these people, and yet it surprises me when I see an original stamp of character, surviving the extinguishing monotony of life, or rather suspended animation among them. What God has impressed man cannot efface. To a child's eye each leaf of a tree is like the other, to a philosopher's each has its distinctive mark.

Our friend W.'s individuality might have struck a careless observer. He has nothing of the angular, crusty, silent aspect of his yea and nay brethren, who have a perfect conviction that they have dove to the bottom of the well, and found the pearl truth, while all the rest of the world look upon them as the bottom of the well indeed; but without the pearl, and with only so much light as may come in through the little aperture that communicates with the outward world. Neither are quite right—the Shaker has no monopoly of truth or holiness, but we believe he has enough of both to light a dusky path to heaven. Friend W. is a man of no pretension whatever; but content in conscious mediocrity. We were at dinner when he came in; but friend W. is too childlike or too simple, to be disturbed by any observance of conventional politeness. He declined an invitation to dine, saying that he had eaten and was not hungry, and seated himself in the corner, after depositing some apples on the table, of rare size and beauty.

"I have brought some notions, too," he said, "for you, B—," and he took from his ample pocket his handkerchief, in which he had tied up a parcel of sugar-plums and peppermints.

B— accepted them most affably, and without any apparent recoiling, shifting them from the old man's handkerchief to an empty plate beside her.

"Half of them," he said, "remember, B—, are for —. You both played and sung to me last summer—I don't forget it. She is a likely woman, and makes the music sound almost as good as when I was young."

This was enthusiasm in the old Shaker; but to us it sounded strangely, who knew that she who had so kindly condescended to call back brother W.'s youth, had held crowds entranced by her genius. Brother W. is a genial old man, and fifty years of abstinence from the world's pleasures has not made him forget to contempt them. He resembles the jolly friars in conventual life, who never resist, and are therefore allowed to go without bits or reins, and in a very easy harness. There is no galling in restraint where there is no desire for freedom. It is the "immortal longings" that make the friction in life.

After dinner, B—, at brother W.'s request, sat down to the piano, and played for him the various tunes that were the favorites, in rustic island life, forty years ago. First the Highland Reel, then "Money Musk."

"I remember who I danced that with," he said—"Sophy Drury. The ball was held in the school-room, at Fleeing fields. She is tight built, and has cheeks as red as a rose, (past and present were confounded in brother W.'s imaginations.) I went home with Sophy—it was as light as day, and near upon day—them was pleasant times!" concluded the old man, but without one sigh of regret, but with a gleam of light from his twinkling gray eye.

"There have been no such pleasant times since, brother W., has there?" asked B—, with assumed or real sympathy.

"I can't say that, B—; it has been all along pleasant, I have had what others call crosses, but I don't look at them that way—what's the use, B—?"

The old man's philosophy struck me. There was no record of a cross in his round, jolly face.

"Were you married," I asked, "when you joined the Shakers?"

"Oh, yes, I married at twenty—it's never too soon nor too late to do right, you know, and it was right for me to marry according to the light I had then. May be you think it was a cross to part with my wife—all men don't take it so—but I own I should; I liked Eunice. She is a peaceable woman, and we lived in unity; but it was rather hard times, and we felt a call to join the brethren, and so we walked out of the world together, and took out two children with us. In the society she was the first woman handy in all cases.

"And she is still with you?"

"No—our girl took a notion and went off, and got married and wife went after her—that's natural for mother's, you know.

"I went after Eunice, and tried to persuade her to come back, and she felt so; but it's hard rooting out mother's love; it's planted deep, and spreads wide; so I left her to nature, and troubled myself no more about it, for what was the use? My son, too, took a liking to a young English girl that was one of our sisters—maybe you have seen her?" We had all seen her and admired her fresh English beauty, and deplored her fate. "Well, she was a picture, and speaking after the manner of men, as good as she was handsome. They went off together. I could not blame them much, and I took no steps after them—for what was the use? But come, B—, strike up again; play 'Haste to the wedding.'" B— obeyed, and our old friend sang or chanted a low accompaniment; in which the dancing tune, and the Shaker nasal chant was ludicrously mingled. B— played all his favorite airs and said, "You do love dancing, brother W—."

"Yes, to be sure—praise him in the cymbals and dancing!"

"Oh, but I mean such dances as we have here. Would you not like, brother W—, to come over and see us dance?"

"Why, maybe I should."

"And would not you like to dance with one of our pretty young ladies, brother W—?"

"May be I should." The old man's face lit up joyously—but he smiled and shook his head, "they would not let me, B—, they would not let me." Perhaps the old Shaker's imagination wandered for a moment from the very straight path of the brotherhood, but it was but a moment. His face reverted to its placid passiveness, and he said, "I am perfectly content. I have enough to eat and drink—everything good after its kind, too—good clothes to wear, a warm bed to sleep in, and just as much work as I want, and no more." "All this and heaven too"—of which the old man felt perfectly sure, was quite enough to fill the measure of a Shaker's desires.

"Now, B—," said he, "you think so much of your dances, I wish you could see one of our young sisters dance, when we go up to Mount Holy. She has the whirlwind gift; she will spin round like a top on one foot for half an hour, all the while seeing visions, and receiving revelations."

This whirling is a recent gift of the Shakers. The few "world's folk" who have been permitted to see its exhibition, compare its subjects to the whirling Dervishes.

"Have you any other new inspiration?" I asked. "Gifts, you mean? Oh, yes; we have visionists. It's a wonderful mystery to me. I never was much for looking into mysteries—they scare me!" Naturally enough, poor child-like old man!

"What, brother W—," is asked, "do you mean by a visionist?"

"I can't exactly explain," he replied. "They see things that the natural eye can't see, and hear, and touch, and taste with inward senses. As for me, I never heard any kind of gifts, but a contented mind, and submission to those in authority, and I don't see at all into this mystery. It makes me of a tremble when I think of it. I'll tell you how it acts. Last summer I was among our brethren in York State, and when I was coming away, I went down into the garden to take leave of a young brother there. He asked me if I would carry something for him to Vesta. Vesta is a young sister, famous for her spiritual gifts, whirling, &c." I could have added—for I had seen Vesta—for other less questionable gifts in the world's estimation—a light graceful figure, graceful even in the Shaker straight jacket, and a face like a young Sybil's. "Well," continued brother W—, "he put his hand in his pocket as if to take out something, though I saw nothing, and a sort of a trickling heat run through me; and even now, when I think of it, I have the same feeling, fainter, but the same.

"When I got home I asked Vesta if she knew that young brother. 'Yes,' she said. I put my hand in my pocket and took it out again, to all earthly seeming as empty as it went in, and stretched it out to her. 'Oh, a white pear!' she said. As I hope for salvation, every word that I tell you is true," concluded the old man.

It was evident he believed every word of it to be true. The incredulous may imagine that there was some clandestine intercourse between the "young brother" and "young sister," and that simple old brother Wilcox was merely made the medium of a fact or sentiment, symbolized by the white pear. However that may be, it is certain that animal magnetism has penetrated into the cold and dark recesses of the Shakers.

Through the way of tears and sorrow, the soul rises to a substantial peace.

Incidents of Travel.

RAMBLE IN GENOA.

THERE is, doubtless, a great deal in making up one's mind to be pleased with a thing beforehand. Poetry had yielded to nausea and empty stomach (a valuable fact); the "blue Mediterranean" had become as ordinary salt water, and we had longed for the shore. It had seemed, too, as if nothing earthly could be more lovely, as we had approached it, than the prospect of Genoa, sweetly nestled in an amphitheater of hills and like a crescent encircling a charming bay, fanned only by the south; and as our eyes had surveyed its palaces, churches, convents, and garden, pleasantly mingled, and rising range after range far up the mountain, it had appeared as if it must be strangely delightful to roam there. And so it proved. To some it was the first invasion of the land of song and macaroni. There was romance in the porter's Italian, though diluted with French, and music in the placards and names of the streets. Recent rains had garnished the old painted walls, cleanly swept the streets, and purified the air. The sun was cheerily shining, and the sea breeze gently breathing, and earth, sea, and sky were again beautiful. It was one of those delicious southern mornings in autumn, like the spring time of our own clime, when one feels in love with all around. As if in good humor with the fine weather, all Genoa appeared in motion. The mules jingled their little bells, the market-women praised their wares, files of Sardinian soldiers in blue and red uniform primly passed, and even the fat monks with the cowl and dangling rope, and the grave-looking priests in long, black dresses, silk stockings, and turned-up hats, seemed livelier than usual.

The moment I had secured quarters, I started off in a fit of enthusiasm for a ramble. I was soon pleasantly bewildered among fine old palaces, with great marble steps, decorated above with lions and hybrid animals that never existed, representing the armorial devices of their former owners; massive churches; vast embankments filling up ravines; piles of brick and mortar, in the style of the Tower of Babel, and lofty terraces covered with the oleander, fig, and orange that reminded one of the hanging-gardens of olden time. There is a singular air of grandeur about every thing, and it is no wonder that the fervid, imaginative Italians, should have given this romantic city the epithet of La Superba. The closeness of the streets is compensated by their coolness, their cleanliness, and the magnificent views that break upon you from almost every point. I strolled on, seeming ever to go up hill, and never to reach the top; now gazing at a fine edifice, then admiring the trappings of an interesting donkey; again stopping to listen to the gambols of a troop of Genoese children with laughing black eyes, and then perhaps undertaking an exploring expedition up a mysterious winding passage, that branched off and grew narrower and narrower, to the serious inconvenience of larger people, till at last it terminated against a brick wall with a little gate affording a side-view of a court-yard with a dilapidated fountain, a noisy watch-dog, and a ferocious animal or two in stone that needed repairing. At last I came to a fine avenue of trees, with seats beneath them, and sat down to indulge in a day-dream. How imposing were still the ruins of that ancient sea-queen! The dust of centuries seemed to rest lightly there. A few touches to cracked and dingy walls, a little garnishing of marble steps and halls, and cleansing of old pictures, and all would be fresh again as in the days of the Dorians. The wealth that had so strongly cemented those imposing piles had been gathered from every clime. What a lesson on the power of freedom and commerce! From that sea-born city has issued a force that had crushed Pisa, and besieged Venice in the height of her glory in her own lagunes; her fleets had assisted to ferry over armies of Crusaders; and she had colonized rich possessions in the Mediterranean and Black seas, and encroached upon the suburbs of Constantinople. Her enterprise had given birth to the daring genius which had led the way to an unknown continent; the fortune of a single citizen had fitted out a fleet that had turned the scale in a conflict between two of the first monarchs of Europe, and delivered his country; and the draining of her bank by a patriotic English merchant had delayed for a year the Spanish Armada, and deranged the monetary affairs of the world.

I was getting into the sublime humor that sometimes comes over one almost unawares, under strong temptation, when my attention was diverted by some odd-looking peasants, and a vehicle laden with a curious article of merchandise. Possibly it was only its near relative inflated with a solid or fluid, but it looked like a sheep with its coat turned, in Russian style, and the head and extremities absorbed, and reminded one of the descriptions of the Arab water-sack.

Presently a troop of girls, possibly from an Italian boarding-school, with happy faces, came tripping along with their long white scarfs gracefully thrown over the head, and the ends floating in the breeze. The females of nearly all classes still retain this somewhat singular part of their ancient national costume. Like most peculiarities of this kind, it is adapted to the local circumstances of a fine climate and narrow streets, shaded by lofty houses. It is the simplest form of headdress imaginable; such as one might almost fancy Eve herself to have invented some fine evening. A piece of thin muslin, of the texture and appearance of a white veil, some yards in length, is merely thrown sideways loosely over the head, so as to expose the forehead and face, while the two free ends, hanging down on each side in front, are retained by the folded arms; and it gives the wearers a sort of a bridal appearance that is quite poetical.—[Dr. Corson's Loiterings in Europe.]

FIRST VIEW OF VENICE.

PRESENTLY we came to the low margin of the Adriatic, and in the distance, bright and fairy, as if she had just floated up from the caves of ocean, and reposed in state upon its breast, with the waves kissing her feet, lay beautiful Venice.

Within the few last years a bridge for the railroad, intended to be completed to Milan, has been built, at enormous expense, all the way over the shallow sea from Venice to the mainland, for a distance of more than two miles. As we came to this the cars slackened their pace, and we commenced gently crossing the lagune. The passage seemed to have lost much of its romance.

How charming it would have been to have first floated to the sea-born city, as in days of yore, in one of her own gondolas, soothingly, as the spirits in Indian story were borne to their island Paradise! How pleasant to have tempted the gondoliers to sing from Tasso!

There was little time for idle speculation. In ten minutes we were safely deposited in Venice. It is built, as most are aware, upon some seventy or eighty low islands, upon which, according to Gibbon, the Christian fugitives from Aquelia and the mainland, in the sixth century, sought refuge from the sword of Attila and the Huns.

There is but very little tide in the Adriatic, and the lagune is sheltered from storms by long projecting banks toward the sea, and marble palaces and churches in airy, Oriental style seem to rise as out of the calm waters themselves.

Communication is kept up between different parts of the city by about a hundred and fifty canals, and innumerable land passages, like alleys, three or four feet wide, perforating the masses of houses, and crossing these water-streets by bridges. These again are arched, to admit of boats and gondolas beneath, and thus almost every house in Venice is accessible both by land and water. The wonderful stillness occasioned by the absence of paved streets, carriages, or horses—the gliding of beautiful fairy barks noiselessly here and there—the effect of the rich, stately mansions of the ancient merchant-princes towering amid state palaces and churches—and occasional glimpses of the surrounding blue sea that laves their marble thresholds—all conspire to produce a strange impression at first, as if you were wandering in some enchanted place.—[Dr. Corson's Loiterings in Europe.]

BUSINESS NOTICE.

Agents without exception are requested to forward their reports immediately, in order that we may credit subscribers promptly and prevent confusion in our accounts. Send the report if only a dollar has been collected.

To subscribers we would again say, do not wait for an agent, but remit direct. Postmasters are allowed to frank your letters to publishers, and are always ready to do so. We prefer remittances direct from subscribers, and hope they will act accordingly.

GAZETTE OF THE UNION
AND GOLDEN RULE.

THE ORGAN OF THE ORDER,

Published under the auspices of the M. W. Grand Sire!

It will contain, from week to week, the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of the State of New-York, and also of other States; accounts of Celebrations, Institutions of new Lodges, and occasionally, a complete Directory of all the Lodges in the Union.

Its Literary department will be filled with Original Tales of the highest excellence, prepared by the most eminent writers in our country—Popular Tales; Choice Miscellany; the rarest Gems of Poetry from the English Poets; Sketches of Travel; Anecdotes, &c., &c.; and occasionally illustrated with beautiful Wood Engravings. Being equal in its Literary character to any Weekly in the country, and being thus perfect in its Odd-Fellowship department, it will be worthy of a place on the table of every brother of the Order.

The Gazette and Rule is published every Saturday, at 44 Ann-street, New-York, by CRAMPTON & CLARK, and is under the Editorial Superintendence of Rev. Bro. AUG. C. L. ARNOLD, P. C. P.

All Communications should be addressed to CRAMPTON & CLARK, 44 Ann-street, New-York.

Special Notices.

TRAVELING AGENTS—We shall be under the necessity of relinquishing the services of all traveling agents who do not make weekly returns. The names of all who do not follow this plan (without which the books of the office cannot be correctly kept) will be stricken from our published list of agents.

Subscribers are hereby notified not to pay money to an agent whose name is not in the paper. To our readers we would again say, do not depend upon agents, but remit to the office of the Gazette and Rule direct.

REMITTANCES—We hope our friends will bear in mind that the approaching celebration will afford great facilities for the settlement of accounts, and that none will fail to remember us, in the form of a remittance, by any brother who may visit New-York.

TO CLUBS—Any person obtaining the names of five new Subscribers, and sending us Ten Dollars, shall receive a sixth copy gratis for one year. Upon all subscriptions over five, the person sending the names and money may retain fifty cents as his commission. Payments invariably in advance.

Postmasters are authorized to remit money to Publishers, and all money mailed in presence of the Postmaster, and duly forwarded by him, is at our risk.

In all cases where postage on subscriptions is not paid, it will be deducted from the amount credited to those who send it.

Office of the Grand Secretary Grand Lodge State of New-York:

ODD FELLOW'S HALL, CITY OF NEW-YORK, }
March 13, 1849. }

To District Deputy Grand Masters, Officers of Lodges, and Brethren:

In consequence of the many complaints made to this Office of the failure of Deputies, Officers of Lodges and Members to receive communications which have been issued from this Office, and of the failure to receive many communications which have been intended to reach this Office, for several months last past, and which have been transmitted by Deputies, Lodges and individuals, you are therefore notified and requested to address all communications intended for the Grand Lodge, Grand Master, or Grand Secretary, to BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Box No. 538, Post Office, New-York, and in all cases to be particular that Letters and Documents are properly mailed, in order that a failure of papers intended for this, or sent from this Office, to reach their destination, may be traced to the proper cause.

Fraternally yours,
BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Grand Secretary.

GOURAUD'S LIBRARY OF ROMANCE.

JULIA WRIGHT—CANTO IX.

The other was a student of the law,
Handsome and eloquent, named Blackstone Story,
A scholar, he (unlike the man of war)
Was emulous of Fame, but not of Glory!
Mild, meek, in character without a flaw,
Was our love smitten hero, but before he
A declaration made of his attachment;
The Cornet's egg of love was near its hatchment!

POOR JULIA SEEMS TO BE "on the horns of a dilemma;" we would not be surprised if the lawyer consulted the soldier. In the meanwhile it must not be forgotten that GOURAUD'S ITALIAN MEDICATED SOAP is the richest thing on earth for purifying the skin from Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Sallowiness, Redness, Roughness, &c. GOURAUD'S POUDES SUBTILES immediately extirpate all hair to which they may be applied. GOURAUD'S GRECIAN HAIR DYE will change the color of red, light, or gray hair to a magnificent brown or black, as may be desired. Bear in mind that the genuine preparations of DR. F. FELIX GOURAUD are to be had genuine only at his depot, 67 Walker-st. first door FROM Broadway.

HAIR RESTORED.

From Mr. John E. Abbott, 223 Washington street, Boston.

Boston, Jan. 27, 1847.

Mr. Wm. Bogle.—Dear Sir: It is with great pleasure that I subscribe myself among the many, as being indebted to your justly celebrated Hyperion Fluid, for a good head of hair. Numbers of my friends also have derived great benefit from its use, and use every exertion in recommending it to others.

Yours respectfully,

JOHN E. ABBOTT.

WRIGHT'S INDIAN PILLS

THIS Superior Medicine may be had in part as follows:—At Dr. Wright's Offices in Philadelphia, 140 Race-street; New-York, 268 Greenwich-street; and Boston, 198 Tremont-street—and by 20,000 Agencies in North and South America, England, France, and Germany. Agents whose supplies become exhausted, can obtain a fresh lot at the Philadelphia rates, by addressing any of the above Offices. Care should be taken not to confound this medicine with other articles of similar name, so as to prevent disagreeable consequences; and in no case should it be purchased from individuals who cannot vouch for its genuineness. 246

PROF. BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS, OR MEDICATED COMPOUND,

FOR RESTORING, PRESERVING AND BEAUTIFYING HAIR, ERADICATING SCURF AND DANDRUFF, AND CURING DISEASES OF THE SKIN, GLANDS, AND MUSCLES, CUTS, STINGS, BRUISES, SPRAINS, &c. &c.

IN order to convince the public of the efficacy of any curative preparation, in this thinking and reflective age, it is necessary to explain the philosophy of its operation. The process by which Professor Barry's Tricopherous produces such extraordinary results, cannot be understood without a brief notice of the structure and uses of the delicate substances to which it is applied, and in the condition of which it accomplishes the most salutary changes. The connection between the hair and the skin is so close, that the one may be almost deemed a continuation of the other, and hence whatever renovates, restores, and nourishes the hair, must of necessity have a healthful influence upon the sensitive membrane in which its roots are fixed.

The skin, that wonderful envelop in which the sense of touch resides, consists of three layers; the EPIDERMIS or cuticle, a semi-opaque, or almost insensible film; the RETICULOCOSM, which is a spongy membrane reticulated with nerves and blood vessels, and forms a sort of shield to the exquisitely delicate TRUE SKIN; and the true skin itself, which constitutes the third layer of the triple envelop. In this tough, flexible and elastic integument, are located the nerves, blood-vessels, &c., which supply sustenance to the hair, and in the derangement of which diseases of the skin originate. The vessels of the true skin supply the sacs containing the roots of the hair with the moisture which sustains the fibres, and the same causes which affect the health of the hair, also affect the health of the skin. This is self-evident to the casual observer, as well as susceptible of demonstration by the anatomist and physiologist; for in all cutaneous diseases, the hair becomes dry and harsh, and falls out in such quantities as sometimes to render the patient partially or entirely bald. Wounds, burns, &c., on the skin of the head, also produce baldness on the portions of the scalp where the injury has been inflicted, thus proving the close affinity and sympathy between the organism of the skin and the hair.

The wonderful restorative and remedial properties of Professor Barry's Tricopherous, are based upon this hypothesis, or rather this fact. It acts through the skin upon the hair, stimulating the inert vessels, opening the pores, imparting activity to the circulation, awakening from their lethargy all the vegetative functions which give life, vigor, and beauty to the fibres, extirpating every particle of scurf and dandruff, and soon clothing even the bald or half denuded head with a thick, glossy, silky, and elastic covering.

But this is only one of the uses of Professor Barry's Tricopherous. The same properties which restore vital and vegetative power the skin of the head are equally beneficial in all cutaneous diseases, or superficial injuries. For cuts, burns, bites of insects, sprains, erysipelas, blotches, pimples, scabies, ring-worm, rashes, scrofula, prickly heat, chilblains, chapped hands, rheumatism, burns, scalds, bruises, redness of the skin, and in short all the troublesome and painful external diseases and injuries which are so common in families, and which NOTHING BUT EXTERNAL REMEDIES CAN REMOVE, the Tricopherous will be found a speedy, safe, and unfailing cure. By virtue of its double claim as a restorative and beautifier of nature's choicest ornament, and a potent and invaluable remedial agent, it is entitled to a place on every toilet, and in every medicine chest.

The following testimonials, selected from hundreds of similar import, will serve to show the value of the preparation, and the estimation in which it is held by those who have given it a trial.

COPY OF A LETTER FROM WILLIAM DAVIES,

Corner of Hicks and Atlantic streets, Brooklyn.

BROOKLYN, April 10th, 1849.

PROFESSOR BARRY.—Sir: I should be deficient in gratitude to you, and in feeling for others who may be similarly afflicted, if I neglected to inform you that your Tricopherous has entirely removed from my face a painful and disgusting eruption, consisting of large red pimples, with which I had been annoyed for many years. A regular application of the fluid according to the directions, for a little better than three weeks, completely relieved me of the nuisance, and the skin of my face is now as free from discoloration as in my boyhood.

Yours truly,

WILLIAM DAVIES.

New York, April 12th, 1849.

PROFESSOR BARRY.—Verily, my dear sir, your Tricopherous is the Admiral Crichton of its class. It not only relieves the head from scurf and dandruff, and imparts beauty and vigor to the hair, but it is, as I can testify from personal experience, a most valuable application for cuts abrasions, bruises, and those vile eruptions which are so annoying to children in the warm seasons, I have found nothing equal to it in cutaneous disorders; and if what I say is worth any thing to you, publish it and welcome.

Your obt. servant,

JAMES FITZGERALD.

COPY OF A LETTER FROM DR. LEE.

New York, Feb. 5, 1849.

MR. BARRY.—I have no hesitation in recommending an article which I can, of my own personal knowledge, endorse as good; and I therefore state with confidence, that your Tricopherous is what you claim it to be—an article for cleansing, preserving, beautifying, and promoting the growth of the hair.

I find it to be the best remedy I have ever had in my practice for scald head, ringworm, and diseases which the skin is subject to.

T. A. LEE, M. D.

The following testimonial is from Mr. Munn, editor of the Scientific American. Comment on such evidence is unnecessary.

New York, Feb. 24, 1849.

BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS is an article that we take pleasure in awarding the highest commendations. We do not do it upon the recommendations of others, but from our own personal knowledge of its effects upon the hair; while it tends to keep it healthy, soft and glossy, it also removes dandruff, prevents grey hair, and invigorates its growth in a manner unequalled by any other composition known to us. A person only needs to use one bottle to be convinced of its truth.

Sold in large bottles, price 75 cents, at the principal office, 139 Broadway.

THE PROPRIETORS having spent much time

in bringing this preparation of SARSAPARILLA to its present state of perfection; and the experience of fourteen years has furnished them the most ample opportunity to study, in their various forms, the diseases for which it is recommended, and to adapt it exactly to their relief and cure. Patients who wish a really good Medicine are invited to give it a trial, and satisfy themselves of its superiority, and the invaluable property it possesses of arresting and curing disease. The bottle has been enlarged to hold one Quart, and in its present improved form may safely claim to be the best and cheapest medicine of the age. Its progress to the fame it has attained may be traced by a long line of facts and cures, that stand as landmarks and beacons for the invalid, pointing the way to the haven of health; and what it has already done for the thousands who have used it, it is capable of doing for the millions still suffering and struggling with disease. It purifies, cleanses, and strengthens the fountain springs of life, and infuses new vigor throughout the whole animal frame.

DYSPEPSY CURED.

The following testimonial, from a gentleman so well known as Mr. Cox, requires no comment, and recommends itself to all similarly afflicted: NEW-ORLEANS, Dec. 18, 1848.

Messrs. A. B. & D. SANDS.—Gentlemen: Having experienced the most beneficial effects from the use of your Sarsaparilla, it gives me pleasure to add my testimony to the numerous spontaneous effusions of grateful hearts which you continually are receiving.

My case was dyspeptic, or rather I may term it a weakness of the digestive organs. For more than a year, I was troubled with wind upon my stomach and its frequent eructation, together with producing a spasmodic contraction of the heart, often gave me much annoyance. After trying various remedies without avail, I commenced with your Sarsaparilla. Before I had used half a bottle, almost every symptom of this disagreeable complaint had vanished, and in a few weeks its continued use effected a complete cure. I therefore confidently recommend it to all persons affected in the same manner, and have reason to believe that many who are suffering under a supposed disease of the heart, if they would take your Sarsaparilla, in a few weeks would find themselves restored to health in both mind and body. I remain yours, very truly,

JOHN V. COX, 93 Lexington Avenue.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA IN PRUSSIA.

The Proprietors of this valuable Medicine have just received an order from our esteemed friend and correspondent, Theodore S. Fay, Secretary of Legation to the Court of Prussia, for the use of a member of the Royal Family—a copy of which we herewith lay before our readers.—[Home Journal.

“U. S. LEXINGTON, BURLIN, Nov. 30, 1848.—Gentlemen: I wish you to send two dozen bottles of your Sarsaparilla, for the use of his Royal Highness Prince Waldimir of Prussia, to this Legation, as soon as possible. It is necessary that he should receive it immediately; therefore, please send it by first steamer. The bill can be made out in the name of the Prince, and sent with it: Your obedient servant,

“THEO. S. FAY.”

SCROFULOUS AFFECTION OF THE EYES.

SOUTH KINGSTON, (R. I.) Oct. 11, 1847.—Messrs. SANDS.—Gentlemen: My little daughter, when one year old, was attacked with a scrofulous humor on her face, which soon after extended into her eyes, causing almost total blindness in one of them, and disfiguring her whole face. I employed two physicians to attend her, who exhausted their utmost skill to give her relief, but it all proved useless, and finally one of them remarked to me that he had known of some striking cures effected by Sands' Sarsaparilla, and advised me to try it. I obtained one bottle, which she commenced using, and before it was all used up it had effected an entire cure. It is now over four years since she was cured, and there has been no reappearance of the disease, and we are satisfied that it is a perfect cure. It gives me great pleasure to add that I can recommend it to any sufferer from a similar complaint.

Respectfully yours,

GEORGE ROBINSON.

JULIA WRIGHT.—CANTO X.
In accents which a heart of stone might move—
But seasoned with the slightest dash of flattery—
Mars Sabretache told Julia all his love,
And vowed "to win her he would storm a battery;
Or lend a 'forlorn hope,' his love to prove!
What if her skin was dark?—her hair red?—no matter; he Was quite regardless of such TRIFLING things;
His Julia was an angel, MINUS wings!"

"LOVE RULES THE CAMP," &c., and our soldier seems to be over head and ears! but he appears to be unaware of the fact that GOURAUD'S ITALIAN MEDICATED SOAP will infallibly remove from the skin every vestige of Tan, Freckles, Sallowness, Redness, Roughness, Pimples, or other cutaneous eruptions! Equally ignorant he seems to have been of the value of GOURAUD'S POUDES SUBTILES in extirpating superfluous hair! 'Tis strange also, that it never occurred to him that Julia's red hair might have been colored a magnificent black, by GOURAUD'S GRECIAN HAIR-DYE! The value of GOURAUD'S LIQUID ROUGE for giving a permanent rosinose to pale cheeks, he seems to have been aware of, for he used it himself!

Dr. GOURAUD'S renowned preparations can only be obtained genuine at his depot, 67 Walker street, first store

BOGLE'S HYPERION FLUID.—We have repeatedly spoken in favor of this celebrated article for the hair, and, from the praise of those who have used it, we believe were fully justified in doing so; we therefore cheerfully give place to the following from the agent in Worcester:

"The sale of the Hyperion increases, and we are confident will supersede all the other preparations in use. We herewith enclose you a certificate, as one of the many proofs of its entire success:

"This may certify that nearly eight months since I lost all my hair, and for six months my head was entirely bald; at the end of that time, I purchased a bottle of Bogle's Hyperion Fluid of D. Scott, Jr. & Co., the agents in Worcester.
Since then I have used it regularly and strictly according to directions, in consequence of which, the hair has started all over my head. It is now about an inch long, and growing rapidly."

OLD DOCTOR
Jacob Townsend,
THE ORIGINAL DISCOVERER
OF THE GENUINE
TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA

Old Dr. Townsend is now about 70 years of age, and has long been known as the AUTHOR and DISCOVERER of the GENUINE ORIGINAL "TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA." Being poor, he was compelled to limit its manufacture, by which means it has been kept out of market, and the sales circumscribed to those only who had proved its worth and known its value. It had reached the ears of many, nevertheless, as those persons who had been healed of sore diseases, and saved from death, proclaimed its excellence and wonderful HEALING POWER. This

Grand and Unequalled Preparation is manufactured on the largest scale, and is called for throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Unlike young S. P. Townsend's, it improves with age, and never changes, but for the better; because it is prepared on scientific principles by a scientific man. The highest knowledge of Chemistry and the latest discoveries of the art, have all been brought into requisition in the manufacture of the OLD DR. SARSAPARILLA. The Sarsaparilla root, it is well known to medical men, contains many medicinal properties, and some properties which are inert or useless; and others, which, if retained in preparing it for use, produce fermentation and acid, which is injurious to the system. Some of the properties of Sarsaparilla are so volatile, that they entirely evaporate and are lost in the preparation, if they are not preserved by a scientific process, known only to those experienced in its manufacture. Moreover, these volatile principles fly off in the form of an acrid vapor, which, if inhaled, is very dangerous to the health, and produces a violent inflammation of the lungs, throat, and every other part.
But in no other of these medicinal properties of the root, which give it its all its value. The

GENUINE
Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's Sarsaparilla

is so prepared, that all the inert properties of the Sarsaparilla root are first removed, every thing capable of becoming acid or of fermentation, is extracted and rejected; then every particle of medicinal virtue is secured in a pure and concentrated form; and thus it is rendered incapable of losing any of its valuable and healing properties. Prepared in this way, it is made the most powerful agent in the

Cure of Innumerable Diseases.
Hence the reason why we hear commendations on every side in its favor by men, women, and children. We find it denoted in the cure of CONSUMPTION, DYSPEPSIA, and LIVER COMPLAINT, and in RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA and PILES, COSTIVENESS, all CU-TANEOUS ERUPTIONS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, and all affections arising from

Impurity of the Blood.
It possesses a marvellous efficacy in all complaints arising from indigestion, from Acidity of the Stomach; from unequal circulation, from morbid action of the blood, from irritation of the bowels, from cold feet and cold hands, cold and wet sores on the body. It has not its equal in coughs and colds; and promotes easy expectoration, and gentle perspiration, relaxing stricture of the lungs, throat, and every other part.
But in nothing is its excellence more manifestly seen and acknowledged than in all kinds and stages of

Female Complaints.
It works wonders in cases of fluor albus or white, Falling of the Womb, Obstructed, Suppressed, or Painful Menstrue, Irregularity of the monthly periods, and the like; and is effectual in curing all forms of the Kidney Disease.

By removing obstructions, and regulating the general system, it gives tone and strength to the whole body, and cures all forms of

Nervous Diseases and Debility, and thus prevents or relieves a great variety of other diseases, as Spinal Irritation, Neuralgia, St. Vitus Dance, Whooping, Epileptic Fits, Convulsions, &c.
It is not possible for this medicine to fail to do good; it has nothing in it which can ever harm or do evil; and therefore, can never lose its curative properties. It cleanses the blood, excites the liver to healthy action, tones the stomach, and gives good digestion, relieves the bowels of torpor and constipation, allays inflammation, purifies the skin, equalizes the circulation of the blood, produces gentle perspiration, and equally all over the body, and the insensible perspiration; relieves all strictures and tightness, removes all obstructions, and invigorates the entire nervous system. Is not this, then,
The Medicine you Pre-eminently Need?

But can any of these things be said of S. P. Townsend's inferior article
This young man's liquid is not to be

Compared with the Old Dr.'s, because of one GRAND FACT, that the one is INCAPABLE of DETE-RIORATION and

Never Spoils.
while the other DOES; it sours, ferments, and blows the bottles containing it like a gun, and the acid liquid exploding, and damaging other goods! Must not this horrible compound be poisonous to the system?
What! put acid into a system already diseased with acid! What causes Dyspepsia but acid? Do we not all know, that when food soon as our stomachs, it produces indigestion, flatulence, heartburn, and all the insupportable diseases of the stomach, liver, and bowels, and corruption of the blood? What is Scrofula but an acid humor in the body? What produces all the humors which bring on Eruptions of the Skin, Scald Head, Itch, Rheum, Erysipelas, White Swellings, Bores, and all ulcerations, internal and external, which it produces? Is it not a sure sign, that they which sour, and thus spoils all the fluids of the body, more or less. What causes Rheumatism, but a sour acid fluid, which insinuates itself between the joints and elsewhere, irritating and inflaming the tender and delicate ligaments upon which it acts? So of nervous diseases, of impurity of the blood, of deranged circulation, and nearly all the ailments which afflict human nature.

Now, is it not horrible to make and sell, and infinitely worse to use this
Souring, Fermenting, Acid "Compound"
OF S. P. TOWNSEND!

and yet he would fain have it understood that Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's GENUINE ORIGINAL SARSAPARILLA, is an IMITATION of his inferior preparation!!
Heaven forbid that we should deal in an article which would harm the most distant resemblance to S. P. Townsend's article; and which should bring down upon the Old Dr. such a mountain load of complaints and diseases from Agents who have sold, and purchasers who have used S. P. Townsend's FERMENTING COMPOUND.

We wish it understood, because it is the absolute truth, that S. P. Townsend's article and Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's Sarsaparilla are heaven-wide apart, and infinitely dissimilar; that they are unlike in every particular, having not one single thing in common.

As S. P. Townsend is no doctor, and never was, is no chemist, no pharmacutician—knows no more of medicine or disease than any other common man, what guarantee can the public have that he can be the author of a genuine scientific medicine, containing all the virtues of the articles used in preparing it, and which are incapable of changes which might render them the AGENTS of DISEASE instead of health?

It is to arrest frauds upon the unfortunate, to pour balm into wounded imagery, to kindle hope in the despairing bosom, to restore health and bloom and vigor into the crushed and broken, and to banish infirmity—that OLD DR. JACOB TOWNSEND has SOUGHT and FOUND the opportunity and means to bring his

Grand Universal Concentrated Remedy, within the reach, and to the knowledge of all who need it, that they may learn and know, by joyful experience, its

Transcendent Power to Heal!
and then to have the unspeakable satisfaction of having lived thousands and millions from the bed of sickness and dependency to hope, health, and a long life of vigor and usefulness to themselves, their families and friends.

THE DYING GIRL'S ENTREATY.

BY MRS. H. S. DE GROVE.

ONCE more enfold me with Love's circling arms,
As sinks my spirit to its final rest;
'Twill soothe my anguish, hush my vague alarms,
That, gathering, shroud my pathway to the blest.
Gently, still gently murmur I am thine,
And pierce with earnest glance my sunken eye;
Closer, 'tis bitter joy to call thee mine,
And know the mandate pass'd that bids me die.

To feel life's torch wane slowly to decay,
While kindles still the flame that lit mine own;
To yield, as visions lost, each dreamy ray
Whose radiant gleam was on the Future thrown;
Better to part from life e'er cold and blight
Had palsied e'en my sweetest hope in thee,
Than, sickening, mark Love's fading, dying light,
As shadows mingle in thy destiny.

Nay, murmur not, for oft at eventide,
An angel-voice shall whisper thee of love,
And thou wilt worship still thine angel bride,
Who e'er thee watches from her home above.
Unseen the Spirit Land draws near—the Home
From whence divided we as wanderers come—
Returning soon we mingle, and, with tears,
Chant a sad requiem o'er life's wasted years.

THE DREAM OF SHAKSPERE.

(IMAGINARY.)—BY FLORASTELLA.

'Twas night—a summer night—and the moon's rays
Stole through the window of a lowly cot,
And fell upon a fair young face. A boy
Lay, seemingly, in troubled sleep, and on His lofty brow reposed a wondrous light
Of thought, too bright, too deep for man to read.
Anon a smile lit up his face, as if
This vision to his wondering soul appeared:
In Heaven, where skies are clear, and bright, and
pure,

A cloud came floating through the azure vault;
He on it gazed intent, and as he looked,
It changed, and changed again, and then it seemed
The semblance of an angel, whose sweet face
Beamed mildly on him, and a lily hand
Did beckon him away. Then golden wings
Seem'd to him given, and thro' the sky he soared
With eagle strength and swiftness, until he knelt

Beside the radiant angel, whose pure eyes
Smiled on the boy with love ineffable,
As thus to him she spake: "Thy Future see!"
He looked above; the sky was filled with stars,
And one more brilliant than the rest came near.
He from it shrank, but lo, the holy one Did pluck it as a flower, and place it on The dreamer's brow, and said: "As this among Its fellows is, so shall thy name be bright,
Surpassing all in glory and extent."

The dreamer woke—not to forget the dream,
But bore its precious memory evermore.
In after years, when its fulfillment came,
And round his brow the laurel wreath was bound,
The angel came again, and claimed that star,
And took it back to Heaven, but kindly left
A reflex of its brightness to illumine
The world for ever.

Original American Romance.

THE BRAVO'S DAUGHTER; OR, THE TORY OF CAROLINA. *

A Romance of the American Revolution.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY AUGUSTINE J. H. DUGANNE.

The evening gun boomed once more over the waters, and the steps of the corporal's guard approached the prisoners. Again their iron rivets of their manacles were loosed, and the heavy log-chain fell to the ground.

Ernest Rivers and the British corporal exchanged rapid glances of intelligence.

"Now!" cried the Englishman.

"Now!" echoed Tom, the ranger.

And away across the sands, toward the water wall dashed the fugitive prisoners, with the British soldiers apparently in close pursuit. No noise had as yet been made, nor had their movements been observed from the castle ramparts.
Ernest Rivers felt his heart swell in his bosom,
as he flew across the yielding sands.

The old man, grasping the small hand of his boy, panted in the rear, and it seemed then as if even that hopeless mourner was inspired anew with the desire of life and liberty. On they dashed. They reached the sea-wall—they beheld the boat. In a moment more, Tom Evans had sprang over the gunwale, and grasped an oar in his stalwart hand.

Rivers followed, and after him sprang the boy, dragging his father's feeble frame. The British corporal at this moment reached the strand.

* Continued from page 211.

"Come on!" cried Rivers; "freedom or death, now!"

"I'm with you," answered the Briton, leaping into the boat.

Two of his comrades followed him. The two others paused upon the beach.

"Come on!" exclaimed the corporal.

But the soldiers turned pale and hesitated.

"Then if you will not come give me your guns," cried the leader, and in an instant he had sprung back upon the beach, and seized the muskets of his faint-hearted associates.

They yielded them without resistance, and as the determined corporal regained the boat, both turned and fled along the shore. At this instant a musket shot sounded from the castle-wall above them.

They were discovered!

"Away—push off, and row for your lives!"
cried the British corporal.

The fugitives needed no second order. They bent upon their oars, and with a sudden force the boat shot out into the channel.

Then was heard the quick roll of the alarm drum, in the castle, and presently a shower of bullets, from a score of muskets, pattered around the boat.

"Pull for your lives, men!"

Away flew the boat, spinning and whirling through the dangerous rapids, which formed the harbor's mouth of St. Augustine. These desperate fellows gave the whole strength of excitement to their efforts. The wide sweep of each stroke carried them on with fearful rapidity, while the swift current, setting seaward, accelerated their speed.

"Pull for your lives, men—we are chased!"
cried the corporal once more, as the musket shots began to fall thicker; and at the same moment a body of soldiers were seen embarking in boats, to pursue them.

The fugitives were as yet inside of the battery's range, but would soon reach a point commanded by all the seaward armament of the fort. The English leader glanced at the boats just pushing from the shore, and a grim smile crossed his lip.

"They will have to pull hard!" cried he.

The shots from the castle now ceased, for the pursuers had emerged into the channel, and intercepted the range of shot.

"Pull away! pull away!" cried the Briton.

On, through the foaming waters, towards the ocean, careered the boat; and behind came the pursuers, straining every nerve to overtake their prey. And now another peril arose frowning before the Americans.

A low, moaning noise swept over the surface of the water, growing louder and louder as it neared the harbor's mouth. Then a heavy swell rocked the frail bark, and a strong breeze rushed landward. The fugitives, tugging at their oars, glanced for a moment around, and beheld an awful cloud spreading upward from the sea horizon, and covering the rising waves with a pall-like blackness. Higher and higher it mounted, swallowing up the twilight; and foreboding one of those terrible storms, which, on the dangerous coast of the Floridas, are nearly always fatal to the hapless mariner who encounters their fury.

"In a moment more we shall be under the guns of the fort, and one battery will sink us," said one of the British soldiers, with a terrified look toward the corporal.

"Never you fear that," answered the determined man. "They'll not fire. Look—if they pour their grape and canister from the ramparts, they may hit friends as well as foes."

He pointed, as he spoke, to the pursuing boats, which had divided, and were somewhat scattered; but all, like their own little vessel, under cannon shot of the castle.

"Pull away," continued the corporal, "and never mind the big guns!"

The cloud grew blacker and blacker ahead of them, and the surging swell of the waters rocked them, as they swept on toward the harbor's mouth. The twilight was rapidly disappearing over the channel, though still, behind the towers of St. Augustine, the sky was crimson with the traces of sunset.

The boats behind were gaining rapidly, and the almost despairing fugitives could hear the shouts of the British, summoning them to surrender. But no thought had these men save of freedom or death.

"Pull away!" still cheerily cried the corporal, and still the escaped captives swept their heavy oars.

The foremost of the pursuers was now within gunshot, and the commanding officer's voice was heard calling upon the Americans to ship their oars.

"Bring to, or we sink you!" came distinctly to their ears.

No answer was returned; but the men bent anew upon their sweeps, in desperation. Again the command to bring to was shouted, followed immediately by a shower of bullets.

A cry of terrible anguish echoed the musketry—a cry as if all the terror of a human soul was concentrated in one convulsive shriek. Ernest Rivers, as he held the tiller of the boat, felt his blood shrink in his veins at that fearful cry.

It was a father's shriek. And, as Rivers looked again, he beheld the wretched old man straining to his bosom the bleeding body of his son. The oars had dropped from the hands of both, and were swept away by the waves.

There, clasping his child to his arms, the desolate old gray-headed father sank to the bottom of the boat. The boy's eyes were fixed in a look of dying love upon his face—his pale, young lips quivered, and he pressed his small hand upon his side, whence from the bullet wound, a stream of dark red blood was pouring.

"My father—we are—free!" murmured the boy, with a last effort.

Then he sank gently back, and was dead. But on his lip was a smile of peace and happiness, as if he indeed were free.

The corporal glanced in the wake of the boat, and beheld his exulting pursuers. He threw down his oar, and raised his musket to his shoulder.

"I will not kill my former comrades," he muttered. "They are but the slaves of tyranny. But," he continued, with a fierce oath, "I will shoot that officer, so help me heaven!"

He fired as he spoke, and the British officer fell back in the stern-sheets of his boat, a corpse.

It was the salvation of the fugitives. The pursuing bark, losing the guidance of her rudder, whirled round among the rapids, and became totally unmanageable. The corporal, who had again grasped his oar, gave once more the order:

"Pull, my men, pull!"

And now another mighty roll, mocking the feeble voice of mortal artillery, was heard above those waters. It was the thunder, crashing through that terrible cloud, which overhung them, crashing like ten thousand cannon, and rocking sea and shore with its reverberations. The frail boat rose and trembled upon the lifted waves, then settled in a fearful gulf, then plunged on with the fury of a wild horse, toward the wide, black ocean.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE OCEAN TORTURE.

Water, water every where;
Yet never a drop to drink! COLERIDGE.

A STORM upon the coast of Florida is a battle of all the elements. Fire, air, earth, and water, meet and dispute with each other the mastery of man. The terrible reefs and headlands hurl back the wind-ridden waves, and the sky bows down in blackness over all, vomiting forth flame and thunder.

And now, while the night and the tempest encompassed her, that frail boat, freighted with the living and the dead, rushed outward to the ocean. Pursuers were left far behind; for the mountain billows rose in fearful barriers behind the fugitives. They were now safe from the rage of man, but the fury of nature was lashing the path before them.

The corporal and the three other rowers drew in their useless oars; and clinging to the gunwales suffered the boat to drive before the wind. Ernest Rivers still grasped the tiller, and endeavored to keep the prow of the slight vessel before the force of the outward gale; for upon the sea, wild and stormy as it was, lay their only hope of safety. The heavy clouds of spray whirled around his form, drenching his garments at every gust; while darker and darker, as they plunged on, grew the face of the waters; and fiercer howled the voice of the storm. The blinding mists hid from each the face of his comrade; each clung for life to his position, uttering no word, and scarcely daring to think of the coming horrors of the awful night.

And in the bottom of that boat crouched the desolate father, hugging to his breast his murdered boy.

Stretched upon those frail planks, the gray-haired father wound his arms around his dead son, and pillowed upon his cheek the cold, pale forehead. The waves, dashing their spray above, disturbed him not; the roar of the winds and thunder was all unheeded. The wretched father thought only of one terrible event—he heard but one awful sound—the death-shot which had struck his gentle boy.

Oh, the long, horrible night, which those despairing fugitives spent upon the wild ocean, struggling for life against the madness of nature! They spoke no word to each other—they took no heed of the dead in their midst—they only clung, pantingly, each to his frail support; and prayed, yet dared not hope, for deliverance.

But the morning at length dawned, and the storm sank into the bosom of the deep. The land was no longer to be seen; and how far that frail bark had drifted and plunged during the long hours of darkness, none of her wretched crew could tell. All around them was one wide stretch of water, glistening now in the first faint glimmerings of the day. They strained their eyes to catch some speck of land, or the white canvas of some ship, in the distance; but in vain! All was a desert of water.

The sun arose, higher and higher above the rim of the ocean. Then these men began to look fearfully into each other's faces, as if they dreaded to behold the expression of madness. Then the gaze of Ernest Rivers, and the blood-shot eyes of his poor companions, fell upon the desolate wretch at the bottom of the boat, still clinging to his bloody burthen.

"Oh, my God, this is terrible!" cried the corporal.

"But we are free!" answered Rivers, with a despairing smile.

"Ay, and we must not give up," said the corporal, suddenly rousing himself. "What say you, comrades, we have neither chart nor compass, but we have yonder sun to guide us. Let us pull bravely, and we shall reach land before night, though God alone knows where we are now."

The man nearest to the speaker grasped his oar, and essayed to lift it; but his strength was unequal to the effort; it fell from his hand.

"I'm beat out," he muttered with quivering lips.

"I have here in my breast pocket," said the corporal, "three hard biscuits, and a flask of rum. We will take one of these biscuits and divide it into six pieces, for our breakfast. Each man shall then have a sip of the liquor. What say you, comrades?"

The calm voice in which the corporal spoke these words inspired those who listened to him with hope. Each man signified his assent to the proposition, and in a few moments the hard ship-bread was divided into six fragments.

The sea was exceedingly rough, and the boat tossed up and down upon the waves. The sun had now risen an hour above the horizon, and its beams were just beginning to be felt by the weary, shivering fugitives. But, as yet, the old man had not lifted his head from his son's body, nor glanced once at the faces of his companions. He crouched in the same position in which he had fallen, with his dying child, to the boat's bottom, straining the lifeless corpse to his bosom with an immovable embrace. Except from the shivering spasm, which at intervals shook his frame, the old man might have been thought dead himself.

Rivers bent over, and whispered to the corporal:

"Had we not better have the youth buried?"

"There's a bit of sacking yonder in the bows," returned the Briton. "We might wrap the poor lad in it, and say the burial service over it—if so be that you recollect it, sir—I'm afraid I don't."

"We can at least say a prayer," said Rivers, solemnly. "Speak, Nevers, to the old man."

Nevers, as the corporal was named, touched the father lightly, and as gently as possible signified his desire. But the old man looked up with a fierce glare, and drew the body closer to his breast.

"The sun is rising, and the heat will be horrible to bear by noon," said Rivers. "Your son cannot then remain in the boat."

"The captain speaks the truth," spake now, for the first time, the voice of Tom Evans, who had since day break been leaning in the bow of the boat, apparently incapable of motion.

It was singular to notice how severely the hardship they had endured, had affected those strong men—Evans, the corporal and the two other British deserters—while the weak frame of Ernest Rivers seemed to bear up with great fortitude, and exhibit little traces of suffering.

"The captain speaks the truth," said Evans. "We must let the poor boy sink in the deep. And it is better, comrades," continued the ranger, drawing near the old man, and grasping his hand—"better for the lad to be where he is than in a dungeon. He is now at least free!"

The last word of the ranger—"free"—seemed to strike upon the old father's heart. It was the word which had concluded the dying murmurs of his child. The desolate wretch looked up with a gaze of hopeless sorrow.

"He is free!" he cried; "my boy is free! Oh, God! oh, God!"

A sudden torrent of tears gushed from the eyes of the man, and fell upon the fair face of the dead boy. It was upturned, as the father raised his head, and the eyes of all those sympathizing companions were drawn toward it. The soft hair fell damp and heavy about the young brow, white as alabaster, and the eyes were closed, with the long lashes dropping as if in slumber. A sweet, placid expression lingered around the lips, such as is often noticed upon the faces of those who have died from bullet wounds. Had the youth's bloody form been covered from view, it might have seemed, from those calm features, as if he were but sleeping.

"His soul is free for ever, poor old man," said Rivers. "Would that we were all as happy and secure as your child."

Once more that father bent over the corpse, and threw his arms around it. He kissed the cold lips, while still the hot tears gushed from his eyes. Those tears were a relief. They soothed the delirium of his brain. Presently, while yet the others gazed, the old man raised himself slowly on his knees, and covering his face with his hands, seemed to pray with inward fervor, though his parted lips emitted no sound. Then, when his brief prayer was ended, the father turned quietly toward Rivers, and in a low voice, said:

"Bury your dead."

The heart of the captain sank within him as he heard those words, and remembered that but for him the boy might now have been alive. The quick glance of Evans caught the expression of the young man's thought, and stretching out his hand, he whispered:

"Not your fault, sir—no, it was I that tempted the poor lad. And thank God do I that he is free!"

"We know not yet what may be our fate," cried the Corporal, Nevers, who had likewise interpreted the feelings of Rivers. "None of us know, as yet, what that lad has escaped."

The few arrangements for the burial of the youth were soon completed; and the body, wound in a piece of drenched sacking, was committed to the awful depths of the ocean. Not a tear did the heart-broken father shed during the ceremony; it seemed, indeed, as if that last gush of grief had dried up the channels of his soul for ever.

But, when the last prayer was said, and the form of his beloved sank with a sudden plunge into the unfathomable sea, drawn downward by a ballast-stone, which had been placed in his rude shroud, the old man sat down silently in the bows of the boat, folded his arms across his breast, and closed his eyes. The sunbeams fell upon his gray hairs, but he took no heed of it. All that had warmed his withered life was now no more upon the earth.

The fragments of biscuit were now divided, but when his share was proffered to him, he put silently away the hand that presented it. The flask of wine was placed to his mouth, but he drank not, the liquor scarce moistened his thin, parched lips.

Then that solitary share of the biscuit was placed apart by those pitying men for their stricken comrade; their own scanty portions were consumed, and the flask passed from lip to lip, each barely wet by the few drops that were drunk. They had—those wretched men—but two biscuits more, and God only knew how long they were to drift upon that ocean.

The sun was like a ball of fire, as it hung above the boat, at noon, pouring its vertical rays upon the crew's unsheltered heads. They had relinquished the design of attempting to gain the shore, not only from the exhausted state to which their labors and exposure had reduced them, but also because they had apparently been driven by the storm into the channel of the gulf stream, and were now borne by that gigantic current in a direction in which it was more than probable they should cross, before night-fall, the course of some vessel.

Long and agonizing were the hours, as they passed. The sufferers had contrived, with the oars and a piece of sacking, united with their coats, to rig up a sort of screen, which partially sheltered them from the direct fierceness of the sun; but this could not prevent the excessive heat from parching their throats and drying up their blood.

The noon passed, and the hours still dragged on. Few words were exchanged between the wretched voyagers; they only looked earnestly into one another's eyes, as if to borrow consolation. And each endeavored, too, to smile at times; and perhaps, even venture a light word. All except the childless old man.

He moved not from the bows of the boat—heeded not, it seemed, the heat. Oh, wretched, heart-broken sire! what indeed was suffering to him who had seen his beloved ones die?

The sun began to descend. Still no sail gleamed upon that wide ocean. The evening breeze arose, and blew upon the fevered foreheads of the men. It cooled the fire of their blood.

The sun disappeared—dipped beneath the water, and was gone. Then rode forth the silver moon, shedding a flood of white rays over the ocean.

But no sail reflected the moonbeams.

Another night passed on. And through the long hours the boat crew slept at intervals, from sorrow and fatigue. But their dreams were terrible, and they ever and anon awoke from their disturbed slumbers, with gushing, stifled shrieks.

Another morning dawned in gray light, and once more arose the sun, and darted its beams across the waters.

But they revealed no sail.

The feeble hands of Corporal Nevers could scarce part the hard biscuits into fragments for his comrades. Tom Evans, the blithe-hearted, wore a sickly smile. Ernest Rivers looked fearfully haggard, and tottered as he arose to take his share of the bread.

But the old man refused again his fragment of the store. The flask went round, but he drank not. Rivers forced a few drops into the wretch's mouth, but he did not seem to taste it.

Oh, the horror of that morning! Noon came again, and the red ball of fire rained down its blaze upon the heads of the crew, burning into their very brains. Then they looked fiercely into one another's eyes, and read in each dry orb what no tongue could speak—the thirst, the fiery thirst for water!

Thirst! It is the torture of the doomed and lost of another world! It is the fire which is never quenched; the undying worm that gnaweth and will not be appeased. Oh! terrible, terrible, is it to thirst upon the ocean, beneath a blazing sky!

And yet no sail appeared.

When night came the last biscuit was divided, and the flask drained. They could not wait for another morn. They ate their last morsel, and gulped the last drop of rum.

But the thirst and the hunger fled not. Nearly three days had the biscuit and liquor been all those wretched men had tasted. The night wore away, and the morn came again.

But why relate the horrors of that day? No sail appeared!

And where was the childless old man? He had sank to the bottom of the boat; and the poor wretch raved of his child, called the boy by soft names, and murmured:

"We will be happy, my son. We will escape!"

He kissed the phantom of his delirium in imaginary transport, and patted the cheek and parted the clustering curls of his shadowy beloved one.

The fourth day dawned, and the sun rose up. And then the five younger men drew their heads together and glared into each other's eyes. Then, in a gasping whisper, the British corporal spoke a few words.

They drew near the maniac father, who was mumbling in the bows of the boat, and to him Nevers whispered again.

The words of the corporal seemed to recall the senses of the old man. His glance wandered over all their faces, and then he spoke. His voice, though he had eaten nought for four days, was clearer and stronger than that of the stalwart Briton. He comprehended their purpose, and said:

"You want to cast lots to die!"

The five men bowed their heads. They had resolved that one should be slain to feed the rest. The cannibal glittered in their fixed eyes; for hunger and thirst had destroyed humanity.

"Let us begin."

Six threads, of different lengths, were wound and knotted together in a ball, with as many ends protruding from it. Then each man clutched one of these fatal ends.

He who drew the shortest thread was to die! Slowly, slowly, the knotted ball was unwound; the wretched men glaring at the unraveled strings. One by one the threads separated. Then kneeling in the boat, beneath the fiery sun, the cannibals measured their threads.

Ernest Rivers held the shortest thread. He must die!

"I am ready!" cried the young captain.

And then those men marked that the eyes of the desolate father gleamed as if with triumph. Perhaps he thought that his son's death was thus avenged.

"I am ready!" said Ernest Rivers.

But Tom Evans, the ranger, feebly lifted his hand. He gasped for utterance, and at last spoke:

"Me!" he murmured. "Me! captain. I'll die for you!"

As the poor fellow said this he strove to rise, but fell back, exhausted. Ernest Rivers bared his breast.

"I have drawn the lot of death, comrades," he said; "I am ready for the knife!"

But none as yet stirred. All eyes looked out once more over the waste of water, as if even then they hoped a vessel might appear.

But no sail was on that ocean.

Presently the old man spoke:

"I have the knife!" he said, and as he spoke he raised in his hand the gleaming blade of the knife, which they had used to divide the biscuit.

Ernest Rivers knelt down and presented his bosom to the blow.

It fell! but it struck not the young man! That knife was sheathed in the bosom of him who wielded it. The old man fell a corpse to the bottom of the boat; and his last words were heard by those famishing men:

"I, too, am free!"

CHAPTER XV.

LAURELWOOD HOUSE.

Embowered in woods,
And hidden in a sylvan vale.—

THE TWO FRIENDS.

On the border of a small river in the interior of South Carolina, stood in 1777, a mansion which was then at least a century old. It bore less the appearance of a private residence than of a fortified post, as the thick walls, heavy buttresses, and small loop-hole-like windows, were evidently intended as defenses against attack or siege. In fact, the building had been a block-house, or garrison, for the small settlement around it, to which during the Indian wars, the inhabitants were wont to retire when threatened by a savage incursion.

A growth of oak and palmetto stretched around the place, forming a natural wall along the river banks, for the plantations appurtenant to the dwelling. Before the house was also an avenue of trees, leading from the front door to the main road, about a quarter of a mile distant.

Up this avenue, about a year after the abduction of the blind girl Alice from her father's protection, crept slowly, at the dusk of evening, the figure of a man. Beneath the shadowy trees the person skulked, pausing every moment to listen for some distant sound.

The front windows of the house, looking on a sort of mossy balcony above the porch, were open, and seated at one of them was a young girl. Her head was pressed against the vine which clambered around the casement, and the breeze wafted back and forth a few stray ringlets that hung from a forehead white as snow. She seemed seated there purposely to feel and enjoy the cool zephyrs that floated upward, burdened with all the perfume of the thousand flowers of the valley. Her eyes were closed, and at first view, she appeared to be wrapt in slumber, but on close inspection, it would become certain that she was blind.

In fact, this young girl was Alice, the child of Mat Orrall.

The person who skulked beneath the trees, gradually drew near the house, and presently stood immediately beneath the balcony where sat the blind girl, though concealed from the eyes of any one within the house by the deepening shadow, and likewise by the thick vines which he bent down over his figure. Thus hidden, he could have a complete view, not only of the window, and balcony, but also of the entire avenue which he had just traversed.

The man's gaze, however, seemed riveted upon the face of the blind girl, to the forgetfulness of every other object, and his glances seemed like living fire. The unconscious girl reposed against the vine-wreathed casement, her lips parted to inhale the evening breeze, and revealing teeth of whiteness almost dazzling. Her cheek was very pale, as if she had suffered from illness, or confinement, and there was a small spot of red upon either cheek that was not good to see. She was clad in a white dress, of fine muslin, which sat well upon her slight, graceful figure, and made it seem almost ethereal to the beholder.

Thus thought her father, Mat Orrall the outlaw, for it was he who now, from those dim shadows, looked upon his child.

It was the first time since his parting with her on the night before the battle of Fort Sullivan, that he had seen the object with which his life was wound up.

He had left the house of Robert Atree, on the night when he received the thousand pounds, with his fierce spirit worked to a pitch of desperation. Baffled but not convinced by the coolness of his employer, the bravo still resolved to watch like a blood-hound him whom he suspected of being privy to the mysterious disappearance of his child.

For this purpose, he had remained concealed for nearly a week in the vicinity of Atree's Charleston residence, scarcely allowing himself to partake of food, so earnest was his determination to track the robber. He suspected Robert Atree, and yet could not divine the motive which should impel him. Never did the outlaw imagine that there were other and higher motives of ambition to actuate the tory besides the mere pleasure of revenge.

Nearly a week did Orrall watch the house of his employer, and dog his footsteps when he walked abroad. But Atree had taken his precautions. On the very night of his last interview with the bravo, and even while he was writhing beneath the man's grasp, the blind girl, under the care of the negress Gottan, and her quadroon daughter, was conveyed secretly from Charleston, to the country residence of the Atree family, called Laurelwood. This was the mansion which we described at the opening of this chapter, and here had the gentle Alice been closely kept for the entire year which had elapsed.

Robert Atree himself left Charleston in little over a week after the repulse of the British from Sullivan's Island. At the same time that he became assured of the loss of Ernest Rivers, he learned also another piece of intelligence, that Lord Marmount had fallen, during the combat, by a shot from the fort. This information startled yet delighted him. He remembered the last conversation which he had had with the deceased nobleman, in which he had learned that Alice, the bravo's child, was the heiress to all his estates and titles. This news filled the young tory's mind with the most ambitious projects; for he immediately perceived that all which would be necessary, was to prove the fact of Orrall's being the father of the girl, to entitle her to the succession.

He now had the blind girl in his power, and what was to prevent his marrying her? Skillful physicians might cure her blindness, and once his wife, he could easily gain the bravo's testimony to the fact of her being Marmount's granddaughter. This proved, Robert Atree the tory, or at least his eldest-born, would be a peer of England!

Another event had occurred which prompted Atree to rest his project principally upon the blind girl. This was the sudden and dangerous illness of Louise Rivers, consequent upon her receiving the terrible news of her husband's death. The blow had stricken her to the earth, and when the plotting tory left Charleston, her life was almost despaired of.

Thus it followed, that when Mat Orrall had dogged the steps of his employer with unavailing assiduity for a week, he learned all at once that Atree had left the city, none knew whither. The bravo muttered a deep curse, and left also, determined to track his child the world over.

For a year his quest had been fruitless, till lately, he had learned in his wanderings of the existence of the country house of Atree, Laurelwood; from which, he likewise ascertained, its master had been absent for nearly a year, but was shortly looked for by the servants of the family. This information was sufficient to impel the vengeful bravo to seek the place, and thither had he now come, and, safely hidden from observation, was gazing on the features of his long-lost child.

Mat Orrall looked out from the shadow upon the white robed blind girl. His dark soul was struggling with all the fierce passions which were its nature. Now, he would mutter oaths of vengeance on Robert Atree—then he would murmur soft words, as if his child might hear them. All the time, he never withdrew his eyes from that pale face, though it grew dim in the increasing dusk.

At last the night fell thicker around the mansion, and then the face of his child vanished from the bravo's vision. Yet still he remained wrapt as it were in gazing at the casement; but all the while fearful memories and resolves were battling in his breast. When lights began to appear in the windows of the house, Mat Orrall stole forth from the vines which had concealed him, and cautiously proceeded to reconnoiter the building.

His resolution was quickly taken, and acting upon the first suggestions of his fancy, he climbed noiselessly up the projecting cornices of the porch, until he reached and stood upon the balcony, whence, through the still open casement, he could look into the apartment. Then, crouching behind the trellis, he narrowly inspected the interior.

Alice was no longer in the room, which was evidently the supper-room of the mansion, for a table, covered with fruits, stood in the middle of the floor. A candelabra, from which a strong light fell upon every part of the chamber, occupied the mantel shelf, and at the moment when Orrall's gaze scanned the scene, the old negress Margarette was engaged in arranging the ornaments around it.

The bravo closely scrutinized the old woman's face, as she moved from point to point, talking to herself in a low tone. Her bright black eyes and singular stateliness of manner, struck the man from the first, and he quickly arrived at the just conclusion that she must be the upper servant or housekeeper of the tory. His examination of her features likewise satisfied him that it would be useless to attempt to tamper with her fidelity to her master; for in every line of Gottan's countenance might be traced the consciousness of confidence deservedly reposed in her. Convinced of this, Orrall knew that he must rely upon his own address or boldness to regain possession of his child.

Atree's absence from home favored his design; and yet the bravo would have given much to know that he should be placed front to front with the tory, and have the opportunity once more that he had failed to profit by at their last meeting. The reflection that he had been made so complete a tool by his designing employer, while the villanous design of abduction was in progress of execution, galled the spirit of the man to bitterness. He resolved first to rescue his daughter, and then to pursue Robert Atree to the death.

The negress having occupied herself for a few moments in arranging the supper table, left the apartment by a door immediately opposite the window at which Orrall was concealed. The bravo immediately emerged from the shadow of the balcony, and sprang noiselessly into the brilliantly lighted supper-room. He did not however follow the footsteps of the old woman, for his quick ingenuity had projected a mode of concealment, which he resolved immediately to test the security of.

The windows were curtained with heavy velvet, which, mingled with thin muslin, depended in folds to the floor. These curtains, at the first view, seemed to appear a hiding-place, but Orrall reflected that perhaps the increasing dampness of the evening air might render it desirable that they should be drawn over the casement, in which event, exposure of the concealed person would become inevitable. He decided upon another scheme.

The fire-place, like those of most old-fashioned dwellings, was very wide, occupying a large portion of the space between the entrance-door of the apartment from the hall, and another smaller door which led apparently to other rooms in the interior of the house. This fire-place was now filled with summer plants, in large wooden boxes, which covered the hearth entirely; and the branches of these house-flowers trained and spread themselves upward and outward, around the fire-place and mantle, forming in that spot a perfect parlor conservatory. It was the work of but a moment for Matthew Orrall to lift carefully one of these boxes, and creep behind it into the recess beneath the chimney, without disturbing the position or appearance of a single leaf. There, hidden completely by the flowers and foliage in front of him, the bravo could observe everything that transpired in the apartment, learn doubtless the location of his daughter's sleeping-chamber, and thence, when all should be quiet in the house, bear away the blind girl, having first fired the mansion, not only to prevent pursuit, but as one instalment of the debt of vengeance due to Robert Atree.

These were the thoughts of Mat Orrall, as he crouched behind the flower-boxes. For some moments the room remained vacant, and the bravo had full leisure to digest his plans. The lights of the candelabra illumined every corner of the place, and the most death-like silence prevailed, so that the man could count the pulsations of his heart.

Suddenly the clatter of horse's hoofs, apparently approaching at full speed up the avenue, struck upon the bravo's ear. He listened breathlessly till the sound ceased at the front door, beneath the balcony, and immediately afterward was heard a murmur of human voices. Orrall listened intently, but he could distinguish no remembered tone.

Nevertheless at the thought which passed through his mind, that his enemy had probably returned, his whole frame shook with savage joy. "Hah!" he muttered between his set teeth—"Robert Atree is here! I shall have the robber in my grasp once more."

But the events of the next moment undeceived him. Gottan the negress entered the apartment, followed by an elderly gentleman, plainly attired, and a lady closely veiled. The costume of both the new-comers was that of travel, and it was apparent from the dust-stained condition of their garments, as well as the fatigue which evidently oppressed them, that they had ridden long and hard. Gottan spoke as she entered:

"Our household is but small during our master's absence. The war does not harm us, however, and that is a blessing."

"We shall not trespass long on your hospitality," remarked the gentleman. "But, it is very dangerous, I may say foolhardy, to travel after nightfall, now that the roads are so unsettled. Indeed, my daughter and myself were put to our speed to avoid a party of soldiers whom we encountered a couple of hours since. It was that adventure, truly, that forced us from our direct road, and obliged us to seek shelter at this mansion."

The traveler, as he made these remarks, was hastily engaged in leading his veiled companion to a couch, and in divesting himself of a short mantle and the riding cap which he wore, as well as a brace of portentous looking pistols, which were fastened at his side. He spoke, too, in a rambling style, as if not directing his conversation to any one in particular; though the old negress listened with every mark of attention, standing with her eyes bent to the floor before him. When he had concluded she pointed silently to the table, on which was displayed a quantity of tempting fruits, and then disappeared noiselessly from the room.

"Well, we rode hard, child, and have found strange quarters here, truly," continued the old man. "A lonely, castle-like old house, without a master, with a most mysterious old witch for a warden. Pray heaven there's no enchantment about us!"

He laughed as he said this, and playfully took the hand of his companion, who threw back her veil, and looked into his face, but without returning her smile.

Matthew Orrall peered from his concealment, and beneath the shadow which half concealed the lady's face, he thought he recalled something he had before seen. He held his breath to listen.

"I like not this place, father, and almost wish we had pursued our journey."

"Nonsense, my child. We are safer here than upon the highway, at all events. Why should we fear? We are strangers, and have sought a shelter, which has been granted to us. Cheer up, my child. Trust me, we are safer with the old negress, black as she is, than with one of King George's troopers on the highroad."

"Oh, my father, would that we were at home," murmured the lady, while an expression of deep sorrow flitted across her countenance.

"And yet, my poor girl, it was for your sake alone, that I insisted upon your accompanying me in this journey. I hoped that it would invigorate your health, perhaps restore you—"

"Can it banish memory, my father? But promise me that we shall remain at home, hereafter, father—that we shall never be separated, or—"

"I promise you, my daughter. And will you in return endeavor to comfort me—your foolish old father—by resuming the smile that used to gladden my heart?"

"I will try to be more cheerful, father—indeed I will," answered the girl. "Come now, let me tempt you with this bunch of grapes," she continued, playfully, holding up a cluster of the luscious fruit.

As she did so, the light from the condelabra fell upon her features.

Matthew Orrall shivered through every limb as he recognized the lady. He covered his face with his hands, and shrank back in his hiding place, as a fearful memory darkened his soul.

"I know her," he muttered; "I know her—I murdered her husband!"

It was indeed the bride of Ernest Rivers, who now sat with her father in the house of their foe.

The bravo cared not to listen to the further converse of these two whom he had so deeply injured. The memory of that last hour of Moultrie's defense came terribly upon him, and he seemed again to hear the half-uttered cry, and quick splash, that alone chronicled his victim's fate. His dark spirit felt relieved when Gottan re-entered the apartment, to conduct her guests to their repose, and he watched their retreating figures, as if he joyed to be freed from the presence of unreal phantoms which had tortured him.

Scarcely, however, had the apartment become silent again, than Orrall's quick ears caught once more the sound of a horse's hoofs. And this time, he was not destined to be disappointed in his hopes; for only a few minutes had elapsed when Robert Atree, followed obsequially by his aged slave, strode with a heavy foot into the supper-room.

The bravo clenched his fingers tightly together, and drew in his breath to catch the first accents of his enemy's voice.

A year had worked some change in the appearance of the young man. He seemed darker in complexion, and there was a haughtier expression in his countenance even than before. He was clad in a dark green riding frock, which set off to great advantage his slight but graceful form. His spurred riding-boots were besprinkled with mud, as if he had ridden long and far. A sword hung at his girdle, and from the breast-pocket of his coat peeped the handles of a pair of silver mounted pistols. Gotta held in her hand a short horseman's cloak, which had apparently been worn by her master, as, like his boots, it was stained with mud and dust.

Atree threw himself in an old-fashioned arm-chair near the fire-place, with his back turned toward the potted-flowers that hid the bravo. He was so close that Orrall could have stretched out his hand and reached him with his dagger's point.

"Well, Gotta, you received my letter," said the tory. "You expected my arrival?"

"Yes, Master Robert," answered the negress. "It made us very glad indeed. Oh, we have been afraid that master would never come back. And you have been away across the great ocean, Master Robert, to the king's house—is it not so?"

"Yes, Gotta, I have been three thousand miles away from home, and among strange people, too. But I missed my old nurse Gotta."

"Thanks—thanks!" said the negress, kneeling beside the young man's chair. "You make Margarette very, very happy."

"Well, well, Gotta, how goes on the little blind girl? Is she well and contented, as when you last sent me word?"

The listening bravo held his breath to hear the conversation which now concerned his child. Gotta replied—

"She is very sweet—very beautiful. I love her very much. So does Filippa. She sings, and plays upon your mother's harp, Master Robert, and works embroidery, like Filippa, who has taught her all she knew herself."

The bravo muttered to himself, "Hah! they teach her, then. Who is this Filippa that she speaks of?"

"But is the little girl contented and happy here?"

"Most always, Master Robert. It is true she wishes for her father, whom she prays for every night."

As Mat Orrall heard this, a thrill passed through his fierce soul. He could not notice the sneer that rested upon Atree's lip, or perchance he had at once rushed forth and stabbed the tory to the heart.

"Well, Gotta, I am glad you have taken great care of Alice," said the young man. "I feared, too, that she might have been troublesome at first, but it seems you love her. That is well."

"O, very much we love her, Master Robert. She is a blessed angel we all think."

The bravo could have hugged that old negro to his heart as he heard her thus speak of his child—so strange are the instincts of affection in the roughest natures.

"Well, Gotta, listen to me," pursued Atree, in a low tone, as if fearful of being overheard. "I take great interest in this young girl, and I have been three thousand miles for her sake alone."

Mat Orrall listened.

"Yes, Gotta, for her sake! Have you not thought how sad it was that Alice has no sight; that she has lived in darkness all her life?"

"It is very, very sad, Master Robert."

"Well, Gotta, I would restore to this child her sight—I would make her able to see like you and Filippa. That is the reason I have been so far away—to Europe—to France!"

"And will she have sight, master?"

"Yes, Gotta. I have seen a great physician in France, who will undertake to cure her blindness; and so I am going to take Alice away with me. You and Filippa shall go too, and we will start immediately."

The negress pressed her master's hand, but answered not.

"What are you thinking of, Gotta?"

"Would not little Alice be happier if her father went with her?"

"Her father is dead," answered Atree. "He was a bad man, and was punished with death by the laws. But never tell this to Alice."

"O, no, no," said Gotta. "She would not believe it, for in truth, Master Robert, she loves her father very much, and weeps often for him. She says they stole her away from her father while she slept."

"Gotta, hush such follies as this. I wish to make Alice happy, and give her sight. Tomorrow you must prepare to go with Filippa and the child away from Laurelwood. We have a long journey before us. Now I will eat supper, Gotta, for I am hungry. Bring me wine. After supper I will see the little girl."

With these words, Robert Atree drew the arm-chair which he occupied near to the supper table. Gotta withdrew for the wine.

Matthew Orrall's fierce eyes gleamed out from the fire-place upon his enemy; but the tory saw them not. All unconscious of the presence of the man he most feared, he went on with his supper, his appetite sharpened by a long and weary journey. Gotta brought the wine her master had ordered, and then stood with folded arms before her master.

"Why do you not go?"

"I had not yet informed you that there were strangers in Laurelwood."

"How! Strangers? What mean you, Gotta?"

"A gentleman and a young lady arrived here about one hour ago. They had ridden out of the way to avoid the soldiers, and asked to remain here for the night."

"Gotta, I wish no strangers in my house. Have they seen Alice? Who, and what are these people?"

The manner of Atree convinced the listening bravo that his enemy attached much importance to the concealment of the blind girl. He smiled triumphantly, as he thought of soon frustrating the young tory's designs, whatever they might be.

"I do not know," returned Gotta, to her master's hurried inquiries, "who they are, except that the gentleman is apparently the father of the lady. They have retired to the north gallery."

"Very well! Go now, Gotta. I will call when I want you."

Gotta was about to withdraw, when a confused noise was heard outside the house, immediately beneath the balcony.

"What is that?" cried Atree, starting.

"I will see," was Gotta's quiet answer, as she glided from the apartment, while the tory, half-rising from his seat, listened attentively.

Mat Orrall listened too, watching the young man with a look which was fearful indeed, blent as it was of all the bad passions which possessed the bravo's soul. And as he gazed, he revolved in his mind the conversation he had heard, and essayed to fathom the secret motive which evidently actuated Atree's interest in the blind girl. "He shall reckon," muttered Mat Orrall to himself. "He shall give an account."

The next moment the old negress returned to the apartment, and the concealed bravo became witness to another scene that further developed the villainy of the man before him.

Gotta was followed by a tall man, attired in the scarlet uniform of a British officer, and another individual whose costume seemed to be neither military or civil, but a compound of both, hanging slouchingly from a most ungainly person. Robert Atree rose as his visitor entered, and the negress immediately withdrew.

"To what am I indebted for—"

"Perhaps Mr. Robert Atree does not recognize an old friend. I am Captain Percy Wemyss, at your service."

"Captain Wemyss, you are heartily welcome," cried Atree, grasping the other's hand. "I did not recognize you at first."

"Egad, Atree, I believe I shall quarter on you here—you look so deuced comfortable. My dear fellow, how long has this been your place of residence?"

"To tell the truth, captain, this night is the first time I have seen Laurelwood for a year. I have crossed the Atlantic twice within that time, and shall shortly do so again. This house was a favorite residence of my father, but since his time has been little occupied."

"It is paradise around it at this charming season, my dear fellow. But, egad! what have we troopers to do with paradise, driven from post to pillar as we are in pursuit of these infernal rebels? By the lord Harry, I wish I was in England once more."

"I was not aware, captain, that his Majesty's troops were so near Laurelwood as it seems. In fact, I am entirely in the dark as to the state of affairs here. My absence—"

"Egad, you're not more in the dark than I am, my dear fellow. We are here one day and away the next. What, with chasing the Swamp Fox and his ragged soldiers, checking insurrections, and hanging rebels, we are kept scouring these deuced bottoms morning and night. I was detached this morning to intercept some dispatches from Marion, and pursuing some fugitives too briskly, this fellow and myself were separated from the rest. I cannot regret the accident, however, as it has led to this meeting with an old friend and good loyalist."

"I trust I am both, captain," said Atree.

"My unhappy and misguided country must ere long recognize who are her real friends. I wish this unnatural war was over, but I am convinced that can never be till the colonies return to their allegiance. But, pardon me, captain, you must be fatigued, and need refreshment. Draw near, and join me in some wine."

"First allow me to ask some of your household if they have seen aught of my fugitives, a lady and gentleman, whom we lost sight of, a couple of hours since."

"I think, captain, you need not go far to ascertain. Gotta tells me that visitors answering your description are now under this roof."

"Egad, Atree—have you seen the lady? This is fortunate. Why, my dear fellow, she's a perfect angel—and I've not the least doubt that the old scamp who accompanies her is a malignant rebel. Have you seen them? Who are they?"

THE SPIRIT OF BEAUTY.

THE Spirit of Beauty unfurls her light,
And wheels her course in a joyous flight;
I know her track through the balmy air,
By the blossoms that cluster and whiten there;
She leaves the tops of the mountains green,
And gems the valley with crystal sheen.

At noon I know where she resteth at night,
For the roses are gushing with dewy delight;
Then she mounts again, and around her flings
A shower of light from her purple wings,
Till the spirit is drunk with the music on high,
That silently fills it with ecstasy.

At noon she lies in a cool retreat,
Where bowering elms o'er water meet;
She dimples the wave, where the green leaves dip,
That smiles, as it curls, like a maiden's lip,
When her tremulous bosom would hide in vain,
From her lover, the hope that she loves again.

At eve she hangs o'er the western sky
Dark clouds for a glorious canopy;
And round the skirts of each sweeping fold
She paints a border of crimson and gold;
Where the lingering sunbeams love to stay,
When their glow in his glory has passed away.

She hovers around us at twilight hour,
When her presence is felt with the deepest power;
She mellows the landscape, and crowds the stream
With shadows that flit like a fairy dream;
Still wheeling her flight through the glad some air,
The Spirit of Beauty is every where!

THE COURT OF VERSAILLES.

From the French.

BY ELIZABETH ROBINSON.

In one of the splendid saloons of the Palace at Versailles, after the royal supper one evening, Louis the Sixteenth stood before a marble table upon which was placed an elegant coffee service. Raising the richly gilt cover from a porcelain sugar basin, he took two lumps of sugar, and letting them fall gently into a cup of boiling coffee, amused himself by watching the small yellow bubbles as they rose from the sinking sugar to the top of his coffee, successively releasing from each fragile prison the air which it contained.

Monsieur de Maurepas approached the king. The revolution was not at that moment contemplated; but passing events were agitating most minds; the vase of futurity was full—waiting only the drop, great or small, which was to cause the fatal overflow. The court, persevering in blindness until its last day, was gay, inconsiderate, and wholly devoted to a young and beautiful queen equally gay and inconsiderate. Monsieur de Maurepas was minister, a witty, facetious, old man—or rather a child of threescore years and ten—who would have given a province for a piece of lace for the queen, and a sea-port, that the king might delight in La Belle France and that France be comprised in Versailles for Monsieur de Maurepas, and a few fine forests for the king to hunt in, while his subjects labored for the payment of his taxes.

What do the people complain of? asked one of the aristocracy, at the beginning of the revolution; and what do they want? Have they not hospitals and asylums?

Monsieur de Maurepas did not even think of hospitals, he thought the people ought first to obey the laws, then to live and die as their destiny appointed, without troubling themselves about their betters. This disdainful indifference, this sacrilegious forgetfulness of the most simple, as well as the most responsible duties of humanity, seems impossible in a prime minister. Nevertheless, it is the true history of Monsieur de Maurepas's political character, that Monsieur de Maurepas, who drew near the king and having waited until his majesty had swallowed several mouthfuls of coffee, said, "How does your majesty like the coffee this evening?"

"It is excellent," replied Louis.

"Yes: the mocha is of a most delicious quality; but does your majesty find it to have the usual flavor? the sugar which they have this evening supplied, has it agreeably softened the sharpness of the coffee?"

Louis the Sixteenth was timid, yet obstinate; his temperament, and like his grandfather, Louis XIV., dreaded nothing so much as a jest or bon-mot at his expense. Surveying his minister with doubtful looks, then reflecting upon his own high position and the courtier-like habits of his minister, he said rather sternly, "What do you mean, sir? are you dissatisfied with our controller of the household? or, do you know of any better coffee than mine?"

"Oh, no! sire; neither one nor the other; but allow me to ask yet another question—your majesty has put two pieces of sugar into your cup, how much does your majesty think they cost each?"

"Ah! you are about teaching me a lesson on economy, I perceive," said the king. "Well! well! I shall be delighted with it, come let us see. Sugar costs four francs six sous a pound. I suppose in a pound of sugar there are eighty, pieces the size of those in my coffee, that makes it a sous per lump—or, as I am King of France and, as such, pay more for every thing than my subjects, my two pieces of sugar would cost me six or eight sous at most."

"Those two lumps of sugar," said M. de Maurepas with emphasis, "cost your majesty, nothing, they are a present from one of your majesty's subjects, but to him they cost a louis d'or each."

"A pretty story truly, Monsieur de Maurepas," said the king, "if all the sugar eaten in the palace were to cost at that rate, I should have to sell the domain of Rambouillet to sweeten the dauphin's boiled milk. Explain, sir."

"Willingly, sire; but will your majesty condescend to examine this sugar well?" Monsieur de Maurepas emptied the basin on to the marble table, and counted the lumps: there were forty-three; "with the twopieces in your majesty's cup," said he, "making forty-five lumps, this pound of sugar costs one thousand and eighty francs. See how sparkling and light it is! just taste it, what an exquisite flavor!—so very sweet, melting in the mouth without leaving the slightest disagreeable flavor behind."

"Well!" said the king, the gray hairs of his minister keeping his rising temper in order, "well! the sugar is sweet, that is simple enough—would you have it better, pray?"

"But your majesty could never guess what this sugar is made from."

Louis the Sixteenth was not an ignoramus, he had some knowledge of chemistry and its mystical operations. He drew back a little, fearing to be compromised by the mention of some ridiculous amalgamation, then said in a loud tone of voice, "It is cane sugar, Monsieur de Maurepas; but let us talk of something else—the parliament."

"Sire!" said Maurepas, "it is beet-root sugar."

"Beet-root! what is beet-root, sir?" asked Louis.

"Sire!" said a little duchess who had listened to the conversation, and waited to snatch an opportunity of making herself remarkable, "beet-root is little red slices of I don't know what, which my people soak in vinegar and eat with salad."

The king laughed heartily.

"Sire!" said Monsieur de Maurepas, "beet-root is a very common root in France, much liked by your own brother, and of this root sugar is now made."

This conversation between the king and his minister had excited the curiosity of all the attendants; none had dared to approach lest they should disturb some state scenes, but not a movement of the interlocutors escaped notice. They had seen the minister show the king his cup of coffee, turn the sugar out on the marble table, and examine every lump. One of the courtiers withdrew into the queen's card room, and whispered in the ear of a friend, that the king had just taken poison in his coffee-pot. "You terrify me," said the devoted fellow-courtier, "I have had coffee too, and perhaps from the same coffee-pot."

"Don't be alarmed," said the other, "the coffee is not poisoned, it is the sugar, and no one but the king has taken from the prepared basin. We shall have a regency; so I will begone and pay my respects to the dauphin's governess."

The report spread from one to another until it reached the queen, who rose in great agitation. Throwing her cards down, she hastened to the king, who was still conversing with his minister. "Oh! sire!" exclaimed Marie Antoinette, much agitated.

"What is the matter?" asked the king, "and what brings you in such haste? how pale you are," added he, with more than usual tenderness, in his manner, then filling a glass with water, he threw in several lumps of sugar and, presenting it to his royal consort, said, "drink this madam, it will revive you—you will also become acquainted with a new kind of sugar."

Monsieur de Maurepas was light and frivolous, but possessed of abundant finesse, he had, moreover, great experience in the tricks of a palace, growing old amid them: he knew well how to judge from the face of what was passing in the heart. He seized the glass of sugared water from the king and drank it off.

"Oh! thank you," exclaimed Marie Antoinette, putting out her hand to the minister; then turning to the king, she said, gaily, "It is all nothing. I am going back to finish my game."

At that moment, the captain of the guards entered, and hurrying toward; Louis, said, "All the palace doors are closed, your majesty may be assured that no one has passed in or out the last half-hour. The culprit is taken, and they are now bringing him before your majesty." Scarcely had he uttered these words ere the saloon doors were thrown open and in marched eight or ten gardes-du-corps surrounding a man whose coarse dress and frightful mien bore a striking contrast to the glitter and smiles of a court sparkling with costly diamonds. Monsieur de Maurepas, always self-possessed, made an immediate sign for the military to retire; then advancing towards the astonished and terrified stranger, reassured him by presenting him to the king, saying, "Sire! this is the good man who filled your majesty's sugar-basin this evening, this is he who makes sugar from vegetables; doubtless he will manufacture cinnamon, pepper, and ginger, next, so that we may soon dispense altogether with our colonies."

Louis perceiving that in all that was passing there was something purposely concealed from him, drew the sugar-maker aside, and began to converse familiarly with him.

"Has the king really taken poison?" asked Marie Antoinette.

"As much as I have," replied the minister, "we shall die the sweetest death possible—I most happily in having saved your majesty's life, and shared the lot of my sovereign."

"Do not jest if you please, monsieur," said the queen.

"Madam!" replied the minister, "be assured the affair is nothing more than a case of beet-root sugar: if there be a plot at all, it is against the sugar canes."

"What is all this sugar about?" asked the queen.

"Madam!" replied Maurepas, "during the regency of the Duc d'Orleans, one Oliver de Serre attracted by the color of beet-root, thought to make wine from it, but instead of wine he found it contained sugar. The good man died, leaving the recipe of his discovery among his papers, which were bought by a Prussian chemist who actually made the first beet-root sugar. This man, with whom the king is talking, has improved the manufacture; and behold the imaginary poison."

The queen courageously took a piece of sugar from the table and ate it; all the ladies followed her brave example. Maurepas facetiously exclaimed, "Take care, ladies and gentlemen, every lump is worth a louis d'or."

"It is no better than other sugar," said her majesty, "and since it is so dear, the taste for it would be ruinous."

"True!" added Maurepas, "the sample is dear; but the inventor thinks if he could have two millions of francs to establish a sugar bake-house—"

"Two millions of francs for a bake-house!"

cried the courtiers with one voice, "oh! fie! 'tis too much, a great deal too much."

"Sober sir!" cried the king to the manufacturer, "take this snuff-box as a testimony of our gratitude. Our coffee has been well sweetened this evening, it is true; but two millions of francs for your manufactory is too much money—the court are agreed upon this point."

"Sire!" replied the sugar maker, bowing low, "sooner or later, beet-root will make its way."

That same evening, Marie Antoinette obtained from Louis his signature which drew from the state coffers three millions of francs for the enriching of the Polignac family. More than fifty years have elapsed since these events; we will not enter upon the fate of the actors in this little history, but, in the significant words of the manufacturer, beet-root "has made its way."

Macaulay is great as a speaker; on his rising to address the House, attention is at once riveted to his quiet, slow, an considered sentences, as though he had well weighed what he advanced ere he gave utterance. "Slowly he goes on at first, like a practiced swimmer, who wades carefully over unseen rocks, and looking somewhat awkward as he picks his way; but he is seen in deep water, and away he dashes, fearlessly flinging around him the glittering spray, and rejoicing in his strength. He is now fairly released from the shallowness of introductory matter, and away he goes, far and fast. As he proceeds, his voice increases in volume and form—his right arm is in unusual motion—his eye kindles, and from his eloquent lips brilliant ideas chase each other in rapid succession, until the House is wrapt in the closest attention. Truth is his weapon, honesty is his armor, and facts are his weapons with which he fights. When Macaulay resumes his seat, a dead silence for a few moments ensues, and then a burst of applause, such as only sterling eloquence can command, is heard from all present."

THE human species, according to the best theory I can form of it, is composed of two distinct races—the men who borrow, and the men who lend. To these two original diversities may be reduced all those impertinent classifications of Gothic and Celtic tribes—white men, black men, red men. All the dwellers upon earth, "Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites," flock hither, and do naturally fall in with one or other of these primary distinctions. The infinite superiority of the former, which I choose to designate as the great race, is discernible in their figure, port, and a certain instinctive sovereignty. The latter are born degraded. "He shall serve his brethren." There is something in the air of one of this caste lean and suspicious, contrasting with the open, trusting, generous manners of other. Observe who have been the great borrowers of all ages—Alcibiades, Falstaff, Sir Richard Steele, our late incomparable Brinsley. What a family likeness in all four!—[C. Lamb.

ENGLAND AS IT WILL BE.—It is now the fashion to place the golden age of England in times when noblemen were destitute of comforts, the want of which would be intolerable to a modern footman; when farmers and shopkeepers breakfasted on loaves, the very sight of which would raise a riot in a modern workhouse; and when men died faster in the purest country air than they now die in the most pestilential lanes of our towns—than they now die on the coast of Guinea. We, too, in our turn, shall be outstripped, and in our turn envied. It may well be in the twentieth century, that the peasant of Dorsetshire may think himself miserably paid with 15s. a week; that the carpenter of Greenwich may receive 10s. a day; that the laboring men may be as little used to dine without meat as they now are to eat rye bread; that sanitary police and medical discoveries may have added several more years to the average length of human life; that numerous comforts and luxuries which are now unknown, or confined to a few, may be within the reach of every diligent and thrifty working man.—[Macaulay's History of England.

The Family Circle.

THE TWO LOCKS OF HAIR.

FROM THE GERMAN OF GUSTAV PFIZER.

A YOUTH, light-hearted and content,
I wander through the world;
Here, Arab-like, is pitched my tent,
And straight again is furled.

Yet oft I dream that once a wife
Close in my arms was locked,
And in the sweet repose of life
A blessed child I rocked.

I wake! Away, that dream—away!
Too long did it remain!
So long, that both by night and day
It ever comes again.

The end lies ever in my thought;
To a grave so cold and deep
The mother beautiful was brought;
Then dropped the child asleep.

But now the dream is wholly o'er,
I bathe mine eyes and see;
I wander through the world once more,
A youth so light and free.

Two locks—and they are wondrous fair—
Left me that vision mild;
The brown is from the mother's hair,
The blonde is from the child.

And when I see that lock of gold,
Pale grows the evening red;
And when the dark lock I behold,
I wish that I were dead.

THE DOMINION OF THE SOUL.—Let us thank Heaven, too, that there are other standards of greatness besides vastness of territory; and other forms of wealth besides mineral deposits or agricultural exuberance. Though every hill were a Potosi, though every valley, like that of the Nile, were rank with fatness, yet might a nation be poor in the most desperate sense;—benighted in darkness of barbarism, and judgment-stricken of Heaven for its sins. A State has local boundaries which it cannot rightfully transcend; but the realm of intelligence, the sphere of charity, the moral domain in which the soul can expand and expatiate, are illimitable,—vast and boundless as the omnipresence of the Being that created them. Worldly treasure is of that nature that rust may corrupt, or the moth destroy, or thieves steal; but even upon the earth, there are mental treasures which are unapproachable by fraud, impregnable to violence, and whose value does not perish, but is redoubled with the using. A State, then, is not necessarily fated to insignificance because its dimensions are narrow, nor doomed to obscurity and powerlessness because its numbers are few. Athens was small; yet low as were her moral aims, she lighted up the whole earth as a lamp lights up a temple. Judea was small; but her prophets and her teachers were, and will continue to be, the guides of the world. The narrow strip of half-cultivable land, that lies between her eastern and western boundaries is not Massachusetts; but her noble and incorruptible men, her pure and exalted women, the children in all her schools, whose daily lessons are the preludes and rehearsals of the great duties of life, and the prophecies of future eminence—THESE ARE THE STATE.

THE SWORD AND THE PEN.—A FABLE.—The sword of the warrior was taken down to brightness; it had long been out of use. The rust was soon rubbed off, but there were spots that would not go; they were of blood. It was on the table, near the pen of the secretary. The pen took advantage of the first breath of air to move a little farther off. "Thou art right," said the sword; "I am a bad neighbor." "I fear thee not," replied the pen, "I am more powerful than thou art; but I love not thy society." "I exterminate," said the sword. "And I perpetuate," said the pen; "where were thy victories if I recorded them not? even where thou thyself shalt one day be—in the Lake of Oblivion."—[From an Ancient Hebrew Apologue.

THE FIRST MARRIAGE.—Marriage is of a date prior to sin itself,—the only relic of a paradise that is left us—one smile that God let fall on the world's innocence, lingering and playing still upon its sacred visage. The first marriage was celebrated before God himself, who filled in his own person the office of Guest, Witness and Priest.

There stood the two god-like forms of innocence fresh in the beauty of their unstained nature. The hallowed shades of the garden, and the green carpeted earth smiled upon so divine a pair. The crystal waters flowed by, pure and transparent as they. The unblemished flowers breathed incense on the sacred air, answering to their upright love. An artless round of joy from all the vocal natures, was the hymn, a spontaneous nuptial harmony, such as a world in tune might yield, ere discord was invented. Religion blessed her two children thus and led them forth into life to begin her wondrous history. The first religious scene they knew, was their own marriage before the Lord God. They learned to love him as the interpreter and sealer of their love to each other; and if they had continued in their uprightness, life would have been a form of wedded worship—a sacred mystery of spiritual oneness and communion.

They did not continue. Curiosity triumphed over innocence. They tasted sin, and knew it in their fall. Man is changed; woman is changed; man's heart and woman's heart are no longer what the first hearts were. Beauty is blemished. Love is debased. Sorrow and tears are in the world's cup. Sin has swept away all paradisean matter, and the world is bowed under its curse. Still one thing remains as it was. God mercifully spared one of the innocent world; and that the dearest, to be a symbol for ever of the primal love. And this is marriage. This one flower of Paradise is blooming yet in the desert of sin.—[Rev. Dr. Bushnell.

FROM THE GERMAN OF JEAN PAUL.—The sun is like God, sending abroad life, beauty, and happiness; and the stars like human souls, for all their glory comes from the sun.

Does not the echo in the sea shell tell of the worm which once inhabited it; and shall not man's good deeds live after him and sing his praise?

The mind makes all the beauty on earth, as the sun all in the heavens.

What is the universe but a hand flung in space pointing always with extended finger unto God!

The pitying tears and fond smiles of woman, are like the showers and sunshine of Spring; alas! that unlike them she should often miss her merited reward—the sweet flowers of affection.

How like rain is the human heart—having no beauty in itself, but beneath the smile of God, showing forth with all the rainbow's glory; or how like a star, which, though but dust, can yet be cherished into a semblance of the fountain of its light.

The songs of birds, and the life of man, are both brief, both soul-filled, and both as they end, leave behind whispers of heaven.

THE DOMESTIC ALTAR.—It is pleasing to find in private houses an altar raised to God. Nothing rivets family attachments wholly, so securely, as meeting every morning to pray for each other, when every petty difference must at once be laid aside, and every misunderstanding forgotten before the sun goes down. What can be more pleasing, also, than for the absent to know precisely at what hour they are remembered with the supplications and blessings of an affectionate family circle, while those who remain together can enjoy no greater solace than in following them with prayers, and uniting, on their account, in every expression, or every anxiety, or pleasure, or sorrow, which each shares in common with the others. There is, indeed, no pleasure more to be prized than that of raising a family altar, where those shall daily assemble on earth, who hope, hereafter, to reassemble in heaven, and not a wanderer lost!

THE practice of the small proprieties of life to a congenial spirit soon ceases to be a study; it rapidly becomes a mere habit, or an untroubled and unerring instinct.

GAZETTE AND RULE.

Friendship, Love and Truth.

AUG. C. L. ARNOLD, EDITOR.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1849.

[C] CHARLES H. HARRISON, who has been acting as our Agent, having made no returns to us, and being, as we are informed, unworthy of such trust, we deem it necessary to caution all against paying him any subscriptions on account of the Gazette and Golden Rule. His former character having been good, we forbear farther remarks at this time.

DEDICATION OF THE ODD-FELLOWS HALL, AT WILMINGTON, DEL.

THE Dedication of this new and elegant Hall will take place on Monday the 28th inst. We shall be there, and hope to meet on the occasion with a large number of our friends. One of the Publishers will also be there, to attend to any business pertaining to the Gazette and Rule which may appear. The entire accounts of subscribers in Delaware will be at hand, and we hope our friends will not omit the opportunity to renew their favors. We hope to make the acquaintance of many new subscribers among the throng the interesting celebration will gather.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP AS IT WAS AND AS IT IS.

THE great difference that is seen between the Odd-Fellowship of to-day, and that of thirty years ago, cannot but strike all who reflect upon it as a most notable fact. The many and great dangers through which the Order has passed during the last quarter of a century, the new features it has developed, the new capabilities for good it has revealed and is constantly revealing, are proofs that it originated in a providential design. The first Odd-Fellows were blind instruments in the hands of heaven; the humble artisans who laid the foundation of a glorious temple, without knowing its object or design.

At first, Odd-Fellowship presented aspects decidedly objectionable and immoral. It relieved many of the painful necessities of life, it is true, but its moral influence was entirely bad. Among the By-Laws of Lodges of the first period we find the following: "If any of the members think proper to meet with the officers on a Sunday evening, they are at liberty to do so, provided they pay for their own liquor, and come in a state of sobriety."

In the By-Laws of another Lodge the following appears: "One pint of beer shall be allowed to each brother on attending a committee of this Lodge. Any member sleeping, eating, swearing, singing an indecent or political song, or giving an indecent recitation, or betting wagers during Lodge hours, shall be fined not less than one shilling."

Now let one compare with the above, the By-Laws of our Order as it is to-day, and see the immense progress it has made. Even the most bitter opponents of the Order do not bring any charges of immorality against it, or express any fear at all on this ground. On the contrary, it is acknowledged on all hands that its influence is conservative of morality; that all its rules and obligations in this direction are as strict as those of the Church.

It is true there are bad men in the Order, and pity it is that it is true. But if knavish Judases cannot be kept out of the sacred pale of the Holy Church, how can it be expected that Odd-Fellowship, a purely secular institution, can be free of them?

The Order now asserts, and positively insists upon every virtue, and denounces in earnest and indignant tones every vice; while it seeks to relieve temporal suffering and to meet many of the cruel perplexities and inconveniences of life, it aims to make men more moral, more fraternal, more benevolent and more upright. It is worthy, therefore, the good will and support of all good men. The humbleness and obscurity of its origin, nor the objectionable attributes it at first exhibited, should be remembered to its prejudice. It is enough for us to know that it has outgrown them all, and in this we see an evidence that a divine and redeeming idea is enshrined within it, which will shine more purely and brightly through all the future, or until its great destiny shall have been fulfilled.

INTELLECTUAL SPECULATION.

WE frequently hear it said of individuals of an inventive genius: "They are visionary, speculative, live in the clouds, and will never accomplish anything." This is said reproachfully, and indicates that most persons regard "speculation" as a great folly, and men of speculative, theoretical minds, as very great fools.

But if we look into this subject a little more deeply, we shall find that no invention, no discovery, no improvement, has ever been made in any science or art, but through the labors of these visionary men.

Cold, prosaic, matter-of-fact men may apply new discoveries to useful purposes; but they cannot invent, cannot create; and notwithstanding all the practical talent of which they boast, they would be but poorly off without the labors of speculative minds.

The Germans are the most visionary people in the world, and yet they have produced the greatest amount of useful discoveries and inventions. The Germans are theoretical and speculative, while the English and Americans are more practical and mechanical. The speculative genius of the Germans has created or perfected every useful art, which now contributes so much to the wealth of nations.

The arts of Engraving and Design, the invention of Gunpowder, the science of Astronomy and Geography, and the noble art of Printing came from Germany. Chemistry and the collateral sciences received their first impulse there.

The Germans were also the first to investigate, scientifically, the secret forces of nature. Franklin obtained his first idea of Electricity from them, and Mercator preceded Newton in Geometry. So, whether in science, art, or philosophy, or literature, the Germans have the precedence of all other nations. And yet they are emphatically a visionary people.

We have made these remarks regarding the Germans and their discoveries, for the purpose of doing away a false impression, which exists too generally among us; viz: that those persons who are reproachfully denominated dreamers and foolish speculators, are useless members of society. Many a man of genius, like Fulton, has been crushed to the very earth by the skeptical jeers and scoffs of those who, priding themselves on their practical skill, affect to despise all new-fangled notions or theories, whatever they may be.

For ourselves, we love the man or woman who can think boldly, originally, and who is not afraid to give the world the benefit of that thinking. We were made to think, to speculate, to make new discoveries, and this cannot be done unless we are visionaries or seers. The postulate of Descartes, "cogito, ergo sum"—"I think, therefore, I exist,"—is true in all senses. It is only by the constant exercise of thought—by mental activity—that man manifests his existence.

The whole army, therefore, of visionaries, enthusiasts, speculators, and thorizers, throughout the world, are doing the highest service to our race, for through their speculations society grows rich and wise.

DEDICATION OF ODD-FELLOWS' HALL, NEW-YORK.—We give to-day a programme of the procession and exercises connected with the dedication of this imposing edifice, which is to take place on the 4th of June. A great day will the 4th of June be to the Order in this city. We anticipate a larger collection of the Fraternity on that occasion, than has ever yet been seen in this country. The exercises will be eminently interesting.

DESTINY AND PERPETUITY OF THE UNITED STATES.

NOTHING is more common than to hear men expressing doubts with regard to the future destiny of our country. Many, who profess to be wise, and assume to be prophets, continue to speak of our republican institutions as an experiment, and would have us believe that civil liberty is a dream, which man has no capacity to realize; and predict that a few years more, and we shall be aroused from our illusion by the downfall of our Republic.

The prevailing opinion among a certain class is, that a state of war and an extensive territory are incompatible with a republican form of government; and it is consequently inferred, that as the war spirit increases, and our territory enlarges, our institutions will fail to hold in check the rebellious spirit of the people.

We have ever held an opinion quite contrary to the foregoing. We believe in Providence, and hold that every people has a destiny to achieve, a mission to accomplish, and, consequently, that we are destined to advance, to realize our ideal of life and civil liberty, as best we can, and then our work is done. All nations have their life, with its youth, its maturity, and decline, the same as individuals.

That it is one of the designs of Providence that the United States shall go forward, develop new resources, acquire new possessions, and new power, and spread whatever they have, of truth, goodness and justice in their institutions over the earth, is very evident. Nothing can prevent this. The growth of a nation cannot be stayed. Its march may be bloody—war, for long years, may be its condition, but nevertheless it advances. Republican Rome illustrated this over two thousand years ago. At the point of the sword, and on the wings of her eagles, and through conquest, she spread art, science, philosophy, and all the treasures of civilization over the entire earth, and thus prepared the way for Christianity.

A work of similar character is given to us, young Americans, to do. The nature of this work, the most philosophical of our statesmen described, when he spoke of the "extension of the area of freedom." So we have no fear that war will prevent our prosperity, or retard our progress, or endanger our institutions. It will rather be a means of extending and perpetuating them; for it creates national feeling, and a strong love of country.

But it is said that this great extension of territory, the extremities of which are so distant from each other—and so separated, also, by diverse interests, will endanger the Union. We think not. We are aware that the general opinion seems to be that republican institutions are better adapted to small States and limited territory than to large. Once, no doubt, this opinion had some weight, and vast territory presented some obstacles to republicanism; but not to-day. Art, Industry and Science have overcome them. The steamboats that ply on our innumerable rivers, the railroads that stretch out their iron arms to embrace the most distant portions of our country, and the wondrous telegraph, which conveys intelligence on the wings of the lightning, have annihilated distance, so that all of North America, is not, in fact—relatively to the ideas we are considering—so vast as the Thirteen Colonies were, when our independence was first asserted. Is it not Providential, that simultaneous with the development of the republican theory on this continent, the agency of steam began to be spoken of as a means of locomotion, and to facilitate communication, both physical and intellectual? Steam and electricity have thus overcome the only serious obstacle to the perpetuity of republican institutions.

It will not be many years, before Mr. Whitney's great project of a railroad to Oregon will be carried out, which will give the United States the control of the commerce of the world. And controlling commerce, we shall control opinions, and by the law of communion, our moral life, our republican sentiments, will be communicated with wonderful rapidity to all nations. Twenty years hence! What changes will have transpired! The United States will then be the most powerful nation on the face of the earth. The Dragon and Cross of England, the Lily of France, the Bear of Russia, will have been left far behind by our soaring Eagle, and dimmed by the splendor of our "stars." Oregon, California, Texas, Northern Mexico, will then be covered with flourishing towns and cities; art and industry will make the wilderness blossom as the rose, and elegance and refinement will bless those valleys which now shelter the wandering savage.

Such is evidently the destiny of the United States. But let it not be forgotten that in raising us up to this height of glory and power, Providence consults not merely our own aggrandizement. Far from it—but rather that through our ministry, the great interests of Humanity may be advanced. Providence is not selfish, nor partial. When the good of the universe requires one people to be raised in power and grandeur above another, or to be hurled from glory to obscurity and shame, it is done. Nations rise and fall, new people come forth and drive out the old possessors of the soil, and war, and blood and violence fill the world. But, through all this, the Race marches ever toward the Perfect. Such is God's order!

— "PICTURES OF THE VIRGIN AND HER SON." New York: Harper & Brothers. We like this little book very much. It aims to present to the reader graphic scenes in the life of our Saviour. Written in a charming style—flowing and elegant—it captivates the reader, and throws over the entire history of Jesus a new and mysterious attraction. The "pictures" are touching and beautiful; and we would gladly make an extract, for the gratification of our readers, but have not yet been furnished with a copy.

LINE OF PROCESSION.

The Procession will move precisely at 10 o'clock, A. M., and proceed up Hudson street to Hammond, down Hudson to Chambers, up Chambers to Broadway, down Broadway and around the Park to Chatham, up Chatham to East Broadway, up East Broadway to the junction of Grand, down Grand to the Bowery, up the Bowery to Astor Place, through Astor Place to Broadway, down Broadway to Grand, and through Grand to Orange, where the line will halt and open to the right and left, close order. The Grand Marshal and his two Special Assistants will then pass between the lines to the extreme left; returning, will be followed by the Committee of Arrangements; the Orator and Chaplain; the Past Grand Masters and Elective Grand Officers of the Grand Lodge of New-York; Past Grand Sires, Grand Officers, and Members of the Grand Lodge of the United States; Grand Representatives, Appointed Officers, and Members of the Grand Lodge of New-York; Board of Managers of Odd-Fellows' Hall Association; Visiting Grand and Subordinate Lodges; the Officers and Members of the Grand Encampment, and Subordinate Encampments and Lodges, and proceed to the corner of Grand and Orange streets, where the following Exercises will be had:

ORDER OF EXERCISES AT THE HALL.

1. Prayer.
2. Music by the Band
3. Dedicating the Odd-Fellows' Hall, by M. W. Grand Sire HORN R. KNEAS, assisted by P. G. Sire JOHN A. KENNEDY, President of the Odd-Fellows' Hall Association, and GEORGE H. ANDREWS, Esq., M. W. Grand Master of the G. Lodge of the State of New-York.
4. Ode, written for the occasion by —, and sung by —.
5. Benediction.

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS.

THE Lodges from the interior of the state will report to the Grand Marshal, at his headquarters, National Hall, No. 29 Canal-street, on the morning of the Procession, their place of rendezvous, in order that a Band of music may be furnished to accompany them to the place of the formation of the line.

A Band of Music will also be furnished for the City, Brooklyn, and Williamsburg Lodges at their respective Lodge rooms, and will proceed in a body to the place in the formation of the line.

Subordinate Lodges engaging Music at their own expense will be entitled to the benefit of the same in the Procession, but will occupy such position in the Sub-division as shall be designated by the Music Committee and the Grand Marshal of the said Sub-division. Such Lodges will, however, be responsible for the assessment the same as other Lodges participating.

As soon as the several Lodges have arrived at the points above designated, they will immediately take the places in the Sub-divisions assigned them.

Brothers are requested to appear in dark clothes, black hat, and white gloves.

Lodges that have given invitations to sister Lodges of adjoining states, are requested to take them under their special charge, and they will form with them in the Sub-division to which they respectively belong.

Visiting Brethren who desire to join in the Procession are respectfully invited to do so, and unite with such Lodges as they may feel disposed to select.

The Members of the Grand Lodge of New-York are invited to meet in the Grand Lodge room, National Hall, No. 29 Canal-street, at 8 o'clock, A. M.

The formation of the line is specially delegated to the following named Assistant Grand Marshals:

John W. Avery, F. W. Gilley,
Florence Mahony, Thaddeus Davids.

After the Exercises are closed, the Lodges and Encampments will consider themselves as dismissed, and the Bands of Music that conducted them to the line in the morning will be at their disposal, to accompany them to their several places of meeting.

Persons will not be allowed in the Procession on horseback or in carriages, excepting such as are designated in this Programme.

Should the weather prove unfavorable, the Procession will be postponed to the first fair day.

By order of the Committee of Arrangements.

WILLIAM N. LEWIS, Grand Marshal.

EVENING EXERCISES.

The Exercises for the Evening will take place at Castle Garden, and will be issued in a separate Programme, and published in the daily papers. Tickets Fifty Cents each, to admit one person. The proceeds will be appropriated toward defraying the expenses of the Celebration. Tickets may be obtained at the following places: Office of the Grand Secretary, Odd-Fellows' Hall; Perkins' Saloon, Odd-Fellows' Hall; Perkins' Hotel, Division-street; John J. Davies, 75 Cortlandt-street; United States Hotel; Mercer's Saloon, corner of Nassau and Ann-streets; Astor House; Franklin House; Merchants' Hotel; New York Hotel; Castle Garden; Pearl-street House; French's Hotel; Palmer's Stage-office, 23d street and 8th Avenue; Williamsburg Gardens, Williamsburg; Smith's Bookstore, 102 Fulton-street, and D. GREAT FIRE IN WATERTOWN, N. Y.—LODGE ROOM BURNED.—We regret to learn that the Odd-Fellows of Watertown, in this State, have been great losers in the recent fire which has destroyed this thriving town. The fire broke out near the American Hotel, and before it could be arrested had consumed the best portion of the village. The Odd-Fellows Hall was burned, with all the Lodge furniture, books, etc., etc.

MT. CARMEL, Ill., May 9, 1849.

EDITORS OF THE GOLDEN RULE.—Dear Sirs and Brothers.—I am directed, by a resolution of this Lodge, of the 30th of April, to notify the Order, through your paper, that this Lodge has annulled the visiting card given to Bro. Chas. H. Harrison, which card he has in his possession at this time.

Yours, in F., L. & T.,

WM. W. HOSTKINSON, R. S.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE GRAND LODGE OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

We have received a copy of the proceedings of this R. W. body, at its late quarterly communication, held at Charleston, April 18, 1849. It is a document we have examined with much interest. From the able report of Grand Master De Sausure, we learn that the Order in that jurisdiction is in a healthy and flourishing condition.

The Committee, to which was referred the New York question, made a report quite temperate in its tone. We give below the concluding portion of the address, with the resolutions reported by the committee, and adopted by the Grand Lodge. We sincerely hope that our new constitution brethren will ponder well the kind, fraternal, and reasonable advice, offered them in this report:

Before closing their report, your committee desire again to express their high respect for the decisions of the G. L. U. S., how muchsoever they may be opposed to the principles which it recognizes, and their entire readiness and willingness to obey the behests of that R. W. Body, however distasteful they may be; and actuated by this spirit, while they deeply sympathize with their brethren in New York, and feel pained by the agitations by which they are torn and sundered, and while they declare their firm and steadfast determination to resist the establishment of a principle so odious in itself, and to which their unfortunate brethren have first fallen victims, they yet call upon them to respect the decrees which they cannot control—and by peaceful agitation and united effort with their brethren in other jurisdictions, advance calmly and steadily to the establishment of that reformation, for which they have so arduously struggled, and which we so earnestly desire.

Your committees recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That while this G. Lodge is prompted, by high respect, to acknowledge and obey the decision of the G. L. of the U. S., in relation to the difficulties existing in a sister jurisdiction, she yet desires, most respectfully, to protest against the decision itself, and the principles which it sanctions.

2. Resolved, That this G. Lodge recognizes no usage or custom as superior to Law and the Constitution.

3. Resolved, That the powers and authority of the G. Sire be more plainly defined in the Constitution, and that our Representatives be requested to attend the next session of the G. L. of the U. S., and there propose, support, and vote for an amendment for this purpose.

4. Resolved, That while we sympathize with our brethren in New York, in the difficulties in which they have been involved by unconstitutional action, and are willing to make common cause with them against the encroachments which are prevailing in our beloved Order, we affectionately exhort them to show proper respect to the Grand Lodge of the United States, as the Supreme Head of the Order; and by peaceful remonstrance and agitation, endeavor to effect the just design of restricting that action, which has deprived them of their rights.

A CARD TO EVENING STAR LODGE, NO. 66, N. J.

LAWRENCE LODGE No. 62, I. O. O. F.
Perth Amboy, N. J., May 11, 1849.

Whereas, This Lodge has this evening been informed of the recent disaster, in which Bro. Thos. L. Willett, of this Lodge, was cast with his vessel on the beach at Cape Island; and, Whereas, we have learned that the most prompt, efficient, and generous aid was rendered to our distressed brother by the members of Evening Star Lodge No. 65, for which they steadfastly refused to receive remuneration; therefore,

Resolved, That we are deeply indebted to the brothers of Evening Star Lodge; and that they have richly merited, and are hereby requested to accept our most heartfelt thanks. Also,

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution be forwarded to Evening Star Lodge, and also to the "Gazette of the Union and Golden Rule," for publication.

THE ORDER IN NORTH CAROLINA.

THE R. W. Grand Lodge of North Carolina held its Annual Commencement at Raleigh, on the 11th and 12th inst. We learn from our esteemed correspondent that it was one of the largest and most respectable meetings ever held in the State. Odd-Fellowship is comparatively young in this jurisdiction, but the rapid strides it is now making, bids fair in a short time to make it one of the main pillars of the Order. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: J. B. Newby, Fayetteville, G. M.; Alexander Bethune, Charlotte, D. G. M.; Julius M. Wilcox, Warrenton, G. W.; Wm. D. Cooke, Raleigh, G. S.; D. McMillan, Wilmington, G. T. Col. J. H. Manly, of Raleigh, was elected Grand Representative to the Grand Lodge of the United States, and Gen. J. C. B. Ehringhaus, of Elizabeth City, Grand Alternate.

We give below the portion of the Grand Master's Report, which relates to the condition and increase of the Order:

During the time that I have been in office, Dispensations have been granted for six Lodges. The first in order is Smyrna Lodge No. 18, which is located at Smyrna, Carteret County, and which was duly instituted by P. G. M. F. Arendell, of Concordia Lodge No. 11, on the 20th of June.

The next is Mountain Lodge No. 19, which is located at Lincolnton, and was duly instituted by D. D. Grand Master Alexander Bethune, on the 23d of September. Muchuena Lodge No. 20, was instituted on the 20th of September, by P. G. R. W. Choate, of Eureka Lodge No. 7, and is located at Warrenton.

The next is Buena Vista Lodge No. 21, which is located at Greensborough, and the duty of instituting the Lodge and installing the officers was performed by P. G. Master, I. Disoway, on the 4th of June. Tuscarora Lodge No. 22, was instituted on the 16th of March, by your chief officer, and is located at Kinston. Tyron Lodge No. 23, is located at Rutherfordton, and was instituted by D. D. G. Master Alexander Bethune, on the 4th of April.

The above named Lodges are all in a flourishing condition, as far as I have heard from them, and I would respectfully recommend that charters be granted them. During the year I have granted a dispensation to Winchester Lodge No. 16, to change the time of holding their regular meeting from Friday to Saturday night; and I have also granted dispensations to Phalanx Lodge No. 10, and Neuse Lodge No. 6, to hold their regular meetings during Court weeks on Tuesday nights, so as to allow the brethren from the country an opportunity of attending the regular meetings of their Lodges early in the week, as the former Lodge holds its regular meeting on Friday, and the latter on Saturday night. I have also granted a dispensation to Eureka Lodge No. 7, to have lectures delivered in their Lodge "for the good of the Order." All the above dispensations were granted, subject to the approval of this Grand Lodge.

THE ORDER IN WISCONSIN.

SHEBOYGAN FALLS, WIS., May 11th, 1849.

FIDELITY LODGE, No. 34, was instituted at this place on the evening of March 7th, by D. D. G. M. Geo. H. Smith, assisted by the officers and brothers of Sheboygan Lodge. There were eight petitioners for the charter, and we initiated six, and two joined by card, the first night. We now number twenty members, and they have all taken the degrees. We meet on Wednesday evenings, in the Sons of Temperance Hall—a splendid hall, 54 by 24 feet. Our Division of the Sons of Temperance numbers about 150 members. The following are the names of the officers of Fidelity Lodge, No. 34, for the present term: Mark Brainard, N. G.; Dr. S. F. Benjamin, V. G.; Wm. H. Prentice, S.; Charles D. Cole, T. The following by-law was unanimously adopted by the petitioners the evening before the Lodge was initiated: "Any member of this Lodge, guilty of using spirituous or malt liquor, wine or other intoxicating drinks, as a beverage, shall be reprimanded or suspended, and if persisted in, expelled."

Yours, in F., L. & T., W. H. C.

VALONIA LODGE No. 376, I. O. of O. F.—This Lodge was instituted on the evening of the 8th inst., at South Bainbridge, in this County, by H. Hubbard, D. D. G. M. The following gentlemen were installed as officers: C. A. Church, N. G.; W. H. Scott, V. G.; D. A. Carpenter, S.; C. Anthon, P. S.; J. Clapper, Treas.—[Chemung Union.]

GRAND LODGE OF NEW-YORK.—The regular adjourned meeting of this body will be held on the 81st inst. The proceedings of this Lodge, we need not say, must have, to the most careless reader, the highest interest, not only as showing the progress of the Order as far as new members are concerned, but as the source of information as to the restoration of brothers to our ranks who have been compelled to differ with us upon the question of State government. From all quarters we have news that is full of encouragement to every true Odd-Fellow, and such as warrants us in believing that in the promulgation of the holy principles of "Friendship, Love and Truth," the State of New-York will soon present an undivided front, and once more assume her proud position as the leader in the glorious work. The Order in the country was never more promising than at present, and what is of more consequence, never looked toward the Grand Lodge of this State with more confidence than now. Not only are single members, whom we have delighted to honor, seeking restoration, but whole Lodges are waiting with much anxiety for a decision that shall once more give them the protection of the Order, and restore to them the full benefits our organization insures to the brotherhood. Parting with our brethren was to us one of the unhappy moments of life, and we shall welcome them to our ranks with that heartfelt gladness, such as the meeting of long separated friends only can create.

THE I. O. O. F. PROCESSION AT TRENTON, TENN.—On Wednesday last, the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows, of Gibson, celebrated their anniversary in a splendid manner. The streets of Trenton were crowded, and beauty and intelligence thronged the sidewalks. After forming, the procession moved through the principal streets, and at length entered the Presbyterian Church, where they were addressed by the Rev. Mr. Roach, of McLeansville. The Church was crowded to overflowing, and many were unable to procure seats. The address was one of the most able, argumentative and eloquent affairs that we have ever had the pleasure of hearing—the speaker held the audience "spell bound" for the space of an hour and a quarter—during which time he gave a most beautiful, sublime, and thrilling description of the principles and aims of this glorious Order. Seldom has an abler champion appeared, and scarcely ever was the cause so nobly sustained, and calumny so completely crushed. Indeed, it was a glorious triumph of truth over error. And we venture to say that few, very few, left the Church without resolving in the future to be better men and better women. In words of burning, thrilling and scathing eloquence, the immutable truths of the Order were unfolded—the dark veil of superstition thrown aside, and the great secret of Odd-Fellowship exposed—that is, the happiness and prosperity of mankind. In fact, we feel that we are entirely unable to do justice to the Orator of the Day—we can only say that it was a noble speech, delivered in a noble cause.—[Dresden, Tenn., Advertiser.]

GAZETTE OF THE UNION.—We have heretofore neglected to notice this paper. It is a well conducted quarto, neatly printed, and devoted in the main to diffusing the principles of Odd-Fellowship. May it ever succeed in its attempts to ameliorate the condition of mankind, by spreading to the corners of this Union the sentiments which emanate from its columns, based upon "Friendship, Love and Truth."—[Cassville Standard.]

Right, Bro. Burke, we wish thee great success, and a life of a thousand years.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP.—The M. W. G. Master, Daniel Baker, assisted by Wm. Curtis, Grand Secretary, and other members of the Grand Lodge, on Thursday evening, opened "West End Lodge, No. 350," at their handsome new hall, northeast corner of Schuylkill Second and Market-streets, Philadelphia. The following persons were elected officers: Thomas J. Mahaffy, N. G.; E. C. Enos, V. G.; Past Grand Charles D. Freeman, Secretary; and John Mitchell, Treasurer. Nine candidates were initiated, and three brothers were admitted on card. The hall is handsomely fitted up, and lighted with gas, and the regalia of the Lodge is very elegant.

DEDICATION.—The new Odd-Fellows' Hall at Petersburg, Va., was dedicated with imposing ceremonies on the 14th of April.

Domestic and Foreign Miscellany.

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENT.—LOSS OF SEVENTEEN LIVES.—The Hudson River has been the scene of another steamboat accident, that has few parallels in the loss of life. The steamer Empire, Capt. Tupper, on the night of the 18th, when off Newburg, on her way to Albany, was struck near the bow by the schooner Noah Brown, and sunk almost immediately. The accident occurred at 10 o'clock, after the passengers had retired for the night. The utmost consternation prevailed, and the unfortunate people on board had barely time to escape in their night clothes. So rapidly did the boat fill, that the ladies' cabin soon filled with water, and the ladies and children were taken out through a hole out in the roof of the cabin. When the boat was struck, many passengers rushed on deck and jumped overboard, and were picked up by the steamer Rip Van Winkle, on her way to Albany. The number of passengers on board was two hundred and sixty, and the number of dead bodies recovered thus far is seventeen. This accident was caused, as we infer from the evidence before the Coroner's jury, by the neglect of the pilot of the steamboat, who was too independent to turn aside from a wood schooner.

THE ERIE RAILROAD will be opened to Owego on the first of June, making an extension of the road twenty-two miles west of Binghamton. The road is graded several miles west of Owego, and the cars will run to Elmira on the 1st of August.

The New-York and New Haven Railroad has now in operation an express train that rivals the English roads in speed, and far exceeds the work of any other road in the United States. Seventy-two miles are run in two hours and ten minutes, or thirty-five miles an hour. The road is admirably equipped, not only with machinery, but with officers, and no trouble need be taken by those who have ladies to send over the road. Once seated in the cars in Canal street, she is under the protection of gentlemanly conductors, who render their services, not as though they were conferring a favor, but so as to convince travelers that they are at home.

THE ORDER IN ALABAMA.—A correspondent, writing from Wetumpka, Alabama, says:

"The Lodge in this place is known as Wetumpka Lodge, No. 9, and numbers 67 members in all. The officers for the present term are: Daniel McKeithen, N. G.; John Trasher, V. G.; M. I. A. Keith, Sec.; Wm. A. Crecherson, Treas.

"I informed you, some time since, of the loss this Lodge sustained by fire. They have now a new and elegant Lodge Room, neatly fitted up, and are prospering finely. The members, such as I have become acquainted with, (and I can boast quite a list,) are good men and true, and such I think as will bring no reproach upon the cause of Friendship, Love and Truth. I was informed by D. D. G. Master, that an Encampment was in contemplation, and would probably be organized here in a short time."

ODD-FELLOWS CEMETERY AT PANAMA.—The Society of I. O. of O. F., among the many acts of benevolence and charity, with which they have so eminently distinguished themselves, have taken measures to purchase and enclose a burial ground for strangers. They do not propose to do more at present than to secure the ground within a chain enclosure, and subsequently appeal to the Order in the States, and the benevolently disposed for a sufficient sum to place an iron railing around it. Were it not for the aid this society has afforded to the sick and destitute, much suffering must have ensued; while under their constant and unremitting care all have been cared for, whether of the Order or not.

DEDICATION AT WILMINGTON, DEL.—In our next we shall have a full and detailed report of the exercises of dedication.

GEN. WORTH, of the U. S. A., died of cholera, at San Antonio, Texas, on the 7th.; and one hundred deaths had occurred, and the disease unabated.

THE DREADFUL FIRE AT ST. LOUIS.—We have not on record an account of many more destructive conflagrations, than the one that has just laid the best part of St. Louis in ruins. The following is the telegraphic account of the disaster, in a condensed form:

The burning boats were cut from their moorings and floated down the levee, setting fire to such boats as were unable to get out.

A strong wind prevailing, the boats almost the entire length of the levee soon presented a solid sheet of flame. By this time nearly the whole city became aroused, and the utmost consternation prevailed.

The heat from the burning boats set the buildings fronting on the levee on fire, the flames communicating at the lowest street, the very heart of the business portion of the city, and extending from Locust street to three quarters of a mile down the levee, reaching back as far as Second street. Within these bounds nearly every building is in ruins.

The burnt district embraces almost all the business portion of the city. The merchants mostly had on hand very heavy stocks of goods. There was very little moveable property saved.

The whole river front of warehouses, from Locust street to Chestnut—three squares—were destroyed; and extending to Main street, the flames swept both sides to Market street, crossing to Second street, diagonally; thence taking a course southward.

More than a mile in length, by three blocks in width, of the center of the city, has been laid waste.

On the river, at Market street, the progress of the fire was stayed by blowing up the drug store of Messrs. Doenich & Valloux.

Three persons were killed by an explosion on board the steamboat Alice; and it is probable that as many as twenty lives have been lost during the progress of the destroyer.

The City Hall was several times on fire, but it is saved.

At least four hundred houses are burned. Many robberies, of course, were committed.

Mr. Thomas B. Fargo, an auctioneer, was one of those killed during the fire. He threw a keg of powder into the store of Doenich & Valloux, for the purpose of blowing it up and stopping the progress of the flames at that point; but, unfortunately, the explosion took place before he could get away from the building.

The value of the steamboat stock was about $350,000; insured for $200,000;

The value of the cargoes of the steamboats, $150,000. Freight on the landing valued at $50,000. The total loss by the fire is about $5,000,000.

WESTERN ELOQUENCE.—We have often had a fling at the wild cat eloquence of the far west, knowing all the time, by auricular evidence, that some of the finest orators of the age are to be found in the valley of the Mississippi. The following beautiful compliment to a St. Louis orator, we cut from the Reveille. St. Louis is about the westernmost city in the Union:

"Editors of the Reveille.—I am a stranger in St. Louis. I came direct from Perth, in Scotland. Having nothing of any importance to do for a day or two, I visited the court house yesterday morning. The general impression made upon my mind, at first, was the common sense one of plain, clean, unpretending halls: fresh painted, airy and spacious. The youth of the Judge, I confess, at first struck me as a defect. The counsel wore no gowns, nor is the place decorated with any armorial bearings that I could observe. I looked for soldiers, but saw not so much as a file to keep the door. This all seemed odd enough. A plain, middle-sized man, about thirty years of age, had the charge of the prisoner's defense, (it was some shooting charge.) He began in slow, rather feeble accents, and as I thought, far from the main question. He seemed to rise mentally, however, and even in person. He spoke fluently, pertinently, and with grace and ease for at least two hours. The scene deepened, his voice became more sonorous; his whole soul seemed thrown into the case of his client. I shall never again doubt of magnetism. I was perfectly spell-bound. I felt no weariness; nor hunger, nor thirst, nor inconvenience of any kind, though I had to stand in a crowded court room the whole day. For six hours did this tide of perfectly tremendous eloquence roll along, and still it seemed to be gathering power. I have never heard anything that could be compared with the eloquence of this gifted orator. I said in my heart, the court that has counsel like this, requires no other ornament.

"I have heard Jeffreys, Campbell, and Brougham, but never heard anything like this. I inquired his name; I think they told me that it was Wright.

A STRANGER."

St. Louis, April 17th, 1849.

A PRISONER "SELLING" HIS KEEPER.—Wm. Phillips, alias Phelps and Porter, was tried in Lowell, in November last, upon three indictments for burglary, and sentenced to nine years hard labor in the State Prison. Shortly afterward he obtained an interview with Mr. Robinson, the Warden, and told him that he had "planted" $50,000 in a locality which he described. After consulting with Mr. Nicholas, Marshal of Charlestown, it was determined to search for the prize. Phillips was granted a holiday, and the trio proceeded by cab to the Old Colony railroad, and thence by cars to Fall River, near which Phillips pointed out the spot where they must dig. They went to work with a will. Phillips superintended operations, and the city marshal and warden relieved one another at the spade. The marshal was at work with the shovel, and had made a hole six feet deep. Phillips and the warden were on the bank cheering him to still greater exertions. Just before Nichols came to the shiners, Phillips shoved Robinson into the hole, commenced burying them up, and vanished. The warden and the marshal had so much dust in their eyes that they could not pursue him to advantage; and the marshal had a sprained ankle. So they came home. Nichols took to his bed, and Robinson offered a reward for the arrest of Phillips, who was taken to Fall River in irons, which were removed in order to allow him to take his turn at the shovel. He is forty-five years old, five feet ten inches in height, dark complexion, blue eyes, and dark hair.—[Boston Bee.

SECRETS OF THE INQUISITION.—A correspondent of the London Daily News, describes a visit he has made to the many small, dark and damp dungeons of the Inquisition. The building is out of the beaten track, being in a sort of cul de sac behind St. Peter's. The dungeons and all their apparatus, are to be thrown open to the inspection of the public, and will furnish a sight not likely to recommend priestly rule to the people. The correspondent says:

"The officer in charge led me down to where the men were digging in the vaults; they had cleared a downward flight of steps, which was choked up with old rubbish, and had come to a series of dungeons under the vaults, deeper still, and which immediately brought to my mind the prisons of the Doge, under the canal of the Bridge of Sighs, at Venice, only that here there was a surpassing horror.

"I saw imbedded in old masonry, unsymmetrically arranged, five skeletons in various recesses, and the clearance had only just begun. The period of their insertion in this spot must have been more than a century and a half. From another vault, full of skulls and scattered human remains, there was a shaft about four feet square, ascending perpendicularly to the first floor of the building, and ending in a passage off the hall of chancery, where a trap-door lay between the tribunal and the way into a suite of rooms destined for one of the officials. The object of this shaft could admit of but one surmise. The ground of the vault was made up of decayed animal matter, a lump of which held imbedded in it a long silken lock of hair, as I found from personal examination as it was shoveled up from below. But that is not all: there are two large subterranean lime-kilns—if I may so call them—shaped like a beehive in masonry, filled with layers of calcined bones, forming the substratum of two chambers, on the ground floor, in the immediate vicinity of the very mysterious shaft above mentioned." (It must be remembered that of late the power of the Holy Inquisition, even in Rome, was greatly fallen from its former high estate.)

CURIOSITIES OF THE EARTH.—At the city of Modena, in Italy, and about four miles around it, wherever it is dug, whenever the workmen arrive at the distance of sixty-three feet, they come to a bed of chalk, which they bore with an auger five feet deep. They then withdraw from the pit before the auger is removed, and, upon its extraction, the water bursts up through the aperture with great violence, and quickly fills this new-made well, which continues full, and is affected neither by rains nor drouths. But that which is most remarkable in this operation is the layers of earth as we descend. At the depth of fourteen feet are found the ruins of an ancient city, paved streets, houses, floors, and different pieces of mosaic. Under this is found a soft, oozy earth, made up of vegetables; and at 26 feet deep large trees entire, such as walnut trees, with the walnuts still sticking on the stem, and their leaves and branches in perfect preservation. At twenty-eight feet deep a soft chalk is found, mixed with a vast quantity of shells, and this bed is eleven feet thick. Under this, vegetables are found again with leaves and branches of trees as before, and thus alternately chalk and vegetable earth, to the depth of sixty-three feet.

ON THE DEATH OF AN INFANT.

FROM THE DUTCH OF DIRL SMITS.

A Host of angels flying
Through cloudless skies impelled,
Upon the earth beheld
A pearl of beauty lying,
Worthy to glitter bright
In Heaven's vast halls of light.

They saw, with glances tender,
An infant newly born,
O'er whom life's earliest morn
Just cast its opening splendor:
Virtue it could not know,
Nor vice, nor joy, nor woe.

The blest angelic legion
Greeted its birth above,
And came, with looks of love,
From Heaven's enchanting region;
Bending their winged way
To where the infant lay.

They spread their pinions o'er it—
That little pearl which shone
With luster all its own—
And then on high they bore it,
Where glory has its birth;—
But left the shell on earth.

THE BROAD WAY.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY MRS. S. MOWBRAY.

"Are there few that be saved?"

St. Luke's Gospel.

THE motto of the present article, the reader will perceive, is the question put by the twelve, on a certain occasion, to their Divine Master. A question which is not more characteristic of human curiosity and impertinence, than the answer, or rather rebuke, which it elicited, is of Godlike wisdom and gentleness. "And he said unto them, 'strive to enter in at the straight gate, for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be who go in thereat; because strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.'"

Now, though the whole of the above quotation does not occur in the part of Saint Luke's Gospel, where the disciples' query is recorded, yet, nevertheless, it is natural to suppose that this was the occasion on which the preceding beautiful language was spoken by our Lord, as given by St. Matthew.

The reason assigned here, by the sacred author of Christianity, why so few are saved, seems to be simply this: that the road to safety is a narrow road, whereas, that to destruction is emphatically a broad one. Wide enough to allow of one hundred of millions of the human family running on it abreast, in company with their countless idols and other infatuations, pomps and vanities, kings and their courts, sultans and their harems, popes and their vaticans, Pharisees and their ostentations, "trumpet-tongued" charities, and many besides, who imagine themselves traveling with their faces Zionward. Not unfrequently does the eye detect this motley multitude—the noisy professor of religion, with his shameless inconsistencies, as well as the silent devotee, in whom the scrutiny of a fellow being can mark no flaw; but could we unveil his heart, and look in upon the imagery there, we should at once pronounce him a polytheist, and as such, a journeyer on the road to destruction. Yet he calls these only a few innocent abstractions; forsooth, scarcely amounting even to a sentiment. Simple preferences, for superlative excellence, to be sure—harmless, platonic attachments to some prohibited objects. Wretched man! He never stops to analyze them further, but lets the snaky brood continue to twist themselves about his heart, until they imperceptibly drink up the very life blood of his soul. Yet all this time he supposes himself traveling in the narrow way, and so does that contented looking character beside him, with the thousand baskets of champagne, and half as many volumes of Bulwer, and others of the same school. He, too, imagines himself within the narrow way, because he manages to carry, as a passport, yon little gilded prayer book merely. And there goes the gorgeous matron, with the golden bible and audible prayer, and jeweled purse—seldom, if ever, drawn out to relieve the poor and weary. She, too, is amusing herself with the above delusion and hopes, soon to reach the heaven of her dreams—which, of course, is not a whit better than that of the veriest muselman—a perfect Abyssinia of astral lamps and ostrich feathers; or a Persian wilderness of India muslins, and cashmere shawls, and artificial flowers, and raiment; not the airy drapery of angels, or the rainbow garments of the clouds, but whole bales of veritable French silks, glowing gloriously in their myriad hues.

Alas for the visionary phantoms which mortals pursue! and what a melancholy spectacle does this wicked world present to the eye of the true philanthropist, as he looks through its dense masses of depraved humanity, regarding with passive indifference, or reckless impatience, the pressure and prospect of present and coming ills! And how he longs to stop the current's flow toward destruction! But from what Mars Hill shall he attempt to arouse man from his suicidal sloth and inanity? At what vantage spot can he arrest the progress of the millions? The path they tread is broad and down hill—it hath no Thermopylae at which his generous zeal might hope to stem the tide of moral death. Man is a free agent, and the Omnipotent Himself is unwilling to interfere with this most sacred attribute of his nature. True, He urges him to turn from the error of his way, by the most touching arguments and tenderest condescensions on His part, as well as by the most ample and gracious provisions for his comfort and defense in the paths of holiness. But, above all, inviting him to constancy and diligence by the prospect of an inheritance eternal in the heavens; and to the sympathetic victims by these most transforming views of the Divine compassion and goodness, as he reveals himself through the medium of Revelation, Creation and Providence.

COMETS.

PROPOSITION.—Is it possible that a comet could come into contact with the earth or any other planet?

SOLUTION.—Comets move in all directions, and traverse extremely elongated ellipses, which intersect our solar system and cut the orbits of the planets. There is, therefore, no absolute impossibility of a comet coming into contact with them, and rigorously speaking, we must acknowledge that the shock of a comet against our earth might happen; but at the same time it is an extremely improbable event, of which we may satisfy ourselves, if we compare the small mass of this globe and of the comets with the immensity of space in which they move. The doctrine of probabilities furnishes the criterion by which we may estimate numerically the chances of such a shock, and it appears to be only 1 in 281 millions; that is to say, if any unknown comet were to appear, one might bet 281 millions against unity, that it would not strike our globe. It would then be weakness in any man to alarm himself about so unlikely a danger. However, the effects of such a collision might be most awful. If the earth were so violently struck that its orbital movement was destroyed, everything not adherent to the surface, as animals, water, &c., would rush from it with a velocity of seven leagues in a second. If the shock only retarded the rotatory movement, the seas would spring up from their beds, and the equator and the poles would be changed. The famous La Place thus describes the effects that would follow: "The axis and rotatory movement being changed, the seas would abandon their ancient basins to precipitate themselves on the new equator; great numbers of men and animals would be drowned in this universal deluge, or crushed by the violent shock impressed on the terrestrial globe; all the monuments of human industry would be overturned; such are the disasters which the shock of a comet would occasion. We see, therefore, why the ocean formerly covered lofty mountains, on which it has left indubitable marks of its presence; we see why animals and plants of the south have existed in northern regions, where we find their remains and traces; finally, we explain the newness of the moral world, whose monuments are not more ancient than five thousand years. The human race, reduced to a small number of individuals, and to the most deplorable condition, solely occupied, during a long period, the conservation of existence, must have entirely lost the remembrance of science and art; and when the progress of civilization created new wants, it would become necessary to begin all things anew, as though men had been for the first time placed on this globe."

MIRACULOUS BLOOD SPOTS ON HUMAN FOOD.—Under the influence of certain circumstances, of which it is difficult, if not impossible, now to form any precise idea, there have appeared upon bread, and food of other kinds, spots of a vivid red color, closely resembling drops of blood. During the siege of Tyre, Alexander was alarmed by the appearance of bloody spots on the soldiers' bread. At a period nearer our own age, in 1610, similar stains were seen upon the consecrated wafers; and thirty-eight unfortunate Jews were accused of having caused, by their sorceries, this phenomenon, and suffered for their supposed sacrilegious death by burning. In 1819, similar kinds of red spots appeared among the inhabitants of Padua and its environs. At the commencement of the month of August in that year, a farmer of Legnaro, named Pittarello, was frightened by seeing drops of blood sprinkled upon his porridge, made of the maize which grew in the neighborhood of his village. His alarm was greatly increased, when, for many days following, he saw the same red spots appear on all his food—new bread, rice, veal, fish, and boiled and roast fowls. The curé was appealed to, that he might exercise his sacred functions to expel the evil spirit which produced these alarming appearances; but prayers were ineffectual, and the neighbors of the unfortunate Pittarello supposed that he was under a celestial malediction. Incited by curiosity, a large number of persons went to Legnaro, and a commission was eventually named, to investigate the nature and causes of this phenomenon. M. Sette was appointed to this task. On examining under the microscope these miraculous red spots, he discovered that they were formed by myriads of small bodies, which appeared to be microscopic fungi, and to which he gave the name of saagalactina inetropha. He succeeded in propagating these minute organic productions, and in a memoir published at Venice in 1824, he gives a detailed history of them. During the year 1848, the same phenomenon appeared at Berlin, and fixed the attention of M. Ehrenberg. This celebrated micrographer has closely studied these red spots; and he believes them to be, not as M. Sette supposes, microscopic fungi, but animalcules of inferior degree, a monade to which he has given the name of monas prodigiosa, on account of their extreme smallness. These little beings appear as corpuscles, almost round, of one three-thousandth to one eight-thousandth of a line in length; transparent when separately examined, but in a mass of the color of blood. M. Ehrenberg calculated, that in the space of a cubic inch there are from 46,656,000,000,000 to 884,736,000,000,000 of these monades.—[Medical Times.

DECREASE OF FISH IN RIVERS.—In "A Treatise on the Production and Management of Fish in Fresh Waters," by Gottlieb Boccia, he says, "The main cause why all fresh-water streams become sterile in the end, if not carefully tended, is simple enough: namely, all the smaller streams form the sewers of the adjacent country, and fall into the larger rivers; and the latter again act as the sewers of the towns and of the kingdom, and are carriers of their congregated impurities finally to the sea. The increasing population of human beings charges the rivers every day with more and more foul matters, the refuse of towns and the agrarian districts passing into them; and hence the destruction of the spawn, egg, or ova of fish, but not of the fish when once brought into life. One cause of this I shall explain chemically. Water is composed of one volume of oxygen gas, and two volumes of hydrogen gas. No life can be sustained without oxygen, let it be animal or vegetable; consequently, when water becomes thickened by other matters, a new compound is introduced, which produces a new chemical action; and this is the cause why all rivers and streams eventually become barren: for the following is the result of such a condition of waters, which it is an abuse of language any longer to call fresh. The egg of a fish, in production, differs from that of other animals, as the absorption of spermatic fluids does not take place till it has passed from the parent, and is then left on its bed, hill, or weed, according to the description of the fish, until the period of incubation has arrived; but in the meantime, should the water become foul and change its character, then the alluvial deposit in the water settles down upon the pedicle or neck of the egg, hermetically seals the same, and prevents the oxygen gas (the component part of water) from being absorbed and passing to the embryo, from which cause suffocation takes place, and the egg is in common phrase, addled. This may seem strange; but the student of the laws of Nature well knows that oxygen gas is as absolutely necessary to life as it is the slow destroyer of all things. The destruction of the eggs of the trout from the cause just assigned I have proved to many friends, having shown them thousands in a putrefied state on their own natural hills or breeding grounds; while, upon the principles I have to detail of my methods of producing fish, not a single egg is lost.

The Quarterly Review affirms that England is the center of the earth. Judging from the free manner in which she lends her money and never gets paid, she might almost be considered the "fool in the middle."—[Puppet Show.

Humorous and Amusing.

A TIME IN OUR BOARDING HOUSE.

OURS is a most singular boarding house. Scarcely a day passes that the steward does not break a new set of dishes; an old gentleman precipitate himself headlong down a steep flight of stairs; an interesting child swallow a pin; a lady boarder's spaniel dash itself accidentally from the third story window; or, in fact, which does not abound with a variety of disastrous occurrences, calculated to throw the boarders in an uproar, and to reduce our landlord to a most distressing state of anxiety.

One day last week there was a calm, the first that had occurred for a month. We congratulated ourselves upon the event, and began to entertain vague hopes that permanent peace was about to be established. But, alas! the house is so doomed to accidents, that no reliable conjecture can be drawn from present appearances. The very next day there occurred one of the most exciting incidents that ever drove our landlord furious, and wound up his boarders into a quintessence of merriment.

I had just returned from one of Wilson's rarest musical lunches, most of the boarders had retired to their rooms, and complete silence reigned in the house. Striking a light, I drew my arm chair near the head of the bed, and threw myself into it in a mental state of luxurious indolence, repeating internally, Wilson's "Scots wha hae." Thus I sat for a few moments, when suddenly I heard two screams, in the room overhead—so loud, so shrill, they can be compared to nothing save the cry of a busy housewife after a servant in the back yard. Soon I heard two bounds on the floor, as if of persons jumping out of bed, and the cries were repeated louder and louder in quick succession. There was no time for consideration. My neighbors were evidently in a trying dilemma. Seizing the candle I unbolted the door and rushed into the hall. But I had been forestalled. All the doors on either side of the hall were opened, and the inmates excited to the last degree. Some with night-caps, some with only a single boot on, and one even sporting a pair of flaming red flannels, were crowded together in the hall, and hurrying to the scene of the catastrophe.

"What's the matter?" "Can't say." "Whose voice is that?" "Och, stand off my corns." "Beg pardon—such confounded squeezing." "Lord, how she hollers"—and on they rushed, helter-skelter, first from one hall to the other, and then up a flight of stairs next to another hall, and so on to the scene of excitement.

"Oh, my heavens!" cried a female voice, as the foremost of the party reached the landing. "What's all them men doing here?"

"Stand back, gentlemen, stand back!" cried one of the least excited of the boarders—a venerable looking gentleman, who had on a coat and no pants, and held his candlestick upside down; "get back if you please, there are females here—the helps of the house, gentlemen—Susan and Margaret—stand back, if you please."

"But what's the matter?" "Who in the deuce cares if—" "Go ahead, if you're going to." "We want to see." "What is it?"

"But, gentlemen, resumed the non-excitable speaker, 'the females are not quite—that is to say Susan has not—hem—I think it's only their—hem—their night things the girls have on.'"

"That's nothing—let's see what's the matter." "We'll shut our eyes." "Good." "Oh, get along; they'll be murdered before we get there." "Whew, what squeezing!" "I do wonder—" "Beef." "Ah, now we go;" and on the tide rolled, pushing and pulling, and wondering until they stopped opposite No. 64, the chamber of the two house helps.

The door stood wide open; the beds were tumbled in admirable confusion, and Susan and Margaret stood at the entrance, one holding her hands over her face, and the other pale and weeping as though her heart would burst.

"What's the matter, my child?" asked a young gentleman of about sixteen summers, in an anxious tone.

"Boo—hoo—hoo," cried Margaret, giving vent to a fresh flood of tears.

"My gracious, it's very distressing," said the man in red flannels, snuffing a neighbor's candle out in an excess of sympathy. "My poor girl, what has happened?"

"Boo—hoo—hoo," answered Margaret, "I can't say."

"Well, now, what is the matter with you?" cried somebody from the distance, who was not able to see over the heads of those before him. The question was propounded so earnestly this time, it was impossible to overlook it.

"Well," commenced the distressed help—"well, boo—hoo, there's a ma—ma—man in my—boo—hoo—hoo."

"I wonder," said the man in red flannels, opening his eyes to their utmost width, and keeping them fixed in inexpressible astonishment on the help.

"Let's drag him out," suggested some one.

"Yes," continued the crowd, "let's take him out." "Carry him out on a rail." "On two chips." "Ah, the scoundrel." "Who'd have thought?" "Don't push." "So rascally." "Let's go in." "Inhuman."

Infuriated at the audacity of such villainy, the crowd rushed into the chamber—the man in red flannels tore off the coverlet—and true enough there lay a stout, large sized man! He remained perfectly still during all the excitement, not appearing even to breathe.

"Get up, sir!"

The man remained perfectly insensible.

"Get up, I tell you, or I'll strike you."

Still he did not offer to stir. The excitement became uncontrollable.

"Tear him out." "Drag him down." "Don't have any mercy."

"Get out, you scoundrel!" cried the man with red flannels, in a voice of thunder.

Still a perfect calm. There was no bearing such indifference. Seizing the offender roughly by the arm, the man with the red flannels pulled him violently over.

"Eh! what's that?"

"Why, it's stuffed!"

"Roped in, by jingo, it's a parcel of dirty clothes!"

The man in flannels stared at his villain in a maze of doubt and astonishment. A roar of laughter that rang through every apartment in the house, and started the watchmen in the street, succeeded; and a young gentleman, whose countenance from the beginning had been disfigured by inestimable twists and contortions, slipped quietly from the crowd, hurried to his room, and throwing himself on the bed, was for full a quarter of an hour holding his sides, and laughing as if he expected this to be his last chance for an ebullition of fine spirits.

Really, as I said before, ours is a very curious house; but as its turmoils and agitations are rather of an amusing character, it may be all the better for that.—[St. Louis Reveille.

DIGESTS.—We have received a small supply of this valuable work, and are now ready to fill orders, which must invariably be accompanied by a remittance. Price 37½ cts. each.

BUSINESS NOTICE.

Agents without exception are requested to forward their reports immediately, in order that we may credit subscribers promptly and prevent confusion in our accounts. Send the report if only a dollar has been collected.

To subscribers we would again say, do not wait for an agent, but remit direct. Postmasters are allowed to frank your letters to publishers, and are always ready to do so. We prefer remittances direct from subscribers, and hope they will act accordingly.

TRAVELING AGENTS.—We shall be under the necessity of relinquishing the services of all traveling agents who do not make weekly returns. The names of all who do not follow this plan (without which the books of the office cannot be correctly kept) will be stricken from our published list of agents.

Subscribers are hereby notified not to pay money to an agent whose name is not in the paper. To our readers we would again say, do not depend upon agents, but remit to the office of the Gazette and Rule direct.

TO CLUBS.—Any person obtaining the names of five new Subscribers, and sending us Ten Dollars, shall receive a sixth copy gratis for one year. Upon all subscriptions over five, the person sending the names and money may retain fifty cents as his commission. Payments invariably in advance.

Postmasters are authorized to remit money to Publishers, and all money mailed in presence of the Postmaster, and duly forwarded by him, is at our risk.

In all cases where postage on subscriptions is not paid, it will be deducted from the amount credited to those who send it.

GAZETTE OF THE UNION
AND GOLDEN RULE.

THE ORGAN OF THE ORDER,
Published under the auspices of the M. W. Grand Sir!

It will contain, from week to week, the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of the State of New-York, and also of other States; accounts of Celebrations, Institutions of new Lodges, and occasionally, a complete Directory of all the Lodges in the Union.

Its Literary department will be filled with Original Tales of the highest excellence, prepared by the most eminent writers in our country—Popular Tales; Choice Miscellany; the rarest Gems of Poetry from the English Poets; Sketches of Travel; Anecdotes, &c., &c.; and occasionally illustrated with beautiful Wood Engravings. Being equal in its Literary character to any Weekly in the country, and being thus perfect in its Odd-Fellowship department, it will be worthy of a place on the table of every brother of the Order.

The Gazette and Rule is published every Saturday, at 44 Ann-street, New-York, by CRAMPTON & CLARK, and is under the Editorial Superintendence of Rev. Bro. AUG. C. L. ARNOLD, P. C. P.

All Communications should be addressed to CRAMPTON & CLARK, 44 Ann-street, New-York.

Office of the Grand Secretary Grand Lodge State of New-York:

ODD-FELLOW'S HALL, CITY OF NEW-YORK,

March 13, 1849.

To District Deputy Grand Masters, Officers of Lodges, and Brothers:

In consequence of the many complaints made to this Office of the failure of Deputies, Officers of Lodges and Members to receive communications which have been issued from this Office, and of the failure to receive many communications which have been intended to reach this Office, for several months last past, and which have been transmitted by Deputies, Lodges and individuals, you are therefore notified and requested to address all communications intended for the Grand Lodge, Grand Master, or Grand Secretary, to BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Box No. 828, Post Office, New-York, and in all cases to be particular that Letters and Documents are properly mailed, in order that a failure of papers intended for this, or sent from this Office, to reach their destination, may be traced to the proper cause.

Fraternally yours,

BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Grand Secretary.

JULIA WRIGHT—CANTO XI.

Thus, for a full half hour, the cornet ran on—
Pouring his burning words like red hot shot,
(According to the tactics of Love's canon.)

Then paused to see if he had BREACH'd or not
By his artillery of heavy gammon,

The heart of Julia; heavens! a bright red spot
On either cheek, told plain as words could speak,
That Julia's citadel was growing weak!

THE 'BRIGHT RED SPOT' might have been produced by GOURAUD'S magnificent LIQUID ROUGE; it may also have been the blush of indignation, called up by the soldier's flattery; our own private opinion is, that she had reason to blush for her ignorance of the virtues of GOURAUD'S wonderful MEDICATED SOAP in the removal of Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Sallowiness, Ringworm, &c. from the skin!

GOURAUD'S POWDER SUBTILE, as everybody knows, will positively extirpate, root, branch and blossom, all superfluous hair from upper lips, brows, or any part of the human frame. GOURAUD'S LILY WHITE is a delicious white for the complexion.

THIS Superior Medicine may be had in part as follows:—At Dr. Wright's Offices in Philadelphia, 160 Race-street; New-York, 288 Greenwich-street; and Boston, 128 Tremont-street;—and by 90,000 Agencies in North and South America, England, France, and Germany. Agents whose supplies become exhausted, can obtain a fresh lot at the Philadelphia rates, by addressing any of the above Offices. Care should be taken not to confound this medicine with other articles of similar name, so as to prevent disagreeable consequences; and in no case should it be purchased from individuals who cannot vouch for its genuineness. 240

PROF. BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS, OR MEDICATED COMPOUND,

FOR RESTORING, PRESERVING AND BEAUTIFYING HAIR, ERADICATING SCURF AND DANDRUFF, AND CURING DISEASES OF THE SKIN, GLANDS, AND MUSCLES, CUTS, STINGS, BRUISES, SPRAINS, &c. &c.

IN order to convince the public of the efficacy of any curative preparation, in this thinking and reflective age, it is necessary to explain the philosophy of its operation. The process by which Professor Barry's Tricopherous produces such extraordinary results, cannot be understood without a brief notice of the structure and uses of the delicate substances to which it is applied, and in the condition of which it accomplishes the most salutary changes. The connection between the hair and the skin is so close, that the one may be almost deemed a continuation of the other, and hence whatever renovates, restores, and nourishes the hair, must of necessity have a healthful influence upon the sensitive membrane in which its roots are fixed.

The skin, that wonderful envelop in which the sense of touch resides, consists of three layers; the EPIDERMIS or cuticle, a semi-opaque, or almost insensible film; the RETICULUM, which is a spongy membrane reticulated with nerves and blood-vessels, and forms a sort of shield to the exquisitely delicate TRUE SKIN; and the true skin itself, which constitutes the third layer of the triple envelop. In this tough, flexible and elastic integument, are located the nerves, blood-vessels, &c., which supply sustenance to the hair, and in the derangement of which diseases of the skin originate. The vessels of the true skin supply the sacs containing the roots of the hair with the moisture which sustains the fibres, and the same causes which affect the health of the hair, also affect the health of the skin. This is self-evident to the casual observer, as well as susceptible of demonstration by the anatomist and physiologist; for in all cutaneous diseases, the hair becomes dry and harsh, and falls out in such quantities as sometimes to render the patient partially or entirely bald. Wounds, burns, &c., on the skin of the head, also produce baldness on the portions of the scalp where the injury has been inflicted, thus proving the close affinity and sympathy between the organism of the skin and the hair.

The wonderful restorative and remedial properties of Professor Barry's Tricopherous, are based upon this hypothesis, or rather this fact. It acts through the skin upon the hair, stimulating the inert vessels, opening the pores, imparting activity to the circulation, awakening from their lethargy all the vegetative functions which give life, vigor, and beauty to the fibres, extirpating every particle of scurf and dandruff, and soon clothing even the bald or half denuded head with a thick, glossy, silky, and elastic covering.

But this is only one of the uses of Professor Barry's Tricopherous. The same properties which restore vital and vegetative power the skin of the head are equally beneficial in all cutaneous diseases, or superficial injuries. For cuts, burns, bites of insects, sprains, erysipelas, blotches, pimples, scabies, ring-worm, rashes, scrofula, prickly heat, chilblains, chapped hands, rheumatism, burns, scalds, bruises, redness of the skin, and in short all the troublesome and painful external diseases and injuries which are so common in families, and which NOTHING BUT EXTERNAL REMEDIES CAN REMOVE, the Tricopherous will be found a speedy, safe, and unfailing cure. By virtue of its double claim as a renovator and beautifier of nature's choicest ornament, and a potent and invaluable remedial agent, it is entitled to a place on every toilet, and in every medicine chest.

The following testimonials, selected from hundreds of similar import, will serve to show the value of the preparation, and the estimation in which it is held by those who have given it a trial.

COPY OF A LETTER FROM WILLIAM DAVIES,
Corner of Hicks and Atlantic streets, Brooklyn.

BROOKLYN, April 19th, 1849.

PROFESSOR BARRY—Sir: I should be deficient in gratitude to you, and in feeling for others who may be similarly afflicted, if I neglected to inform you that your Tricopherous has entirely removed from my face a painful and disgusting eruption, consisting of large red pimples, with which I had been annoyed for many years. A regular application of the fluid according to the directions, for a little better than three weeks, completely relieved me of the nuisance, and the skin of my face is now as free from discoloration as in my boyhood.

Yours truly, WILLIAM DAVIES.

COPY OF A LETTER FROM JAMES FITZGERALD.
New York, April 19th, 1849.

PROFESSOR BARRY—Verily, my dear sir, your Tricopherous is the Admiral Crichton of its class. It not only relieves the head from scurf and dandruff, and imparts beauty and vigor to the hair, but it is, as I can testify from personal experience, a most valuable application for cuts abrasions, bruises, and those vile eruptions which are so annoying to children in the warm seasons, I have found nothing equal to it in cutaneous disorders; and if what I say is worth any thing to you, publish it and welcome.

Your ob't servant,

JAMES FITZGERALD.

COPY OF A LETTER FROM DR. LEE.
New York, Feb. 6, 1849.

MR. BARRY—I have no hesitation in recommending an article which I can, of my own personal knowledge, endorse as good; and I therefore state with confidence, that your Tricopherous is what you claim it to be—an article for cleansing, preserving, beautifying, and promoting the growth of the hair.

I find it to be the best remedy I have ever had in my practice for scald head, ringworm, and diseases which the skin is subject to.

T. A. LEE, M. D.

The following testimonial is from Mr. Mann, editor of the Scientific American. Comment on such evidence is unnecessary.

NEW YORK, Feb. 21, 1849.

BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS is an article that we take pleasure in awarding the highest commendations. We do not do it upon the recommendations of others, but from our own personal knowledge of its effects upon the hair; while it tends to keep it healthy, soft and glossy, it also removes dandruff, prevents grey hair, and invigorates its growth in a manner unequalled by any other composition known to us. A person only needs to use one bottle to be convinced of its truth.

THE PROPRIETORS having spent much time

in bringing this preparation of Sarsaparilla to its present state of perfection; and the experience of fourteen years has furnished them the most ample opportunity to study, in their various forms, the diseases for which it is recommended, and to adapt it exactly to their relief and cure. Patients who wish a really good Medicine are invited to give it a trial, and satisfy themselves of its superiority, and the invaluable property it possesses of arresting and curing disease. The bottle has been enlarged to hold one Quart, and in its present improved form may safely claim to be the best and cheapest medicine of the age. Its progress to the fame it has attained may be traced by a long line of facts and cures, that stand as landmarks and beacons for the invalid, pointing the way to the haven of health; and what it has already done for the thousands who have used it, it is capable of doing for the millions still suffering and struggling with disease. It purifies, cleanses, and strengthens the fountain springs of life, and infuses new vigor throughout the whole animal frame.

DYSPEPSY CURED.

The following testimonial, from a gentleman so well known as Mr. Cox, requires no comment, and recommends itself to all similarly afflicted: NEW-ORLEANS, Dec. 18, 1848.

Messrs. A. B. & D. SANDS—Gentlemen: Having experienced the most beneficial effects from the use of your Sarsaparilla, it gives me pleasure to add my testimony to the numerous spontaneous effusions of grateful hearts which you continually are receiving.

My case was dyspeptic, or rather I may term it a weakness of the digestive organs. For more than a year, I was troubled with wind upon my stomach and its frequent eructation, together with producing a spasmodic contraction of the heart, often gave me much annoyance. After trying various remedies without avail, I commenced with your Sarsaparilla. Before I had used half a bottle, almost every symptom of this disagreeable complaint had vanished, and in a few weeks its continued use effected a complete cure. I therefore confidently recommend it to all persons affected in the same manner, and have reason to believe that many who are suffering under a supposed disease of the heart, if they would take your Sarsaparilla, in a few weeks would find themselves restored to health in both mind and body. I remain yours, very truly,

JOHN V. COX, 93 Lexington Avenue.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA IN PRUSSIA.

The Proprietors of this valuable Medicine have just received an order from our esteemed friend and correspondent, Theodore S. Fay, Secretary of Legation to the Court of Prussia, for the use of a member of the Royal Family—a copy of which we herewith lay before our readers.—[Home Journal.]

"U. S. LEGATION, BERLIN, Nov. 30, 1848.—Gentlemen: I wish you to send two dozen bottles of your Sarsaparilla, for the use of his Royal Highness Prince Waldimir of Prussia, to this Legation, as soon as possible. It is necessary that he should receive it immediately; therefore, please send it by first steamer. The bill can be made out in the name of the Prince, and sent with it. Your obedient servant,

"THEO. S. FAY."

SCROFULOUS AFFECTION OF THE EYES.

SOUTH KINGSTON, (R. I.) Oct. 11, 1847.—Messrs. SANDS—Gentlemen: My little daughter, when one year old, was attacked with a scrofulous humor on her face, which soon after extended into her eyes, causing almost total blindness in one of them, and disfiguring her whole face. I employed two physicians to attend her, who exhausted their utmost skill to give her relief, but it all proved useless, and finally one of them remarked to me that he had known of some striking cures effected by Sands' Sarsaparilla, and advised me to try it. I obtained one bottle, which she commenced using, and before it was all used up it had effected an entire cure. It is now over four years since she was cured, and there has been no reappearance of the disease, and we are satisfied that it is a perfect cure. It gives me great pleasure to add that I can recommend it to any sufferer from a similar complaint.

Respectfully yours, GEORGE ROBINSON.

DR. S. P. TOWNSEND'S COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA.

The Most Extraordinary Medicine in the World!! This Extract is put up in Quart Bottles; it is six times cheaper, pleasanter, and warranted superior to any sold. It cures without vomiting, purging, or debilitating the Patient.

THE great beauty and superiority of this Sarsaparilla over all other medicines is, that while it eradicates the disease, it invigorates the body. It is one of the very best ever known: it not only purifies the whole system and strengthens the person, but it creates rich, new and pure blood, a power possessed by no other medicine. And in this lies the great secret of its wonderful success. It has performed, within the last two years, more than 100,000 cures of severe cases of disease; at least 15,000 were considered incurable. It has saved the lives of more than 10,000 children the past two seasons in the city of New-York alone.

10,000 Cases of General Debility and want of Nervous Energy.

Dr. S. P. Townsend's Sarsaparilla invigorates the whole system permanently. To those who have lost their muscular energy by the effects of medicine or indiscretion committed in youth, or the excessive indulgence of the passions, and brought on by physical prostration of the nervous system, lassitude, want of ambition, fainting sensations, premature decay and decline, hastening toward that fatal disease Consumption, can be entirely restored by this pleasant remedy. This Sarsaparilla is far superior to any

Invigorating Cordial,

as it renews and invigorates the system, gives activity to the limbs, and strength to the muscular system, in a most extraordinary degree.

Consumption Cured.

Cleanse and Strengthen. Consumption can be Cured. Bronchitis, Consumption, Liver Complaint, Colds, Catarrh, Coughs, Asthma, Spitting Blood, Soreness in the Chest, Haemic Flush, Night Sweats, Difficult or Profuse Expectoration, Pain in the Side, &c., have been and can be Cured.

Spitting Blood.

New-York, April 28, 1847.—Dr. S. P. Townsend: I verily believe your Sarsaparilla has been the means, through Providence, of saving my life. I have for several years had a bad Cough. It became worse and worse. At last I raised large quantities of blood, had night sweats, was greatly debilitated and reduced, and did not expect to live. I have only used your Sarsaparilla a short time, and there has been a wonderful change wrought in me. I am now able to walk all over the city. I raise no blood, and my cough has left me. You can well imagine that I am thankful for these results. Your obedient servant, WM. RUSSELL, 65 Catharine st.

Dyspepsia.

No fluid or medicine has ever been discovered which so nearly resembles the gastric juice or saliva, in decomposing food, and strengthening the organs of digestion, as this preparation of Sarsaparilla.

BANK DEPARTMENT, ALBANY, May 10, 1845.—Dr. Townsend—Sir: I have been afflicted for several years with the Dyspepsia in its worst forms, attended with sourness of stomach, loss of appetite, extreme heartburn, and a great aversion to all kinds of food, and for weeks (what I could eat) I have been unable to retain but a small portion on my stomach. I tried the usual remedies, but they had little or no effect in removing the complaint. I was induced, about two months since, to try your Extract of Sarsaparilla, and I must say with little confidence; but after using nearly two bottles, I found my appetite restored, and the heartburn entirely removed; and I would earnestly recommend the use of it to those who have been afflicted as I have been.

Yours, &c.

W. W. VAN ZANDT.

Great Blessing to Mothers and Children.

It is the safest and most effectual medicine for purifying the system, and relieving the sufferings attendant upon childbirth, ever discovered. It strengthens both the mother and child, prevents pain and disease, increases and enriches the food; those who have used it think it is indispensable. It is highly useful both before and after confinement, as it prevents diseases attendant upon childbirth. In Costiveness, Piles, Cramps, Swelling of the Feet, Despondency, Heartburn, Vomiting, Pain in the Back and Loins, False Pains, Hæmorrhage, and in regulating the Secretions, and equalizing the Circulation, it has no equal. The great beauty of this medicine is, it is always safe, and the most delicate use it most successfully.

Scrofula Cured.

This Certificate conclusively proves that this Sarsaparilla has perfect control over the most obstinate diseases of the Blood. Three persons cured in one house is unprecedented.

Three Children.

Dr. S. P. Townsend—Dear Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that three of my children have been cured of the Scrofula by the use of your excellent medicine. They were afflicted very severely with bad sores, have taken four bottles; it took them away, for which I feel myself under great obligation. Yours, respectfully, ISAAC W. CRAIN, 106 Wooster st.

Opinions of Physicians.

Dr. S. P. Townsend is almost daily receiving orders from Physicians in different parts of the Union.

This is to certify, that we, the undersigned, Physicians of the city of Albany, have, in numerous cases, prescribed Dr. Townsend's Sarsaparilla, and believe it to be one of the most valuable preparations in the market.

Original Poetry.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

BY R. NATALIE CROMWELL.

In fancy, I am gazing now on old Westminster's walls—
In fancy, I am standing within its ancient halls;
With beating heart I wander on, with light and humble tread,
I stand before the honored graves of Britain's noble dead.
Great king, why art thou sleeping thus? where is thy scepter now?
The jewel'd crown which erst adorned thy proud and haughty brow?
Thou, who o'er Britain's sons held undisputed sway,
Doth lay in death's cold sleep, as powerless as they.
The wily priest, of whose black heart the secrets none might know—
The holy man, who counsel gave, relieved both want and woe—
The Courtier, who his honor prized less than a Sovereign's smile—
The honest and the true in heart, who knew no thought of guile.
Yes, there they sleep, all side by side, the warrior stern and brave;
He, who on many a battle field, his life-blood freely gave—
The timid child, the maiden bright, who in their beauty died—
The haughty dame, of princely name, once England's boast and pride.
And here rest those, to whom God gave a high and noble dower,
An honored gift, (was given them) that great creative power;
Though a deathless name their genius won, from death it could not save—
With saddening heart the eye doth fall on many a poet's grave.
Could ye arise, ye men of old, my longing eyes to greet,
Queens, kings and heroes, sages, priests, alas! how would ye meet?
In love and peace it might not be, for see, I stand between
The tomb of Scotland's Mary and England's haughty queen.*

* Queen Mary and Elizabeth are buried side by side.

I lingering gaze—they may not wake "till the last trump shall sound;"
Farewell—farewell for ever, Westminster's hallow'd ground;
And I depart—the vision's past, the dream, alas! is o'er,
E'en as thy glory, England, it hath pass'd for ever—more.

BY AUGUSTINE J. H. DUGANNE.

"I am as ignorant as yourself. I only know they are in the house. The fact is, I have had no time as yet to eat my supper, which is at present much more necessary than paying my respects to a couple of wandering spies, perhaps."

"By the lord Harry, she's handsome, though, and I must speak with her," cried the young Briton, filling his glass with wine. "I shall soon find out all about her."

This was said with a satisfied smirk, which fully evinced the honorable Captain Percy Wemyss's opinion of his own powers of persuasion.

"Please, sir, I've seen the lady before—I know who she is," said the voice of the motley-garbed individual who had accompanied Captain Wemyss, and who occupied now the deferential position behind that officer, which he had assumed upon entering.

The first tones of this man's voice caused an involuntary start from Atree. He scrutinized the speaker closely, and exclaimed, "Pappett."

"That's my name, Master Atree," returned the man, advancing a little, with a demure look and cringing attitude. "I didn't make any observation before, 'cause I wasn't spoke to. It's me, sure enough—Pappett, at your service."

"Well, Pappett, what do you know about these strangers? Who are they?"

"I've seen them both often enough in Charleston; Mr. Arnoult, the merchant, and his handsome daughter, Louise, that was married and widowed the same day."

No one but Matthew Orrall, crouching and watching behind the house-plants, noticed the sudden shade, or knew the fiery pang, that crossed the face or wrung the heart of Robert Atree. But the bravo saw and knew—for he felt his own soul writhe.

* Continued from page 329.

"Do you know them, Atree?" asked Captain Wemyss, sipping his wine.

"I do—that is, I did."

"Charming girl—isn't she?"

"So considered."

"Egad, Atree, I must know her. You must assist me in it. To be sure, I've a commission in my pocket to arrest all traitors, rebels, and suspected persons. I could take both—father and daughter—at once. But, dang it, one don't like to be ungentlemanly, you know."

"To be sure not," answered Atree. "Besides, I would not like to be a party to an affair like this in my own house. And you forget, too, captain, you have not your troop with you, should the old man resist."

"Poh, nonsense, my dear fellow. But, as you say, there's delicacy about these things. Egad, though, I must see the charming girl. Can't you arrange it—eh, Atree?"

"Let us wait till to-morrow, captain, and in the meantime you can send for your troop. I shall leave Laurelwood to-morrow myself, and can easily prevail on my guests to accept of my traveling protection. You can take us all prisoners, if you please, upon the road—much better, my dear captain. I only stipulate that my own party shall be liberated. Will not that suit, captain?"

"Egad, I think it will. I can pounce upon you on your journey, and arrest the rebels, as doubtless they are. That's it."

"And I can advise Arnoult and his daughter to trust themselves implicitly to your honor, captain—eh?"

"Capital! Let us drink to the success of our plan."

"With all my heart."

"Atree, you are a good plotter. Pappett, see to our horses."

Pappett, after drinking a glass of wine, which his officer in the plenitude of his good humor, signed him to take, disappeared from the room, and the two companions went on with their repast; while the impatient bravo counted the tedious minutes, longing for a moment to emerge from his cramping concealment, and grapple with his enemy's throat.

At length Captain Wemyss, who did not apparently disrelish the largest draughts of the rich wine, became somewhat bewildered, and gratefully accepted the attentions of old Gotta, who came, at her master's call, to conduct the officer to his apartment. Then Robert Atree was once more, as he thought, alone.

"This besotted Englishman," he muttered to himself, "would possess her whom I murdered Rivers to obtain. He must be balked. And yet, what care I? What is Louise Arnoult now, compared to that which Orrall's daughter may yet be? Let her pass now—she would but interfere with my projects. No, no. Let Louise Arnoult pass—I must away to France with the blind Alice."

Robert Atree filled a goblet with the shining juice of grapes, and held it aloft, while he seemed to pause in thought. At that moment, the bravo softly put aside the flowers that concealed him, and emerged from the fire-place.

He stood at the back of the tory's chair.

Robert Atree began to drink; but ere his glass was emptied, an iron grasp was around his throat, and an uplifted dagger gleamed before his eyes. "Ha! ha!" laughed Mat Orrall.

That low, scornful laugh froze the blood in Atree's veins. He struggled, and the goblet which he held fell to the floor; he gasped for breath, and essayed to cry out, but his enemy's grasp was around his throat. The abductor was once more beneath the vengeful father's dagger.

"I have come for my child—for Alice," muttered Orrall. "Robert Atree, I swore when we parted that my revenge should be terrible if I ever learned that you had paltered with me! Now, robber, I know that my daughter is here—beneath your roof—and you, you shall die!"

The tory struggled—but in vain. That strong armed father lifted him from the table, and bent back his head.

The knife glittered—upraised for the blow.

But suddenly, a white-robed figure glided silently into the room, and interposed between the bravo's weapon and the breast of his foe. Mat Orrall saw no face; it was hidden upon the tory's bosom, but that white robe, that woman's form, paralyzed the man's arm. The next moment, he felt the sharp coldness of steel thrill through his flesh. He had been stabbed by the white-robed girl.

Then a shriek broke from the woman's lips. The bravo heard the noise of coming feet. He felt the shivering thrill of his wound, and staggered back. But, as he did so, a curse trembled on his lips, and he hurled his dagger at the white-clothed girl.

It struck heavily against her breast, and fell to the floor with a dull sound. Then Matthew Orrall turned with a superstitious dread, and rushing to the window, flung himself from the balcony.

And as he did so, he drew from his side, where it had been struck, a long, thin stiletto, and staggered on through the dim avenue.

Robert Atree had beheld the raised knife of his enemy gleaming over his head, and, overcome with terror, had sunk insensible upon the wide arm-chair. He saw not the white-robed form that had interposed to save him—saw not the quick stiletto-stroke.

But now, as he lay with closed eyes in the arm-chair, Filippa, the quadroon, bent over him, and pressed her lips upon his cold forehead, while her brow, cheeks and neck were crimsoned with burning blood.

Again had she preserved her master's life. And now, as Gottan, her mother, entered the room, the quadroon placed her finger on her lip, and glided away.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE BOAT UPON THE OCEAN.

Once more upon the ocean—yet once more,
And the waves bound beneath me!—CHILD HAROLD.

OVER the blue waters, dashing the spray from her graceful keel, bounded the gallant little ship Ranger, mounting eighteen guns, manned by as determined a crew as ever sprang to the boat-swain's whistle, and commanded by John Paul Jones, captain in the navy of the revolted colonies of North America. She carried dispatches from Congress to the Republican commissioners at the court of France, and authority to destroy and capture the property and vessels of George the Third, King of England, Ireland Scotland and Wales.

It was said that Paul Jones fought with a "halter about his neck," but certainly no one who could have seen him treading so proudly the Ranger's quarter deck, would have imagined this to be the case. Since leaving the capes of Delaware, the Scotchman had already taken two prizes, British merchantmen, and already lofty dreams of future success possessed his fancy; already he was planning some of those gigantic schemes against English commerce, which, had they been carried out in the spirit of their conception, might have ended the revolutionary war, by the defeat of Britain on her own shores.

Paul Jones paced the Ranger's deck, glass in hand as was his wont, eagerly scanning the face of the ocean, to catch the first glimpse of what might prove a prize. At times he would pause, as if in profound thought, then exchange a word or two with his lieutenant Wallingsford, whose watch it was, and then renew his look-out, with increased earnestness.

"The prizes we have taken, Mr. Wallingsford, will have some weight with the commissioners, I doubt not. Nevertheless, I could wish to carry an Indianman into Brest with me."

"I fear we are out of the India track completely, Captain Jones," answered the lieutenant. "And besides, they are heavily armed and manned."

"Our little Ranger is a saucy craft, Mr. Wallingsford, and I hope, sir, we shall soon try the soundings of St. George's channel. I would like no braver sport than to run the gauntlet of His Majesty's coast squadron."

Jones spoke these words in a light tone, but it was plain, from the look which accompanied them, that they meant all and more, perhaps, than they conveyed. But suddenly the commander turned, and raised his glass to his eye. "Hah!" he exclaimed, as he directed it upon the extreme edge of the horizon—"A boat, as I live!—an open boat upon the ocean. Look, Mr. Wallingsford—is it not so?"

The lieutenant took the glass, and pointed it toward the slight speck which appeared relieved against the distant edge of blue sky. "It is a boat, sir, I am very sure," answered he.

"And filled with men—is it not, Mr. Wallingsford? Alter the ship's course a point, and steer for that boat immediately, Mr. Wallingsford."

In a few moments the Ranger was rapidly lessening the distance between herself and the object of Jones's scrutiny, which now was distinctly seen to be an open boat, apparently crowded with men. But to the loud hail of the look-out at the foretop, no response was returned.

"Can they be dead?" whispered the lieutenant, drawing close to his commander.

"Methinks I perceive a hand raised," said Paul Jones. "Ay, by my life, they are making faint signals. Man the pinnace, sir, and pull toward them."

The hands of half a dozen stalwart seamen soon sent the light pinnace skimming over the waves, and in a brief space it ranged along side of the drifting boat.

What a spectacle met the eyes of that pinnace crew!

Upon the bottom of the strange boat lay the lifeless bodies of three men, festering with corruption generated by the blazing sun which poured directly upon them. Two of those corpses were clad in British regimentals, and one, which had been evidently mutilated after death, was that of an old, gray-haired man.

Three men yet survived. Sheltered somewhat by a piece of sacking, from the blistering sunbeams, three living beings lay together in the boat's quarter, and turned their wild and haggard looks upon the seamen of the Ranger. These three men were all that yet remained alive of the fugitives of St. Augustine.

They were Rivers, Evans, and the corporal Nevers; and it was apparent that the last spark of life was trembling in their bodies. Slowly and tenderly the rough men of Paul Jones's ship, raised the wretched voyagers into their own boat, and disposed their emaciated limbs upon a litter of canvass. A sponge moistened with spirits was placed to the dry lips of each, and this in a slight degree recalled their fading life. Ernest Rivers, the youngest and frailest of the three, was yet, strange as it seemed, the only one who retained a spark of mental consciousness, and it was his feeble hand which had essayed the signals which had attracted the vision of Paul Jones.

As speedily as possible, the nearly dying men were placed in comfortable beds, and the ship's doctor applied his skill to their recovery. Slight stimulants and the external use of water soon softened their dry and cracked skin, and the Scotch commander at last learned, with humane joy, that they were, to all appearance, rescued from immediate danger of death; a sound slumber having been induced which would doubtless recruit in a measure their exhausted energies.

Paul Jones drew near the quarters of the rescued men. But the breast of the brave sailor shook with a new emotion, and his dark eyes were suffused with tears, as he recognized in the youngest of the three, his well-remembered and cherished friend of a year before, Captain Ernest Rivers.

"Once more am I indebted to you for life," said the faint voice of Rivers, when, the next day, he recognized the form of Paul Jones, and replied to the warm greeting of the brave commander.

"Courage, my young friend, then. Keep up your spirits, and please Heaven, you shall yet save mine. Rest now, and let your strength be recruited. Thou shalt relate to me what has passed since our parting."

In a few days, Rivers, under the skilful treatment of the Ranger's physician, recovered sufficiently to be enabled to recount his brief but painful experience, of captivity, suffering, and perils of the darkest nature. The seaman shuddered as the story of the murdered boy and suicide father fell upon his ear. "You have indeed suffered, my friend," cried he, grasping the young American's arm—"Providence must have ordained your deliverance for some good purpose. Fear not—you shall yet enjoy happier days, to recompense you for the horrors of the past."

"But my wife," murmured Rivers, covering with his hands his withered cheeks and sunken eyes.

"Will love you for the dangers you have passed," answered Jones, with a smile. "Trust me, Rivers, once restored to her arms, you will forget all you have suffered, or think of it only as a fearful dream."

"She shall learn to couple your name, Captain Jones, with all her gratitude to heaven. That lesson I will teach her."

"Thank you, my friend," answered Jones. "But, tell me,—this British corporal Nevers—he is a determined fellow, it would seem."

"He is, indeed, sir, and as noblehearted as he is resolute. To him I owe my lasting gratitude, as well as to the gallant Evans."

"They shall be looked to. If the Briton wishes to serve Congress instead of his old master George, he shall fight under that banner as long as he pleases," said Jones, lifting his chapeau, as he raised his eyes to the flag which he loved so well and defended so undauntedly.

Both Nevers and Evans were glad of the opportunity to enrol themselves as volunteers under Paul Jones. The corporal, as Tom the ranger remarked, was too honest a man to wear a red coat, and pipe clay his leathern breeches. They were soon entered on the ship's books, and rated as entitled to prize money; and with this addition to her crew, the Ranger pursued her course toward the sunny shores of France.

Ernest Rivers rapidly recovered his prostrated strength, and in a few weeks scarcely any traces remained of the severe trials he had undergone. He walked the deck with his friend Paul Jones, once more free, and with the hopes of youth again swelling his heart.

The young man's capabilities of endurance and action had both been greatly developed since his parting with the Scotchman a year before. Other motives besides the love of his own country now conspired to actuate him to hatred against the invaders of her liberties. He had witnessed, as well as suffered, the cruelties of the British at St. Augustine. He had beheld American prisoners treated with worse severity than even the laws of a penal settlement could authorize; and he had seen the practice of petty military tyranny carried to such a pitch as to embitter even the hirelings of the army against those whom they served. Disgust and a desire to escape the despotism of their officers, had in fact been the principal motives to induce the co-operation of the deserting soldiers in the scheme of corporal Nevers, which had resulted so fatally for those poor fellows; and Captain Rivers remarked, too, with horror, the dreadful fate of the old man and his hapless son, victims originally of British cruelty which had dragged them from their homes.

Rivers, therefore, had resolved on this occasion, to accompany Captain Jones on his expedition, and if possible distinguish himself brilliantly before returning to his home. "With you, my deliverer," he cried, grasping the commander's hand, "I will strike a few blows, at least, against that tyrannic nation from whom all of us have endured so much."

"With me, you shall have the opportunity," was the reply of Paul Jones.

CHAPTER XVII.

MAT. ORRALL'S RESOLVE.

I will not pause—I will not stay,
Till vengeance shall be mine.—POPE.

MORNING broke over Laurelwood House, and the fair country around it, such a morning as is most beautiful upon southern plains, when the air is all perfume, the skies golden, and the face of nature lovely as a dream.

Up and down amid the darkness of the night, had Matthew Orrall wandered weak and bleeding from his wound, yet still clutching nervously the stiletto which had pierced his side. The bravo now lay at the foot of a gnarled oak-tree, that lifted its rugged height far above and around him, and strove to ponder upon the events of the night.

Many and fierce were the man's thoughts. He had found his child—the blind Alice; he had gathered some idea of his enemy's purpose, mysterious as it was. The conversation he had overheard between Atree and his slave was sufficient to reveal at least one intention of the young tory, and this was the restoration of sight to the stricken Alice, through the skill of some foreign physician. But the motives which prompted Atree to this course—what were they?

Orrall too well knew the character of his late confederate and employer, ever to imagine that sympathy or pity for the blind girl could actuate Robert Atree. He knew that the young tory's heart was one which could harbor no sentiment more powerful than self-aggrandizement; and he was convinced, therefore, that some deep design was at the bottom of all his enemy's proceedings. At times, as he glanced back over his own stormy life, he thought of all that he himself might have been, and all that he had thrown to the winds, and he cursed and smote his forehead, when he reflected on what he was now.

Then he would clash his teeth together, and swear vengeance on Atree, and utter maledictions on his last night's abortive attack. And again he would hold the stiletto before his eyes, and wonder, in his superstitious terror, if it had been wielded by mortal hands. At length, however, he reduced his frantic thoughts to something like reflection, and with a resumption of natural craft, sat about concocting new schemes of revenge, and projects for the recovery of his child.

Alice!—that name always softened the iron of Mat Orrall's nature. Alice brought visions of humanity and love about his dark soul. "I must pluck her from his power!" muttered the bravo—"I will restore to her the sight of which she has been deprived so long—yes—the out-cast Orrall will give his child sight, and the wealth of a princess for her dowry—and then—then let death come by cord or cannon-ball—it matters not."

The bravo's thoughts again reverted to the different conversations he had overheard during his concealment in Laurelwood House. The reverend form of the merchant Arnould, the beautiful face of the injured Louise, these rose before his memory to torment him; and then he thought of the half-formed plot which Atree and the British officer had laid, to arrest the fugitives upon the renewal of their journey:

Their journey! Ah! that was, as her master had informed Gotta, to remove Alice from Laurelwood. And they were to leave the mansion to-day. This Orrall remembered that Atree had said, and the bravo resolved on a counter-plot. "I will pluck my child from him, and slay him among a thousand," muttered the reckless man, holding aloft in the morning sun, the weapon that had wounded him. "Twice has he escaped my hand—but the third time comes my triumph. I will watch this house like a bloodhound, and pursue my enemy to the death."

The morning wore on, and a hot Carolina sun rose high in the heavens. But, Matthew Orrall, crouching in the thicket upon the road-side leading from Laurelwood, watched every avenue of exit from the mansion. He had staunch and bound up his wound, which was not deep, with fragments of his own garments, and had appeased the cravings of hunger with a few crusts which he carried in his pocket. But though weak and wounded, he had lost not one jot of that fiery and indomitable malignity which had been the bane and the ruin of all his hopes in life, and had Robert Atree suddenly appeared alone before him, he would have sprung at his throat and conquered the tory, even though it should be by the sacrifice of his own remaining strength.

EVERY LADY HER OWN GARDNER.—APRIL.—Put on your coarse straw bonnet and your worsted polka, for the winds are cold. Make your husband put down that eternal Times, and give you his arm round the garden. Remark what a litter the walks are in. Say you wish the flowers would come out. Wonder where all the crocuses are gone to; if he says the yellow linnetts have eaten them to improve their color, ask him how he can talk such nonsense. Observe that the fruit trees look like skeletons, and remind him what nice peaches you had last year. If he suggests that he bought them in Covent-Garden, ask him how he can be so aggravating. Ask if the anemonies don't look like tulips; if he says they do, and thinks they will do quite as well, tell him he is growing dreadfully mean. Tell him you must really have a little conservatory, not a great building, but a pretty little place which would cost just nothing, and which a very few pounds would fill. If he murmurs, say you did not want it for yourself so much as because it would be a nice place for him to sit in and smoke, as his cigar would help to kill the insects, and that would surely be better than scenting the new curtains you are determined to put up. Pick two or three violets at this period of the conversation, and hold them playfully to his nose, remarking, with your prettiest and most pouting smile, that there was a time when a certain person thought a flower from your hand was worth taking. Don't mind any little repartee of his crushing the coarse straw bonnet, as you can get another for eighteenpence, and a conservatory is worth eighteenpence. Remark the pleasure it gives you to see him taking the fresh air in the garden, and that it quite recalls the days when he used to walk about with you in the dear old garden, at Lewisham before you were married. Then push the conservatory very hard indeed. If he still hold out, tell him, and lean heavily on his arm, that perhaps he is right, for it would be only a useless expense, for you have a presentiment that these are the last spring flowers you will ever see with him. Make him promise to plant them around your early tomb, and sometimes come and see them. That you have been thinking of poor Lavinia Buggins, who died in her first confinement; but you will have got the conservatory long before this, and a permanent gardener into the bargain. By attending to these instructions a lady may make the delightful science of gardening an agreeable and profitable pursuit.—[Puppet-Show.]

DIGNITY.—All establishments die of dignity. They are too proud to think themselves ill and take a little physic.—[Sidney Smith.]

We make ourselves more injuries than are offered us; they many times pass for wrongs in our own thoughts, that were never meant so by the heart of him that speaketh.

With increase of fame too often comes addition to care; and sorrows grow out of the surfeits of employment.

ELOQUENT EULOGIUM ON CROMWELL.—What can be more extraordinary than that a person of mean birth, no fortune, no eminent qualities of body, which have sometimes or of mind, which have often, raised men to the highest dignities, should have the courage to attempt, and the happiness to succeed in so improbable a design as the destruction of one of the most ancient and most solidly founded monarchies on the earth—that he should have the power or boldness to put his prince and master to an open and infamous death—to banish that numerous and strongly allied family,—to do all of this under the name and wages of a parliament—to trample upon them, too, as he pleased, and spurn them out of doors when he grew weary of them—to raise up a new and unheard of monster out of their ashes—to stifle that in the very infancy, and set himself up above all that were ever called sovereigns in England; to oppress all his enemies by arms, and all his friends afterwards by artifice; to serve all parties patiently for a while, and to command them victoriously at last; to over-run each corner of the three nations, and overcome, with equal facility, both the riches of the south and the poverty of the north; to be feared and courted by all foreign princes, and adopted a brother to the gods of the earth; to call together parliaments with a word of his pen, and scatter them again with the breath of his mouth; to be humbly and daily petitioned that he would please to be hired at the rate of two millions a year; to be the master of those who had hired him before to be their servant; to have the estates and lives of the three kingdoms as much at his disposal as was the little inheritance of his father, and to be as noble and liberal in the spending of them; and lastly (for there is no end of all the particulars of his glory), to bequeath all this, with one word, to his posterity; to die with peace at home and triumph abroad, to be buried among kings, and with more than regal solemnity: and to leave a name behind him not to be extinguished but with the whole world; which as it is now too little for his praises, so might have been, too, for his conquests, if the short line of his human life could have been stretched out to the extent of his immortal designs.—[Abraham Cowley.]

PHILANTHROPY, my friends, is of no particular sect; it is confined by no paltry form of rule; it knows no distinction, but that of the happy or unhappy; it is older than the gospel, eternal as that great source from whence it springs, and often bears higher in the heathen's heart, than in those of many who are called Christians, who, though under the influence of the most benevolent of all possible systems, yet not unfrequently refuse both relief and compassion to the petitions of the wretched, and the entreaties of the unhappy. God forbid that the genuine feelings of humanity were confined to this or that mode of faith! God forbid that any ridiculous prejudice should hinder me from reverencing the man, (however we may differ in speculative notions,) whose gentle spirit flies to sooth the mourner; whose ear is attentive to the voice of sorrow; whose pittance is shared with those who are not the world's friends; whose bountiful hand scatters food to the hungry, and raiment to the naked; and whose peaceful steps, as he journeyeth on his way, are blessed, and blessed again, by the uplifted eye of thankful indigence, and the sounds of honest gratitude from the lips of wretchedness.—[Dean Kirwan.]

LOVE OF COUNTRY.—It is necessary to limit and concentrate the sentiments of interest and commiseration to give them proper activity. It is certain that the greatest prodigies of virtue have emanated from the love of country. This sentiment, touching and lively at the same time, which joins the force of self-love to the beauty of virtue, gives to the latter an energy which, without disfiguring it, converts it into the most heroic of passions. It is this which has produced so many immortal actions, the splendor of which dazzles our feeble eyes; and so many great men, whose antique virtues pass for fables, since the love of country has been turned by us into derision.—[Rousseau.]

Incidents of Travel.

A SIROCCO ON THE DEAD SEA.

We extract the following interesting sketch from Lieut. Lynch's forthcoming "Narrative of the United States Expedition to the Dead Sea and the River Jordan." The work, we learn, will soon be ready for publication. The delay of its appearance has been occasioned by the numerous illustrations with which it is embellished:

At 2 35 P. M. close in with the eastern shore, but unable to land from the soft bottom and shoalness of the water. At 2 50 a light breeze from the W. N.W., hauled to the north toward the base of the peninsula. A long, narrow, dry marsh, with a few scrubby bushes, separated the water from a range of stupendous hills, 2000 feet high. The cliff of En Nuweiroh (Little Tiger) lofty and grand, towering above us in horizontal strata of brown limestone, and beautiful rose-colored sandstone beneath. Clouds in the east (nimbus) seemed to be threatening a gust. At 3 30, steering N.N.E., along a low, marshy flat, in shallow water. The light wind had subsided, and it was oppressively hot; air 97 deg.; water, twelve inches below the surface, 90. A thin, purple haze over the mountains, increasing every moment, and presenting a most singular and awful appearance; the haze so thin that it was transparent, and rather a bluish than a distinct color. I apprehended a thunder gust or an earthquake, and took in the sail.

At 3 50 a hot, blistering hurricane struck us from the south-east, and for some moments we feared being driven out to sea. The thermometer rose immediately to 102 degrees. The men, closing their eyes to shield them from the fiery blast, were obliged to pull with all their might to stem the rising waves, and at 4 30 physically exhausted, but with grateful hearts, we gained the shore. My own eye-lids were blistered by the hot wind, being unable to protect them, from the necessity of steering the boat.

We landed on the south side of the peninsula, near Humier, the most desolate spot upon which we had yet encamped. Some went up the ravine to escape from the stifling wind; others driven back by the glare, returned to the boats and couched under the awnings. One mounted spectacles to protect his eyes, but the metal became almost burning to the touch; and the inner folds of our garments were cooler than those exposed to the immediate contact of the wind. We bivouacked without tents, on a dry marsh, a few dead bushes around us, and some of the thorny nubk, and a tree bearing a red berry a short distance inland, with low canes on the margin of the sea. At a short distance to the N.E., on the peninsula, we found fragments of an immense and very old mill-stone. The mill had doubtless been turned by a canal from the ravine, down which the water must flow copiously in the rainy season.

At 5, finding the heat intolerable, we walked up the dry torrent bed in search of water. Found two successive pools rather than a stream, with some minnows in them; the water, not yet stagnant, flowing from the upper to the lower pool. There were some succulent plants on their margins, and fern roots and a few bushes around them. There were huge boulders of sandstone in the bed of the ravine; a dead palm tree near the largest pool, a living one in the cleft of the rock at the head of the gorge; and high up, to the summits of the beetling cliffs, the sandstone lay in horizontal strata, with perpendicular cleavage, and limestone above, its light brown color richly contrasting with the deep red below.

The sandstone below limestone here, and limestone without sandstone on the opposite shore, would seem to indicate a geological fault.

Washed and bathed in one of the pools, but the relief was only momentary. In one minute after leaving the water, the moisture on the surface evaporated, and left the skin dry, parched, and stiff. Except the minnows in the pool, there was not a living thing stirring; but the hot wind swept meaning through the branches of the withered palm trees; and every bird and insect, if any there were, had sought shelter under the rocks.

Coming out from the ravine, the sight was a singular one. The wind had increased to a tempest—the two extremities, and the western shore of the sea were curtained by a mist, on this side of a purple hue, on the other a yellow tinge; and the red and rayless sun, in the bronzed clouds, had the appearance it presents when looked upon through smoked glass. Thus may the heavens have appeared just before the Almighty in His wrath rained down fire upon the cities of the plain. Behind were the rugged crags of the mountains of Moab, the land of incest, enveloped in a cloud of dust, swept by the simoom from the Great Desert of Arabia.

There was a smoke on the peninsula, a little to the north of us. We knew not whether those who made it might prove friends or foes; and therefore that little smoke was not to be disregarded. We had brought one of the Ta'amirah with us for the express purpose of communicating with the natives, but he was so fearful of their hostility that I could not prevail on him to bear a message to them. With his back to the wind and his eyes fixed on the streaming smoke, he had squatted himself down a short distance from us. He thought that we would be attacked in the night; I felt sure that we would not if we were vigilant. These people never attack each other but at an advantage, and fifteen well-armed Franks can, in that region, bid defiance to anything but surprise.

We have not seen an instance of deformity among the Arab tribes. This man was magnificently formed, and when he walked it was with the port and presence of a king. It has been remarked that races with highly colored skins are rarely deformed; and the exemption is attributed, perhaps erroneously, not to a mode of life differing from a civilized one, but to a hereditary organization.

The sky grew more angry as the day declined:

"The setting sun in crimson seemed to mourn,
Denouncing greater woes at its return,
And adds new horrors to its present doom,
By certain fears of evil yet to come."

The heat rather increased than lessened after the sun went down. At 8 P. M., the thermometer was 106 deg. five feet from the ground. At one foot from the latter it was 104 deg. We threw ourselves upon the parched, cracked earth, among dry stalks and canes, which would before have seemed insupportable from the heat. Some endeavored to make a screen of one of the boat's awnings, but the fierce wind swept it over in an instant. It was more like the blast of a furnace than living air. At our feet was the sea, and on our right, through the thicket, we could distinguish the gleaming of the fires, and hear the shouts from an Arab encampment.

In the early part of the night there was scarcely a moment that some one was not at the water-breakers; but the parching thirst could not be allayed; for, although there was no perceptible perspiration, the fluid was carried off as fast as it was received into the system. At 9 the breakers were exhausted, and our last waking thought was water. In our disturbed and feverish slumbers we fancied the cool beverage purling down our parched and burning throats. The mosquitoes, as if their stings were envenomed by the heat, tormented us almost to madness, and we spent a miserable night, throughout which we were compelled to lie encumbered with our arms, while by turns we kept vigilant watch.

We had spent the day in the glare of a Syrian sun, by the salt mountain of Uduem, in the hot blast of the sirocco, and were now bivouacked under the calcined cliffs of Moab. When the water was exhausted, all too weary to go for more, even if there were no danger of a surprise, we threw ourselves upon the ground—eyes smarting, skin burning, lips and tongue, and throats parched and dry; and wrapped the first garment we could find around our heads to keep off the stifling blast; and in our brief and broken slumbers drank from ideal fountains.

Those who have never felt thirst, never suffered in a simoom in the wilderness, or been far off at sea, with

"Water, water everywhere,
Nor any a drop to drink," can form no idea of our sensations. They are best illustrated by the exclamation of the victim in Dante's Inferno:

"The little rills which down the grassy side
Of Casentino flow to Arno's stream,
Filling their banks with verdure as they glide,
Are ever in my view—no idle dream—
For more than vision parches, makes me weak,
Than that disease which wastes my pallid cheek."

Our thoughts could not revert to home save in connection with the precious element; and many were the imaginary speeches we made to visionary common councils against ideal water carts, which went about unsubstantial city streets, spouting the glorious liquid in the very wastefulness of abundance, every drop of which seemed priceless pearls, as we lay on the shore of the Dead Sea, in the feverish sleep of thirst.

The poor affrighted Arab slept not a wink—for, repeatedly, when I went out, as was my custom, to see that all was quiet and the sentries on the alert, he was ever in the same place and looking in the same direction.

At midnight the thermometer stood at 98 deg.; shortly after which the wind shifted and blew lightly from the north. At 4 A. M. thermometer 82 deg.; comparatively cool.

Ladies' Department.

THE WHISPER AT PARTING.

SHE but look'd, and the darkness of parting awhile
Was dispell'd by those glances of tender regret;
While the sunset of hope was illumed by a smile,
Whose twilight of happiness lingers there yet.
How I felt on my cheek the warm crimson was glowing.

When it thrill'd to the breath that exhaled from her mouth;
As the roses spring forth, when the summer is throwing
Its breath of perfume from the zephyrs of South.
Oh! burn not thus, my cheek, as in mine ear
That thrilling whisper still I seem to hear.

Yes, we parted—but yet, in that moment of bliss
Our hearts were knit closer than ever before;
And if only to join in such partings as this,
I would willingly meet thee a thousand times o'er.

On the night of thy absence, which now has roll'd o'er me,
Still the moonbeams of memory shed their soft light,

And the glow of that sunset still tends to assure me
That the morrow of hope will be joyously bright.
Oh! burn my cheek, as still, methinks, again
That stealing whisper thrills along my brain.

"I LOVE THE LADIES, EVERY ONE."

BY JAMES STILLMAN.

I LOVE the Ladies, every one—
The laughing, ripe brunette—
Those dark-eyed daughters of the sun,
With tresses black as jet.
What rapture in their glances grow!
Rich tints their cheek discloses;
And in the little dimples there
Young smiling Love reposes.

I love the Ladies, every one—
The blonde so soft and fair,
With looks so mild and languishing,
And bright and golden hair.
How lovely are their sylph-like forms—
Their alabaster hue!
And their blushes far more beautiful
Than rose-buds bathed in dew.

I love the Ladies, every one—
Even those whose graceless forms
Are rugged as the oak, that's borne
A hundred winters' storms.
The young, the old, the stout, the thin;
The short as well as tall;
Widows and wives, matrons and maids—
Oh, yes! I love them all.

I love the Ladies, every one—
None but a wretch would flout 'em;
This world would be a lonely place
If we were left without 'em.
But, lighted by a woman's smile,
Away all gloom is driven;
And the most humble home appears
Almost a little heaven.

I love the Ladies, every one—
They're angels all, God bless 'em!
And what can greater pleasure give
Than to comfort and caress 'em?
I call myself a temperance man,
So I'll drink their health in water—
Here's to the mothers, one and all,
And every mother's daughter!

LINES ON PARTING.

THE beams that o'er the mountain play
Shall leave them lone at even;
And thy sweet smile will pass away,
Just like that light of heaven.

For, lady, 'tis the doom of earth
To meet but just to sever—
The friendship that to-day finds birth
To-morrow dies for ever!

Still there's a moral in this doom
That speaks to every heart;
It is that earth is not our home,
Else wherefore should we part?

Then turn those gentle eyes above,
Where peace and joy entwine—
The home of friendship and of love—
May it be thine and mine.

THE MUSICIAN'S DAUGHTER.

A TALE OF RAVENNA.

"Tis sweet to hear
At evening, on the blue and moonlit deep,
The song and oar of Adria's gondolier,
By distance mellowed, o'er the waters sweep."

DON JUAN.

AMONG the various cities of the Papal States (Rome, of course, excepted) few are richer in objects of interest to the traveler, whose mind can cull flowers of memory from the contemplation of the men and monuments of the past, than the ancient city of Ravenna. The environs of this town forcibly recall to the eye, that views them for the first time, the vast and silent Campagna of Rome, to which the wide and cheerless marshes, in the midst of which it stands, bear much general resemblance. Between the town and the sea, whose waves once laved its marble terraces; but which have now, from various causes, receded to a distance of five miles, is situated the boundless pineta, or pine forest, celebrated in the verse of Dante and Boccaccio, and which extends for upwards of fifteen miles along the dreary shore of the Adriatic. Thro' the somber foliage of this gloomy grove the evening breeze, rising from the sea, sweeps with plaintive murmur, oppressing the ear of the wayfarer with its mournful music, and irresistibly drawing his thoughts into unison with its own melancholy strain. Such moments as these, in which the heart droops in sympathy with surrounding scenes, are not altogether ungrateful to the reflective pilgrim; they form a welcome relief to the tension and excitement of the mind, which constant change of scene and the oft-recurring adventures of foreign travel seldom fail to beget: they serve to prepare it for keener enjoyment of whatever may next present itself, in the ever varying panorama of men and things—in fact, as medicine to the body, sadness, it must be owned, brings vigor and elasticity to the mind.

The city entered, however, reality takes the place of reverie. The numerous splendid churches and monuments of marble—some of the latter mementos of the deadly feuds of the Traversari and Polenta in the middle ages, when Ravenna was an independent republic—the frequent Byzantine remains, which impart to the streets the air of a Greek rather than a Roman city; the constant memorials of Dante, whose exiled old age was here solaced by the protection and hospitality of the powerful Guida da Polenta, who afforded the living poet an asylum, and bestowed on him, when dead, a grave and funeral honors; and lastly, in our own times, the reminiscences of Byron, who, hurrying from his native land, stung by the sense of wrongs, fancied or real, sought in its gloomy environs a congenial resting place for his troubled spirit—all combine to engross the stranger's thoughts as he sets foot within its precincts.

On a calm Sabbath evening, toward the middle of the last century, vespers had just been concluded at the ancient church of Santa Vitale, an edifice of which Ravenna may justly boast as the work of the great Justinian. The tones of incense curled gracefully around the branches of the silver chandeliers that swung suspended from the lofty roof, and to which the rays of the setting sun, breaking through the painted windows of the choir, lent a brighter, yet mellowed luster; the strains of Palestrina burst forth in rich harmony from the organ, and died away in the distant aisles; and a gorgeous train of priests, in vestments of scarlet and gold, and glittering in the reflected light of the tapers borne before them, passed with stately step from the high altar, through the nave, and disappeared beneath the granite pillars of the portico. Against one of these pillars stood an elderly man, clad in the garb of a plain citizen, holding by the hand a girl aged about sixteen, also neatly and becomingly attired, and of the most striking beauty; and at a short distance might have been observed a third person, who kept stepping from behind the church door to peep at the parties we have described, and retiring precipitately, as if to avoid recognition.

The elder of the two men was Carlo Clarelli by name, and the girl, his only child, Valeria. Clarelli was by profession a violinist, a consummate master of his art, and an admirer of the celebrated Corelli, as its most able exponent, to a degree almost amounting to adoration. If any of his acquaintance presumed to couple the names of Valentin, Lully, or any cotemporary master, with that of his musical deity, he would feel himself insulted by the allusion, and thenceforth repudiate all knowledge of a person who could show himself so devoid of taste or discernment. He would have endured any privation rather than have passed a day without playing one of his favorite master's concertos. With these renowned compositions he had become so familiar as to dispense altogether with the score; and his attentive girl, at his usual signal, upon the conclusion of the morning's repast, used to hand him his favorite Cremona, when he would sink into his chair, and closing his eyes, as if to shut out all other perceptions, proceed to execute some of these masterpieces, with a finish and brilliancy that could not be surpassed. Then, after lamenting with a sigh that his hand was not so obedient as in bygone days, he would fall back to enjoy his siesta, to dream of his cherished Corelli, and the art for which he lived; and from the exercise of which his soul imbibed such deep draughts of delight.

On quitting the church of Santa Vitale, which at that period possessed the finest choir of any in the city, and was consequently the frequent resort of all who admired the grand compositions of Palestrina and Pergolesi—those twin Handels of the Romish church—Clarelli and his daughter pursued their way homeward, followed by the third person we have named, who, observing them enter their abode in a neighboring street, instantly turned back and disappeared.

On the following day, a stranger of noble mien and richly clad, called upon the musician, and, after introducing himself as Count Rinaldo Palermi, expressed a wish to have the benefit of his instruction. Clarelli, whose refined ear recoiled from the drudgery of tuition, replied with a bow that he received but few pupils, and those only who had attained some proficiency; at the same time pointing to an instrument, and inviting the count to afford him some idea of his skill. The latter reluctantly complied, and played a few bars of a popular melody, but to the evident annoyance of the professor, who made a sign for him to cease, and observed that his visitor's studies had as yet produced but little fruit.

"However," he continued, "as you have displayed some taste, and express yourself a devoted admirer of the art which I unworthily profess, and on which the matchless Corelli has shed the luster of his genius, I will in your case deviate from my rule, and consent to receive you as a pupil, which act I expect you to acknowledge by unflagging zeal and attention."

A month had elapsed since Count Rinaldo—as he styled himself—had become the pupil of Clarelli. A group of young men were assembled in a saloon of the musician's house, awaiting his coming to commence their lesson. Valeria, his daughter, seated at the harpsichord, is singing for their gratification a simple romanza, the composition of her father, a penalty imposed by the foremost of the pupils, who had surprised her unawares in the music-room. At her side stood Rinaldo, whose eye and ear seemed equally charmed by the beauty of the singer and the sweetness of her voice. The concluding cadenza had hardly died away, and the timid girl, blushing amid the compliments of the bystanders, was about to withdraw, when Clarelli entered, only to hear a repetition of the encomiums so profusely lavished on his accomplished and pretty daughter. Without heeding these universal commendations, he instantly commanded silence, raised his violin to his shoulder, and after a short prelude, struck suddenly into the eighth concerto of his favorite master, amid the profound attention of the company. The concerto, the most generally admired of the set, was on this occasion interpreted with an energy, fire, and intensity of expression that held the audience literally spell-bound, from the opening bar to the conclusion. One only, during its performance, raised his eyes from the inspired musician—it was Rinaldo, who turned as if in quest of Valeria, but she had quitted the chamber unobserved.

"There!" cried Clarelli, as he dropped his bow, amid the loud bravos of his astonished pupils; "but now you were all in raptures with a trifling romanza, the foolish production of a vacant hour; but this, my children, is music indeed. Here the mighty master, Corelli, has poured out the treasures of his fancy in streams of unlying melody; there is no music like this on earth, there can be no finer in heaven! Oh, that it had fallen to my lot to have heard their inspired author give utterance to the glowing beauties of these immortal compositions, I had then perceived how fruitless have been my poor endeavors to attain to their due and worthy interpretation! Study then, my sons, by day and by night; each bar will unfold fresh beauties; and, above all, this glorious number eight, which is glittering with gems as bright and countless as the stars of heaven! Oh, that I could find the man who should afford me a more perfect conception of its hidden charms than, after a life devoted to its study, I have been able to attain; such a one should I cherish as my dear foster brother in art, the bright solace of my declining years, the welcome sharer of all I possess!"

"Of all!" repeated Rinaldo, in a reflective tone, as the old man concluded this enthusiastic apostrophe,

"Yea, verily, my son; for to such a one I would refuse naught; not even the hand of my cherished Valeria; and such a one only is worthy of aspiring to it!"

"Then poor Valeria must wait long enough for a husband," observed Rinaldo; "for I cannot conceive anything nearer perfection than the display of skill which has just delighted us."

"Nor I, indeed," echoed the pupils, simultaneously.

"Ah!" resumed Clarelli, "you are all as yet but infants in art; you will find, as you mount upward, that the ladder strengthens with every step; that perfection is a goal to which each day finds us no nearer; and that of the many devoted followers of our divine art, but one has reached the envied high—the great, the incomparable Corelli."

The artistic enthusiasm that glowed in every feature of the musician, and the profound sincerity of his manner as he uttered the foregoing sentiments, made a deep impression on the group around him; some of whom, for the first time, perhaps, were sympathetically touched by that divine fire which burns within the bosom of every real artist, whether painter, poet, or musician, and from which his genius imbibes inspiration and vigor. The Count Rinaldo, especially, was absent and thoughtful throughout the lesson which followed, and at its conclusion quitted his companions in silence and retired. He appeared no more at the house of the musician.

The current of our story now transports us to a solitary and ruinous villa, on the shore of the Adriatic, between Ravenna and Rimini, a deserted palace, mourning amid the desolation of surrounding swamps, and rocks covered with sea-grass, a scene familiar to the admirers of the genius of Canaletti and our own equally gifted Calcott. Wild vines and maiden's hair curled luxuriantly round the yellow and tottering columns of this once splendid mansion, fig trees shot up from its floors, and in the clefts and fissures of its moss-grown walls sprang forth violets and the dun-colored gilliflowers. The upper story alone presented any token of habitation—its broken casements were carefully closed, and a passing light every now and then threw its glimmering shadow on the orange trees below. Within a chamber of the ground floor a fire was kindled, around which reposed some dozen men, muffled in boat-cloaks, and wearing the red cap common to Greek and Italian sailors. Before the door of the chamber, another man, in similar garb, was pacing to and fro as sentinel, his drawn cutlass glittering in the mingled light of the fire and the moonbeams. Suddenly a casement above was opened, and a young girl leaned forward upon the moss-green parapet. She turned her pale face to the moon, and appeared to listen to the murmuring of the sea, as its waves broke sullenly beneath, and threw their spray in glittering clouds over the marble terrace that fronted the building. Now she would pause to catch the distant echoes of the gondoliers' chorus, and now gaze with eager eye in the direction of a small vessel that lay a short distance off the shore, and whose white and loosened sails flapped impatiently in the night breeze.

"Valeria! Valeria!" whispered a voice from below, "I come to bid thee farewell. We sail this night for Cyprus, admit me, then, instantly, I implore thee—a minute's delay may prove our ruin."

The next moment the speaker was rushing up the staircase of the villa, and tapping impatiently at the door on the landing-place, was admitted by Valeria Clarelli, not as of old, radiant with smiles, and youthful merriment, but pale, haggard, and broken-hearted.

"Oh, Valeria!" cried the intruder, "to-night's breeze will bear me on an enterprise so fraught with peril that I dare not even hope to return in safety: nor would I wish it otherwise, since all I love on earth fades from my grasp in the moment of possession; but ere I depart let me implore thy forgiveness for that act of violence which tore thee from thy cherished home, and the fond parent whose soul lived upon thy loveliness, to fret to death in this wild pirate's nest. Alas! from the moment I beheld thee 'neath the columns of Santa Vitale, my blood burned with love, my heart with longing. Each day that I entered thy home as the Count Palermi, under the pretext of acquiring that art thy father so nobly adorns, and there regaled my eyes with thy beauty, the arrow sunk deeper into my heart—my soul's madness drove me to force thee hither, seeing that the lawless pirate could not otherwise possess thee as his bride, but now to feel thee in my power, thy glowing beauty fading day by day, and thy heart cankered by unceasing grief, is a thought so fearful that I hate myself for having loved thee so fondly. Yet there is a corner for remorse even in a corsair's breast, and to-morrow he assured a trusty hand shall restore thee to thy parent. Adieu, Valeria! I go forth to danger, ay, to death—the hounds of his Holiness are e'n now upon my track—think sometimes of Gennaro Contini, the pirate, if only to forgive the wrongs he has done thee.”

As he ceased he raised her hand to his lips, and fervently kissed it. Valeria bent her tearful eyes on his manly countenance, and replied, “Rinaldo—for I must still call thee so—I could have forgiven them all, I could even have loved thee—thee, the outcast of thy father's house, the lawless pirate of the Adriatic, but thou hast, perhaps, broken the heart of the fondest parent on earth; my poor father could not, I am sure, survive our separation.”

“Say not so, Valeria; to-morrow shall see thee in thy parent's arms, and if thy forgiveness depend on his welfare alone, then am I contented; and,” continued the pirate, in a solemn and deliberate tone, “should I survive the perils of this night's adventure, I will try to win thee. Adieu!”

So saying, he hurried from the chamber, and as he descended the staircase, Valeria, whose heart had been half won by the striking person of the pirate, and his unwearied attention as the Count Rinaldo, her father's pupil, and whose youthful affection her sudden and violent abduction had not sufficed to obliterate, notwithstanding the lawless character of her admirer's pursuits, went to the casement to steal a last glance at his departing form. Contini, as we must now call him, issued quickly from the villa, and advanced to the edge of the terrace as if to reconnoitre the vessel which, as above stated, lay a little off the land. In an instant a bright and sudden flash illumined the ruin, followed by the quick report of a pistol, and the pirate fell to the ground, and rolling over the edge of the terrace fell into the waves below. Valeria, sick with terror, retreated from the casement, and sinking on a couch listened with terrified ear to the tumult now raging around and within the building. At length the long-continued report of fire-arms began to flag, and soon ceased altogether, giving evidence that one of the contending parties had surrendered; and ere long the affrighted girl was left alone, the sole living tenant of the gloomy ruin, the victorious soldiers, in their hurry to secure the prisoners, having omitted searching the interior of the villa. Trembling with apprehension at the silence which now reigned around her, Valeria again ventured to approach the casement, whence with fearful gaze she beheld extended on the terrace the bodies of several of the pirates, their ghastly and blood-stained features standing out in grim relief in the pale moonlight. Shocked at this appalling picture she again sought her couch, and overcome with grief and terror, at length fell asleep.

The next morning an old man in the garb of a fisherman tapped at her chamber door, and informed her that a vetturino with a wagon and a pair of mules awaited her on the high road, to commence the journey to Ravenna, and instantly following her informant, our liberated beauty and her trusty conductor were soon pursuing their way along the dreary road that leads from Rimini to Ravenna by the sea shore. On entering the latter city the driver suddenly stopped near the mausoleum of Dante. Valeria dismounted from the vehicle, and with a heartfelt addio to her companion, hurried on the wings of affection to her childhood's home. As she drew near the well-known spot her heart beat violently with mingled joy and apprehension, and prevented her for some time from knocking for admission. In this interval, however, her misgivings were joyfully dissipated; for pausing a moment to listen, the well-known tones of the violin gave a strong and sweet assurance of her parent's welfare. Clarelli, indeed, whose existence knew but two sources of joy, his child and his violin, having lost the one, sought only the more eagerly for consolation in that which remained. He played at this time almost without cessation from morning to night, but the theme was ever andante maestoso, the plaintive wailing of his bereaved heart, dissolved in melody. At first the loss of his child had so overwhelmed him that he refused consolation, and prayed daily for death to relieve his sorrow; but the pirate having contrived to have conveyed to him the strongest assurances of her safety and speedy return, he became gradually resigned to a misfortune he hoped would be but temporary; and taking up his instrument, the peace which he had sought elsewhere in vain flowed with its tones into his heart.

He ceased playing as his quick ear caught the timid knock of Valeria, rushed with instinctive eagerness to the door, and in the next moment pressed to his bosom the wasted form of his beloved child.

“This is indeed a day for rejoicing,” observed Flaminia, the musician's servant, as she minutely arranged a repast, more than ordinarily choice, in honor of the joyful occasion. “They are talking throughout the town of the capture of the dreadful pirate Gennaro Contini; and e'en now as I passed the porch of St. Romuald, I saw a tumbrel roll by, in which they said he lay dying of his wounds. However, living or dead, he is by this time safe within the city prison.”

This intelligence powerfully affected Valeria, who, in reply to the anxious questions of Clarelli as to the cause of her agitation, bid him kindly partake of the refreshment before him, and after their repast promised to relate all that had befallen her. Accordingly, the meal ended, she recounted to his eager ear how that the famous pirate Gennaro Contini was no other than his old pupil the Count Rinaldo Palermi; how as such he had sought her love, and how she had weakly listened to his protestations; how he had proposed to her to fly with him from Ravenna, and on her rejecting his proposal had laid in wait in a neighboring street, and forcibly conveyed her to the dreary scene of her late captivity; but that relenting at the fearful effects of his violence on its victim, had, on the eve of starting on a perilous adventure, assured her of a speedy liberation, which assurance was, as we have seen, strictly fulfilled.

Clarelli listened in sympathetic tenderness to the tale of his daughter's woes, gazing the while with tearful eye on her face, once beaming with health and beauty, but now pale and hollow with the trace of many a recent suffering.

“Thank heaven!” he cried, as her recital was concluded, “that remorse hath reached the heart of thy ravisher, and that thou art again within this home, so dark and cheerless in thy absence!”

Thus speaking, he caught her in his arms, and covering her cheek with kisses, fervently bid her “good night.”

The pirate Contini lay for some time within the city prison, awaiting recovery from his wound, which had been severe, to undergo trial and punishment for the crime of which he had long been notoriously guilty. The officers of the Papal power, incited by the hope of a reward which had been offered for his capture, used every effort, when they saw him fall wounded in the sea, as above narrated, to rescue him from the waves, and so produce him, living or dead, to the judicial authorities. In this they succeeded. It was whispered about, however, ere the prisoner was convalescent, that he was closely allied to a certain cardinal of great influence in the holy city; that a grave offense, the result of a youthful folly, had compelled his sudden flight from Rome and his family; and that, left without resources, and hesitating between the career of a brigand by land or a pirate on the sea, he had chosen the latter as the most congenial to his wild and roving character. Possessed of great personal advantages and undaunted courage, he soon gained paramount influence over his associates, and becoming their elected captain, long ravaged the Adriatic, to the terror of all who traded on its shores. After a successful adventure he would visit Ravenna, Rimini, and other towns on the coast, to dispose of his ill-gotten merchandise: and being in Ravenna on an occasion of this kind had first set eyes on Valeria Clarelli. By the exertion of friends of great influence at the Vatican Contini escaped an ignominious death, and his penitent bearing during his captivity, operating strongly in his favor, his punishment was commuted to imprisonment for ten years, which was afterwards reduced to seven.

One evening the musician and his daughter sat within their humble abode, talking over bygone days, and the events which form the subject of this tale, the former ever concluding with a sigh for those bright periods of his artist life, when, as he mournfully observed, his ear was ever quick, and his arm ready. A great misfortune has meanwhile befallen the violinist, paralysis has stricken his aged limbs, and his favorite Cremona, once so eloquent, has become mute for ever. Valeria, now ripened into womanhood, is the sole bright object in a prospect where all else is cheerless and forlorn—the patient solace of the querulous old man, who, denied the gratification of his sole appetite, does little else but repine at his helpless condition from morn till night. Flaminia suddenly enters, announcing a visitor, and is thereupon followed by a tall figure enveloped in the folds of a Spanish cloak, and splashed with marks of recent travel, who, raising his hat, reveals to the astonished Valeria the somewhat changed but still remembered features of Gennaro Contini. Clarelli stepped forward, as if to obtain a nearer view of his visitor, which the latter observing, said, in a firm but mournful tone:

“I am your old pupil, the Count Rinaldo Palermi. I come to claim the fulfilment of a pledge given in this room years ago. I demand the hand of thy daughter—I will prove myself worthy of it.” So saying he took up a violin-case he had put down on entering, and proceeded to tune the instrument, Clarelli the while watching his motions in dumb astonishment. He paused an instant as if to collect his energies, and then commenced the very concerto his old master had executed on the same spot just ten years previously.

When the first notes of the well-known music reached the old man's ear, he stood transfixed, as if by the influence of a potent spell; but as the performer proceeded, developing with each succeeding movement powers rarer than even he had ever boasted, his cheeks burned, his breast heaved, and his whole soul drank in the melody he had so long pined to hear once more. As the tones ceased, tears fell quickly from his furrowed cheeks, his eye rested with admiring wonder on Contini, and he remained speechless with emotion and delight.

“The prize is fairly won,” he at length exclaimed; “the pledge shall be fulfilled!”

“Henceforth,” said Contini, advancing and taking the hand of Valeria, “let the treachery of the pupil, the crimes of the pirate, be remembered no more. I come, justly deprived of all that noble birth and kindred once promised me, and which I have forfeited by crime and folly, retaining naught but the name of that ancient house, whose escutcheon hath, for the first time, been blotted by deeds like mine. I, Angelo Ruggieri, musician of Bologna—prouder of the art I have acquired than the nobility I have lost, come to claim thee as my hard-won and long-loved bride. During seven years of cheerless captivity, rising from my pallet of straw with the first ray of dawn that pierced the bars of my dungeon, I toiled hour by hour in the hope of reaching that perfection in thy father's art, which he, ten years ago, fixed as the price of thy beauty, and which I felt would not plead in vain on behalf of the despoiler of his home. Heaven cheered my daily-renewed efforts with a bright vision of love and constancy that smiled on me from beyond the walls of my prison; and on my release I departed for Bologna, there to renew my labor of love; but now, with the favorite aid of the ablest professors of that famous city—dost thou remember, Valeria, at our parting I said, ‘I will try to win thee’—the goal is reached at last, and thou art mine! Come then, let us depart hence, where the deeds of my past life are yet unforgotten. In the city of my adoption, a humble, yet peaceful home awaits thee and thy cherished parent, and which the skill thy love has created shall be devoted to render more worthy of thee!”

Valeria, her father, and Ruggieri—now adopting his real name for the first time since our acquaintance with him—soon quitted Ravenna, and settling at Bologna, the fame of the latter ere long eclipsed that even of his father-in-law. At an annual gathering of professional friends on the anniversary of his nuptials, he never failed to gratify them by performing the famous eighth concerto, upon the conclusion of which he used to observe, amid the enthusiastic plaudits of the company:

“That's how I won Valeria!”

INWARD INFLUENCE OF OUTWARD BEAUTY.—“Believe me, there is many a road into our hearts besides our ears and brains; many a sight, and sound, and scent, even, of which we have never thought at all, sinks into our memory, and helps to shape our characters; and thus children brought up among beautiful sights and sweet sounds will most likely show the fruits of their nursing by thoughtfulness, and affection, and nobleness of mind, even by the expression of the countenance. Those who live in towns should carefully remember this, for their own sakes. Never lose an opportunity of seeing anything beautiful. Beauty is God's handwriting—a wayside sacrament; welcome it in every fair face, every fair sky, every fair flower, and thank for it Him, the fountain of all loveliness, and drink it in simply and earnestly, with all your eyes; it is a charmed draught, a cup of blessing.”

LOVE.—There is a gloom in deep love as in deep water; there is a silence in it which suspends the foot; and the folded arms and dejected head are the images it reflects. No voice shakes its surface; the Muses themselves approach it with a tardy and timid step, and with a low, tremulous and melancholy song.—[W. S. Landor.

Religion helmeted is religion no more; but in the wars of the League, even in the midst of that blind and bloody hurrying of human passion, the forms of holiness, and charity, and devoted faith, were to be seen moving, like impassive spirits, through the ranks, binding up many a dreary wound, and turning many a dying eye to heaven.

Whoever has gained the affections of a woman is sure to succeed in any enterprise wherein she assists him.—[Gall.

SONG.

SAY, have you in the morning
Beheld the dewy gem,
So beautiful, adorning
The rose's diadem?
Or have you in the wildwood,
Where clear the streamlet flows,
Beheld in summer's childhood
The blushing, bright primrose?

Have you beheld the lily
Bloom on the water's breast,
Or in the dewy valley
The gowan's modest crest?
Then ye have seen sweet Nature
Her loveliest charms display,
As they beamed in every feature
Of her I've lost for aye.

Her eye was lit with beauty,
Her coral lip with love,
Her bosom, true to duty,
Was guileless as the dove.
How tenderly, how kindly,
Love's accents from her fell!
And, oh, how warmly, fondly
I loved my Isabel!

In vain for me the flowers
Of spring or summer blow,
And from the rosy bowers
In vain doth music flow;
The song-birds by the river
Remind me all too well
That stilled, and stilled for ever,
Is the voice of Isabel!

THE DEAD ALIVE.

A YOUNG man, called Arthur, was coming lately from the country, where he had been to arrange some family affairs; he was alone part of the way, but at some distance from town a traveler got into the coach.

The traveler was a young man about the same age as Arthur, and a friendly intercourse soon sprung up between them. The new comer's name was Edward B—; he related to his fellow traveler that he was in a most peculiar situation, he was going to be married to a lady whom he had never seen, neither did he know her father; the arrangement had been made by a friend of both parties, the preliminaries had been gone through by correspondence, and all seemed to make it a very desirable match.

On arriving in Paris, Edward and Arthur were the best friends in the world.

"I hope that we shall meet again," said the young provincial to Arthur, "and if you were not in a hurry to return home, you would do me much pleasure by breakfasting with me at the hotel where I stop."

Arthur accepted the invitation.

The young people had been hardly half an hour at table, when Edward was taken suddenly with a fit, and died before assistance could be procured.

This sad occurrence threw Arthur into great consternation, and he wished at least to render a last service to the friend that he had lost, by going to inform the family in which Edward was expected, of the sad catastrophe.

However, before fulfilling this sad mission, he went home to his young wife, whom he was afraid would be uneasy at his absence, so that it was not till about five in the afternoon that he was able to call upon Mr. C—.

Mr. C—, who doubted not on seeing him that it was his intended son-in-law, received him with open arms.

"How glad I am to see you, my dear Edward!" said he; "we were only waiting for you to go to dinner;" so saying, he hurried the perplexed Arthur into the drawing-room, where, independently of his wife and daughter, were assembled several friends, who were to be presented to the future son-in-law.

Mr. C—'s fluency of speech was so great that Arthur, not being able to get in a single word to undeceive him, was obliged to resign himself to the part forced upon him, and allowed himself to be presented to the young lady. He forgot even the death of poor Edward, and could not help smiling at the strangeness of the adventure, which was more like a scene in a farce than anything so serious as the reality.

This thought so tickled his fancy, that his spirits became excited, and he was so witty and agreeable during dinner, that everybody, including the young lady, was delighted with the supposed Edward.

At a quarter to seven, just as they were going to tea, Arthur looked at his watch, and rose.

"A thousand pardons," said he to Mr. C—, "but I am unfortunately obliged to leave you."

"Leave us, and why?"

"For an affair which does not allow of the least delay."

"What affair can you have in Paris, where you are quite a stranger? besides, on this occasion, I quite expected that you would at least have devoted to us this evening."

"Impossible, my dear sir, impossible!"

"How! impossible?"

"Well," said Arthur, "since you must know all, learn that at ten o'clock this morning I arrived in Paris, and at half-past ten I died; and that as the weather is warm, they mean to bury me this evening at seven o'clock. You must be aware that I cannot keep the funeral ceremony waiting; it would give them a very bad opinion of me. Besides, the Young France Hotel won't keep my body any longer."

After this speech, Arthur took his hat and vanished.

"What an original!" said Mr. C—. "Come, I shall have a very witty relation; but I wish he would have jested on a gayer subject. You see he will be back in half an hour; I dare say he's gone to smoke a cigar on the Boulevards. This is no doubt the way they joke in the country."

Ten o'clock struck, and the intended had not returned.

Mr. C— became uneasy; and, to solve the mystery, went to the hotel, and inquired for Edward B—. They related to him that a traveler arrived there that morning at ten, and that half an hour after he had died, and had been buried that evening at seven; to substantiate which statement they produced the official deposition of the death of Edward B—.

Poor Mr. C— returned home in a state impossible to describe. His belief in ghosts and fetches since this occurrence remains unshaken.

THE NORTHERN COUNTIES OF ENGLAND 160 YEARS SINCE.

A LARGE part of the country beyond the Trent was, down to the eighteenth century, in a state of barbarism. Physical and moral causes had concurred to prevent civilization from spreading to that region. The air was inclement; the soil was generally such as required skillful and industrious cultivation; and there could be little skill or industry in a tract which was often the theater of war, and which, even when there was nominal peace, was constantly desolated by bands of Scottish marauders. Before the union of the two British crowns, and long after that union, there was as great a difference between Middlesex and Northumberland, as there now is between Massachusetts and the settlements of those squatters who, far to the west of the Mississippi, administer a rude justice with the rifle and the dagger.

In the reign of Charles the Second, the traces left by ages of slaughter and pillage were still distinctly perceptible many miles south of the Tweed, in the face of the country and in the lawless manners of the people. There was still a large class of moss troopers, whose calling was to plunder dwellings, and to drive away whole herds of cattle. It was found necessary soon after the restoration, to enact laws of great severity for the prevention of those outrages. The magistrates of Northumberland and Cumberland were authorized to raise bands of armed men for the defense of property and order; and provision was made for meeting the expense of these levies by local taxation. The parishes were required to keep bloodhounds for the purpose of hunting the freebooters. Many old men who were living in the middle of the eighteenth century, could well remember the time when these ferocious dogs were common. Yet even with such auxiliaries it was often found impossible to track the robbers to their retreats among the hills and morasses, for the geography of that wild country was very imperfectly known. Even after the accession of George III, the path over the fells from Borrowdale to Ravenglass was still a secret carefully kept by the dalemen, some of whom had probably in their youth escaped from justice by that road. The seats of the gentry and the large farm-houses were fortified. Oxen were penned at night beneath the overhanging battlements of the residence, which was known by the name of the peel. The inmates slept with arms at their sides. Huge stones and boiling water were in readiness to crush and scald the plunderer who might venture to assail the little garrison. No traveler ventured into that country without making his will. The judges on circuit, with the whole body of barristers, attorneys, clerks and serving-men, rode on horseback from Newcastle to Carlisle, armed, and escorted by a strong guard under the command of the sheriffs. It was necessary to carry provisions; for the country was a wilderness which afforded no supplies. The spot where the cavalcade halted to dine, under an immense oak, is not yet forgotten. The irregular vigor with which criminal justice was administered shocked observers whose life had been passed in more tranquil districts. Juries, animated by hatred, and by a sense of common danger, convicted house-breakers and cattle-stealers with the promptitude of a court-martial in a mutiny, and the convicts were hurried by scores to the gallows. Within the memory of some who are still alive, the sportsman who wandered in pursuit of game to the sources of the Tyne, found the heaths round Keeldar Castle peopled by a race scarcely less savage than the Indians of California, and heard with surprise the half-naked women chanting a wild measure, while the men, with brandished dirks, danced a war-dance.—[Macaulay's History of England.

FUN AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.—Every one of my readers, I dare say, is acquainted with fun, particularly the young people. How often have they told stories for fun; how often have practical jokes been played, all for the sake of fun, though sometimes the consequences are fatal, as in the following true tale:

At a country village, about thirty miles from London, there was a picturesque cottage, inhabited by a widow lady of the name of Norton, and her two lovely daughters.

Ellen, the eldest was about twenty years old—very clever, and of an amiable disposition—with only one failing, and that was superstition. She had imbibed it from an old Irish nurse in her childhood, and her mother could never eradicate it. Ellen was engaged to Lieutenant Walters, who was now at sea with her only brother.

One stormy night, when all the household was in bed, excepting her sister, who was sitting up to finish a book, she dressed herself in her brother's clothes, and keeping her face turned away, entered at the farthest end of the room. Ellen, when she caught a glimpse of her, thinking that her lover was dead, and that it was his ghost, gave a piercing shriek, and fell senseless on the floor.

I shall not attempt to describe to you the agony of her mother, the despair of her lover, and the remorse of her sister, when she became for ever a harmless maniac. If you go to the churchyard of the village of S—, you will see her wandering about a grave, which she thinks is his, calling in a pathetic manner on him whom she thinks for ever lost.

THE VALUE OF TIME.—"I will tell you," said my father, "the secret of leisure is occupation. Have eight hours a day entirely devoted to business, and you will then find you have time for other pursuits; this, for some time to come, will seem to you a paradox, but you will one day be convinced of the truth of what I tell you, that the man who is the most engaged has always the most leisure. And remember, it is only Brahmins and Rajahs who think that they must move with head erect and uplifted gaze in order to govern men. To be a man above the world, you must, in every signification of the word, begin by being a man of the world; to have weight and influence with the people, you must understand them; to understand them, you must mix with them; we often hear so much of la haute politique, of the dignity in history, that the individual traits of character are lost sight of. A perfect simplicity is often the greatest refinement of diplomacy. All youth is arrogant, but arrogant above all youth, is political or diplomatic youth.—[Lucille Belmont.

"A leaden sword in an ivory scabbard," was the observation of Diogenes, the cynic, on hearing very foul language come from the mouth of an elegant young man.

The friendship of some people is like our shadow; keeping close to us while we walk in the sunshine, but deserting us the moment we enter the shade.

It is a masterpiece to draw good out of evil, and by the help of virtue to improve misfortunes into blessings.—[Seneca.

The eloquence that is effectual and irresistible must stir the inert mass of prejudice, and pierce the opaque shadows of ignorance.

There is either money or money's worth in all the controversies of life; for we live in a mercenary world, and it is the price of all things in it.

INVOCATION TO SUMMER.

BY MRS. B. F. FOSTER.

Come, beautiful summer! the glorious time
When high in mid heaven the sun shall climb,
And flowers awaking from out the cold sod,
An offering of incense breathe up to thy God;
When swift on the breeze the gay butterflies pass,
And the wild bee is humming above the long grass,
When the streamlet may creep through its margins of green,

Like a deed of kind charity, blessing unseen.
Oh, summer, come back! with thy voices of glee—
My spirit grows weary in longing for thee.

Ah! beats there a bosom so darkened by care,
That thy joy and thy light have no entrance there?
Or breathes there a creature so sordid and cold,
That he heeds not thy riches while counting his gold?
Or dreams there a sage who can moodily pore
O'er a volume of ancient and spiritless lore,—
Nor turn for a moment to pages like thine,
Where mercy and beauty are writ in each line?
Oh, summer, come back! I am pining to see
The lark in the sky, and the leaf on the tree.

Enwoven with all the fond dreams of my heart,
Enshrined in my memory, summer, thou art.
Through thy long sunny hours I have lingered to hear

The vows of a loved one poured into mine ear;
And when the night parted us, ever too soon,
I dream'd them again by the light of thy moon.
And with friends now departed, how often I've stray'd

In the warmth of thy sunbeam, the peace of thy shade.

Oh! thou wilt come back; but thou canst not illume

The eyes that are closed in the night of the tomb.

Yet, come! I will pray, I will long for no more Than the beauty and joy thou hast ever in store;
The westerly breezes, that come o'er the earth
Like whispers of Heaven to call into birth
Its fruit and its flowers, the birds that prolong
From morning till evening their thanksgiving song.
Again let me wander through garden and field,
Where every blossom can luxury yield.
Oh, summer! come back, for I pine to be free
My spirit grows weary in longing for thee.

ADVENTURE WITH CALIFORNIAN ROBBERS.

I ONCE hunted for three months in company with a hunter well known in California. In idea he was wild and imaginative in the extreme; but in his acts of daring, &c., the most cool and philosophic fellow I ever knew. A merchant, or mercantile, at San Francisco, on whose veracity I know from experience I can depend, told me the following story of this man, which will at once illustrate his general character:

"This hunter was, some months before I had fallen in with him, making the best of his way down the valley of the Tule Lakes from the interior, with a heavy pack of furs on his back, his nevererring rifle in his hand, and his two dogs by his side. He was joined at the northernmost end of the valley by the merchant I have spoken of, who was armed only with a sword and pistols.

"They had scarcely cleared the valley when a party of robbers galloped out before them. There were four whites fully armed, and two Indians with their lassos coiled up in their right hands,
'ready for a throw.' The hunter told the merchant, who was on horseback, to dismount instantly, 'and to cover.' Fortunately for them, there was a good deal of thicket, and trunks of large trees that had fallen were strewn about in a very desirable manner. Behind these logs the merchant and the hunter quickly took up their position, and as they were in the act of doing so, two or three shots were fired after them without effect. The hunter coolly untied the pack of furs from his back and laid them beside him. 'It's my opinion, merchant,' said he, 'that them varmints there want either your saddle-bags or my pack, but I reckon they'll get neither.'

"So he took up his rifle, fired, and the foremost Indian, lasso in hand, rolled off his horse. Another discharge from the rifle, and the second Indian fell, while in the act of throwing the lasso at the head and shoulders of the hunter, as he raised himself from behind the log to fire. 'Now,' said the hunter, as he reloaded, lying on his back to avoid the shots of the robbers, 'that's what I call the best of the scrimmage, to get them brown thieves with their lasso out of the way first. See them rascally whites now jumping over the logs to charge us in our cover.'

"They were fast advancing, when the rifle again spoke out, and the foremost fell; they still came on within thirty yards—another fell, and the remaining two made a desperate charge close up to the log.
The hunter, from long practice, was dexterous in reloading his gun. 'Now, merchant,' said he, 'is the time for your pop-guns (meaning the pistols,) and don't be at all nervous; keep a steady hand, and drop either man or horse. A man of them shan't escape.'

"The two remaining robbers were now up with the log, and fired each a pistol-shot at the hunter, which he escaped by dodging behind a tree close to, from which he fired with effect. As only one rider was left, he wheeled round his horse with the intention of galloping off, when the pistol bullets of the merchant shot the horse from under him.

"Well done, merchant," said the hunter, 'you've stopped that fellow's gallop.' As soon as the robber could disentangle himself from the fallen horse, he took to his heels and ran down a sloping ground as fast as he could. The hunter drew his toma-hawk from his belt, and gave chase after him. As the robber was more of an equestrian than a pedestrian, the nimbleness of the hunter soon shortened the distance between them, and the last of the robbers fell. Thus perished this dangerous gang of six, by the single hand of this brave hunter, and, as the merchant informed me, he acted as coolly and deliberately as if he were shooting tame bullocks for the market.

"The affair was rather advantageous to the hunter, for, on searching the saddle-bags and pockets of the robbers, he pulled forth some doubloons and dollars, with other valuables, which they had, no doubt, a short time previously taken from some traveler; the saddle-bags, arms and accoutrements of the four white men were packed up and made fast on the saddles of the two horses, the hunter mounting a third, the merchant another, his horse being shot, and thus they left the scene of action, leaving the bodies of the robbers to the wolves, who were howling about them, and entered San Francisco in triumph."—[Coulter's Adventures on the Western Coast of South America.

LIFE.

Yes, life is but a feverish dream,
A drop snatched from the eternal stream,
An ignis fatuus seen from afar,
A drooping, trembling, falling star,
We wake too soon to sin and pain,
The drop rejoins the stream again;
Few are the lights our path to cheer,
Our star is shining o'er our bier.

A JOKE UPON AN ELEPHANT.—A very intelligent elephant was shown some years since at a caravan of wild beasts, at a fair, in the West of England. One of those practical jokers, whose wit lies in pouring melted butter into a friend's pocket, or conveying a putrid oyster into his plate, had been doling out some gingerbread nuts of the first quality to the elephant, who received the instalments, small as they were, with satisfaction and gratitude, manifesting the latter by the spontaneous performance of some of his tricks between the somewhat protracted intervals of supply. Suddenly his benefactor produced a large paper parcel, weighing some two or three pounds, and presented it en masse. The elephant took it as it was, and considered the whole to his powerful crushing-mill.
Hardly, however, had he swallowed the dose, before he gave a loud roar, and exhibited all the symptoms of suffering severely from internal heat, handing—yes, handing, for the trunk acted as dexterously as a hand—the bucket to his keeper, as if beseeching for water, which was given to him, and of which he continued to pour in floods sufficient to drive a mill, down his capacious and burning throat.

"Ha!" said the joker, addressing his victim,
"those nuts were a trifle hot, old fellow, I guess."
"You had better be off," exclaimed the keeper,
"unless you want the bucket at your head, and save you right, too."

The dispenser of ginger and pepper took the hint;
for there was an angry glance in the drinker's eye, while the distressed beast was pumping up his sixth bucketful; and in good time he took it, for he had scarcely cleared the entrance of the show, when the empty bucket was hurled after him by the elephant, with such force and correctness of aim, that if he had been a moment later, his joking would, in all probability, have been terminated with his life, on the spot.

A year had passed away, and the wayfarers from the country villages trod over the withered leaves that had, when fresh, green, and vigorous, shielded their heads from the burning summer's sun, as they bent their steps to the same annual autumnal fair, where the elephant had been before exhibited, and where he was again ready to receive company.

Our joker was again among his visitors, and forgetful of his narrow escape from the bucket, which at the time another wit observed he had been near kicking, came as before, with one coat pocket filled with "best nuts," and the other with hot nuts.
He gave the elephant two or three nuts from the best sample, and then drew forth and presented him with a hot one. No sooner had the elephant tasted it, than he seized the coat-tails of his tor-mentor, and with one whirling sweep with his trunk lifted him from the ground, till, the tails giving way, the man dropped half dead with fright, and with his coat reduced to a jacket. The elephant, meanwhile, quietly inserted the end of his trunk into the pocket containing the best nuts, and leisurely proceeded, keeping his foot on the coattails, to discuss every nut of them. When he had finished the last, he tramped upon the pocket containing the hot nuts, till he had reduced them to a mash, and then, after having torn the tails to rags, threw the soiled fragments at the head of his fac-tious friend, amid the derision of the assembled crowd.

A ROYAL ROMANCE.—At the grand and brilliant ball given by Prince Schwartzberg, the Austrian Ambassador at Paris, in the year 1810, in celebration of the marriage of Napoleon with Maria Louisa, at which the Emperor and many illustrious persons were present, it is well known that a most destructive fire broke out in one of the temporary buildings, erected for the occasion, by which the young and beautiful hostess and several other persons were burned to death, and many seriously injured. One of the visitors at this ball was the then Dowager Duchess of Savoy-Carignan, mother of Charles Albert, ex-King of Sardinia.
This lady, prevented by the great confusion from getting out in time, found herself in one of the saloons, which was burning on all sides. When in this most perilous situation, and almost suffocated, she was accidentally discovered by her courier, who resolutely rushed through the flames into the room, took his mistress in his arms, and jumped from a window on the first floor to the ground. By this heroic conduct he broke both of his legs, but the Duchess was unhurt. Her life having thus been miraculously saved through the courage of her courier, she, of course, paid him all possible care and attention during his illness, and when he had recovered from his accident she married him. He afterward received, from some Italian Prince, the title of Count Montelart; and ever since they have been living together, but not very happily, in various parts of the continent, and are now in Paris.

REMARKABLE ADVENTURE.—A short time since, Hector Macalister, while out on the Arran Hills, looking after his sheep, six miles from home or other habitation, his two collie dogs started a rabbit, which ran under a large block of granite.
He thrust his arm under the stone, expecting to catch it, but instead of doing so he must have removed the support of the block, which instantly came down on his arm, holding him as fast as a vice.
His pains were great, but the pangs he felt when he thought of home, and the death he seemed doomed to die, were much greater. In this position he lay from ten in the morning until four in the afternoon, when, finding that all his efforts to extricate himself were unavailing, he tried several times, without effect, to get his knife out of his pocket to cut off his arm. His only chance now was to endeavor to send home his dogs, with the view of alarming his friends. After much difficulty, (as the creatures were most unwilling to leave him) he at length succeeded in this; and Mrs. Macalister, seeing them return alone, took the alarm, and speedily collected the neighbors, who went in search of her husband, led on by his faithful collies. When they came to the spot, poor Macalister was in a very exhausted state, and was quite speechless in crying for assistance. It required five strong men to remove the block to extricate his arm, which is dreadfully bruised; but having obtained medical treatment, it is hoped he may recover the use of his limb.—[Scotch Paper.

A FRAGMENT.

Amid the crowd there walk'd a youth,
Whose heart seem'd charged with woe;
His eyes were bent upon the deck,
His step was sad and slow.
It was not unrequited love,
Nor disappointment's fruits,
That mark'd with care the cheek of youth;
He couldn't find his boots!

GAZETTE AND RULE.

Friendship, Love and Truth.

AUG. C. L. ARNOLD, EDITOR.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1849.

THEY SAY THE ORDER IS PARTIAL AND SELFISH.

We do not deny that the chief advantages to be derived from it are confined generally to the members. And this is no objection. If it be, then all societies that ever existed, sacred or secular, may be condemned by the same rule; for the very idea of a society implies this. It is true that the legitimate benefits of the Order belong alone to the members of the fraternity. But the Order is not blind to the woes nor deaf to the cries of suffering, seen and heard in the world without. It relieves first, and very justly, the sufferings of its own children, and does what it can for the general good. It does all the good it has the ability to do. In works of beneficence it goes to the extent of its resources. As its resources are increased, as its power is extended, its ability to relieve suffering, and the sphere of its benevolent operations, are enlarged. How, then, can the Order be accused of selfishness?

As we walk by the side of your river, we see five children struggling for life in the current. Two of them are within our reach, we can save them, but the others we cannot save, even if we sacrifice our own life for them. Are we to be proceeded against as a murderer, because we saved two and saw the other three drown, it being impossible for us to save them? Would it be just to condemn us as a cruel, hard-hearted man? And yet, this is precisely the reasoning of those who charge the Order of Odd-Fellows with selfishness! According to these objections, if you cannot do everything, you should do nothing—if you cannot alleviate all distresses, you should be indifferent to all—if, of five drowning persons, you can save only two, it would be better to let the whole five drown. If, therefore, it were literally true that Odd-Fellowship confined all its benefits to the initiated, it would not be any serious objection. But this is by no means true. The records of our Lodges show that immense sums are every year distributed to the needy, who have no connection with the Order whatever. We say it with pride, that in all recent cases of public or individual calamity, there are no societies which have shown themselves so liberal. The following fact, which we take the liberty to relate, is an ample refutation of this charge of selfishness:

Not long since, two young women—intelligent and of the highest respectability—became residents of one of the manufacturing villages of New England. Natives of a foreign land, having no friends or relatives here, and by one of those misfortunes which often come as a tempest to obscure the fairest prospects, reduced to a state of dependency, they found it necessary to work in a factory. One of them, being of a delicate constitution, was soon utterly prostrated by the unwonted toil. A double duty was now imposed upon the other sister—that of labor for the support of both, and that of watching by the bed of the dying girl. No words can describe the anguish of those two young and friendless hearts. The sick one died, and the broken hearted, surviving sister had no means to defray the funeral expenses. The world looked on without pity and without feeling. The corporation, in whose service the girl had toiled and died, tendered no relief. But what was the astonishment of the neighbors and the wonder of the poor sister, when they saw two of the most respectable citizens of the town, who were not supposed to know anything about the case, appear to take charge of the funeral. Their words to the afflicted girl were few. "You are alone, friendless, and suffering—we are the friends of the distressed—your brothers."

Everything was decently prepared for the funeral and a large company of most respectable people followed, as mourners, the hearse which carried the homeless one to the grave.

The funeral ceremonies over, and expenses paid, the other sister was furnished with funds to return to her country; and she went away with the benediction of those brethren she had so mysteriously found. We need not tell you who these friends were. And this is not a solitary case. We could mention hundreds of incidents of this description, which every day give the lie to the charge of selfishness that we hear so frequently.

THE VICE OF THE AGE.

We are not of those who are ever disposed to find fault with what is—those who seem to think that the only purpose of their living, their greatest and highest duty, is to utter complaints against the existing social organization, and to denounce everything as radically vicious and evil which is not in harmony with their own speculations. To this class of restless, turbulent men, we say we do not belong. Nevertheless, we are obliged to say that we do see to-day, indications of a growing evil—an evil fraught with the most fearful consequences to our country. And this evil to which we allude, is the more dangerous in that it assumes the most seducing of all forms—that of independence—the absolute freedom of the individual. We ourselves do homage to the sentiment of liberty, and reverence all institutions which are calculated to make it actual in the life of the world. But this sentiment is now exaggerated beyond reason; and the idea of Fraternity, of Unity, has been overshadowed by what are called the rights of the individual. Man looks upon himself, not as a portion or member of society, of humanity, but as an independent force. He acknowledges no obligations to the State, and ridicules the very idea of a patriotism which requires the sacrifice of personal ease, comfort or interest. We may be wrong, but we believe our greatest danger lies here. A people is morally dead, when none can be found who are ready to make sacrifices to the State.

In time of war, for example, every citizen should give his aid. Because war perils his material interests—because his business may be deranged, his ships captured and his property seized by the enemy, he should not forget his duty to his country, but rather be willing to offer up all these interests upon the altar of public duty.

We, ourselves, are not politicians—we have no relations with any political party, no sympathies with any, and consequently what we have now said, cannot be supposed to have been prompted either for or against any one of the parties which now divide our country. Nor have we spoken with a political aim, but rather because we have seen beneath the movements which have appeared in certain quarters, the workings of that spirit of anarchy and rebellion, which, if not checked, will, in the end, destroy the Union, and spread desolation and ruin over all our social institutions.

We have ever admired that lofty virtue, that disinterested patriotism, for which many of the old Romans were distinguished, and which shone so clearly in the acts of those great and good men who founded our republic. Our only safety is in an emulation of their virtues. We should never let our obligations to society be lost sight of in personal interests, nor allow our private opinions to move us to act and speak in favor of our country's foes. If we do so, then is there an end to all government, and all order and all law; all our institutions are overturned to their very foundations. Each individual sets himself up as an independent government, acknowledges no God but pleasure—no law but interest.

We very much fear that these radical notions of "individuality," which self-styled reformers are constantly prating about—these notions of "private rights," and "personal freedom," which we hear everywhere proclaimed, are working mischievously among us, and, if not eradicated, will end in destroying all reverence for government or law, and in spreading through our land a withering selfishness, a spirit of disorder and confusion, too deep and terrible to admit of a cure.

Let us be warned, then, in time. Let it not be forgotten that nations advance—that Humanity is perfected by the sacrifices of individuals.

BENEFICIAL INFLUENCE OF ODD-FELLOWSHIP UPON INDIVIDUAL LIFE.

THE beneficial influence of Odd-Fellowship upon man, as an "individual," is not unworthy of note. It is adapted to all the circumstances and conditions in which he may be placed. It takes isolated men, separated by a thousand differences, and binds them together by the solemn vows and obligations of Fraternity. It teaches them the duty of mutual aid; and by its peculiar organizations and arrangements, it secures the right of Fraternity to all its members. Its benevolence is not all hypothetical, but practical; not a profession, but a fact.

Its fund of relief, formed by the weekly or quarterly contributions of its members, is always sufficient to meet all of the wants of distressed and suffering brothers; so that in sickness no brother can be degraded by receiving the scanty charity of the world. He has a right to that fund, which, when prosperous and strong, his own hand helped to form. He feels no sense of obligation or dependence. He applies for his weekly benefits with as much self-respect and independence as he would draw money from a bank, in which he had deposited large sums.

But this is not all. Odd-Fellowship not only furnishes pecuniary relief to its sick members, but also what is of far higher value, the personal attention of brothers, the fraternal sympathy, and their encouraging words of love. Night after night does the sick brother see around his couch those "friends in need," and their gentle ministries of love remove one half of his pains.

Any one who examines Odd-Fellowship from this point of view, cannot fail to see its adaptation to the circumstances and wants of men. There is no society which so well and truly supplies this want; there is none which so efficiently meets the thousands of unfortunate circumstances in which men are constantly liable to be placed. Every where and always has he need of sympathy and fraternal love; and often, alas! too often does it happen that, without pecuniary aid, he and those dear to him as his own life, must be involved in suffering and distress. But being a member of this Order he has nothing to fear. Its helpful and friendly arms are around him, ever to encourage and support, and direct him, when prosperous, and to console and comfort, and soothe him in the darkness of adversity.

As a mutual help society, Odd-Fellowship is certainly far in advance of any which has ever existed. While it is humble, and does not claim to be a religion, nor evince any disposition to usurp any of the prerogatives of the church, it does claim to be founded on the religious sentiment, and to be a Christian society, not a pagan nor an infidel one. The loving spirit of Christianity presides over all its arrangements, and inspires all its operations. Other societies are beneficial to men, but their influence and operations are limited. They chiefly address themselves to one of the many wants of humanity. But Odd-Fellowship has a wider influence and power, and far greater facilities for the accomplishment of its benevolent purposes; and besides, it looks out over all of life, and embraces all the possible temporal circumstances of man. More truly here than any where else is realized the great ideas of Union, Fraternity, Love.

The beautiful type, which Christianity presents, of a society where men will bear the burthens of each other, relieve each other's necessities, and love one another in all circumstances, as a family of brethren, here in our association becomes a feast of life.

We cannot here explain in detail all the benefits and advantages of Odd-Fellowship. We will only add, that there are no circumstances of want or suffering which concerns man's worldly life, in which he can be placed, for which Odd-Fellowship does not generously provide. The music of his footsteps charms away human grief, and wherever it acts, the flowers of hope and joy grow in luxurious beauty, and scatter the aroma of Eden over the abodes of men. Ever is it active—untiring as the angels of mercy—carrying forward its benevolent work, assuaging the sorrows of the lone widow, and protecting her fatherless babes, and extending to the child of sickness and penury the tender consolations of paternal sympathy.

ANNIVERSARY AND DEDICATION OF THE I. O. O. F. NEW YORK.

MONDAY next, the 4th inst., will be a great day for the Order, in this jurisdiction. We have already given our readers a programme of the procession, and of the exercises of dedication; and below they will find the order of exercises for the evening. We learn that large numbers of the Order intend visiting New York, to participate in the festivities of the occasion. Arrangements have been made with railroad and steamboat companies, which radiate from New York, to take members of the Order at reduced rates, and nearly all the rooms of the principal hotels are already engaged. We ought also to remark, that brothers visiting the city on this occasion, will be received as guests by the brothers here, who will be most happy to minister to their wants:

EVENING EXERCISES,

AT CASTLE GARDEN,

On Monday, June 4th, 1849. To commence at 8 o'clock, precisely.

PROGRAMME.

1st. Overture by the Band.

2d. ODE—written by Miss E. C. Hurley.

Joy, brothers, joy, let each face beam with gladness, Heaven smiles propitious, our efforts to crown; Our path is victorious, then banish all sadness—Our deeds and alms-giving have met with renown. We hail with delight, this our day for uniting, For rendering praises, and glory and power, To him who alone gives the means so inviting, Each brother to cherish when darkness may lower.

Mark, brothers mark, the distress'd from all nations,

Wending their way to the Odd-Fellows' Hall; Whate'er once their lot, or whate'er their stations, The Odd-Fellow's heart is alive to their call. He feels 'tis a brother who seeks his protection, Whate'er be his doctrine, religion, or creed, A brother's regard, and a brother's affection, Is instantly yielded, in thought, word and deed.

See, brothers, see, the lone Orphan's eye beaming, Tho' memory's tear will bedew that soft eye; The heart feels assured, and bright visions are gleaming—

The Odd-Fellow's haven, their refuge, is nigh. Then hail, brothers, hail, with delight hail the morning,

Whose dawn rose in Friendship, in Love, and in Truth—

Cementing, uniting, each other adorning, A solace for age, a bulwark for youth.

Advancing in splendor, unshackled and fearless, Onward and upward, and proud our career; Ne'er may the sick or the feeble be cheerless, But find in Odd-Fellows that comfort is near. Stronger and broader, and wider our borders—Boundless and free be our march thro' the land; Graceful and peaceful, and free from marauders, Till Faith, Hope and Charity join hand in hand.

8d. Oration, by C. Edwards Lester, of Atlantic Lodge, No. 50.

4th. Music by the Band.

5th. ODE—written for the occasion, by P. C. P. Franklin J. Otterson, of Lebanon Encampment, No. 19.

The restless wing of Time hath brought
The parting moment near,
And soon an evening, pleasure-fraught,
Will be with those that were;
The bell that tolls the midnight chime
Will knell a glorious day—
The memory of whose pleasant time
Shall never fade away.

Farewell, warm hearts, and eyes of light!

We part; but memory yet
Will turn with ever new delight,
To bless the hour we met;
When Friendship gave the grip so true,
And Truth, from Heaven above,
O'er all the vast assembly threw
The gorgeous light of Love.

Farewell, ye Brothers true and bold!

This day to you shall be,
O'er Prejudice and Slander old,
The day of Victory;
And they who barr'd our infant way
Shall cheer our mighty youth,
And own the noble power, to-day,
Of Friendship, Love and Truth.

Farewell! yon Temple long shall tell,

In ages crowding on,
Our still increasing sons, who well
Their fathers' work was done.
Farewell, ye fair, whose presence here
Hath made our festal bright!
To Brother, Mother, Maiden dear,
Good night—a sweet good night!

—The Odes will be sung by Mr. Austin Phillips, Mr. George Paxton, Mr. Joseph Daniel, and two Gentlemen Amateurs.

Thirty minutes intermission.

After which the floor will be cleared, and music furnished for such as are disposed to conclude the performance by dancing. The floor will be in charge of a competent person, assisted by a floor committee.

DEDICATION OF ODD-FELLOWS' HALL, WILMINGTON, DEL.

We had the pleasure of being present at the dedication of this new and beautiful Hall, on the 23th inst. The day was a little unpleasant, yet an immense number of the Order were in attendance, amounting to several thousands. The procession was brilliant and well arranged. The Oration was delivered by J. L. Ridgely, Esq., of Baltimore, C. S. R. W. G. L. U. S. It was one of the most philosophical and able addresses ever delivered on such an occasion. The Hall was dedicated by Grand Sire Kneass, assisted by P. G. Sires Wildey and Hopkins, and G. S. Ridgely. The ceremonies were performed in a most impressive manner. We give below the order of exercises:

Music by the Band.

The audience being in the Saloon, the G. S. and other Grand Officers of the G. L. in the Lodge Room, the Master of Ceremonies called to order, closed the door, and stationed two O. Gs. with a Herald within, and dispatched the G. Marshal to the Lodge Room.

The G. Marshal, accompanied by the G. S., and followed by the G. L., advanced to the Saloon door; and the G. S. sounded the alarm.

1st O. G.—Who sounds that alarm?

G. Mar.—The M. W. G. S. and R. W. G. L. of Delaware ask possession of this building in the name of FRIENDSHIP, LOVE and TRUTH, that they may dedicate it to the diffusion of the principles of BENEVOLENCE and CHARITY.

2d O. G.—[To the Herald within.]—The M. W. G. S. and R. W. G. L. of Delaware, ask admission that they may dedicate the Hall to the diffusion of the principles of Odd-Fellowship.

Herald.—Brethren, prepare to welcome the M. W. G. S. and R. W. G. Lodge of Delaware, who appear [throwing open the door] to dedicate our Hall to F., L. and T.

M. of C. [advancing to meet them.]—Welcome, M. W. G. S. and R. W. G. L. of the I. O. of O. F. of Delaware, who come in the name of F., L. and T.

Response.—All welcome!

Flourish by the Band.

During which the M. of C. and G. Marshal will conduct the G. S. and G. L. to their seats. Chaplain reads the 124th Psalm.

Response.—So be it.

M. of C. [Introducing the Board of Managers to the G. S.]—M. W. G. S. I beg leave to introduce to you the President and Board of Managers of this Hall.

President of the Board.—M. W. G. S., having been elected to direct and superintend the erection of this edifice, and having thus far attended to the arduous and interesting duties entrusted to us, we now deliver it into your hands, praying you to set apart by solemn dedication the portions designed for the use of our beloved Order.

M. W. G. S.—Brethren of the Board of Managers, gratefully do I receive your offer, and cheerfully will I perform the duty assigned me. I congratulate you on your success, and assure you of the grateful regard of your brethren for your attention and care in the erection of this building, and as under this roof, you aid and encourage each other and the Brotherhood at large in the works of Benevolence and Charity; in the cultivation of filial trust in God, and Friendship, Love and Truth among men—and in the elevation and improvement of human character generally, may you and those you represent, be rich partakers in the fruits dispensed in the faith that works by love, and purifies the heart, in the hope that entereth within the veil, and in the ever-enduring Charity that is greater than even Faith and Hope—that thus you, and they, may be perfected as temples spiritual, and receive the approbation of the Grand Sire of the Universe.

The G. S. then called up the audience, and the Brethren and Choir sang,

"Brethren of our friendly Order."

Prayer—by the Chaplain.

DEDICATION ODE.

BY P. G. SAMUEL D. PATTERSON.

When first the Architect of all,
The earth had cast in boundless space—
'Twas ordered that each sparrow's fall
In its records should find a place—
One hand should guide—one spirit move—
And all be concord, peace and love.

When o'er the pure primeval world,
The taint of deadly sin had spread,
When Heaven had half its beauty furled,
And angels bowed, to guilt, the head—
Darkness and gloom, with murky pall,
Enveloped and enshrouded all.

When Discord o'er the earth had first
'Twixt kindred people kindled war,
And bitter passion's angry burst,
The golden age began to mar—
A cure for all was found to be
In Faith and in Fraternity.

When all the bonds of right and wrong,
Were feeble as a rope of sand—
When sage's thought and poet's song,
With heartless might could not contend—
Solace was given, mid strife and ruth,
In holy Friendship, Love and Truth.

And now, amid our social world,
Where virtue's self we often wrong,
Where crime on blood-stained axles whirled,
Subjects the feeble to the strong—
A sad and dreary waste 'twould prove,
Deprived of Friendship, Truth and Love.

Then, brothers, to our holy tie,
In sacred honor firmly bound,
Let us as brothers live and die—
And make each secret we expound,
A proof that Friendship, Truth and Love,
Our actions prompt, our feelings move.

The Heralds in the East, West and South, advance to the G. S., at the altar in the North, and receive from him three vases of Wheat, Water and Flowers, respectively, and then return to their stations.

G. S.—Brethren, be attentive while our Heralds dedicate this Hall, with solemn ceremonies, to the principles and uses of our honorable Order. Heralds, you will proceed in the performance of your duties.

H. East.—[Sprinkling water]—In the name of FRIENDSHIP, as pure and refreshing as this water, I dedicate this hall to the practice of that ennobling virtue, which, uniting men as brothers, teaches them to sustain that relation at all times, each, in his turn, helping and helped, blessing and blessed.

H. South.—Sweet as the gushing fountain to the weary pilgrim on the parched and sandy desert, is the smile of a friend to the wanderer in life's thorny wilderness.

H. West.—May we each so live, that the spiritual Temple within may also be sprinkled with the pure water of the River of Life, the streams whereof make glad the city of our God.

Flourish by the Band.

H. South.—[Strewing Flowers]—In the name of Love, which, like the flowers, beautifies all on which it falls, and fills the common air with fragrance, I dedicate this hall to the practice of that highest virtue, which is, in itself, the "fulfilling of the law," and "the bond of perfectness," teaching us to "visit the widow and the fatherless in their afflictions," to bind up the broken hearted and let the oppressed go free.

H. West.—As the gentle fragrance of opening blossoms restores vigor to the exhausted body, so do the gentle breathings of Love recall life and strength to the fainting spirit.

H. East.—May we all so speak and act as to hasten the coming of the happy day when the wilderness of man's nature shall blossom as the rose, so that on our dying beds angels' hands may scatter flowers from the Tree of Life.

Gentle flourish by the Band.

H. West.—[Scattering Wheat]—In the name of Truth, which, like this grain sown broadcast on the earth, springs up again a hundred fold for future use and blessing, I dedicate this hall to the practice of this most noble virtue which lies at the foundation of all other virtues, and which, devoid of guile and hypocrisy, teaches us sincerity and plain-dealing in all our communications, and earnestness in the inculcation of whatsoever is good and true.

H. South.—As this grain furnishes the staff of the bodily life, so does Truth the staff of the spiritual life, without which the inward man pines and perishes.

H. East.—May the seeds of Truth that are here sown, fall upon good ground, and springing up, bear fruit unto life eternal.

Gentle flourish by the Band.

H. East.—"Let brotherly love continue!" In the practice of these noble duties and virtues, may we be always actuated by the blessed spirit of that Friendship that speaks the Truth in Love.

H. South.—"Let brotherly love continue!" As brothers may we together cultivate all the virtues that adorn humanity—as brothers may we pass on through the journey of life: and as brothers, enter, in fraternal embrace, the dark valley of the Shadow of Death.

H. West.—And may brotherly love continue beyond the tomb! When He who sent us shall have called us home, as brothers may we meet in that "house not made with hands"—in that Celestial Lodge, whose members no tongue can number, and the Supreme Master of which is the Father of the spirits of all flesh.

[The three Heralds.]—Amen! So may it be!

Solemn flourish by the Band.

Herald East.—M. W. G. S., in obedience to your instruction, and in the holy and reverend name of the Eternal Creator of the Universe, we have dedicated, and do dedicate this hall to the principles and work of Odd-Fellowship.

G. S.—The in the name and by the authority of the R. W. G. L. of I. O. of O. F. of the State of Delaware, I declare it dedicated to the good purposes of Odd-Fellowship—to the cultivation of Friendship, Love and Truth—to the diffusion of the principles of Benevolence and Charity—to the protection of the Widow and the Fatherless—to the relief of all worthy and distressed brethren, and to the moral and mental improvement of mankind thereby.

Response.—So may it be.

CLOSING ODE.

BY REV. BRO. A. B. GROSS.

Sound the glad chorus! Let praises arise,
In works of our Order, to God in the skies.
Sing! for the light of His Truth is advancing,
And darkness and suffering are fleeing away;
His Love, in its warmth, human souls is entrancing,
And Friendship on earth, is asserting its sway.
Sound the glad chorus, &c.

Welcome Odd-Fellowship! Praise to the Lord!
His Love is its buckler, His Truth is its sword,
Brethren raised up from despair, are its story.

And orphans protected, its jewelry bright;
The tears of the widow—from gloom turned to glory,
Like the bow on a cloud—grow bright in its light.
Sound the glad chorus! Let praises ascend
To God, in the work of the heart and the hand.

G. S.—Brethren of the Board of Managers: We have thus dedicated this hall to the purposes and uses of our beloved Order, and now return it to your possession, assured that you, and those you represent, and the brethren who may occupy the portions solemnly consecrated—will suppress every improper feeling and sentiment in its use—and will make it a place from which only noble thoughts and benevolent deeds shall flow forth, for the amelioration of mankind and the healing of the nations.

President.—Most worthy sir: Gratefully do we receive back our consecrated hall, and willingly do we pledge ourselves to endeavor to promote the purposes to which it has been so impressively and beautifully dedicated by yourself and assistants. We cordially thank you, and them, and the R. W. G. L., and the brethren generally for your presence and your services on this interesting and joyous occasion. May we long remember the words conveyed in those services—living, may they live in us and by us; dying, may they give us solace in death, and hope for eternity.

Response.—Amen—so may it be!

Benediction—by the Chaplain.

THE DELAWARE CELEBRATION.

WILLMINGTON, Del. May 23, 1849.

THE day has been a glorious one for the Order in spite of the inclement weather usually fatal to a celebration, such as has just closed. At an early hour the city began to fill with strangers, eager to witness the parade in honor of the dedication of a temple to the uses of the I. O. of O. F. By ten o'clock, the city swarmed with Odd-Fellows, who came by thousands from Philadelphia, Baltimore and the nearer vicinity of this city. The throng of ladies at the windows, to see the Procession, rivaled New-York in enthusiasm, nor could a fairer gathering be produced, in even the Empire State. The ceremonies of the dedication I pass, to give a brief sketch of the procession, which in the face of a most industrious rain, numbered thousands strong and paraded the entire route. The tout ensemble of the procession was most beautiful, not only in the brilliancy of the Regalia of the members, but from the appearance of the brothers of the Order; for no one could look upon them, and not feel at once, that these were the real men of the State, her jewels, and that an order composed of such men could not but be worthy the confidence of their fellow citizens, though ignorant of the mystic tie that binds them in the Fellowship of Friendship Love and Truth. Among the beautiful scenes in the Procession, was a carriage gayly decked with flowers, drawn by four horses covered with flowers, containing a numerous party of children of both sexes, themselves the fairest flowers of all. In their white robes and blue sashes, and the profusion of flowers entwined in their hair, they looked the happy delegates from the Temple of Flora, sent to give a new pleasure to the festival. Along the whole route this carriage was the mark of all eyes, and many a tear glistened upon reading the motto, "We protect the innocent," that was borne by the brothers who guarded this valued charge. At four o'clock the procession reached the church, when the stand was taken by Grand Sire Kneass, and his worthy supporters, the Past Grand Sires of the Order. The services commenced with music from the choir, and was continued by an elegant and impressive prayer. The Most Worthy Grand Sire then introduced Bro. J. L. Ridgely, G. S. of the G. L. of U. S., who delivered an Oration replete with information and bearing the marks of the most careful preparation, such as befitted the occasion.

Thus far in the day, he said the celebration could have appeared to the multitude of spectators only as a gorgeous pageant, the meaning of which they knew not; and it was now time to remove the veil and show the real purposes of the Order. The object of the Order was to secure the happiness of the human race. In every being this desire existed, and in every age this work had been going on, but in no era had made such progress as during the time when the ties of Friendship, Love and Truth had been invoked, under the present organization. The noble edifice just dedicated stood a monument to the success of our Order. Yet in its youth, a stripling, so young indeed was the Order on this continent, that he whose benevolence planted the first germ in Baltimore, was now present to witness the strength of the youth of the Order. The seed planted in 1819 had increased until more than one hundred thousand were in the Brotherhood, the principles of which remained unchanged, though its energy and affairs are a thousand fold greater, keeping pace with the march of Time. In Delaware, the least of all the States, the progress of the Order was no less gratifying. The single Lodge founded nineteen years ago had grown to be the head of a family of twenty-one, comprising fifteen hundred brothers. The people of Delaware, in this as in other things, gave their whole hearts, and with the most abundant success.

At the close of the oration the choir gave some most excellent music, after which the benediction was pronounced, and the assembly dispersed, after a day of pleasure, that will live long in the memory of all.

FROM EUROPE.

By the arrival of the Caledonia our European advices are brought down to the 12th of May.

From England the news is of little interest. The Navigation Law has passed the House of Lords, and it is now in fact repealed.

In Germany, affairs are very unsettled, and the whole continent, in fact, seems upon the eve of war. The people are opposed directly to the various Parliaments, and resist the Government by force of arms. At Dresden a fight occurred between the Red Republicans and the troops, which lasted three days. At Leipsic there had been an outbreak, and at Breslau and Coblenz. The success of the Hungarians continue, and they are now in possession of Gran, Raab, and Ayraraw. The power of Austria seems incompetent to maintain order within her borders, and Russia is advancing a large body of troops to the aid of Austria. The Poles, encouraged by the success of the Hungarians, are apparently on the eve of another attempt to gain their nationality. It is stated that the English and French Governments have remonstrated against the course of Russia, and have demanded the withdrawal of her troops.

Italy has roused herself for a decisive blow against the French army, which has visited them for the purpose of reinstating the Pope on his temporal throne. In two encounters the Frenchmen have been beaten, and at the last advices were awaiting orders from home. The spirit of the Italians does not brook this insolent attempt of France to regulate her internal policy, and the war will be urged with spirit. The success of the Italian army has wounded the pride of France, and there is little doubt that France will give all her energy to this task she undertook so thoughtlessly.

In France there is nothing of moment. Some troubles have occurred with the troops, caused by the efforts, it is said, of the Socialists, who persuade the soldiers from their allegiance. It is, however, extremely difficult to award to the Socialists the exact proportion of the blame of these movements, which grow out of the peculiar constitution of the French Government. Were the Socialists swept from existence, there would be little change for the better in the public order of France.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.

THE resolution of the Government, to send two National vessels in search of the lost English Navigator, Sir John Franklin, is a noble one. The search for a north west passage is an adventure calculated, if successful, to interest the whole maritime world; and it is becoming a great commercial nation, like the United States, to assist in rescuing the daring explorer of the icy seas. It seems barely possible that the expedition will ever be found, still no efforts to that end should be spared.

Captain Wilkes, of the Navy, publishes a letter in the National Intelligencer, in relation to the contemplated expedition in search of Sir John Franklin, the British Navigator. Capt. Wilkes entertains the hope that it is not yet too late to render relief, and suggests that prompt action may be the means of saving Sir John and his brave followers from a terrible fate. He is of opinion that search should be made through the Wellington Channel, it being the only place where adequate search is not likely to be made. Beyond Cape Walker, toward the south-west, in Baffin's Bay, in Davis's Straits, in Lancaster Sound, or in the Arctic Ocean, within Behring's Straits, he would most likely be fallen in with by Richardson or Ross, both of whom are in search of him; or by the English, Russian, or American whale ships, which have extended their cruising grounds into those remote parts. The writer remarks:

"The best practical plan, peculiarly suited to our means, and the character of the navigation and service, is to fit out three or four of our small eastern fishing vessels (Chebecoo boats), from sixty to eighty or one hundred tons burden, manned by those who have been brought up in them, and have them well and fully equipped, with but small crews—ten or twelve persons, including officers. For this number these vessels could be provided with fuel, provisions, and clothing for two or three seasons. There is no necessity for them to set out with the intention of wintering within the icy region; the supplies should be to guard against the accident of detention.

"The vessel and outfit could readily be prepared for five or seven thousand dollars each, and crews would cheerfully undertake the voyage at double wages, and a gratuitous supply of warm clothing; the whole sum would not exceed, for these, twenty-five thousand dollars. The reward offered by the British Government, in the event of success, would be ample compensation to excite the greatest exertion, casting aside the desire of adventure and engaging in so laudable undertaking.

"The distance of Wellington Channel from our shores is no greater than that to Europe, and the voyage may readily be performed in forty-five days. If vessels were now fitted they would be in time for the season, which opens about the middle of July, and would be able to explore this channel thoroughly to its farthest extent or navigable point, and if not to succor, they will ascertain whether Sir John Franklin has taken that route, and return safely back before winter, with tidings."

THE ORDER IN KENTUCKY.

We have received the official report of the proceedings of the R. W. Grand Lodge of Kentucky, and are glad to perceive that the Order in the West is flourishing to a degree not exceeded by any part of the Union. The greater part of the proceedings have only a local interest, and we confine our extracts to that part of Grand Representative Merrick's report relative to the New York question, before the last G. L. of the U. S.:

" 'It must needs be,' said he who spake as never man spake, 'that offenses come.' For the context of this quotation we have no application in the present instance; ever believing that a conciliatory spirit is the proper weapon in the hands of the true Odd-Fellow, for the reclamation of the erring, and ardently trust its influence may be essayed to restore to her former place in the Constellation of Odd-Fellowship, the once brilliant, burning Star of New-York—once the brightest gem in the diadem of our Fraternity—but now, alas! dimmed by internal discord, and two-thirds of her membership under the ban of suspension for insubordination. It is unnecessary here to recapitulate the origin and progress of the difficulties in this unfortunate jurisdiction. The entire history has, no doubt, long been in possession of this Right Worthy Grand Lodge; and has elicited from each member the calm, close, unbiassed investigation its importance demands. The subject of the New York difficulties was introduced into the G. L. U. S. under the following circumstances, viz: The Committee on Credentials reported two sets of Representatives from New York. Each set bore the acknowledged seal of the G. L. of New York, yet was attested by the signature of a different Grand Master and Grand Secretary—thus presenting in Odd-Fellowship the anomaly of two State Grand Lodges existing in New York, and each claiming to be the head of the Order there. The Committee being unable to decide in the premises, the whole matter, together with that part of the Grand Sire's report touching the New York difficulties, was on motion referred to a special committee of five, chosen by the Grand Lodge—who, after an untiring and patient investigation of five days, communicated as the result of their labors, two reports, a majority and minority one; the former bearing four signatures, the latter one. The majority report was adopted by a decisive vote of 47 to 24, recognizing the Grand Lodge working under the old Constitution, and of which Andrews is G. M., and Pentz is G. S., as the G. L. of New York, and Hale and Davies, elected by that body, as legitimate Representatives. In the foregoing decision the undersigned concurs most heartily, believing it in strict accordance with the evidence, and fully and entirely sustained by it. The undersigned cannot but admire the dignified, fraternal, conciliatory course of the G. Sire, throughout the entire procedure. We have been unable to detect even the gleamings of usurpation in the much talked of Commission; but are constrained to believe it a most judicious expedient, having for its object the amicable adjustment of existing difficulties, and bearing the marks of despotism before the eyes of those only whose acts would not bear its lynx-eyed scrutiny. With such a man as Horn B. Kneass in the executive chair, we cannot entertain any apprehensions for the prosperity of the Order, as far as he is concerned—and may his every successor acquit himself as faithfully in the discharge of those duties, which, under the sanctity of an oath, demand at his hand a supervision and superintendence of the interests of the Order, during the recess of the G. L. of the U. S."

REASONS FOR ATTENDANCE AT STATED MEETINGS OF THE LODGE.

BY ALBERT CASE.

THERE are many reasons to be urged in favor of a general attendance on the meetings of the Lodge. Our Lodges are deliberative assemblies, and the business they transact, I apprehend, is of more importance than many of the members imagine. The reception of members, the disposition of the funds, and all the immediate and direct operations of the Institution, is the work of the Subordinate Lodges. The entire character, standing and success of the Order, depend, in a great degree, on the manner in which the business of the Lodges is conducted.

If the meetings of the Lodges are neglected by the members, the business may be transacted in a careless, loose and injudicious, if not in an unlawful manner. In such an event, negligence will be apt to mark all its operations—the inevitable consequence of which must be, that from want of suitable attention to the qualifications of candidates, bad men will obtain admittance—the funds will be squandered, or applied to improper purposes, and the Lodge ultimately ruined, and an injury inflicted upon the character and interests of the Institution generally; therefore it is the duty of every member, to attend the meetings of his Lodge as often as circumstances will admit. He should not neglect them for any trifling cause. The interests of the Institution and his Lodge, which it is his duty to watch over and labor to promote, and to guard against abuse, demand it.

But it is not merely to watch and to guard the Institution and the Lodge from abuse—to prevent the admission of the unworthy, the squandering of the funds, or their improper application, that members should be constant attendants at their Lodge meetings. This is a mere negative purpose. But it is more especially, that they may act affirmatively, in promoting the welfare and interests of the Lodge and the Order.

It is an old saying and true, that in the multitude of counsel there is safety. Of deliberative assemblies this is as emphatically true, as of individuals.

There is much business that comes before our Lodges, in which the counsel and advice of every member are needed, in words and by vote. And this, the Lodge and the Institution have a right to claim of its members.

Besides this, it is only by attendance upon his Lodge meetings, that any Brother can become familiar with the work and operations of the Order, and be able to form an intelligent opinion of its practical utility. With the utilitarianism which distinguishes the people of this country, little interest will be excited or felt in an Institution, until it is perceived that it possesses some utility; that it can be applied to some practical purposes.

Again, the influences excited upon the mind and heart, by the meeting of a well regulated and harmonious Lodge of Brothers, is not to be overlooked. If candidates are to be initiated, or advanced, the solemnities of the service will exert a good influence upon every serious mind. And then, if there is no work to be done, the lessons of the Lodge cannot fail to awaken thoughts and feelings of a noble and generous character, and inspire a generous mind with a renewed interest in the welfare and happiness, not only of the Brotherhood, but of the human race, and make it feel more deeply for the race—to excite a general sympathy for our kind, and make the members more active for their relief and improvement.

ODD-FELLOWS' CELEBRATION IN NEW YORK.—Extensive arrangements have been made for the dedication of the new and commodious Hall, recently completed by our brethren in New York City, which is arranged to take place on the 4th of June.

The Board of Grand Officers of our State have made arrangements with the railroad companies, by which the members of the Order with their families, may go to New York, via Fall River, Stonington, and Norwich, on the first and second of June next, to attend the celebration of the dedication of Odd-Fellows' Hall on the 4th; and return on or before the 9th. Price of tickets, to and from New York, $5, provided five hundred are sold. The Board do not wish to take upon themselves the responsibility of guaranteeing that this number will be sold, (although they confidently expect a much larger number,) but recommend that the different Lodges send the names of the members who will attend, together with the money for the tickets, to the Grand Secretary, who will deliver them on the 25th inst., provided five hundred are sold, or return the money. It is necessary that notice should be given on or previous to that time, in order that the different railroad companies may make arrangements for our accommodation. This should be borne in mind by those of our brethren who may desire to attend.—[Yankee Blade.

THE WAY TO KEEP UP AN INTEREST IN LODGE MEETINGS.—The experiment has been tried in several Lodges in this vicinity, with complete success, to keep an interest in the weekly meetings, when the usual business of the Order was unimportant, and readily disposed of. It is this: to introduce suitable subjects for discussion, something after the manner of Lyceum and Debating Societies. In these discussions, almost every member will have something to say, and thus confidence will be inspired, native talent elicited, and intellectual and moral worth be secured. We believe that the association of Odd-Fellowship may and will be instrumental in promoting an elevation of character superior to any other institution extant. The Order is still in its infancy, and has not yet developed one half of its resources in aid of humanitarian principles or enlightened progress. One of the means to attain this great object, and certainly one of the most feasible to extend the limits of the Order, is an introduction to all the Lodges of social discussions after the manner alluded to. We think it would be well, after having disposed of all necessary business, to doff the peculiar characteristics of Odd-Fellowship, and extend general invitations to the neighborhood of the Lodges to attend and listen to the debates therein conducted. This course would have a tendency to dissipate many of the foolish prejudices which exist against Odd-Fellowship, and to attract the respectful regards of many worthy young men, who might thereby be induced to become members and ornaments to our glorious institution. The subject to which we have thus briefly alluded, is one of importance; and we trust it will be duly considered by the brothers, and our suggestions be received, as they are honestly intended, "for the good of the Order."—[Boston Odd-Fellow.

TOMB OF NAPOLEON, PARIS.—An immense circular crypt has been dug beneath the dome; within which, on three shafts of green marble, a sarcophagus containing the emperor's coffin will repose. A block of porphyry is destined to cover the sarcophagus. A lower gallery, paved in mosaics, and lined with marble bas-reliefs, representing the principal events in the emperor's life, will admit the public to circulate about the sarcophagus. Twelve colossal statues, in white marble, of which six are already placed, will sustain an upper gallery, whence it may be looked down on and its details examined from above. These allegorical statues represent the principal branches of human activity, science, legislation, war, arts, &c. An altar of black marble, veined with white, rises in front of the tomb. Four large columns, also of black and white marble, support the canopy of carved and gilt wood. Ten steps, each cut from a single block of Carrara marble, lead up to the funeral altar. Beneath this altar is the passage to the lower gallery above spoken of, whose entrance is guarded on either side by the tombs, in black marble, of Bertrand and Duroc, dead marshals keeping wait at the door of the imperial dead. The marbles employed in the construction of this tomb cost not less than £80,000 in the rough; the sculptures, and bas-reliefs, executed by Simart, cost £24,000. The extraction and carriage to Paris of the block of porphyry, for the covering of the sarcophagus, cost £5,600.

Good Humor.—Good humor is the clear, blue sky of the soul, on which every star of talent will shine more clearly, and the sun of genius encounter no vapors in his passage. It is the most exquisite beauty of a fine face—a redeeming grace in a homely one. It is like the green in the landscape—harmonizing with every color, mellowing the glories of the bright, and softening the hue of the dark; or, like a flute in a full concert of instruments, a sound not at first discovered by the ear, yet filling up the breaks in the concord with its soft melody.

Japan contains 30 to 35,000,000 of highly civilized people; Corea has 20,000,000; Cochin China 30,000,000; and Siam, 20,000,000; making in the whole 100,000,000 of highly civilized people, with whom Great Britain has no trade whatever, excepting a slight coasting trade to Siam.

CALIFORNIA SCENES.

We are under obligations to Col. Doniphan for the following extract from a letter, addressed to him by Peter H. Burnett, Esq.:

BUTTER'S FORT, Upper California, Feb. 2, 1849.

COL. A. W. DONIPHAN: I am here at this point, having been attracted hither by the unlimited gold region of California. Men are here nearly crazy with the riches forced suddenly into their pockets. I have had some opportunity, in the course of my life, to study human nature; but the school here is upon a grander scale than you or I ever saw before. Perhaps a few anecdotes may illustrate the state of things, and afford you some amusement. An honest, close-fisted shoemaker, by the name of Spee, came from Oregon to California about a year ago. After the gold was discovered he went into the mines, and was soon making his hundred dollars a day. A quizzical, shrewd fellow from Philadelphia met him one day.

"Well, Mr. Spee, how do you get along?"

"First rate, sir. I would not be a Member of Congress with his eight dollars a day, nor the President of the United States. I can make more money than they."

"Well, Mr. Spee, I suppose you will make no more shoes."

Our shoemaker thought himself insulted, and indignantly replied: "No, not I. Let those make shoes who will, I make no more."

He is now a merchant, and deals in goods, wares and merchandise.

I was here during the Christmas holidays, and saw great numbers of young men who had never worn a cloth coat before, with at least $1000 worth of finery upon them. They were almost loaded down with trinkets. I saw one fellow dressed in a splendid suit of black, over which he wore a superb black cloth cloak; and instead of drawing his cloak around him to shelter him from the cold wind then blowing, he was careful to let it be unfurled, like a flag, to the passing breeze, that he might catch the admiring gaze of the passers-by. Another gay fellow, dressed equally as well, save the cloak, was strutting up and down before the door of a large tavern. In his right hand he held a large bell, and at short intervals he would stop and tingle his bell, as much as to say: "Look here! this is me." Another dandy went into a store and took out a fine silk handkerchief and commenced wiping the mud off his boots.

The merchant said: "You will spoil your handkerchief, sir."

"Oh, that's no difference, I have another. I wipe my boots with one and my nose with the other."

Some time during the last autumn a young man was at work in the mines, who had his heart set upon marriage. Whether he had courted the fair one, and she had refused his offer, or whether he had always considered himself too poor to take upon himself the support of a family, I do not know. At all events he had one day rolled aside, by means of levers and props, a large stone, under which there was a deposit of several hundred dollars of pure gold, in small pieces, the size of flax seed. The moment he cast his eye upon the shining treasure, he threw himself flat upon his back, in an ecstasy, among the rocks, clapped his hands, kicked up his heels, and exclaimed, "A married man, by gosh!" Colonel, you have been through Mexico, and elsewhere, but you never saw anything like the state of affairs here. The accounts you have seen of the gold region are not over-colored. About $25 per day is the amount of the produce of one hand. I was in the mine forty days, and was careful to make an accurate estimate. The gold is positively inexhaustible! One hundred millions will be taken out annually in the course of two years. Town lots at San Francisco are worth $10,000 for the best, and no title at that. —[Liberty, Mo., Tribune.]

NEWSPAPERS IN PARIS.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New-York Courier and Enquirer gives the following account of them:

In one respect, Paris remains unchanged, and it is to be feared unchangeable. Far down beneath its gay surface lies a mass black with ignorance, sweltering with fanaticism, and festering with vice, ready at any favorable moment to leave one mighty throng, and shiver society into its original elements. It would be a great mistake to suppose that anarchy, after its late terrible but abortive effort, collapsed into nothingness. It still exists, contracted somewhat in material extent, but venomous with yet intenser malignity. The Socialists still continue to propagate their doctrines, by means of the press and associations. Most of the papers that, like poisonous fungi produced in a night of darkness and tempest, sprung out of the bosom of the revolution, have disappeared; three, of sturdier growth, yet remain, La République, La République Démocratique et Sociale, and La Peuple. The first of these was founded the very day of the revolution, by the notorious Thore. It is conducted with little talent, and without system or guiding idea. It is a kind of Socialist omnibus, the vehicle of every atrocious and vile thing that crazed heads or rotten hearts can generate.

The second was established by Ledru Rollin, and is the recognized organ of the Montagne. Its editorial management displays a certain degree of talent, but its inspiration is rage, and its dialects execrations. It is wroth because Charles X and Louis Philippe were not guillotined; eulogizes St. Just and Robespierre as the disciples of truth and the champions of humanity; and compares the murderers of General Brea, in the presence of their judges, to Christ arraigned in his heavenly innocence before the wicked Pontius Pilate. La Peuple is much the most originally and ably edited paper of the three. Its presiding genius is the celebrated Proudhon. It deals little with cant or maudlin sentiment; it is stark mad, but there is method in its madness; its premises may be impudent or specious assumptions, but oft-times it reasons from them with tremendous force. Its language is condensed, trenchant, and not seldom full of terrible energy. I have uniformly noticed that in reading rooms and restaurants no paper is more in quest than La Peuple. This, of course, does not arise so much from the popularity as from the singularity of its doctrines, and the vigor with which it maintains them. It is at war with all the other Socialist sheets. Though it preaches that God is a fiction, and that Popery is theft, it styles Fourierism the greatest mystification of the age, and unsparingly derides the newly-fangled doctrines respecting "woman's rights." Scarcely a week passes that an edition of La Peuple is not seized by the civil authorities, on account of its violence; and Proudhon himself, though a member of the National Assembly, is now under penal prosecution for sedition, in recklessly assailing, through its columns, the character and motives of the President.

All these papers are published daily, and their extremely low price—respectively 18, 16, and 24 francs per annum—gives them a very extensive circulation. The Démocratique Pacifique, the only really Communist paper that existed before the revolution, ought not to be classed in the same category with the sheets above mentioned. It is the advocate of Fourierite doctrines, but it is contemplative in its cast, moderate in its tone, and at least semi-Christian in its character. Its editor, Victor Considerant, representative of the people, is a scholar and a gentleman, and is respected for his private worth wherever he is known. He was formerly an officer in the army, but his reflections having satisfied him that society is founded on a wrong basis, he relinquished his profession and devoted himself to the cause of social re-organization. He writes forcibly, and his ideas, erroneous as they doubtless are, bear the mark of having originated in a thoughtful and truthful-seeking spirit. The two old republican papers, Le National and La Reforme, and especially the latter, though far from being avowedly Socialist, coquette just enough of Socialism to propitiate its favor, and, when occasion demands, secure its co-operation.

LAST MOMENTS.—The manner in which remarkable persons have met the great enemy of mankind, would form a curious history. To contemplate the different moods and tempers with which frivolity and philosophy have met the king of terrors—whether the one has displayed great weakness, or the other sustained itself in the hour of its great change—to ascertain whether the bold recklessness of the profligate, who has through life scoffed at the dangers and perils of death, has accompanied his last moments—or whether the equanimity with which the good man has contemplated the change, while health seemed to place it at a distance, has deserted him in the hour of trial—would be a curious speculation, and form a great moral lesson to mankind.

Gallani, when dying, said: "The dead has sent me a card of invitation." Wood died clasping in his hand the papers of the Antenæ Oxoniensis. Here was the ruling passion strong in death. A Dane, condemned to death, thus addressed his executioner: "Be quick in cutting off my head, for we have often debated at Tomsburg whether any sense is retained after the head is off. I will grasp the knife in my hand; if, after my head is off, I strike it toward you, it will show that I have not lost all sense; if I let it drop, it will prove the contrary. Make haste, therefore, and end the dispute." George Leith, a Marshal of Scotland, when dying abroad, sent for Mr. Elliott, the British Envoy. "I have sent for you," said he with his usual gaiety, "because I think it pleasant enough that the minister of King George should receive the last breath of an old Jacobite. Besides, you may have some commissions to give me to Lord Chatham; and, as I lay my account for seeing him to-morrow or the day after, I will carry your dispatches with pleasure." James Butler, second Duke of Ormond—famed for his extraordinary politeness, and who died in Madrid, in 1795—when he was in the agony of death, fearing that the expression of his countenance in his pain might shock the friends standing by his bedside, said, as his last words: "Messieurs, j'espère que vous excuserez la grimace." ("Gentlemen, I hope that you will excuse the grimace.") Haller died feeling his own pulse, and when he found it almost gone, said to his physician: "My friend, the artery ceases to beat." Lord Cobham, (of whom Pope says his last words were, "Save my country, heaven!") not being able to carry a glass of jelly to his mouth, was in such a passion at feeling his own weakness, that he threw jelly and glass into Lady C's face, and expired.

There is a great difference between the power of giving good advice and the ability to act upon it. Theoretical wisdom is, perhaps, rarely associated with practical wisdom; and we often find that men of no talent whatever contrive to pass through life with credit and propriety, under the guidance of a kind of instinct. These are the persons who seem to stumble by mere good luck upon the philosopher's stone. In the commerce of life every thing they touch seems to turn into gold.

Fame has no necessary conjunction with praise; it may exist without the breath of a word. It is a recognition of excellence which must be felt, but need not be spoken. Even the envious must feel it, and hate it in silence.

Scientific and Useful.

A SINGULAR PHYSIOLOGICAL FACT.—The transference of vitality which appears to take place when young persons are habitually placed in contact with the aged, is not a nursery fiction. It is well attested by very competent authorities. "A not uncommon cause," observes Dr. James Copeland, "of depressed vital power, is the young sleeping with the aged. This fact, however explained, has been long remarked, and is well known to every unprejudiced observer. I have on several occasions met with the counterpart of the following case: 'I was, a few years ago, consulted about a pale, sickly, and thin boy, of about four or five years of age. He appeared to have no specific ailment, but there was a slow and remarkable decline of flesh and strength and of the energy of the functions; what his mother very aptly termed a gradual blight. After inquiry into the history of the case, it came out that he had been a very robust and plethoric child, up to his third year, when his grandmother, a very aged person, took him to sleep with her; that he soon afterward lost his good looks; and that he continued to decline progressively ever since, notwithstanding medical treatment. I directed him to sleep apart from the aged parent, and prescribed gentle tonics, change of air, &c. The recovery was rapid. But it is not in children only that debility is induced by this mode of abstracting vital power. Young females married to very old men suffer in a similar manner, although seldom to so great an extent; and instances have come to my knowledge where they have suspected the cause of this debilitated state. These facts are often well known to the aged themselves, who consider the indulgence favorable to longevity, and thereby illustrate the selfishness which, in some persons, increases with their years.' Every medical practitioner is well aware of the fact, and parents are generally advised not to allow their infants to sleep with aged persons."

COLORLESS INK.—While in the formation of an inkstand so much beauty is sometimes displayed, both in the form and the material, it is vexing to see, when it is put to its destined use, how soon it is soiled by the black liquid, and disfigured by the accumulation of dregs of dried ink. By saturating paper with one of the principal components of ink, and writing with the other, this is avoided. The inkstand then contains only a colorless fluid, and its beauty is, consequently, not injured; and if by any accident it is spilled, no material injury is done either to dress or furniture. This suggestion is made by a correspondent.

CAUTION.

THE Publishers of the "Gazette and Rule" beg leave to caution publishers, tradesmen and others, against the depredations of persons representing themselves as being connected with this paper. No person is allowed to receipt for advertisements or for business notices except at the publication office; nor will any notice or advertisement appear in the paper unless an arrangement is made at the office, or with the publishers personally.

CRAMPTON & CLARK.

TRAIN UP A CHILD IN THE WAY HE SHOULD GO.—

Under this title, an article appeared in the Gazette and Rule of April 14, censuring Prof. Tayler Lewis, and imputing to him the doctrine that filial disobedience ought, by our laws, to be punished with death. The language of Professor Lewis, upon which these strictures were based, he states to the publishers, was never used by him, nor indeed anything that should subject him to the imputation such an avowal would call forth. The effect and general bearing of the comments upon the language of Professor Lewis did not at the time meet the eye of the publishers, or they most certainly would have excluded them from their columns. The article has been copied by various papers, and we trust that Professor Lewis' disavowal will be accorded an equal circulation.

BROADWAY THEATER.—The gorgeous spectacle, in which Mr. Lester, Mr. Dyott, Fanny Wallack, and Mrs. Abbot appear, still continues to attract good houses at this place.

BURTON'S THEATER.—The novelties at this place are so varied, and succeed each other so rapidly, that we find it difficult to take note of them. It is enough to say that Burton, Brougham and Miss Chapman are always there.

AMERICAN MUSEUM.—Mr. Barnum, and his manager, Mr. Greenwood, have always something entertaining on the carpet, in the way of comedy, besides innumerable and indescribable curiosities, which are permanent fixtures, to say nothing of that Goliath of a pig!

A NEW AND BEAUTIFUL HOTEL IN NEW-YORK.—We are pleased to learn that our friend Sanderson, late of the Franklin House, Philadelphia, has taken the new and beautiful Hotel recently erected on the corner of Murray street and College Place. This house is one of the most elegant retreats in the city, and under the management of Mr. Sanderson must become one of our most popular Hotels. Our friends, who have ladies with them, should stop at this place when visiting New-York.

AN IRISHMAN'S VIEWS OF CALIFORNIA.

SACKRYMENTO DIGGINS, Oct. 20th, 1848.

TO TIM FLAHERTY: Arrah thin, Tim, as soon as you read this bit of a note come out at wonst. Rite forenenst me where I sit composing over this letter there's a fortune to be got for the mere sifting. The sands is all goold powther. Och! if you could only see how beautiful it shines in the sun. An' thin the depth of it. It goes clane down to the center ov the world. The mountains, Tim, has vains, and ivvery vain is full of circulatin' majum. Wouldn't you like to bleed them vains, ould boy? We've no horses here, 'cepting mules, and as soon as one ov the boys gets a load he puts it on the back ov the donkey and carries it to the ass sayers. The ass sayers, ye see, is the jintlemen as informs ye whether the goold's the rale stuff or only iron pitaties. You see there's a desavin' kind o' goold they call pitaties. It's an invenshun ov the ould sarpint, and iv yez put it in the fire it vanishes in a thick shmoke, wid an enfarnel smell ov sulfur. Heaven be about us!

It's a fine, healthy rejin, is the Sackrymento. There's no disase 'cept the shakin ager; an' the fits com on first rate whin there's any sifthing to be done. As soon as one o' the boys gets the shake on him he jist puts the sifther in his flats, and he'll make small fortin before the trimble's off ov him.

We're all rale demmocrats out here, Tim. While I'm writin' ov this letter on the side-ov my hat—bad luck to the crown there's to it—I can see one ov the captins ov the New York melisha, washin' the goold in the Sackrymento, with hardly a rag on him, savin' your presence. Even the mishinaries dig like bogthrotters all the week, and deliver mighty improvin' discourses to the haythen on the unrighteousness of mammon on a Sunday. The Injins is incensed in this way wid the sinfulness of riches, and sells it chape to save their souls.

Remember me to Biddy, the darlin', an' tell her, if she'll put on the jacket and trousers, she can make hapes of money here, for she knows how to use a spade, an' it's easier diggin' goold than cuttin' turf in Kilkenny. But she'd better not be after comin' in her natural duds, for the site ov a petty-coat might breed a 'ruccion in the sittlement.

Intendin' to address you agin shortly, on the state of picayunary affairs in this country,

I remain yer affeckahynit coozen,

TERRENSE MAHONY.

MY FIRST LOVE.

AH! well I remember the day—nay, the hour, I first fell in love. 'Twas not in a bower, Where flowers lay strewn for a carpet to walk on, And stars with a significant luster to talk on Shone bright; nor the moon with its modesty beaming,

To polish our sighs, and assist us in dreaming. No sensitive zephyr that courted seclusion, Nor one friendly shadow to hide our confusion; No gales that came spicy as from the Atlantic, Nor waterfalls rush'd with their cadence romantic; No nightingale's love-song, nor screech-owl to frighten, Nor any one thing Cupid seemed to delight in.

'Twas in a room, with a fire—and a clothes-horse before it, And the steam rose in volumes, you would not have borne it;

I heartily wish'd for a plan to dispense it, But somehow or other, love seem'd to condense it; For seated beside was a girl like a fairy, With large eyes of blue, and the dear name of Mary.

I soon fell in love, though I'd ne'er before seen her,

And swore at the steam that seemed rising to screen her;

I wonder'd how Cupid—that precious young dog—he,

Could manage to aim when the air was so foggy; But soon I discovered that he can, in all weathers, Hit fair—for his arrow sank up to the feathers.

Some time has elapsed since the scene I've narrated

Occurred, and my love's in some measure abated; Yet oft, in the fanciful light of my taper, I see blue-eyed Mary enshrouded in vapor.

PROSPECTUS.

GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE.

THE ORGAN OF THE ORDER,

Published under the auspices of the M. W. Grand Sire!

Vol. XI, commencing July 7, 1849.

It will contain, from week to week, the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of the State of New-York, and also of other States; accounts of Celebrations, Institutions of new Lodges, and occasionally, a complete Directory of all the Lodges in the Union.

Its Literary department will be filled with Original Tales of the highest excellence, prepared by the most eminent writers in our country—Popular Tales; Choice Miscellany; the rarest Gems of Poetry from the English Poets; Sketches of Travel; Anecdotes, &c., &c.; and occasionally illustrated with beautiful Wood Engravings. Being equal in its Literary character to any Weekly in the country, and being thus perfect in its Odd-Fellowship department, it will be worthy of a place on the table of every brother of the Order.

The Gazette and Rule is published every Saturday, at 44 Ann-street, New-York.

TERMS.—To Mail Subscribers, TWO DOLLARS A YEAR in advance, invariably. Address

CRAMPTON & CLARK, Publishers,
No 44 Ann-st. New York.

Any paper copying the above prospectus, and calling attention to it editorially, will, on sending a marked paper, be placed on our exchange list.

CRAMPTON & CLARK.

Special Notices.

BUSINESS NOTICE.

Agents without objection, are requested to forward their reports immediately, in order that we may credit subscribers promptly and prevent confusion in our accounts. Send the report if only a dollar has been collected.

To subscribers we would again say, do not wait for an agent, but remit direct. Postmasters are allowed to frank your letters to publishers, and are always ready to do so. We prefer remittances direct from subscribers, and hope they will act accordingly.

TRAVELING AGENTS.—We shall be under the necessity of relinquishing the services of all traveling agents who do not make weekly returns. The names of all who do not follow this plan (without which the books of the office cannot be correctly kept) will be stricken from our published list of agents.

Subscribers are hereby notified not to pay money to an agent whose name is not in the paper. To our readers we would again say, do not depend upon agents, but remit to the office of the Gazette and Rule direct.

TO CLUBS.—Any person obtaining the names of five new Subscribers, and sending us Ten Dollars, shall receive a sixth copy gratis for one year. Upon all subscriptions over five, the person sending the names and money may retain fifty cents as his commission. Payments invariably in advance.

Postmasters are authorized to remit money to Publishers, and all money mailed in presence of the Postmaster, and duly forwarded by him, is at our risk.

In all cases where postage on subscriptions is not paid, it will be deducted from the amount credited to those who send it.

LIST OF TRAVELING AGENTS.

BRO. ALONZO WELTON,	BRO. ISAAC H. RUSS,
WM. H. FAIRCHILD,	PERRY E. TOLES,
SAMUEL H. BARRETT.	L. W. ALDRICH,
HORACE LAMB.	AARON PIERSON.

CHARLES H. HARRISON, who has been acting as our Agent, having made no returns to us, and being, as we are informed, unworthy of such trust, we deem it necessary to caution all against paying him any subscriptions on account of the Gazette and Golden Rule. His former character having been good, we forbear further remarks at this time.

REMITTANCES.—We hope our friends will bear in mind that the approaching celebration will afford great facilities for the settlement of accounts, and that none will fail to remember us, in the form of a remittance, by any brother who may visit New-York.

MARRIAGES.

May 23, in Oneonta, N. Y., by Rev. D. Elliot, Bro. D. J. YAGER, of Butternut Valley Lodge No. 264, and Miss EMOGENE T., daughter of Elisha Shepherd, Esq., all of Oneonta.

In Lawrence, Van Buren county, Mich., on the 12th inst., by the Rev. Bro. J. L. Marvin, Bro. HENRY C. CLAPP, of Pawpaw Lodge No. 18, to Miss RUTH WORDEN, of Lawrence.

GOURAUD'S LIBRARY OF ROMANOE. JULIA WRIGHT—CANTO XII.

Then Sab etasche, concerning Julia's dowry,
Outspoke—his moustache curling with emotion;
He said "her fortune was to him no more
Than drops of water added to the ocean!
Indeed, he'd rather, if he had the power,
(And thus to Julia prove his soul's devotion.)
Shower it, Danse-like, in golden rain,
Or scatter it, as farmer's scatter grain!"

Our Cornet's protestations must be received with a grain of allowance—indeed, we do not think there was a grain of truth in them. Of this fact, however, we are certain—that GOURAUD'S ITALIAN MEDICATED SOAP will positively make the darkest skin as white as alabaster; it will also remove Freckles, Pimples, Ringworm, Sallowness, Redness or Roughness. GOURAUD'S POUDES SUBTILES have acquired an astonishing celebrity for their powers in eradicating superfluous human hair. GOURAUD'S LIQUID ROUGE imparts the most delightful rosiness to pale cheeks or lips.

Take particular notice that Dr. FELIX GOURAUD'S renowned preparations can only be obtained genuine at his Depot, 67 Walker-st., first door FROM Broadway.

Office of the Grand Secretary Grand Lodge State of New-York:

ODD-FELLOW'S HALL, CITY OF NEW-YORK,
March 13, 1849.

To District Deputy Grand Masters, Officers of Lodges, and Brethren:

In consequence of the many complaints made to this Office of the failure of Deputies, Officers of Lodges and Members to receive communications which have been issued from this Office, and of the failure to receive many communications which have been intended to reach this Office, for several months last past, and which have been transmitted by Deputies, Lodges and individuals, you are therefore notified and requested to address all communications intended for the Grand Lodge, Grand Master, or Grand Secretary, to BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Box No. 838, Post Office, New-York, and in all cases to be particular that Letters and Documents are properly mailed, in order that a failure of papers intended for this, or sent from this Office, to reach their destination, may be traced to the proper cause.

Fraternally yours,

BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Grand Secretary.

EMMA'S RAVEN TRESSES.

"Bait, hook and hair are used by angle fish—Emma's bright hair alone is bait, hook and line."
I knew her when her hair was coarse, and intermixed with gray;

But by some magic influence 'twas changed within a day
To color dark and texture soft, and I've a slight suspicion
The talsman fair Emma used was BOLE'S HYPERION.

PROF. BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS, OR MEDICATED

COMPOUND,

FOR RESTORING, PRESERVING AND BEAUTIFY-
ING HAIR, ERADICATING SCUFF AND DAN-DRUFF, AND CURING DISEASES OF THE SKIN, GLANDS, AND MUSCLES, CUTS, STINGS, BRUISES, SPRAINS, &c. &c.

IN order to convince the public of the efficacy of any curative preparation, in the thinking and reflective age, it is necessary to explain the philosophy of its operation.
The process by which Professor Barry's Tricopherous produces such extraordinary results, cannot be understood without a brief notice of the structure and uses of the delicate substances to which it is applied, and in the condition of which it accomplishes the most salutary changes. The connexion between the hair and the skin is so close, that the one may be almost deemed a continuation of the other, and hence whatever renovates, restores, and nourishes the hair, must of necessity have a healthful influence upon the sensitive membrane in which its roots are fixed.

The skin, that wonderful envelop in which the sense of touch resides, consists of three layers; the EPIDERMIS or cuticle, a semi-opaque, or almost insensible film; the RETE MU-COSUM, which is a spongy membrane reticulated with nerves and blood-vessels, and forms a sort of shield to the exquisitely delicate TRUE SKIN; and the true skin itself, which constitutes the third layer of the triple envelop. In this tough, flexible and elastic integument, are located the nerves, blood-vessels, &c., which supply sustenance to the hair, and in the derangement of which diseases of the skin originate. The vessels of the true skin supply the sacs containing the roots of the hair with the moisture which sustains the fibres, and the same causes which affect the health of the hair, also affect the health of the skin. This is self-evident to the casual observer, as well as susceptible of demonstration by the anatomist and physiologist; for in all cutaneous diseases, the hair becomes dry and harsh, and falls out in such quantities as sometimes to render the patient partially or entirely bald.
Wounds, burns, &c., on the skin of the head, also produce baldness on the portions of the scalp where the injury has been inflicted, thus proving the close affinity and sympathy between the organism of the skin and the hair.

The wonderful restorative and remedial properties of Pre-fessor Barry's Tricopherous, are based upon this hypothesis, or rather this fact. It acts through the skin upon the hair, stimulating the inert vessels, opening the pores, imparting activity to the circulation, awakening from their lethargy all the vegetative functions which give life, vigor, and beauty to the fibres, extirpating every particle of scurf and dandruff, and soon clothing even the bald or half denuded head with a thick, glossy, silky, and elastic covering.

But this is only ONE of the uses of Professor Barry's Tricopherous. The same properties which restore vital and vegetative power the skin of the head are equally beneficial in all cutaneous diseases, or superficial injuries. For cuts, burns, bites of insects, sprains, erysipelas, blotches, pimples, scabies, ring-worm, rashes, scrofula, prickly heat, chilblains, chapped hands, rheumatism, burns, scalds, bruises, redness of the skin, and in short all the troublesome and painful external diseases and injuries which are so common in families, and which NOTHING BUT EXTERNAL REMEDIES CAN REMOVE, the Tricopherous will be found a speedy, safe, and unfailing cure.
By virtue of its double claim as a renovator and beautifier of nature's choicest ornament, and a potent and invaluable remedial agent, it is entitled to a place on every toilet, and in every medicine chest.

Sold in large bottles, price 25 cents, at the principal office, 139 Broadway, and by druggists and perfumers generally throughout the United States and Canada. 256

WRIGHT'S INDIAN PILLS

For Purifying the Blood, and for the Cure of
SCROFULA, RHEUMATISM, STURBORN ULCERS, CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS, LIVER COMPLAINT, BRONCHITIS, SALT RHEUM, CONSUMPTION, FEMALE COMPLAINTS, LOSS OF APPETITE, GENERAL DEBILITY, &c.

THE PROPRIETORS having spent much time in bringing this preparation of Sarsaparilla to its present state of perfection; and the experience of fourteen years has furnished them the most ample opportunity to study, in their various forms, the diseases for which it is recommended, and to adapt it exactly to their relief and cure. Patients who wish a really good Medicine are invited to give it a trial, and satisfy themselves of its superiority, and the invaluable property it possesses of arresting and curing disease. The bottle has been enlarged to hold one Quart, and in its present improved form may safely claim to be the best and cheapest me-dine of the age. Its progress to the fame it has attained may be traced by a long line of facts and cures, that stand as landmarks and beacons for the invalid, pointing the way to the haven of health; and what it has already done for the thousands who have used it, it is capable of doing for the millions still suffering and struggling with disease. It purifies, cleanses, and strengthens the fountain springs of life, and infuses new vigor throughout the whole animal frame.

DYSPEPSY CURED.

The following testimonial, from a gentleman so well known as Mr. Cox, requires no comment, and recommends itself to all similarly afflicted: NEW-ORLEANS, Dec. 18, 1848.

Messrs. A. B. & D. SANDS—Gentlemen: Having experienced the most beneficial effects from the use of your Sarsaparilla, it gives me pleasure to add my testimony to the numerous spontaneous effusions of grateful hearts which you continually are receiving.

My case was dyspeptic, or rather I may term it a weakness of the digestive organs. For more than a year, I was troubled with wind upon my stomach and its frequent eructation, together with producing a spasmodic contraction of the heart, often gave me much annoyance. After trying various remedies without avail, I commenced with your Sarsaparilla. Before I had used half a bottle, almost every symptom of this disagreeable complaint had vanished, and in a few weeks its continued use effected a complete cure. I therefore confidently recommend it to all persons affected in the same manner, and have reason to believe that many who are suffering under a supposed disease of the heart, if they would take your Sarsaparilla, in a few weeks would find themselves restored to health in both mind and body. I remain yours, very truly,
JOHN V. COX, 93 Lexington Avenue.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA IN PRUSSIA.

The Proprietors of this valuable Medicine have just received an order from our esteemed friend and correspondent, Theodore S. Fay, Secretary of Legation to the Court of Prussia, for the use of a member of the Royal Family—a copy of which we herewith lay before our readers.—[Horn Journal.
"U. S. LEGATION, BERLIN, Nov. 30, 1848.—Gentlemen: I wish you to send two dozen bottles of your Sarsaparilla, for the use of his Royal Highness Prince Walldimir of Prussia, to this Legation, as soon as possible. It is necessary that he should receive it immediately; therefore, please send it by first steamer. The bill can be made out in the name of the Prince, and sent with it. Your obedient servant,

"THEO. S. FAY."

SCROFULOUS AFFECTION OF THE EYES.
South Kingston, (R. I.) Oct. 11, 1847.—Messrs. SANDS—Gentlemen: My little daughter, when one year old, was attacked with a scrofulous humor on her face, which soon after extended into her eyes, causing almost total blindness in one of them, and disfiguring her whole face. I employed two physicians to attend her, who exhausted their utmost skill to give her relief, but it all proved useless, and finally one of them remarked to me that he had known of some striking cures effected by Sands' Sarsaparilla, and advised me to try it. I obtained one bottle, which she commenced using, and before it was all used up it had effected an entire cure. It is now over four years since she was cured, and there has been no reappearance of the disease, and we are satisfied that it is a perfect cure. It gives me great pleasure to add that I can recommend it to any sufferer from a similar complaint.

Respectfully yours, GEORGE ROBINSON.

OLD DOCTOR JACOB TOWNSEND, THE ORIGINAL DISCOVERER OF THE GENUINE TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA

Old Dr. Townsend is now about 70 years of age, and has long been known as the AUTHOR and DISCOVERER of the GENUINE ORIGINAL TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA. Being poor, he was compelled to limit his manufacture to such extent as he could keep out of market, and the sales circumscribed to those only who had proved its worth and knew its value. It had reached the ears of many, nevertheless, as those persons who had been healed of some disease, and saved from death, proclaimed its excellence and wonderful HEALING POWER. This is manufactured on the largest scale, and is called for throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Unlike young S. P. Townsend's, it improves with age, and never changes, but for the better; because it is prepared on scientific principles by a scientific man. The highest knowledge of Chemistry, and the latest discoveries of the Art, have all been brought into requisition in the manufacture of the OLD DR. TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA. The Sarsaparilla root, it is well known, has medicinal properties, many medicinal properties, and some properties which are inert or useless; and others, which, if retained in preparing it for use, produce fermentation and acid, which is injurious to the system. Some of the properties of Sarsaparilla are so volatile, that they entirely evaporate and are lost in the preparation, if they are not preserved by a scientific process known to those experienced in its manufacture. Moreover, these volatile principles, which fly off in vapor, or as an exhalation, under heat, are the very essential medicinal properties of the root, which give it all its value. The

GENUINE
Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's Sarsaparilla

is so prepared, that all the inert properties of the Sarsaparilla root are first removed, every thing capable of becoming acid or of fermentation, is extracted and rejected; then every particle of medicinal virtue is secured in a pure and concentrated form; and thus it is rendered incapable of losing any of its valuable and healing properties. Prepared in this way, it is made the most powerful agent in the

Cure of Innumerable Diseases.

Hence the reason why he has commendations on every side in its favor by men, women, and children. We find it doing wonders in the cure of CONSUMPTION, DYSPEPSIA, and LIVER COMPLAINT, and in RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA and PILES, COSTIVENESS, all CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, and all affections arising from

Impurity of the Blood.
 It possesses a marvellous efficacy in all complaints arising from indigestion, from Acidity of the Stomach, from unequal circulation, determination of blood to the head, palpitation of the heart, cold feet and cold hands, cold limbs and hot flashes over the body. It has not had its equal in coughs and colds; and promotes any expectoration, and gentle perspiration, relaxing structure of the lungs, throat, and every other part. But in nothing is its excellence more manifestly seen and acknowledged than in all kinds and stages of

Female Complaints.

It works wonders in cases of fluor albus or whites, Falling of the Womb, Obstructed, Suppressed, or Painful Menstruation, irregularity of the menstrual periods, and the like; and is effectual in curing all forms of the Kidney Disease.

By removing obstructions, and regulating the general system, it gives tone and strength to the whole body, and cures all forms of

Nervous Diseases and Debility,

and thus prevents or relieves a great variety of other diseases, as Spinal Irritation, Neuritis, St. Vitus Dance, Swooning, Epileptic Fits, Convulsions, &c.

It is not possible for this medicine to fail to do good; it has nothing in it which can ever harm; it can never sour or spoil, and therefore, can never lose its curative properties. It cleanses the blood, excites the liver to healthy action, tones the stomach, and gives good digestion, relieves the bowels of torpor and constipation, always infuses the blood, equalizes the circulation of the blood, producing gentle warmth equally all over the body, and the insensible perspiration; relaxes all strictures and tightness, removes all obstructions, and invigorates the entire nervous system. Is not this, then,

The Medicine you Pre-eminently Need?

But can any of these things be said of S. P. Townsend's inferior article? This young man's liquid is not to be

Compared with the Old Dr.'s,

because of one GRAND FACT, that the one is INCAPABLE OF DETE-RIORATION and

Never Spoils,

while the other DOES; it sours, ferments, and blows the bottles containing it into fragments; the sour, acid liquid exploding, and damaging other goods; Must not this horrible compound be poisonous to the system? action, tones the stomach, and gives good digestion, relieves the bowels of torpor and constipation, always infuses the blood, equalizes the circulation of the blood, producing gentle warmth equally all over the body, and the insensible perspiration; relaxes all strictures and tightness, removes all obstructions, and invigorates the entire nervous system. THE MOUNTAIN BROOK.

BY DR. GEO. F. REEVES BAKER.

SWEET little brook! I come once more,
To look upon thy silver face;
The windings of whose pebbled shore
My early childhood loved to trace,
Till in the far sequester'd vale,
Where rocks a beauteous cascade made,
I drank the mountain breezes hale
In the thick forest's ample shade.

But oh! how chang'd, since youth's fair prime
In budding gladness joyed to greet,
Gay mountain brook! thy mellow chime,
Thy banks the spring then rob'd so sweet.
The rose when the bland summer came
Perfum'd at morn', each passing breeze,
And spread as thou' in glowing flame
To the bright sun its shining leaves.

No vestige now that marks the place
Where twice ten years ago it stood;
And vainly still, I strive to trace
The oaks that crown'd the ancient wood;
All, all are changed, save thee, fair stream!
E'en I am chang'd in all things too,
Since first I hail'd the sunny gleam
That gives thy breast its glossy hue.

But thou art still the same sweet brook,
And still the same thy sparkling breast,
As when the forest eagle shook,
First o'er thy marge his haughty crest—
The brawny hunter cross'd thy banks,
Where panther still'd his startling scream;
From thy low brim the bison drank,
At summer eve, thou lovely stream.

Age after age had seen thee glide,
In all thy pristine beauty drest;
And lightly to thy glassy tide,
The tall green pine its image prest,
The young pappoose that rang'd thy shore
Sprang into manhood, and its strength,
Time spread his locks with whiteness o'er,
And still'd him in the grave at length.

The batt'ling warrior's bow was strung,
The proud of fight were gather'd then,
Till high above the green hills rung
The mingled groans of dying men—
Time moved apace, the city shone
Bright with temple, spire, and tower,
And earth, with prostrate forests strown,
Serenely smil'd upon the hour.

And still perpetual youth, fair stream,
Was thine those changes vast among,
As brightly still each sunny gleam
Is o'er thy dimpling eddies sung.
Years alter not thy childhood's glee,
Of joys are thine an endless train,
And thousands yet of years to be,
Shall listen to thy merry strain.

Original American Romance.

THE BRAVO'S DAUGHTER; OR, THE TORY OF CAROLINA. *

A Romance of the American Revolution.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY AUGUSTINE J. H. DUGANNE.

Yet the bravo was not rash—he had throughout his life mingled craft with boldness; but his passions suddenly roused, were always for the time ungovernable. In the present case, however, he knew that he had many obstacles to contend against—that Atree would not scruple, as he believed, to destroy him, and that the tory possessed power to thwart, if warned in time, all that might be attempted against his projects. He resolved therefore to lurk around Laurelwood, till the departure of Atree and his company, and then to pursue them, until opportunity should enable him to effect the rescue of his daughter, and deliver her abductor once more into his power.

The hours passed on, and the anxious bravo had seen but two persons pass on the road from Laurelwood, and these he had readily recognized as the English Captain and his attendant, doubtless on their way, according to the preconcerted plan with Atree, to rejoin their troop, and waylay the traveling-party of the tory, for the purpose of arresting Arnoult and his fair companion.

"That's a villainous business, I'll wager," muttered the bravo to himself—"but its nothing to me. I've my own affairs to think of. So let Captain Wemyss run off with the merchant's child—I care not. But—the fiend knows I'd rather my right hand were off, than that River's blood was on it!"

The wretch covered his face with his hands, and rocked to and fro, torn with remorseful thoughts.

Noontime came and went by, and still nought else approached from Laurelwood House. The bravo wondered much at not beholding the departure of Arnoult and his daughter, as was their evident intention the previous night; and he almost fancied that Atree had committed some new crime to detain them; more especially as he well-knew the designs which the tory had at one time entertained in regard to the unfortunate Louise.

But Orrall erred in supposing that ought evil had happened to the tory's guests. It had been their intention, it is true, to depart from Laurelwood at an early hour in the morning; but Robert Atree, who had recovered from the excitement of the night, presented, in company with Captain Wemyss, his respects to the merchant and his child, and begged the favor of their stay for at least one day at Laurelwood. This he was induced to do from several reasons; the principal of which was his knowledge that the Bravo Orrall now knew the abode of Alice, and would spare no means of obtaining possession of his child. Under these circumstances, he resolved not to leave Laurelwood, save under the escort of Captain Wemyss's troop, which would be sufficient to prevent any overt act of the watchful Orrall, until he should be beyond his reach. With this view, Robert Atree concluded to enter into the designs of the British officer, and co-operate with him in Arnoult's arrest, in order to gain in return his protection in prosecuting his journey with Alice and his slave, from Laurelwood. This it was which had detained the merchant and his daughter at the mansion, and Captain Wemyss had left to rejoin his troop, and make preparations for the treacherous adventure.

Matthew Orrall knew not this, but nevertheless he watched still vigilantly in his ambush. Once only, as the sun began to decline on its western way, the bravo crept from his concealment, and stole cautiously toward the small river which skirted the grounds of Laurelwood, to refresh himself for a moment by a hasty ablution. But still, he kept his sharp glance fixed upon the woody avenue, and listened to every sound that broke the quiet of the summer forest.

Suddenly the man's attentive ears caught the not distant tread of horse's hoofs upon the woodland sward. He shrank cautiously back from the river's brink, and waited till the sounds approached the water, thinking that it was doubtless a detachment of the troop which Wemyss commanded, returning with their commander.

But, when the leaves parted on the opposite bank of the river, and Orrall caught a glimpse of the dozen stalwart horsemen, who reined up to let their steeds drink of the cool stream, he saw at once that they were not the crimson-coated and bedizened soldiers of King George, but motley garbed and rough in appearance as a band of prairie hunters. "Ha!" cried the bravo, as he glanced at the bronzed features of the leader of the party, who rode a stout bay mare—"I shall know that face. I have seen it before, though begrimed then with powder-smoke. 'Tis the Ranger JASPER."

It was indeed the brave Jasper, now once more a ranger in Marion's troop of "Swamp Foxes," who with a sort of a "roving commission," was now abroad upon one of his innumerable expeditions to annoy the British foe. Matthew Orrall, shrunk farther back into the shadow of the woods as he made this discovery, for he cared not to risk a rencontre with the band or a recognition by their redoubtable leader.

* Continued from page 343.

Nevertheless the view he had caught of these, as well as his previous knowledge of the vicinity of British soldiers, satisfied the bravo of the danger he should be in, if surprised by either; inasmuch as a capture, or compulsory detention at the present time, might have the effect of defeating all his wishes, and enabling Atree to succeed in whatever design he contemplated.

"I will use the craft of the rattle-snake," muttered Orrall, as he crept back to the road-side, "in order that I may preserve the venom likewise."

CHAPTER XVIII.

ORRALL'S SCHEMES.

"Thou villain! give me back my child!"

KING JOHN.

THE second morning after his arrival at Laurelwood House, Robert Atree, having made all things ready for his departure, stood upon the balcony with the merchant, Arnoult, and the young Louise, that widowed bride, whose heart's hopes he had withered so fearfully. At their side stood the young Captain Wemyss, busily engaged in paying his devoirs to the fair girl, against whom he meditated the worst treachery. Below were drawn up the red-coated troops, which Wemyss commanded for King George the Third, while two or three negroes were securing some trunks upon the footboard of a clumsy traveling carriage. The first rays of the sun gleamed over the tree tops, and from the valleys was wafted up a cloud of early perfume. It was a morning such as the good delight in, but which seldom wakes music in the hearts of the bad.

When the cortege left the great door of Laurelwood House, it was disposed as follows: At the head rode Robert Atree, Captain Wemyss, the merchant Arnoult, and his daughter. Then followed a half dozen troopers, accompanying the carriage, within which were Gottan, Filippa, and the blind girl, Alice. The rest of the troop brought up the rear. And thus passed on the cavalcade through the avenue, where crouched the bravo, Orrall, watching with strained gaze.

All the night he had watched. He had crept up to the balcony, and prowled about the house, listening to every sound. From weakness, weariness, want of rest, the man was well nigh prostrated; yet he lingered and watched, sustained alone by the thirst and hope for revenge.

When the cortege had passed his concealment, Orrall emerged from the hedge, and followed it, as it wound slowly down the avenue. His mind had no settled purpose; but a confused whirl of thoughts crossed his brain, without shadowing forth the means by which he might obtain his double object of revenge, and the recovery of Alice. At times he sprang suddenly forward, as if resolved to spring upon the tory, and strike the slave's stiletto to his heart: and then he would slacken his steps, and strive to mold his chaotic thoughts into some plan of action.

Thus, through the greater portion of the hot day, Matthew Orrall, weak, weary, and half famished, followed the troop in their journey.

It was near the close of another twilight that the cortege reached a point where, according to the opinion of Atree and Captain Wemyss, it was deemed unnecessary that the military escort should be continued; and the merchant Arnoult prepared to thank the Briton for his protection. And it was at this point, likewise, that Wemyss had laid his plans to arrest the merchant and his fair daughter, in the name of the good King George.

Mat Orrall, when he beheld the troop pause, at a spot where diverged two roads, divined easily, with his natural cunning, that the Briton intended to execute the design conceived in Laurelwood Hall. And with this impression on the bravo's mind came the sudden thought that now might be the time for his own action.

"Ay," muttered he, "there will be confusion; a melee, perchance. I will bide my time!"

The sun's rays now were slanting from the western horizon, and another sultry, quiet evening was approaching. The cortege had stopped at the cross-road, and Mat Orrall, watching intently from his position among the trees that skirted the highway, could notice that Captain Wemyss approached the merchant Arnoult, that Atree reined his horse, and looked against the traveling carriage, and that at the same instant the troopers who had escorted the carriage, closed in between Atree and the merchant, completely hemming in the contemplated victims.

"Wait, Mat Orrall," muttered the bravo to himself, his breath growing short, and his fingers clutching nervously the hilt of his dagger.

Thus Mat watched his enemies, but knew not that another eye was watching his own motions.

There was, about about a dozen yards back from the skirts of the road where the bravo crouched, a high bank, completely concealed and overgrown with the wild parasites of the woods. This bank was cloven by a wide fissure, over which drooped the branches of a knotty tree, depending nearly to the ground, and affording a perfect covert to a horse and his rider, whose figures, motionless as marble, were there wrapped in the deepening shadows.

The steed was of stout proportions; and the rider, clad in a dark costume, appeared of almost colossal size amid the gloom. But, though rigid and statue-like they seemed, the concealed rider and his horse would have been recognized in broad daylight by any one of the red-coated Britons in the road, as the gallant partisan Jasper and his bonny bay mare. It was indeed JASPER, who now, having left his small troop at some distance in the rear, was abroad upon one of those single handed expeditions, which had already made him dreaded by every tory upon the borders. With his trained mare, which seemed almost to have imbibed the brave sergeant's nature, Jasper would venture alone upon the most perilous adventures, reconnoitering the enemy's positions, penetrating their camps, and carrying off prisoners from the very midst of their army.

Jasper had, in watching the course of the cortege, caught a sight of the solitary bravo, as he stealthily pursued it; and he had at once recognized the features of the dark volunteer of Fort Moultrie. With this recognition came the thought of the fate of Captain Rivers; and the indefinable feeling which had before aroused the sergeant's mind, that this man had been connected in some way with the young captain's disappearance.

"I will not lose sight of this villain-face, till I learn more," said Jasper to himself.

And with this determination he had followed in the bravo's trail till the troop paused in the place we have designated; and then, when Orrall concealed himself, Jasper also ensconced himself and his steed in the secure hiding place which we have described, and which had been speedily discovered by one so well versed in woodcraft as the gallant sergeant. From this retreat the partisan now overlooked the motions of both Orrall and the British soldiers in the road.

Captain Wemyss, as we have seen, had approached the merchant Arnoult, and at this moment was speaking to him in a low voice. What he said could be heard neither by Orrall nor Jasper, but it was sufficient to make the merchant start, and suddenly grasp his daughter's bridle.

"Mr. Atree, we are betrayed!" suddenly cried aloud the duped Arnoult.

But Atree, moving not from his position, coolly watched the movements of the Britons.

"No harm is meant," then spoke Captain Wemyss, "but in the king's name I direct you to accompany me."

The merchant had seized the head of his daughter's horse. He now sank his spurs deep into the flanks of his own steed, and the two mettled animals sprang away together, and were some rods in advance of the troop before the British officer could recover his startled faculties.

"Away, men, away!" he shouted, and drawing his sword he dashed after the fugitives.

The whole affair had passed in the space of one moment, and the next the entire troop of soldiers were clattering down the road, in full pursuit.

Sergeant Jasper had readily understood the aspect of affairs, as soon as he beheld the movement of the merchant's hand to his companion's bridle. But so closely had been the flight and pursuit followed, that almost immediately the soldiers disappeared, and nothing remained in the road but Robert Atree, and the occupants of the carriage. A cloud of dust rolled back and enveloped even them.

The fugitives had taken the right of the two roads which diverged at this point, and were almost instantly hidden from view. Atree stooped a moment from his saddle, addressed a few words to Gottan, and then spurring his own horse, set off to gain the bend of the road, in order to obtain a glance at the pursuing soldiers, while the carriage remained stationary, in charge of the negro driver. Thus the females were left for a few minutes alone, as it were, and the watchful bravo did not fail to perceive it. He grasped the stiletto with a firmer clutch, and noiselessly parting the underwood, crept stealthily toward the carriage.

The twilight was now deepening, and from his covert Jasper could scarcely distinguish the figures in the road. He saw, however, that the bravo had left his hiding place. Orrall reached the side of the coach. The negro driver was gazing from his seat in the direction his master had taken, and Gottan was leaning from the opposite side to that which the bravo approached. Suddenly the quadroom Filippa uttered a piercing shriek, and the next moment the carriage door was thrown open, and the blind girl was in the grasp of her father. Alice struggled, and strove to cry out.

But no power on earth could at that moment have wrested his child from the bravo's arms. He dragged her through the narrow doorway, he strained her wildly to his breast; and murmuring "Alice, Alice! I have thee!" that strange man sprang back into the increasing shade.

Filippa's shriek had been borne on the still air to the ears of her master, and Robert Atree, with a sudden pang shooting through his brain, turned his horse's head, and galloped back. At the same moment, too, the partisan Jasper dashed from his concealment into the road, and placing a whistle to his mouth blew several shrill and bird-like notes.

For an instant the clatter of horse's hoofs, the shrill whistle, and the shrieks of Gottan and Filippa mingled wildly together. Then the tory dashed by the carriage in the direction taken by the bravo. A single glance had sufficed to discover the absence of the blind girl, and another had revealed to him the bravo's path, by fragments of Alice's white robe clinging to the underwood, through which her father had dragged her.

Robert Atree dashed into the wood that skirted the road. They were not dense, though bordered with underwood, and the tory found little difficulty in making his way some distance from the road.

In the meantime, Orrall, straining Alice in his arms, rushed through the wood with furious speed, the girl lying fainting upon his neck. He left the road behind, and gained a smooth patch of level sward, beyond which, at the foot of a shelving bank, ran the broad and quiet river. As he neared this spot, a confused sound in the direction he was progressing, arrested his footsteps. He listened anxiously, then crept cautiously forward, and strained his eyes to pierce the darkening haze. The sounds he had heard grew louder; they were shouts and curses, and clatter of horse's feet. Matthew Orrall drew nearer to the shelving bank, whence he could behold the river.

He could distinguish upon the opposite side a number of horsemen, whom, by their red coats, he recognized at once as Wemyss's troop. They seemed to have missed the fugitives, and to be evidently at fault. It was apparent that Arnoult and his daughter, in their flight, had left the road and struck out into the open country, and that at the river their pursuers had lost trail.

The bravo glanced but a moment upon this scene, and then he turned and fearfully looked upon the face of his child. It was ghastly pale and cold as the grave. The blind girl lay like one dead in her father's arms. Mat Orrall stooped and laid her gently upon the sward. Then, plunging down the bank, he scooped some water in the hollow of his hat, and turned again toward his child.

At this moment his gaze was riveted by an agitation of the river's surface, and presently he could distinguish, through the gray mist, the forms of two horses and their riders, stemming the tide. Another glance revealed the figures of Arnoult and his daughter.

"Escaped!" muttered the bravo, as he rushed up the bank toward his daughter.

As he did so, the fugitives gained the shore, and at the same instant they were, it appeared, discovered from the opposite side; for a simultaneous plunge of a dozen horsemen into the river broke the quiet. But Orrall heeded not the sound, save to quicken his steps toward Alice, whom he reached and sprinkled with the cool water. The blind girl drew a deep sigh.

"Alice, Alice, my child! It is your father that speaks!" cried the wretched man.

"Father!" murmured the girl, clinging closely to his neck.

"We must away. They come!" cried Orrall, lifting her once more into his arms, as the sounds of the horses drew nearer.

But, as the bravo resumed his flight, the tramp of hoofs echoed in the path he was taking, and ere he could turn, the tory Atree dashed over the sward.

"Dog! villain!" cried Atree, spurring his horse full upon the bravo.

But Orrall laid his blind child upon the grass, and raising his dagger, leaped forward and seized the tory's rein. For an instant the fierce onset bent back the steed, till it reared aloft. Robert Atree held a pistol in his hand; his finger pressed the trigger; but he fired not. Perchance a thought that the bravo might yet be of service in his schemes, stayed the tory's hand.

The stiletto gleamed over Atree's head, and his arm was seized in the grasp of his foe. The horse reared and sprang aside, and the pistol exploded with a sharp crash. Then Orrall staggered, reeled, and fell upon the sward, with the blood gushing from his mouth. When the smoke cleared away, the tory beheld that new actors were added to the scene.

Climbing up the bank, dripping with water that had saturated their garments, appeared the forms of Arnoult and his daughter. Their steeds heaved and panted, but the riders urged them forward. Behind them, in close pursuit, pressed the red-coated troopers, with Wemyss at their head.

"We are lost—we cannot now escape!" murmured Arnoult, in a despairing voice.

"Courage, father—our horses will yet hold out," answered Louise, hurriedly.

Atree advanced in the path of the fugitives; but not before a loud shout echoed and re-echoed through the dim wood, and a band of stalwart horsemen came crashing through the gloom.

A glare of torchlight suddenly illumined the scene, cast by burning pine-knots in the hands of the new-comers, and immediately a cry ran through the line of red-coated troopers who had crossed the river. "They are Marion's men."

"Marion's men—hurrah! Charge on them, boys," rang the clear voice of Jasper, as, dashing forward, he struck the foremost Briton from his horse. "Make way for the Swamp-Foxes!"

The scene swam before the startled eyes of the young tory. Swords crossed and flashed, pistol-shots rang, and wild shouts arose, ere he could rein his horse from the path. The British troopers, taken completely by surprise, made little resistance, but turning their horses' head, fled precipitately along the river's bank. Arnoult and his daughter, almost terrified at their abrupt deliverance, dismounted, and knelt upon the sward. And over the flying Britons and the rescued whigs, the prostrate bravo and his insensible child, the pine-knot torches threw a sepulchral light.

Robert Atree dismounted also, and led his horse toward the merchant Arnoult—Louise was kneeling beside her father. Suddenly a groan from the throat of Matthew Orrall fell upon their ears. They turned and beheld the wounded man, and Louise Arnoult, rising hastily, approached him, at the instant that Robert Atree drew near to the group.

Orrall lay upon his back, with the blood flowing from a wound in his breast. He opened his eyes as Louise appeared, and recognized her countenance. And as he did so, the wretched bravo shrieked aloud, for his mind, stung to a terrible tension by his over-wrought feelings for the last two days, recalled, by the sight of Louise, the memory of the lost Rivers.

"Ha!" he shrieked, covering his face with his hands, "I killed him—'twas I."

"What says he?" asked Arnoult, anxiously.

"He raves, doubtless," returned the voice of Robert Atree.

"It is a lie," muttered Orrall, opening his eyes, and glaring on the tory. "I slew him. I—I murdered the gallant boy—the boy who saved my life. O, fiend! fiend!"

"It is the villain!" cried Jasper, who now, at the head of his victorious little band, drew rein beside the group. "What does he say?"

Arnoult bent over the apparently dying man.

"Speak!" cried the merchant. "Whom did you murder? Speak! his name."

"Alice! O, God! O, God!" raved the wretch, making a vain effort to rise, and well-nigh choking with the blood that filled his mouth.

"His name—the murdered man! Speak!" cried Arnoult.

"Rivers!" gasped the bravo, and fell back rigid and corpse-like upon the turf.

Louise heard that name, as she listened with beating heart. She heard it, and with a low moan fell into her father's arms. The mystery was cleared—but the golden bowl was broken.

The merchant Arnoult and his daughter, under the escort of Jasper and his small band, pursued their homeward journey. Robert Atree, likewise, having regained possession of his victim the blind girl, parted from the partisan serjeant without having awakened a suspicion of his treachery in the gallant soldier's mind. But when a couple of the Americans, by Jasper's orders, returned to bury the corpse of the bravo, they found it no longer on the green sward. Robert Atree had taken charge of his enemy, and for reasons which future chapters will reveal.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE BRAVO AGAIN.

Twice foiled, but yet not vanquished. BUTLER.

MAT ORRALL the bravo was not dead. He awoke from the swoon into which he had fallen, to find himself in a comfortable bed in one of the antique rooms of Laurelwood House. His wound had been dressed and bandaged, and beside the bed on which he lay, sat a withered old black. The wounded man, as he opened his eyes, and cast his gaze upon the strange guardian of his sleep, could not at first comprehend his situation. But gradually the events which had transpired presented themselves before his memory—his concealment, his meeting with Atree, and the sudden blow which had foiled his purpose. The bravo strove to speak, but the old negro's hand was immediately placed upon his mouth; he started from his pillow, but the attendant's arm restrained him, and a sudden gush of blood from his bandaged wound forced him back again exhausted.

More than a swoon had Mat Orrall gone through since his attack. For a whole week the wretched man had raved with fever. It was from the sleep which had been the crisis of life or death, that the bravo now awoke, feeble as a young child.

And a week longer elapsed ere he could rise from that bed, and question his sable attendant. During all the time, he saw none other than the black, who watched faithfully, and answered all his wants. That week was an agonizing one to the bravo. Strange dreams continually haunted him, but uppermost of all was that one terrible thought, of the unknown fate of his child Alice. He had gathered from the few words which the old negro answered to his many questions, that Robert Atree had left the mansion, with several servants. But more the black either could not or would not communicate. The bravo gnashed his teeth in impatient fury, at every baffling reply of his attendant; but he soon found that it had not been the design of Atree that he should die, and he resolved that he would not retard his own recovery by unavailing efforts to learn what the future alone could unfold.

The objects of the tory were now to Orrall a complete mystery, in which the fate of his daughter was involved. He resolved to devote all his energies to the unravelment of Atree's schemes.

When, after the lapse of a fortnight, the bravo was able to leave his bed and his chamber, and reach the balcony, a letter from Robert Atree was placed in his hands. It was as follows:

"MAT ORRALL:

"Give up your useless opposition to my plans, which when I have accomplished their success, will be for your own and your daughter's good. Had I wished, you would have perished on this occasion; but I do not war with you. I seek the welfare of Alice.

"You will receive every attention from Frank, my steward, who has also considerable skill in the healing art. When you recover, go or stay. In two years from this time, I will meet you at Laurelwood.

"Till then, Mat, you shall know nothing of your daughter, or ATREE."

The bravo read this missive with his brow darkening fearfully, and his lip wearing a demon smile. When he had finished the perusal, he folded it carefully, and placed it in his pocket. "We shall see, Master Atree—we shall see!" muttered Mat Orrall.

CHAPTER XX.

PARIS.

The Babel of the world, where life Hath thousand tongues, and every tongue a crime. COTTON.

At the porte-cochere of a Hotel in the Rue Tournan; Paris, at the close of an autumnal day in 1778, a fiacre was standing, evidently waiting for some person within the mansion. The driver was walking up and down before the porter's lodge, beating his boots with the handle of his whip, and whistling in a low key, a favorite Parisian air. While thus engaged, he was accosted by a man clad in rather shabby habiliments, who spoke French with the accent of a foreigner.

"You are waiting for your fare?" inquired the stranger.

"You are mistaken—I am waiting for my passengers," answered the driver.

"Who are two women and a gentleman," remarked the other.

"You seem to know all about it, monsieur," cried the driver.

"I am an old acquaintance of both, my friend, and take great interest in their movements. I know very well that you have brought the gentleman here many times before this."

"That is very true," said the coachman. "It is my business to drive where my passengers wish to go."

"Tell me, now, friend—who lives in this house?"

"Monsieur does not know everything, it seems. This Hotel belongs to Doctor Girardin, the great oculist."

"Hah!" muttered the stranger, drawing a long breath. "Then it is as I expected. Very well, monsieur le cocher, I thank you for your information. Here is something to get you a drink."

The coachman started with surprise, as his fingers closed on the broad gold piece which the stranger handed him: "Monsieur is too generous," he said—"Can I give any more information?"

"You shall have ten pieces like that, if you will obey my directions," answered the stranger.

"If monsieur will give his orders," said the coachman rubbing his hands.

"Very well, then. You shall first change garments with me."

"The coachman glanced at the shabby clothing which the other wore, but the gold piece which he still held in his hands decided for him.

"And what, then, monsieur?" asked he.

"I will take your place on the box, and drive the fiacre."

"And where shall I be?"

"Behind, or before, I care not," answered the stranger. "Only let me be the driver, and drive where I please."

"Monsieur shall have his way," answered the cocher, and immediately proceeded to divest himself of his driver's cape, coat, and slouched hat, which he exchanged for the threadbare jerkin and chapeau of the stranger. Scarcely was this metamorphosis completed, when the gate of the hotel was opened. The new coachman, grasped whip, and prepared to open the door, while the real driver of the fiacre concealed himself near the lodge.

From the porte-cochere came three persons—a young man, dressed in fashionable costume, and two women closely muffled. The pretended coachman held the carriage-door, while they entered the fiacre. Then he sprang upon the box, seized the reins, and drove off. The real cocher jumped upon the stand behind the coach.

The new driver seemed to know the streets perfectly. He lashed his horses to the top of their speed, and turned the narrow corners, and threaded the narrow passages with the skill of one accustomed to the whip. At last, the fiacre turned into a quarter of Paris known as the oldest and least reputable portion of the city. It was now quite dark.

The street was one of those gloomy and deserted-looking avenues which border on the water, and are occupied in general by extremely suspicious, if not criminal characters. It was called the Rue Morgue, and its ominous title was sufficiently descriptive of its appearance. The carriage stopped at the entrance of a dark arched passage-way and, and the driver, throwing the reins upon the horses, jumped with alacrity from the box.

The real cocher sprang from his seat behind. "Monsieur, monsieur," cried he—"do you know where we are?"

"Perfectly well," whispered the other. "Here is your fare—ten bright pieces of gold. Are you satisfied?"

"But will monsieur explain? What am I to do?" asked the cocher, taking the money, with trembling hands, as he looked fearfully around the gloomy locality.

"Take your seat upon the box again," cried the stranger. "Quick! up with you! I will take care of your passengers. As soon as they are upon the pavement, do you drive off at your utmost speed."

The cocher mounted to his seat, and seized the reins. At the same time, the other man opened the carriage door, and let down the steps. The young man first descended, and he was quickly followed by the two females.

"Off!" cried the stranger, slamming the coach door fast; and at the word, the treacherous cocher whipped his horses, and the fiacre rolled away. The young man, who had, meantime, cast his eyes about him, now discovered that the place was strange to him, and uttered a sudden exclamation. "Garçon!" he cried to the fugitive coachman; "stop! come back!"

But at that moment, the man who had held the coach door, whistled in a shrill key; and immediately, from the covered passage-way, sprang three men. Before the betrayed young man, or his female companions could utter a word, or make the slightest resistance, they were seized, overpowered, and muffled, by the daring ruffians, and dragged through the gloomy archway.

The bribed cocher stopped his horses as soon as he had reached the end of the dark Rue Morgue, and leaning back, listened to hear the sound of a struggle, or of a voice calling for help. But no noise broke the death-like stillness of the dead street.

"This is a queer piece of business," soliloquized the driver. "I warrant there's a pretty piece of devilry going on. I have earned eleven broad pieces by it, however—very nearly three hundred francs, which is a small fortune for a poor cocher. Now, parbleu, I will to the commissaire, and direct them to send some gens d'armes to the Rue Morgue. Thus, I will wash my hands of the business, and pocket the eleven broad pieces."

With this resolve, the cocher whipped his horses again, and drove away from the Rue Morgue, whistling his favorite air. We will return to the other persons of our chapter.

TO BE CONTINUED.

BUSINESS is like fishing; if you wish to succeed, you must anchor once in a while. To be constantly changing is to be yourself out of change for all eternity. Men that are always stirring must be spoons.

A WAG observes that the reason ladies make the best theatrical managers is, probably, because a woman is obliged to be so much more careful than a man in choosing the company she keeps.

THE ARROW AND THE SONG.

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

I SHOT an arrow into the air,
It fell to earth, I knew not where;
For, so swiftly it flew, the sight
Could not follow it in its flight.

I breathed a song into the air,
It fell to earth, I knew not where;
For who has sight so keen and strong
That it can follow the flight of song?

Long, long afterward, in an oak
I found the arrow, still unbroke;
And the song, from beginning to end,
I found again in the heart of a friend.

THE POISONED VIAL.

It was a winter's night of piercing coldness in Amsterdam. The rich banker, Brounker, sat near his stove smoking a long pipe; opposite him was his intimate friend Van Grote, who also on his side sent out enormous volumes of smoke. Madame Brounker and her children were gone to a masked ball; so the two friends, sure of not being interrupted, conversed confidentially.

"What can be the reason," said Grote to Brounker, "that you will not consent to the marriage of your daughter with the son of Birkenrode?"

"My dear fellow, I do not oppose the match; it is my wife who will not hear of it."

"But what reason can she have to refuse her consent?"

"I cannot tell you," answered Brounker, lowered his voice.

"A mystery!" exclaimed Grote. "Come, you know how discreet I am; let me know all about it."

"But will you promise to be secret?"

"Do you wish me to swear it?"

"Well! It is now six-and-twenty years since I was married, and I frankly confess to you that I was excessively jealous of my wife. My position obliged me to see a great deal of company at home, and I feared that some of my numerous visitors, would rob me of my Clotilda's affections; one of these particularly, the gallant Colonel Birkenrode, caused me the greatest fear, inasmuch as he passed, in general, for a most accomplished lady-killer. I could not deny him access to my house, as he belonged to a very powerful family, neither had any thing in his conduct given me reason to do so.

"At the time I speak of, I bought this house, where I previously had constructed in secret, behind this stove, a narrow closet, from which I could hear all that passed in this room, where my wife received her visitors. For a long time Birkenrode contented himself with depicting in the most vivid colors the passion which consumed him; my wife listened without making any answer. At last one day, he became more impatient than before, and threatened to blow his brains out before her eyes, if she would not show a little more pity. Greatly distressed at this proof of love, Clotilda burst into tears.

"But I am not at liberty," exclaimed she, in a voice interrupted by sobs.

"And if your liberty were restored to you?" urged the Lothario.

"Sir!" said my wife.

"If you become a widow," insisted he, "swear to give me your hand."

"To this proposition my wife answered only with her tears, and he left her much distressed.

"We both passed the night a prey to the most violent agitation; preserving, however, a prudent silence on the events of the day.

"The next morning an extraordinary occurrence greatly increased the agitation of Clotilda. During breakfast a servant came and whispered in my ear that the cook wished to speak to me privately.

"Let him come in," said I; "I have no secrets from my wife." The cook came as pale as death; and, with a long face, he told me that he had that morning received a packet containing three hundred florins, a small phial, and a note, telling him to put the contents of the phial into the first eel pastry he made. (You well know my extreme fondness for eels, while my wife cannot even bear the smell of them.) He was promised even a greater recompense if he faithfully executed the commission. Fearing some treachery, he had hastened to give me the vial, and the three hundred florins. I immediately put a few drops of the liquid contained in the vial on a lump of sugar, and gave it to my wife's little dog. The poor little animal was in an instant taken with violent convulsions, and expired in a few moments, in the most cruel tortures. There was now no doubt that the intention was to destroy me. At the sight of the dying animal Clotilda had thrown herself into my arms, shedding a torrent of tears. "Poison! an assassin!" exclaimed she, clasping me tightly, as if to protect me from some peril which menaced me; "merciful Heaven, have pity on us!" I consoled her by saying that, on the contrary, I ought to be very thankful to the unknown enemy, who had proved to me the great affection which my wife possessed for me. The same day Birkenrode came as usual, but Clotilda refused to see him, and wrote to him to say that she would confess all to her husband, if ever he dared to show himself again. Having uselessly tried to calm her anger, he resolved at last to marry; and since that our families have had no communication, except that my son has fallen in love with his daughter; and although I have given my consent, my wife opposes it."

"She is right," indignantly exclaimed Van Grote, "I never should have thought Birkenrode capable of such a vile action."

"Ha, ha, ha!" said Brounker, bursting with laughter. "Do you, then too, accuse him?"

"Who, then, could it be, if he was not the culprit?"

"It was myself, my dear fellow; the adventure cost me 300 florins, which I gave to my cook. It was rather dear; but at the same time I got rid of a dangerous rival, and a lap-dog which I equally detested—ha, ha, ha!"

"In your case, I should confess all to my wife," said Van Grote. "The action was a very cruel one; it is very wrong to allow any one to rest under the imputation of being capable of poisoning a fellow-creature; besides, are you not bartering the happiness of your son?"

"Well, perhaps I am; but how shall I undeceive my wife?"

At this moment the door opened, and Madame Brounker entered the room.

"I thought you were at the ball, Clotilda," said her husband.

"No; I do not feel very well, and am going to bed. Maurice has accompanied his sisters. I have brought you a key, which I found on your desk; and as it does not seem to belong to any of the locks in the house, some friend of yours must have left it behind him."

Brounker, deeply blushing, took the key. He had recognised it.

"My dear," said Clotilda "I have given Maurice my consent to his marriage with the daughter of Mr. Birkenrode."

"Thanks, dear wife," said Brounker; "that is good news."

"Mr. Grote," said she, "pray remain, and sup with my husband to-night; we have an excellent eel patty in the larder, which, I assure you, does not contain the slightest portion of poison!"

At these words she retired. Hardly was the door closed, when Van Grote said to Brounker:

"You are properly caught in your own net. He that diggeth a pit for his enemy often falls into it himself."

"That may be," said Brounker; "but I assure you, my dear fellow, I do not in the least regret the loss of my wife's lap dog."

ANECDOTE OF JOHN HOWARD.—During his stay at Vienna, Howard was introduced to the Queen of Hungary, and had the honor of dining with her on some public occasion, when the nobles of her court and the foreign ambassadors were her guests. A circumstance also occurred at Vienna, which strongly evinces his love for truth and the fearlessness of his character in speaking it, at all times and in all companies. Dining one day at the table of Sir Robert Murray Keith, the English Ambassador at the Austrian Court, the conversation turned upon the torture, when a German gentleman observed that the glory of abolishing it in his own dominions, belonged to his Imperial Majesty.

"Pardon me," said Mr. Howard, "His Imperial Majesty has only abolished one specie of torture, to establish in its place another more cruel; for the torture which he abolished lasted at most but a few hours; but that which he has appointed lasts many weeks, nay sometimes years. The poor wretches are plunged into a noisome dungeon, as bad as the black-hole at Calcutta, from which they are taken only if they confess what is laid to their charge."

"Hush!" said the Ambassador, "your words will be reported to his Majesty."

"What?" replied he, "shall this tongue of mine be tied from speaking truth by any King or Emperor in the world? I repeat what I asserted, and maintain its veracity."

Deep silence ensued, and every one present admired the intrepid boldness of the man of humanity.

A Poetic Romance.

THE SACKING OF SEVILLE.

A BALLAD.

["In September, 844, a band of Norse sea-rovers, after plundering the coasts from the Tagus to the Guadalquivir, sailed up the latter river and attacked Seville, which they soon made themselves masters of, the inhabitants having fled, on their approach, to Carmona, and the Moorish troops making but a feeble resistance. On learning this unexpected event, Abderahman II sent a flotilla, with fresh troops, down the river, from Cordova, and a sanguinary conflict took place between the sectaries of Odin and Mahomet, presenting, no doubt, one of the most singular scenes recorded in history. . . . No decided advantage appears to have been gained by either party; we only know that the sea-rovers redescended the Guadalquivir unmolested, carrying with them the spoils of the city, and a great number of captives, among whom we may picture many a weeping damsel, who, amidst the frozen regions of the North, would long sigh in vain for the sunny plains and vine-clad hills of Andalusia. This appears to have been the first time that the Moors came into contact with the Northmen, whom they took for a people of magicians.—See Depping, 'Histoire des Expéd. Maritimes des Normands,' liv. ii., chap. 2."—Blackwell's "Mallet's Northern Antiquities," note, p. 178.

"As early as 827," says Geijer, "Gallicia was visited by the Northmen. In 847, they besieged Seville, harried the whole country around Cadiz, and defeated the Moorish king, Abderraman, in three battles. In 859, they plundered the Spanish coasts, invaded Mauritania, laid waste the Balearic Islands, proceeded as far as Greece, and only returned at the end of three years. In the same year, the Northmen came to Spain in sixty ships, ravaged the African shores, wintered in Spain, and returned home in spring." About the same time, they sailed to Italy, with the intention of plundering Rome; but being driven by a storm to the city of Luni in Etruria, they sacked it, and retired when they discovered their mistake.—Geijer's "Chronicles of Sweden," part i.]

The Sacking of Seville.

A. D. 844.

Down the river Guadalquivir
Norsemen's galleys swiftly went,
And their singing, rudely ringing,
Thus with Moorish mourning blent.

"Set the sail, and
Out to sea;
For old Norway
Bound are we.
Mount the benches,
Man your oars;
Plunging proud each
Dragon* roars."

"For thy pleasant shores we mourn,
Mourn and weep, O River!
Far from thee, for aye, we're borne,
Golden Guadalquivir!"

"From Heimskringle†
Farthest fells,
Shooting southward
Came our shells;
Left its lofty Hills behind,
Rushed impatient
'Fore the wind."

"Thro' the sunny land of Spain,
Lovingly, O River!
Roll'st thou onward to the main,
Golden Guadalquivir!"

"Through the foaming
Seas we dash:
Hear with joy Ther's
Taunders crash.
Let the peasant
Plow the lea;
We sea-rovers
Plow the sea."

"Past Cordova's stately walls
Roll'st thou, O River!
Proudly 'mid Seville's halls,
Golden Guadalquivir!"

"Bearded grain the
Peasant reaps:

* Dragons, shells, sea-horses, favorite epithets for ships among the Norsemen.
† "The Crown of Earth"—the North.

Bearded men we Lay in heaps.
Loudly sounds the Sturdy flail:
Louder clashes
Mace on mail."

"What thou lov'st, day by day,
In thine arms, O River!
Lieth smiling, and for aye!
Golden Guadalquivir!"

"Dull the peasant's
Life doth flow,
Till to Hela's*
Realm he go.
Glad and free the Viking† falls:
Mounts aloft to Odin's halls."

"Sire or lover hast thou none,
Hast no husband, River!—
Husband lost as soon as won,
Golden Guadalquivir!"

"North in Gandvik‡
Mead we've quaffed,
O'er Sicilian
Wines we've laughed.
Hjaltland§ bears our Heroes' name:
Wastes of Orkney||
Tell their fame."

"Ever flowing, never flown,
From thy loved ones, River!
Parting grief thou ne'er hast known,
Golden Guadalquivir!"

"Sudureyar¶
Own our sway;
Isle of Man and Anglesey.
Oft we've harried
Neustria's shores,
Now we plunder
Blue-skinned†† Moors!"

While thus rowing down the flowing
Guadalquivir's golden tide,
Loudly voicing their rejoicing,
Ever higher rose their pride.

"Erin's mothers long may wail
Many a bloody slaughter:
England's fathers mourn in vain
Many a blooming daughter.

"In our Norway halls they bide,
Wives to us sea-rovers:
Blithe are they and mourn no more
English sires or lovers.

"Now Norranic songs they sing,
Praises of old Sea-kings—
Train a sturdy troop of boys
To the life of Vikings.

"We from Spain now hasten back,
Richly booty-laden;
Gold, and arms, and jewels; ay!
And many a Moorish maiden!

"Gold and pearls our wives shall deck,
Silks, with silver shining;
Our young Norsemen, they shall keep Moorish maids from pining!

"Spanish wine instead of mead
Trusty friends shall gladden,
When with black-eyed maids our youth
Hold their Northern wedding.

"Necklaces of gems we'll throw
To each buxom daughter;
'Mong the white-haired Northern Skalds
Moorish gold we'll scatter.

"Guadalquivir! fare-thee-well!
Fare-thee-well, Sevilla!
Soon our dragons reach the main;
Cleave the briny billow!"

While thus chaunting, loudly vaunting
Deeds of blood on many a shore,
Louder ever, down the river,
Moslem shouts the breezes bore.

"Row, Moslem, bend ye strongly, unto your oars
this day;
The Infidel hath robbed your halls, the craven flees away:
He dares not bide the arms of those who own dread
Allah's power;
Then bend you stoutly, Moslemites! o'ertake the dastard Giaour!"

Now, Norsemen! for your booty strike!
Bear down upon the foemen!"

"On, Islam! for your ravaged gold! on for your jewels rare!
On for the maids the Infidel to slavery doth bear!
Fear not the powers of darkness these fell enchanters wield,
To Allah's and his Prophet's name, all evil powers must yield!"

Foemen's greeting at their meeting
Passed between the foes that day,
Falchions flashing, corselets crashing,
Told the fierceness of the fray.

"See the dark-eyed Houris beckon,
With seducing half-closed eyes;
Now advancing, now retiring
To the gates of Paradise!

"See! they come! our hearts are filled, as
With the potency of wine,
When thro' black-fringed clouds outflashing
Eyes like suns upon us shine!

"Now retire they!—in our bosom
Sinks our heart as sinks the sea;
Ebb and flows with ceaseless motion—
Ceaseless as their motions be."

"Hark! hark! the brazen car of Thor,
From Thrudvang's† halls downrolling;
He comes to aid his chosen sons,
Upon the Thunderer calling!

"On Bifrost‡ chaunting heroes' praise,
Sits Bragé, harper olden,
And Saga§ graves in deathless runes,
Their deeds on tablets golden.

"Above the Moors the raven flaps
His broad black wing, ill-boding:

To lead us up to Odin."

"See the Houris' green scarfs waving,
And their perfumed floating hair,
And their breasts, like full moons rising
Thro' the purple love-drunk air.

"Drunk with love, and steeped in music,
Come the breezes to our ears,
And halfway to Aden ravished
Is the blissful soul that hears.

"Troops on troops, they come to lead us
To the bowers of Paradise:
We come! we come! On! on! ye Faithful!
Aden's bliss is his who dies!

"Swift along Al Sirat's¶ ridge,
By the Prophet guided,
Shall we sweep aloft to bliss,
For the Saints provided.

"O'er the opal-gleaming walls

"Down with the faithless robber-hounds, Ye worshippers of Allah!"
Strike! crush the swarthy Mussulmen!
Ye children of Valhalla!††

"Forth from Valhalla's five hundred gates
Each morn shall ride the Kemper,‡‡
And on each other's helms shall prove Their warbrands' keenest temper.

"And, raised again by Shieldmaids fair,
The slain, once more returning,
Restored to life, in Odin's hall
Carouse anew till morning.

"Each day anew, Saehrimnir's flesh
Shall yield a feast unfailing,
Whilst round the hall, with horns of mead,
Valkyrior are sailing.

"—Huzzah! they yield! their galleys sink!
The Bluemen now are reeling!
Down, down they go, beneath the flood,
'Mid shouts of terror pealing!"

"For thy pleasant shores we mourn,
Mourn and weep, O River!

THE BELLE OF BARBADOES.

BY JOHN WILSON ROSS.

THE family of Maxwell, during their residence in Barbadoes, were as well known as any on that island. No other enjoyed a reputation more general for hospitality and social qualities, or one better established for respectability and station. Mrs. Maxwell, who was a widow, was neither rich nor poor, but she had enough to satisfy any reasonable desires. The greatest attraction at the Fancy, the name of the estate of her eldest son, and on which she resided, was her niece, Marianne Bruce. It is said by travelers that the women in Greece and Georgia are beautiful, but I can testify, from personal observation, that in Barbadoes and the other West India Islands they are lovely; and Marianne Bruce was the loveliest of her sweet Creole race. She had delicate features, an elegant shape, a majestic walk—which is natural to women of warm climates. The exact symmetry of her fascinating form was displayed through the thinness of her dress, which also gave an air of greater freedom to her motions; and this, joined with the carelessness of her actions, served more successfully to arouse those voluptuous desires which are ever awake. She had large black eyes, expressive at once of the greatest languor and the greatest vivacity. But her chief charm was her look; in it tenderness and gaiety were happily mingled. This beautiful and amiable girl was much admired by the young men of the island; and many were the bad verses written in praise of her charms, by amorous merchants and poetical planters. Her favorite lover was a young lawyer, who had recently come out to the West Indies to settle as a barrister; and though Marianne loved him, there seemed but little chance of their immediate marriage; for Edward Clarence, as the young lawyer was named, had absolutely nothing, and the girl he was in love with was equally destitute of the gifts of fortune. Clarence, besides, knew no science beyond that of the lawyer; and as the litigants in Barbadoes, like litigants in most other parts of the world, look with contempt upon a younger counsel, Clarence could make but just enough to provide for his own wants, after paying the expenses of a small wooden house among some cocoa-nut trees, on the bay near Bridgetown. However, he exerted himself ardently, stimulated by the hope of seeing better days, and anticipating with all the sanguine confidence of youth, the attainment of his wishes in the possession of Marianne Bruce.

Such was the state of his affections when there arrived in Barbadoes a young man of property. Marianne's first cousin, George Maxwell. Maxwell had not seen his cousin since they were children. He had gone to England, when a boy, to receive his education at one of the principal public schools, and then at the University of Oxford; and, on returning to his native island, he found that his cousin had bloomed into a beautiful woman, when, fascinated by her charms, he made love to her. But his cousin's smiles were not capricious. She could not shift her favors from a rival whose merit was his worth, to another, whose endowments were the more glittering prizes of life. Wealth, and not even honors, fame or power, for her had any particular charms. She—valuable woman!—refused the hand of her rich cousin. Maxwell, nettled at the repulse, left the Fancy, and went to reside at his house in Bridgetown.

Accident there threw him in the way of Edward Clarence, who had been hitherto unknown to him.

Accident had also supplied them with congenial dispositions; and they both immediately showed a predilection to each other.

Some time after this acquaintance, Clarence succeeded an uncle who had property in Nevis; and his revenue being augmented, he resolved to go to that island, and be an industrious cultivator of sugar-canes, and take Marianne with him as his wife.

Until this period, Maxwell was in blissful ignorance that Clarence was his successful rival for the hand of his cousin. It was first made known to him by his favorite negro, Loue, who was a young Creole like himself, had grown up with him, was of the same age, and had now become his vizier; and like a prime minister, sometimes attempted to keep his impetuous young master in order, a somewhat difficult task.

"I can tell you, sir, who lub Miss Marianne," said Loue to him, one day.

"Who?" cried Maxwell, quickly.

"Mister Nedward Clarence."

"How do you know that, Loue?"

"Becas I seed a sight that mak's me spec' some-thin' of that kind. 'Twas when I went to de Fancy, larst week, on de day when you says to me, 'You mus' tak' de hoss, Loue, and go to my mudder wid dis letter, and come back afore de evenin'; as I shall be sure to respect you.' Well, I wish massa good bye for de present, and tak's de hoss, and tells 'em at de Fancy, when I gets dere, what I comes dere for, and shows 'em de letter what massa gibs me.

'Now,' says I to myself, 'I habn't had a chaw dis mornin', and looks bery poorly, so I'll just step round to de kitchen, and eat and drink hearty, and den bid 'em all good bye.' So I was creeping along de hedge softly, when turning round a corner—Patience me! dere was a sight! Mister Nedward and Miss Marianne gotten both togeder alone on a bench. 'You tell me, Marianne,' says Mister Nedward, 'dat I looks poorly. I hab cause. Lub for you is doing it.' Den talking softly, he tak's her hand in his own, Miss Marianne all the while looking up in his face, and smiling with a tender igspreshum. Whistling myself all de while to mak' 'em both believe I nieder 'spect nor hear nuffin', and, in course, sees nuffin'. I goes back to de house, tinkin' how Mister Nedward hab tak' de exbarntage of you."

Maxwell knit his dark brows, and an angry expression gathered on his countenance and in his jet-black eyes. He cast his glance toward the window—rain was falling—the wet season had just set in.

"Would," he muttered audibly to himself, "that Clarence would catch some morbid affection, that would baffle the skill of all the faculty!"

"Lord! what a debbil of a wish, sir!" exclaimed Loue, with an expression of mingled surprise and horror.

At this moment Clarence came walking into the room, his face lighted up with extraordinary animation.

"Give me joy, my dear Maxwell," said he; "give me joy. Monday last was the happiest day I ever spent. I then wrung from Marianne the promise that the day which witnesses my return from Nevis shall also make her my bride. But," he continued, with an altered tone, "how is this? You do not answer me?"

Maxwell turned aside in silence, and looked through the window.

"How is this, Maxwell? How is it, my dear friend? Do you not approve of my marriage?"

"You should have told me of this marriage before," said Maxwell, ungraciously. "I do not, and cannot congratulate you, for I love Marianne Bruce myself!"

"Is it so? Alas!"

Clarence was truly concerned at this discovery, for Maxwell seemed to wish to discontinue their friendship. On returning home he sat down to contemplate what step he should take. Remembering that he had become intimate, through Maxwell, with a gentleman in the Commissariat-office, named Heywood, he went to him and made known the state of affairs between his friend and himself, and begged Heywood to say some civil things with regard to him to Maxwell, to bring about a reconciliation, when he should some day find his friend in a proper humor.

"I will make you both happy in a short time," said Heywood, gaily; "and set about it this afternoon. The weather is fine; come, let us take a ride together."

On their way from Austin's Town (where Heywood lived) to Bridgetown, they met Maxwell near Mount Charity.

Now Heywood was one of the wits of Barbadoes—in many respects extremely clever; and he had about him that sort of buffoonry which made him a delightful companion. You could not be with him and not feel the heart grow light and free.

And in this manner he rattled away in his usual gay and jovial manner till Maxwell laughed and was merry; and from first refusing his invitation—because Clarence was of the party—to accompany him home and dine with him, he finally accepted it. As they were passing by the barracks at St. Ann's, nearly opposite to Needham's Point, they met a black fisherman, in a nankeen dress and a broad-rim white hat, coming along the road with a basket filled to profusion with the natives of the deep. Heywood stopped him. The black man thereupon placed his basket on the ground, and making three ceremonious bows, said, at leisure and with civility:

"Marrow, massa; and you, too, massa, marrow; and you, arlso, massa, marrow; marrow, arl 'ree."

"What have you got in your fish basket this afternoon, Kookoo?" said Heywood.

"Me got doctors, massa, and me got old wives, cobblers, Welshmen, yellow-bellies, ballahoes, parrot-fish, and bollockbiters—bery good fis', massa—bery good eatin' with sarlt butter and a quart of cool drink arter."

Heywood, who was fond of fish, bought a ballahoo and a yellow-belly, and sent Kookoo with them to his house, with orders that they were to be dressed for his dinner.

They all three, that day, ate and drank plentifully of the fish and the cool drink, which beverage is made by fermenting a decoction of snake-root and other vegetable substances of a delsterious quality; and those who drink to excess of it are sometimes seized with the putrid fever, to which they not uncommonly fall victims. Maxwell, who filled himself to repletion with this liquor, felt feverish as he was riding home. All of a sudden he complained of a pain in his side; and, from his increasing faintness, he could scarcely articulate or draw his breath with ease. The heat of his body gradually increased; and, on his return home it was evident that he had caught the nervous fever. From the quantity of bile which had mingled with his blood, his skin was of a yellow hue, whence the fever is known more generally by the name of the yellow fever. The blood in this state is subject to putrefaction, and black spots break out here and there upon the body.

The doctor, on his arrival the next morning, found the pulse of his patient full and quick. Maxwell complained of a headache and burning thirst, and of pains in different parts of his body. There was a universal tremor in his limbs; a paleness all over his countenance; his skin was burning hot, and wrinkled in an astonishing degree, and without moisture; his tongue dry, and his brain delirious. In a few hours how he felt inwardly no one could tell, for he was incapable of speaking; but he seemed to be in great agony with oppressive respiration and anxiety.

The doctor, seeing him in this state, despaired of his recovery. He rang the bell, and Loue appeared. He wrote a letter to an uncle of his patient, who lived at Speight's, and gave it to Loue, who, saying that he would "tak' it," took the road toward the fishing town, and, after running through several streets in Bridgetown, was arrested at the outskirts of the capital, by a gentleman putting his head out of the window of an elegant house, and calling out to him:

"Where are you going to, Loue?"

"Beg pardon, sir, but no t'ink you call me. I'm just going to Speight's, taking a letter to Mr. MacSweeney, me massa's uncle, from the doctor. Me massa taken ill wid mullygrubs eberywhere, and bery likely, ebery momeat, to kickaraboo" (die.)

"How long has your master been ill?"

"Larst night, sir, he was takin' ill after he left Mister Heywood's, from de cooldrink he gotted dere."

"I have drank the cooldrink every day of my life since I have been here, Loue, and never felt any bad effects from it. However, I will just step over and see how your master is getting on."

Clarence took up his cane and his broad-rimmed hat and trudged to his quondam friend's. On entering the room, he found the window up to prevent perspiration in the patient, that he might have all the strength possible to resist the attack of the fever, which was now raging with great violence; and his skin was of a burning heat, literally burning. Clarence approached his bedside, and found him in a state of the most perfect debility and enervation, though he was the most robust man of his acquaintance, and though he had seen him only the night before in the most perfect health and strength. A spasm had taken place on his skin, and the doctor was giving him elixir of vitrol, as often and in as large quantities as his patient could take, to produce nausea, which being caused, the spasm was removing fast from the skin, and this was succeeded by a great and general perspiration. Maxwell, on recovering his voice, begged, as the weather was hot, and his bedroom close, to be taken out of bed and be carried into the adjoining apartment. This office was performed by Clarence. Maxwell, in being helped from his chamber to his sitting room, fainted away; when, being uncommonly heavy, he fell from the hold of Clarence, and rolled upon the floor, when Loue, who was walking close behind with a glass of bombo in his hand, stumbled over his master, crying out, "thousand debbils!" There was nobody present but Clarence and Loue. They got Maxwell up again and placed him in a chair. He came to himself, but complained of the cramp. His pulse was very weak; he had a cold perspiration, was chilly all over, and had a shrivelled skin. He looked like a dead man.

"Patience me! dere's a sight!" exclaimed Loue. "My massa never lib over dis!"

"I propose, Loue," said Clarence, "that we give your master some port wine. I can testify to its happy effect in removing this disorder. It cured a friend of mine."

They gave Maxwell port wine—first with bark, then alone. After that he began recovering rapidly. On being restored to his senses, and seeing Clarence by his bedside, he took him warmly by the hand, and in a thousand broken sentences, told him what extreme delight it gave him to see him so interested in his health and welfare, after what had passed between them.

The kind services rendered by Clarence to Maxwell, during the latter's illness, gave them an opportunity to renew their friendship.

A few days after, as they were walking together in the gardens behind Maxwell's house, that young man, who seemed in a good deal of confusion on the occasion, at length addressed his friend in these words:

"My dear Clarence, our thoughts and souls have been ever the same. Where then is the wonder that our inclinations should be so too? Your loving any object is sufficient, nay, it is the most compulsive of all reasons that I should love it too—"

"Oh! Maxwell—"

"Let me conjure you hear me with patience and with pity. You have taught me the value and the beauty of virtue; and I blush to think that I have nearly perished by the disease to which, in the violence of my passion for Marianne, I had wished you to fall a victim. Even now my equal passion urges me to make the trial of gaining the hand of Marianne; and as it is impossible for me to make you miserable at the expense of making even myself happy, I will, that I may not be guilty of taking any base advantage during your absence in Nevis, also leave the country."

A thousand various passions on this declaration filled the breast of Clarence: his heart was too full to let him speak; and he could not too much admire the generosity and heroism of his friend.

That same evening Maxwell sailed for Tobago; and at dawn next morning Clarence started on his voyage to Nevis. As Clarence's absence was to have extended to no more than two or three months at the farthest, his marriage with Marianne was deferred till he should be able to leave Barbadoes for good. The time that he was to be absent elapsed without his return; and, at the end of six months, Maxwell again landed at Bridgetown. His family not having corresponded with him during his absence, and not knowing where to direct to him, he immediately mounted his horse to ride to his mother's, where he expected that he should have to congratulate Marianne as the wife of his friend. On reaching the Fancy, he had entered the mangrove avenue, and was passing by a large shell bench, when he heard music proceeding from the house. It was a piano; and the notes, which were touched with a most rapturous effect, were accompanied by the voice, which, taking part in the feelings of the mind and the pathetic words of the song, faltered with every emotion of tenderness. Maxwell knew that this was his cousin Marianne; and the desire of possessing her haunted his heart with as strong a passion as ever. His first inquiry was after Clarence. Marianne replied that he had not returned, but that the family were in daily expectation of his arrival.

At this moment, two of Maxwell's younger brothers, saying that "Loue was coming," ran out of the room; and, as Loue was removing the big toes of his bare feet from between the leathers just above the stirrup, Mrs. Maxwell, making her appearance at the hall door, called out to him:

"Well, Loue, what is all the news?"

"A note for master, marm. Mr. Clarence comes home at last; for just now I meets upon de beach wid de captain of the sloop Nancy jus' from Nevis; and as he gibs me dis letter for master, (tak'ing it out of his handkerchy, where it was folded up nicely and flat,) I says to him, says I, 'Cap'n Primus,' says I, hab you nebber no news to tell a Christchearn, eh? Cap'n Primus? Perhaps you wish Mr. Clarence good-bye at Nevis; and leab him bery well.' 'I no leab him bery well,' says he, a grinning like a monkey; 'for he leab Nevis afore me, Mister Loue; but he didn't tak' de straight way for home, for when I gotted to Dominica, I found de William schooner at anchor dere, in de harbor of Cul de Sac Robert, and Mister Clarence ashore. Howsomebber, I tinks to find him here, for he leave Dominica de night afore me.'"

This was joyful news for Mrs. Maxwell, and particularly for Marianne; but, on reflection, their joy was blended with not a little anxiety; for it was toward the latter end of October, the worst part of the hurricane season, when no vessel can be considered safe at sea, as it is almost sure, if overtaken by a hurricane, of foundering, or of being driven on shore and lost.

Marianne and Maxwell rode out that afternoon to look if they could see any traces of the vessel; and, as they were riding on the highlands between Speight's and Bridgetown, they saw a schooner beating against the wind, and bearing down to Carlisle Bay; and they did not doubt but that this was the "William."

There had been light variable weather a few days before; this evening, however, there was a calm, but, strange to say, an extremely heavy swell at sea. Up the blue sky rolled the nearly full moon—three days within her full; the stars came out, and the fire-flies flitted among the trees and hedges. Suddenly from the south-western horizon there came rolling and tumbling over each other an immense pile of jet-black clouds. Maxwell saw it, and his cheek blanched.

"For goodness sake," said he, in a tone of excitement, "let us hasten home. We are going to have a hurricane."

They spurred their horses, and rode rapidly homeward. As they passed along the bay, they saw the sailors were striking their lower yards and topmasts, battening down their hatchways, and heaving anchor, in hurry and confusion, to run out to sea before the hurricane came on. On reaching home Maxwell had the windows and doors fastened close, and not a cranny left by which the wind might enter into the house.

In the middle of the night he was awoken by the most terrific noise. The wind was howling awfully, and, shrieking and whistling with a deafening noise, it was rushing through the air with inconceivable speed and tremendous power. It was overthrowing the walls of houses, tearing off the roofs, and projecting the heaviest materials to the greatest distances. Not the least alarming part of it were the strange phenomena accompanying it: rain fell in plashing torrents; there was no thunder, but a continual rumbling in the air; the ground trembled from earthquakes; and the heavens momentarily opened with lightning, not of the forked and darting kind, but in large sheets and steady blazes.

As might be expected, the sufferings by sea that night were great and many. The wind was too violent for ships to ride it out; many that pushed to sea perished by the mere violence of the weather, and a greater number were stranded.

By sunrise the next morning the weather was again settled. The wind, which had been blowing all night in the southerly, had gone round to its old course in the eastward; and the trade-wind was softly fanning the air. But the sea was still breaking with great violence on the shore.

Maxwell rode to Bridgetown to ascertain the news of the William schooner, when he heard that it had been wrecked on the rocks near Needham's Point, and that all on board her had perished. On reaching Needham's Point, he saw that a vessel had been wrecked there; and, while he was tarrying on the beach, an immense wave rolled to his feet a piece of the wrecked vessel, and left it there. It was one of the stern planks bearing the ship's name, "THE WILLIAM." At that moment Maxwell observed in the waves the figure of a man entangled in the spars of a ship. The heavy surf was rolling it and the spar over each other, driving them high upon the land, and tumbling them over the sharp rocks. With difficulty, Loue—who had accompanied Maxwell—disencumbered the body from the shrouds that were attached to the spar, and dragged it high upon the beach. The eye of the drowned person was glazed; his lips blue; his mouth distorted; and his legs and arms were stretched out and wide apart; his whole appearance indicating that he had perished in extreme convulsion and suffering.

"Patience me! dere's a sight!" exclaimed Loue. "Dere's Mr. Clarence's head, and dere's his arm, too; and dat's him—he gotted no nose—de rocks hab mash him, or massa jack shark hab had a snap at him."

Marianne was sitting on the soft cushions of a luxurious sofa near the open window, when Maxwell returned to the Fancy.

"Where is Clarence?" were the first words she uttered. "Have you heard any news of him? Speak, in mercy, speak."

"Compose yourself, Marianne—"

"Tell me at once—has the vessel been wrecked?"

"It has; and your lover is—"

"Drowned?"

"Even so."

Marianne pressed her hands together wildly; the next moment she fell back on the sofa in a death-like stupor. She was stretched, for several days, on the couch of lethargy and inaction. At length she rose from it only to lead the life of a recluse. It was the fourth evening after her recovery: the family were walking in the gardens and avenues; she was sitting alone with Maxwell in the hall (as the principal room in a house in the West Indies is generally called.)

"If I am so high in your esteem as I flatter myself," he said, "you will share happiness with me, and Heaven will have reserved for us both a blessing capable of alleviating even the severe sting of that we have lost."

At this allusion to Clarence's death, Marianne was absorbed in tears.

"Have no longer any thought of me," she said; "and let me give you this, my solemn vow, that no future passion shall ever have a place in my breast; that no greater offer shall influence me; and that even kings in vain would woo me."

"Be it with me as you determine," said Maxwell.

The hope of sometime possessing Marianne being now crushed for ever, and his passion being too great to be kept within bounds, Maxwell left Barbadoes, and, on his arrival in England, purchased a commission in a dragoon regiment, and, following the army to the Netherlands and the Peninsula, distinguished himself nobly in the late wars.

It was about a week after his departure; and, one evening, his mother and her young family, with Marianne, were seated under the porticoed gallery in front of the house at the Fancy. It was one of those sweet tropical nights that the inhabitants of cold climates do not know. The moon, hid behind a crest of tall palms, tinged every object with a uniform and soft splendor.

Harriet, a blue-eyed child, about ten years of age, ran and threw herself in her mother's arms.

"My dear mamma," said she, "you know how well pleased we all are, when, of an evening, you tell us some pretty story; how much delighted should we all be if you would tell us one now! Let it be of England. It is not late; the evening is mild, and none of us are much inclined to sleep."

The whole small family formed themselves in a semi-circle around their mother. The lady had taken on her knee her youngest child; the merry Harriet had seated herself at her feet, and recommended silence to her brothers and sisters, and with all attentive, Mrs. Maxwell had begun her story, when Harriet jumped up, crying out:

"Here comes Frederic, mamma; here comes Frederic!"

And a young man on horseback came trotting slowly down the avenue.

Without uttering a syllable or a sound, Marianne fell to the ground like a stone. The children ran cowering round their mother, crying out:

"Oh! mamma, a ghost; a ghost, mamma—the ghost of Mr. Edward Clarence!"

And Clarence came walking up the stone steps leading into the house before the astonished eyes of Mrs. Maxwell. It was no form which had passed the portals of death. It was the living Edward Clarence. He had arrived at anchor that evening in Carlisle Bay, and had immediately ridden over to the Fancy.

Little remains to be told to complete the remainder of the story. Clarence had changed passage at Dominica with a young gentleman, named Preston, who was anxious to get to Barbadoes as soon as possible to sail by the packet to England; and Clarence, who wished to see Dominica, readily took his berth in a brig that had been detained in loading three or four weeks longer than its original time. On hearing how Marianne had been ill when she learnt that Preston, who had been mistaken for himself, had been drowned in the William schooner, and how she had refused the proposals of Maxwell, he pressed her to his heart with a fondness, if possible, greater than ever.

"Sweet Marianne Bruce," said he, "I would rather be the owner of the heart of a true woman like yourself, than be the master of the whole world."

A few days after the ceremony of marriage was performed between them; and—to end the story like all such stories should be ended—contentment, happiness, prosperity, and a flourishing young family, were the blessings that crowned the remainder of their lives.

METHOD OF LABOR.

THE two great efforts of modern times are to dignify labor, and make it pleasant. A few years ago mechanics and other laborers were considered the "third estate" literally, and were of little consideration; they belonged to the category of cattle, and their worth was estimated by the amount of work they could perform. But it is very different to-day. The innumerable "institutes," "mechanics' associations," etc., etc., prove that the laborer is noble, and has as great a heart, and as lofty a purpose, and as aristocratic a bearing as the descendant of a kingly race, which has existed for a thousand years.

In fact, we are every day witnessing the spectacle of the blending together of all classes. Nobles become artisans, and artisans become nobles and kings. It seems that man has discovered what indeed he ought to have seen before, viz: That labor is God's ordinance; that the universe itself exists only by the virtue of everlasting toil. This is seen in all things around us—in heaven, in earth, and in sea. The brightest and noblest names of this age were made so by skill in the mechanic arts.

But while efforts, and successful efforts have been made to ennoble labor, some have conceived the idea of so organizing industry as to make it agreeable and pleasant. The Fourierists call this, we believe, "attractive industry." This is to be accomplished by creating what may be termed an enthusiasm of labor, having the whole system so organized that all kinds of toil, however severe or disagreeable, will be sought after with much avidity, and with the same enthusiasm as men now aspire to accomplish the most difficult and dangerous feats on the field of battle!

That something like this attractive industry of Fourier is possible, we believe. We see an exemplification of it—an imperfect one we admit—in our fire department. What labor is more difficult and disagreeable than the duty of a fireman? What toil is more dangerous? And yet with what ardor do they rush to their work, when the loud ringing bells call them to their duty? See them brave the hottest fires, scale the loftiest walls, to rescue the helpless one, and work for hours in the summer heat, or the cold of winter, without a murmur! Nay, sometimes their ardor seems to increase with the necessity of greater exertions, and their strength to increase with the conflagration. Why is this? It is the working of enthusiasm!

If this principle, enthusiasm, could be associated with all labor, a great result would be produced. And it may be done. Convince man that in his toil he is working out a noble destiny—that he is touching every where the springs of life—and is a co-laborer of the Infinite One, in beautifying, adorning, and advancing the Universe—that he is one of the noble army of industrials, through whose toil the world goes steadily forward, in the way of an everlasting progress—and the sweat of labor which stands upon his brow, will be more precious to him than the pearls of a kingly diadem. He will go to his labor with joy; nay, with enthusiasm; because he knows his work is a kind of worship, or prayer, through whose mysterious ways he approaches ever and ever nearer to the Perfect!

DEDICATION OF ODD FELLOWS' HALL,

ON THE

26th Anniversary of the B. W. G. L. of New York, Monday, June 4, 1849.

THE day for which, and its interesting ceremonies the notes of busy preparation had been so long sounding, and to the enjoyment of which so many of our beloved Order had so long looked forward with pleasurable anticipation, was truly a lovely and delightful one. In truth, it was the first that, so far in the season, could be called a summer day. A light mist which hung over the city during the night was dispelled by the earliest rays of the sun, which shone out auspiciously, giving promise and assurance of a goodly day. Nature smiled in every lineament of her countenance. The green in the parks and public grounds was rich in emerald brightness. The trees were out in all their bravery, their fresh foliage stirred by a soft and gentle breeze. The sky was unclouded, and was "Deeply, richly, beautifully blue,"

—in brief, everything looked ominous of a happy time.

A great number of strangers from the surrounding country came into the city by all the early boats and cars. These were drawn hither by curiosity, to see the pageant, and we do not, of course, include in this number the many brethren of the Order, who came to join in the interesting ceremonies of the occasion. The crowd of spectators would undoubtedly have been immeasurably greater (numberless as it actually was,) but for the apprehension that is just now felt out of town, from the idea that we have a dangerous epidemic in our midst. But as it was, the streets through which the procession moved, the windows and tops of the houses situated in those streets, the balconies of public buildings, the Park, the City Hall steps and roof, the top of the Museum, and every other "Coigne of Vantage" from which the curious looked, and could take a good view of the moving pageant, were filled by spectators of every age, sex and condition.

The order and course of the procession we give in another place. The preparations were laid out and carried through with great skill and ingenuity, and the line was formed without difficulty or unnecessary delay, according to the programme. The different Lodges and Encampments had formed at an early hour, at the reception rooms, and were seen at intervals in full regalia, and in good numbers, headed by bands of music, marching through the streets to take their places in the line.

We have never witnessed a more imposing sight than that which was displayed by the parade of this immense column, as it turned from Broadway at the bottom of the Park, into Park Row, on its way up Chatham-street. We will not undertake, at this point of our narration, to estimate the number comprising the procession, as there will be other means than mere guessing, by which to arrive at a fair result. The line was so judiciously displayed under the skillful direction of the Marshals, and the officers of the several Lodges and Encampments, as to give the lookers-on a satisfactory view of the brilliant regalia and emblems of the Order. There was a much nearer approach to the desired uniformity in the order observed among members than we had anticipated. Dark clothes, black hats and white gloves formed the dress which prevailed by a very large majority; a costume which at once gave a dignified appearance to the line, and by contrast, added greatly to the display of the regalia.

Another thing added great animation and brilliancy to the pageant; we mean the liberal multiplicity of the bands of music along the whole extent. This was indeed a most agreeable feature, as it ever is upon such occasions. To the scene we are describing, it was peculiarly appropriate, and lent to it a charm that must have been felt and acknowledged by all who witnessed it.

During the passage of the procession down Broadway, we noticed that on several of the public buildings were displayed flags, in honor of the gala; and at various points of the march the brotherhood were greeted with cheering from the gentlemen, and bouquets, wreaths, and waving of kerchiefs by the ladies, which were acknowledged by the recipients of these compliments by taking off their hats, and, in some instances, by a return of the cheering.

On the balcony of the Broadway Hotel, (corner of Park Place and Broadway,) there was a large collection of ladies and their attendants, who were particularly attentive to the procession, from its first appearance to the last departure. One of the prettiest wore a collar, and another an apron, of the Order, and we thought we discerned something like an attempt, now and then, to show off some smattering they had, somehow, picked up, (or thought they had,) of "the signs." Some brethren present very good-naturedly humored this notion, apparently.

We were glad to see the "Maid of the Mist" showing off, in all her glory, beneath the green trees of the Park, while the brilliant cortege was passing.

The magnificent car, drawn by sixteen horses, and upon which stood several orphan children, appropriately attired, (protéges of the Order,) and among them, (representing the Goddess of Liberty,) a little girl, ten years old, who has been under the care of the Order since she was one year old, attracted a great deal of attention. It was, indeed, a touching sight. The uncommonly neat banner of the Alleghanian Lodge, of Pennsylvania, was the object of general admiration, even amid the splendid array of banners, borne in the center of every Lodge and Encampment. Some of them were wreathed with sweet flowers of the season, and many of them bore at least a bunch of these "gentle remembrancers," at the top of their staff.

The Encampments were all most gorgeous in the display of regalia, and produced a great sensation, as they passed along. Several cars, most elaborately got up, represented tents, under the folds of which the officers rode. That, drawn by eight black horses, led by grooms in Turkish costume, and carrying the elective Grand Officers of the Grand Encampment, was magnificent in the extreme. That, representing an Egyptian Temple, was of unique beauty, and excited much curiosity. But that belonging to the "Mount Olivet Encampment" was, beyond comparison, the most gorgeous of all.

The display of Lodges from out of the city was very large, and aided materially in enhancing the splendor of the occasion.

The column met with no interruptions from intervening carriages, omnibuses, &c. during all the time we saw it. It kept steadily on, while passing our point of particular observation, and occupied exactly fifty-five minutes in doing so.

The plan, order of march, and ceremonies on arriving in front of the Hall, were all adhered to, and carried out to the letter. The general order of dedicatory exercises which took place at the Hall, is given below.

THE PROCESSION.

THE following notes of the various banners, will give an idea of the splendor of the parade:

MOUNT SINAI LODGE No. 374, had a rich silk banner, edged with silver lace and fringe, and a full parade of members.

ST. NICHOLAS LODGE No. 364, carried as their emblem the statue of St. Nicholas.

AMARANTHUS LODGE No. 352, with a scarlet banner, trimmed with gold lace and fringe.

NORTHERN LIGHT LODGE No. 348, a large blue silk ensign, with fringe of gold.

WILLIAM TELL LODGE No. 347, bore a banner of blue and gold, on which was delineated a scene in the life of William Tell.

SOLON LODGE No. 339, had a blue silk banner trimmed with silver, and wreathed with flowers, with a figure of Solon giving his laws.

THE PROCESSION.

TRADESMEN'S LODGE No. 814, an elegant scarlet silk banner, lined with white silk, and edged with gold lace and fringe. No device; inscribed, "Tradesmen's Lodge No. 814, I. O. of O. F., instituted July 31, 1847."

HOSPITALER LODGE No. 295, bore a large white banner, with blue fringe.

WARREN LODGE No. 253.—Among the Lodges in the procession none excited higher encomiums than No. 253. The regalia of the members was of the most elegant and rich material, and obtained in honor of the day. Their banner of blue satin, bore the portrait of the immortal Warren, who so gallantly fell at Bunker Hill, and attracted much attention from the spectators. The number of members that paraded was seventy, a strength demonstrating the deep interest the Lodge takes in the work.

PILGRIM LODGE No. 243, had a blue silver trimmed banner, with a sketch appropriate to the name. ACORN LODGE No. 237, a blue silk, yellow fringed banner.

LOGE LA SINCERITE No. 233, with a purple and gold banner, and the motto, "Charité, Fraternité et Protection."

BEACON LODGE No. 228. The banner of this Lodge was of rich velvet, with the name, &c. of the Lodge, in silver letters.

MYRTLE LODGE 194, blue silk banner, neatly trimmed with gold. This Lodge is from Brooklyn.

ALLEGHANIA LODGE No. 188, had a scarlet, gold edged banner, of large size.

BLOOMING GROVE LODGE No. 182, a blue silk banner, variegated fringe, lined with blue.

NEPPERMAN LODGE No. 181, from Yonkers, bore a blue banner, with fringe of white, and wreathed in flowers.

OREGON LODGE No. 178, had a blue and gold banner, surmounted by the cap of liberty.

EUREKA LODGE No. 177, with a purple silk banner, having heads of Columbus, Washington, Franklin and Lafayette.

O. of O. F. State of New-York; instituted Nov. 14, 1822, chartered June 4, 1823." This was also the anniversary of the charter of this Lodge.

EGYPTIAN ENCAMPMENT No. 35, with a splendid purple velvet banner, embroidered and trimmed with heavy gold thread and fringe.

DAMASCUS ENCAMPMENT No. 18, had a fine standard, with the various emblems in gold; and a magnificent carved tent, with all the officers and fixtures—a singular and elaborate piece of work.

GRAND ENCAMPMENT, with a gorgeous banner, trimmed with roses and borne by mulattoes in Oriental costume.

GRAND ENCAMPMENT CAR; a large black silk tent, borne upon four eagles, drawn by eight black horses, each led by a Turkish groom. On this car were the officers of the Grand Encampment of the State.

Our list does not comprise all the Lodges which went to make up the elegant procession, and we have no doubt omitted some of more merit than those we have described. Any errors or omissions that our friends may point out or supply, will be most agreeably received by us.

THE DEDICATION.

At four o'clock, the procession reached the corner of Grand and Center-sts. They formed in front of a large staging erected at the north-east corner of the Hall.

G. Master GEO. H. ANDREWS, then gave three distinct raps with his gavel, to command the attention of the Brethren; and directed the G. Marshal to make proclamation of the object of this convocation.

G. MARSHAL—"It is the will and pleasure of the M. W. Grand Master of the G. Lodge of the I. O. of O. F. of the State of New-York, that the ceremony of dedicating this edifice to the business and purposes of Odd-Fellowship, do now proceed."

G. MASTER—"Such is my will and pleasure."

DEDICATORY PRAYER—by Rev. Bro. Morrison.

P. G. Sire JOHN A. KENNEDY, President of the O. F. Hall Association, then addressed the G. Master as follows:

MOST WORTHY GRAND MASTER: We meet you here to-day to announce to you through the Order, that our work is done.

Since the first effort was made for the erection of this edifice, thirteen years have passed away, and with them not a few of those spirits who engaged early in the enterprise with alacrity. During much of that period, progress was so tardy, and eventual success apparently so uncertain, that many of our most ardent friends despaired; while those who chose to oppose the prosperity of our beloved Order, audibly rejoiced.

To-day our relative positions are changed; it is now our privilege to experience the pleasures of gratification, and have our hearts dilated with gladness, while those who have imprudently impeded this work with industry and zeal, lie buried beneath the heap of obstructions they had, with such labor, gathered for another use.

Two years ago this day the erection of our Temple was formally commenced, under auspices not so favorable as its friends could have desired; but their hope was large; their confidence in being sustained by their brotherhood was great; nor have they been disappointed.

The Order came forward with vigor and furnished the needful subscriptions to such an extent, that but a few hundred shares remain untaken; and these, they have reason to expect, will be speedily subscribed for.

It is not the business of the management to allude to their own labors, nor the manner in which they have been performed; nor would good taste permit them to descant on the fitness of our edifice for the sacred purpose to which it is designed. It is capable of speaking for itself, through its proportions and its style: if these fail to impress you, any words of mine would prove worse than useless.

I have only to repeat: "OUR WORK IS DONE," and, in behalf of "The Odd-Fellows' Hall Association of the City of New-York," I make the request that the building be set apart and dedicated to the business and purposes of Odd-Fellowship.

Whereupon the M. W. Grand Master Geo. H. ANDREWS received the building by saying:

Mr. President of the Odd-Fellows' Hall Association: In the name of, and in behalf of the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows of the State of New-York, I accept for dedication to the uses of Odd-Fellowship, this edifice, which has been constructed under your supervision.

To you and your associates—the managers of that corporation—the present must be an occasion especially gratifying.

To-day, you witness the consummation of that for which you have long and ardently hoped. To-day you hail the completion of that for which you have zealously and faithfully labored—and to-day you behold the recognition by your Brethren from the North, the South, the East and the West, of this, the result of your efforts, as a temple devoted to the service of those, whose vocation it is to "Visit the Sick—Relieve the Distressed—Bury the Dead—Educate the Orphan!"—duties which neither interfere with, nor supersede the discharge of any others—social, moral, or religious.

Turning to the M. W. Grand Sire of the United States, the Grand Master concluded as follows:

"Most Worthy Grand Sire: This assembly of Brothers of the I. O. of O. F., having especially convened by order of the R. W. Grand Lodge of the State of New York, for the purpose of dedicating and consecrating this Hall to the charitable and humane objects of Odd Fellowship, we solicit your aid in the ceremonial, as that of the chief officer of the body whose decisions we regard as law, and whose authority we are proud to acknowledge as supreme in the order."

G. S. HORN R. KNEASS then made the dedicatory speech as follows:

"Most Worthy Grand Master: In taking part in the inspiring ceremonies of this day, permit me to tender my cordial thanks for the gratification thus done me, by yourself and the distinguished Lodge over whose deliberations you so ably preside. An occasion like the present is always interesting. The preparation of a permanent home for any portion of our numerous brotherhood is calculated to inspire agreeable emotions; but especially joyous is it when that home is to supply the wants of, and yield comforts to, so many as will here enjoy its soothing influences. We behold in this vast metropolis of the most populous State of the American Union, a hall, commodious, magnificent, whose huge proportions indicate the character of the enterprise of the association by which it was constructed—whose diversified architecture evinces the refined taste of those by whom it was fashioned—whose general internal decoration displays the munificence of its owners—and whose very construction, while it has given to New York one of its most attractive ornaments, at the same time attests the attachment of our fraternity here to the principles of our institution. But well adapted and superb as this costly pile surely is, I can regard it as a medium through which can be felt that effective spirit which prompted its design, and insured its completion—a spirit which, bounding over all intervening obstacles, has thus happily manifested itself. In this locality, but a few short years ago, our brotherhood, in common with all associations whose doings were not revealed to the public eye, was subjected to attack, and its members to contumely and scorn; but it fell not before the ruthless assault. The duration of its proscription was but the period of its probation. From that season of gloom it emerged, purified and strengthened. The events which were then stimulated, and caused so much tribulation to the nervous admirer of our embodied principles, but which served only to arouse and cement the stout hearted friends of our Order, now are amongst the things that were—treasured in the memory as so many touchstones to illustrate the sincerity and value of our union. If thus once temporarily overshadowed in this immediate region, the obscuration was not unfelt in other portions of our far-stretching republic, and the efforts elsewhere were identical with those experienced by yourselves. Instead, then, of looking back with emotions of regret to the trials to which we were then exposed, we can revert to them with calm satisfaction, derivable from a consciousness of their happy issues. How changed is now the condition of our institution! Apprehension and doubt have been dispelled—the wavering have become firm and the steady have continued unmoved. Our institution now extends over this vast country, and whether flourishing in a thickly settled commonwealth, or a remote territory—whether amidst cities, whose foundations were laid before the electric spark of liberty quickened the American people into a nation, or upon a soil but recently brought within the protection of the American ensign—it enjoys no common respect. It embraces within its membership, citizens of education, virtue and wisdom. Towns are improved by its presence, and villages smile under its benign influences.

"Go where you may, through the vast area of our land, where man's habitation can be found, and the voice of the Odd-Fellow will be heard, soothing and consoling affliction, cheering the heavy laden, and imparting hope and consolation wherever they may be needed. Indeed, so promotive of human comfort, so essential to human happiness is it, that man, in his roaming through the untamed wilds of our distant confines, scarce meets his fellow-man, without contemplating the means required to constitute a lodge. But by the boundaries of our own extended country our institution is not circumscribed, any more than the cardinal virtues, of the nature of which the human kind alike partake, can be limited by metes and bounds. They manifest themselves, and expand wherever intellectual culture is invited and encouraged. Indeed, wherever mind has dominion, there are they most usefully, most effectively unfolded. Borrowed originally from transatlantic shores, the light has been reflected with additional warmth and luster upon the mother soil, and now also from the same bright flame is vivifying the islands of the Pacific ocean.

"Judging from the past—that unerring criterion—who can foresee the extent of our Order's bearing in a few years to come? Its scope, adapted to our entire race, will never be fulfilled while any portion of man is unobservant of it. Its influence must be progressive—ever onward—and when ever and where ever they go, they must emanate from one fountain of authority, the Grand Lodge of the United States, of the I. O. of O. F., by which all of us, no matter where residing, must be bound. To that exalted body do we ever turn with respect and confidence, composed of members of an enlightened and immense constituency, as well as those who have served in the highest offices known to our laws—all of whom, no matter how great their experience or elevated their positions, must still be in connection with a Lodge, claiming as its integral parts members of all ages in our Order. Possessing an organization unlike any other association, we bow with submission to its decrees, and lend whatever energies we can control to its full enforcement. And that authority which has been recognized from the period of the formation of our supreme council—which has employed itself in dispensing the inestimable blessings that our teachings insure—whose development, but a quarter of a century since, was beheld only by a few in a few cities on our seaboard, and has continued to show itself of the same character from that time to the present, is based upon the affections of our brotherhood. No municipal law thunders forth its penalties to secure obedience to its behests. No early associations in its history, connected with our own land, throws around it a charm that can bias or touch the judgment; and perhaps there is nothing in its early manifestations in another clime, to attract the general attention and support; but by its own inherent worth, it has thus far survived the many adverse circumstances by which it was enveloped. By that force alone it must hereafter live—deprived of it, it must cease to exist. With merit, not ostentatious, but rather noiseless and unseen, unless by those covered by its mantle, it is replete. It trenches upon no right, interferes with no privilege, assails no religious faith or political dogmas, disturbs no man's business arrangements; but, on the contrary, endeavors to point out to its admirers the paths which lead to a happiness not incompatible with that respect which others should command, and also to instill into their hearts that ardent love of country which constitutes here, as well as elsewhere, the nation's bulwark. It is well entitled to our warm admiration, to what ever support and assistance may, from time to time, be necessary to the exhibition of its various attributes; and especially important is it that the decrees of the institution should be obeyed—not with a lagging submission that gives pain in beholding it, but with a promptitude and potency which evince a regard for the authority whence they emanate.

"Without this recognition of such a power somewhere, and the early rules of our brotherhood have fixed it to the chief council, where would the arbitrament be found? where would be the tribunal competent to adjudicate such questions as arise in the performance of the various Lodge duties? Pause in the rendering of implicit obedience to that high power, and the stability of the institution is threatened, its harmony assailed, and its general integrity jeopardized. He who falters in this respect, looks more to his own personal feelings than the interests of this vast community of our Order, and upon his head rests a great responsibility. By an undeviating and unbroken reliance, we have risen from a small beginning to our present position of respectability and strength. Our rise has been without parallel; not merely in the rapidity by which it has been marked, but also in the amount of substantial benefit which has been scattered broadcast through our jurisdiction. In the success we enjoy, there should be found abundant cause of gratulation, and whosoever would expect additional advantage within the short period of our history upon these shores, would not be restrained to the realities of existence, and would ill deserve the harvest which industry may have assisted to reap.

"I had proposed, my friends, to engross but a few moments of your time; my pledge to myself has been redeemed. But before concluding these hasty remarks, permit me to say that the influence of your example, as shown upon this occasion, will be felt throughout the length and breadth of our common country. If incentive to increased endeavor on behalf of our institution be needed anywhere within its wide-spread jurisdiction, it will be found in the enterprise and determination of their brethren of New-York. This hall, although your immediate home, is nevertheless the home of every man who is bound by the ties we acknowledge. Here he can find rest when wandering from his distant residence. Here he can find calm contentment when sundered from the active cares of business life; and here, as though within his own Lodge Room, he can interchange the civilities and kindnesses of our common nature, refined and chastened by the gentle teachings of Friendship, Love and Truth."

The Grand Sire terminated his speech with this formula:

"Hear, Hear, Hear, all men: By authority and in the name of the Grand Lodge of I. O. of O. F. of the State of New-York, I dedicate this Hall to the business and purposes of Odd-Fellowship; to disseminate Friendship, Love and Truth, and to diffuse Benevolence and Charity in their fullest extent to all its worthy members; and by this solemn act I hereby declare it duly dedicated.

"The Grand Marshal will please cause this dedication to be appropriately proclaimed."

Four Heralds were placed at appropriate distances, forming the corners of a large square, and set on horseback, uncovered. The following ceremonies then took place:

G. MARSHAL.—"Brothers, Grand Heralds of the North, of the East, of the South, and of the West: By the solemn act of the Most Worthy Grand Sire of the Grand Lodge of the United States, this Hall is duly dedicated to the business and purposes of Odd-Fellowship, to disseminate Friendship, Love and Truth; and to diffuse Benevolence and Charity in their fullest extent to all its worthy members. It is his will and pleasure that the same be proclaimed, which duty you will perform."

G. HERALD OF THE NORTH.—[After a blast on the Trumpet.]—"Hear, all men: By authority of the M. W. Grand Sire, I proclaim this Hall dedicated to the business and purposes of Odd-Fellowship, and the promulgating of the principles of Benevolence and Charity."

G. HERALD OF THE EAST.—[After a blast on the Trumpet.]—"Hear all men: By authority of the M. W. Grand Sire, I proclaim this Hall dedicated to the business and purposes of Odd-Fellowship, and the promulgating of the principles of Benevolence and Charity."

G. HERALD OF THE SOUTH.—[After a blast on the Trumpet.]—"Hear, all men; By the authority of the M. W. Grand Sire, I proclaim this Hall dedicated to the business and purposes of Odd-Fellowship, and the promulgating of the principles of Benevolence and Charity."

G. HERALD OF THE WEST.—[After a blast on the Trumpet.]—"Hear, all men; By authority of the M. W. Grand Sire, I proclaim this Hall dedicated to the business and purposes of Odd-Fellowship, and the promulgating of the principles of Benevolence and Charity."

G. MARSHAL.—"Most Worthy Grand Sire: Proclamation has gone forth to the four quarters of the globe, that all men may hear and know the principles of Odd-Fellowship have here a dwelling place."

G. SIRE.—[Holding in his hand a vessel of pure water, in the act of pouring it out.]—"I do declare and proclaim—in the name of a FRIENDSHIP as pure as this element, this Hall solemnly consecrated to the practice of that ennobling virtue, which, uniting men as Brothers, teaches them to sustain that relation at all times each to the other. In the name of a Love that delights in listening to a tale of sorrow, that it may relieve it; that exults in every opportunity to wipe the tear from the weeping eye, and is ever found armed for the defense and protection of the widow and orphan—this Hall solemnly consecrated. In the name of TRUTH, devoid of guile and hypocrisy, which inculcates sincerity and plain-dealing, that communicable attribute of Deity which most exalts the character of man on earth—this Hall solemnly consecrated."

THE G. SECRETARY then read the certificate of dedication, which was then attested by the Grand Officers.

THE G. MASTER then called on the Brethren to give the honors of the Order, which was done.

The closing Ode, by Bro. D. P. BARHYDT, was then sung by a company of performers and amateurs, with much effect.

Uplifting to th' auspicious skies,
For Friendship, Love and Truth a home,
Behold the stately fabric rise,
A finished whole from base to dome.
As step by step, and stone by stone,
Our temple rose toward the sky,
The work of Fellowship sped on
To reach that dome outspread on high.
Long celebrated be this day,
And be our Hall, when old and gray,
The honored temple, as in youth,
The home of Friendship, Love and Truth!

Rejoice! the finished type reveals
To love-born hope a glorious sight;
Let anthems sound in pean peals—
The dawn has broken on the night!
Our temple stands the type confess'd
Of work in Fellowship complete,
When ev'ry heart with Friendship bless'd,
Each hand a brother's hand shall greet.
Long celebrated be this day,
And be our Hall, when old and gray,
The honored temple, as in youth,
The home of Friendship, Love and Truth!

Along th' eternal paths of time,
We see the fane "not made with hands,"
Where Truth, enshrined in might sublime,

O'er sin and self triumphant stands—
Her altar built of deeds had birth
In myriads of halls like this,
All stars of hope encircling earth
To gem the cup of grief with bliss.
Long celebrated be this day,
When other honored fanes, and gray,
Shall, ages hence, as this in youth,
Be homes of Friendship, Love and Truth!

A benediction was then pronounced, and the ceremonies being over, the Lodges and Encampments were considered as dismissed, and wended their way to their several head-quarters, accompanied, most of them, by bands of music.

THE EVENING FESTIVITIES.

In the evening, Castle Garden was the scene of festivity, mirth and music. A goodly company assembled there, to listen to a good band, an Oration by C. Edwards-Lester, and the singing of an original Ode, written for the occasion.

After the music from the band, Mr. Austin Phillips and his associates sung the following Ode, written by Miss E. C. HURLEY.

Joy, brothers, joy, let each face beam with gladness,
Heaven smiles propitious, our efforts to crown;
Our path is victorious, then banish all sadness—
Our deeds and alms-giving have met with renown.
We hail with delight, this our day for uniting,
For rendering praises, and glory and power,
To him who alone gives the means so inviting,
Each brother to cherish when darkness may lower.

Mark, brothers mark, the distress'd from all nations,
Wending their way to the Odd-Fellows' Hall;

Whate'er once their lot, or whate'er their stations,
The Odd-Fellow's heart is alive to their call.
He feels 'tis a brother who seeks his protection,
Whate'er be his doctrine, religion, or creed,
A brother's regard, and a brother's affection,
Is instantly yielded, in thought, word and deed.

See, brothers, see, the lone Orphan's eye beaming,
Tho' memory's tear will bedew that soft eye;
The heart feels assured, and bright visions are gleaming—

The Odd-Fellow's haven, their refuge, is nigh.
Then hail, brothers, hail, with delight hail the morning,

Whose dawn rose in Friendship, in Love, and in Truth—

Cementing, uniting, each other adorning,
A solace for age, a bulwark for youth.

Advancing in splendor, unshackled and fearless,
Onward and upward, and proud our career;
Ne'er may the sick or the feeble be cheerless,
But find in Odd-Fellows that comfort is near.
Stronger and broader, and wider our borders—
Boundless and free be our march thro' the land;
Graceful and peaceful, and free from marauders,
Till Faith, Hope and Charity join hand in hand.

THE ORATION.

Ladies, Citizens and Brothers

So vast and brilliant an assembly as this, may well close our triumphant festival.

From the cold rivers of Maine—from the orange groves of Florida—from the deer-haunted shores of the great Lakes of the North—from the upper waters of the mountain-fed Missouri—from the fervid plains over which Cortez led the Cavaliers of Spain, we have gathered to dedicate a Temple of Charity—to celebrate the inauguration of the Republic of Humanity.

On the night of the 25th of December, 1806, while a Winter storm was drifting over this Island City, in an upper chamber of a house yet standing in Fulton-street, five men assembled to organize the first Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows ever founded on this continent.

To the Genius of Humanity who presided over that humble scene and foresaw its consequences, it must have seemed, as to its first discovery did the parent rill which gushes from the Rocky Mountains and flows on its far pilgrimage till it swell into the solemn Mississippi.

They called the Institution they founded SHAKESPEARE LODGE, and like the name they gave it, it has pervaded the world. Its charter now lies side by side with the play of Hamlet in the secluded library of Sunny-side on the Hudson, and in the frail tent of the gold-digger on the golden banks of the Rio Sacramento.

The names given to the first four Lodges in New-York indicate the spirit of their founders. Shakespeare's name represented Literature and Humanity; Franklin was the second, and is represented Philosophy and Labor; Washington was the third, and represented Heroism and Love of Country; Columbia was the fourth, and represented the broad continent where Odd Fellowship was to achieve its greatest triumphs.

I shall pronounce no encomium on this Order. It has already existed too long, and entered too deeply into the regards of mankind, to need any defence, or require any apology.

I shall speak of some of the causes which brought it into existence and contributed to its progress—what it has attempted to do for mankind hitherto, and what it must achieve if it would live in the future. It will be necessary also to glance at the aspects of the present period and the electric progress of the world.

I am conscious that it has been a day of excitement and fatigue, and that on the fancies of the fair women and brave men who will hear me with scarce concealed impatience, are gleaming visions of fairy forms floating in the dance. It is not a very enviable office to try to elicit the interest or stir the sympathies of this great company who have just returned from the fatigues of a march, and are just going to the enchantments of a ball room and the luxuries of a banquet.

Suffer then, I pray you, with what patience you can, a few words in the name of the trinity of humanity, FRIENDSHIP, LOVE, and TRUTH.

It should not seem strange that we have assembled for this exulting festival; all nations and orders of men have had their anniversaries of congratulation. For nearly forty centuries the sons of Abraham have held their yearly Pentecost to celebrate the emancipation of their fathers. The Greeks held their National Games to immortalize the triumphs of heroism, and the birth of this Nation will be celebrated through all time to perpetuate the memory of the Fathers of the Republic.

Every creed has had its temples, and every divinity its worshippers; why may we not rear a temple to Humanity and burn incense on its altars. The world has long had its Republic of Letters, and its Republic of Liberty—it is time it had its REPUBLIC OF HUMANITY. We have blended the beauties of the arts of the Orient in building our Temple, and with grateful and joyous hearts, we have dedicated it to-day.

Odd Fellowship arose in the necessities of man; not to add one more star to the waning constellation of nobility; not to deal with fictitious interests, or practice fanciful experiments. It was formed to deal with substantial life, to minister to real wants. A more practical benevolence was wanted in the world, to seek out distress, bind up wounds, assuage griefs, feed the hungry, clothe the naked, visit the prisoner, educate the orphan, protect the widow, comfort the dying, and bury the dead. Man needed a closer acquaintance with man, the world over. For these hallowed purposes our Order sprang into life, and its course has been cheered by the sunny smiles of gratitude, by the consciousness of duty, and by the blessing of God. Let us, in passing, correct a false impression, not uncommon:

Odd Fellowship never was, and never can be, hostile to Christianity, for it is founded on its great law of Love. It never assailed the Church, for clergymen, and good men of all denominations swell our numbers. But it has been assailed, either because it was not understood, or from a still worse motive.—We lay claim to none of the rights or privileges of a Divine Institution; we assume none of the prerogatives of the priesthood; we invade none of the ordinances of Religion; we celebrate none of its mysteries; we impose no religious creed on the conscience; we do not even claim to be an institution of charity; we only attempt to do our duty to one another.—True, we admit no one to our Order who does not believe in an Almighty and Beneficent Father of the Universe; who does not recognize the law of the Saviour, "whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye also unto them," to be the only true or safe guide of life. True, when we come together, we sing anthems of congratulation, and we invoke the benediction of Heaven, that all we do may be conformed to the law of Love. But who will say that the glad and joyous heart may not pour forth its fullness in music, or that, in a world in which the tears of the Son have fallen, the erring, misguided, suffering child of earth, may not turn his eye up to the blue Heaven, and supplicate the blessing of his Father! We only aim to do to each other what the Good Samaritan did to the wounded and robbed wayfarer, whom the Levite and the priest passed by on the other side.

Our duties are plainly prescribed: "To meet together as brothers, and, in case of affliction or distress, to relieve the wants of each other, and administer all the consolation we can to the afflicted." * * We keep nothing hidden, except what is necessary to give efficacy and permanence to our Order, by preserving its unity, and guarding it against imposition. The breaking of bread to the hungry, the cup of cold water to the thirsty, watching by the sick bed, comforting the afflicted, cherishing the stranger, visiting the imprisoned, succoring the enfeebled; how sadly are these tender duties neglected by a large portion of the human race!"

How far are these duties performed by Odd Fellowship? How far are these objects effected? So perfectly, I answer in a word, that it is nearly impossible for an Odd Fellow to be overwhelmed with calamity, without finding succor. If slander's merciless breath strikes him, there is an honest man near by to defend his reputation, for in this association men are taught not only to reverence truth, but to scorn the liar, and despise the robber of the good name of a fellow man! He is the foulest of burglars, the meanest of highwaymen!

The Odd Fellow cannot suffer honest poverty without alleviation. If his hand of labor is paralyzed at his toil, he is maintained till his muscles grow strong—and this comes not in grudging charity—it is his right. His wife and children are not driven into the streets to ask charity while he is sick—the dignity of manhood is spared this deep humiliation. In his old age he is not driven to the Alms House for a home. He is a man to the last—he never becomes a pauper! That squalid, loathsome, intolerable wreck of a man. The Odd Fellow cannot die alone; brothers stand by him in the final hour, and half the bitterness of death is forgotten in the thought that brothers will follow him to the grave—that his widow will be cared for, and his orphans protected. These gentle beings are not left without a covert on the heath of Time!

This argument is not limited to the poor man—for no man has so much gold he may not sometime lack bread; none of us has so many friends he may not one day be deserted, and our children are sure one day to be orphans. It is no mean praise of Odd Fellowship to say that it multiplies a man's friends—and in a world like this, who ever had too many?

The whole fabric of society is strengthened by the sustaining influence of the Order. It is benefitted by it in a higher and better sense than by hospitals and alms houses—for it administers relief to men in their homes; they are not dragged from the sacred enclosure of the family and paraded in the fever wards, and watched over by hirelings, or farmed out in the county Poor House!

Let us cross the ocean, (for Odd Fellowship follows man everywhere,) and look into the Work Houses of England, those loathsome and crowded depots where men and women are stowed away till Death's freight train comes for them! Husbands and wives, in want and age separated from their children and from each other. The Work-House is the terror of the poor man in England! when it stares him in the face, he boldly perpetrates a crime, and by going to a foul dungeon, escapes the humiliation of a Work-House.

The British Government, which discourages all secret societies, has been compelled to remove her restrictions from Odd Fellowship—for poverty and want have filled her green islands with dying and dead men. She has even made the Order her almoner to expend her relief fund, since her money would thus go farther, and secure greater and quicker relief. In Great Britain, Odd Fellowship stands between a million of men and death. Heaven send peace and plenty to those Emerald Islands—powerful in their empire, feeble in their famine!

Ask the Alms-House Commissioners of this great City, what it costs New-York to feed her hungry, and bury her dead! and they will tell you what Odd Fellowship saves us every year. Let the Order suddenly withdraw its sustaining hand, and every city in this country would feel the shock—the entire body of society would stagger under the tremendous burden!

It should be no cause of complaint if we limited our beneficence to the circle of our own Order; for we cannot, alone, bear the Atlean world of human suffering, and if we do not care for Odd Fellows, who will? As an organization, our most imperative duties are toward one another; but we regard man everywhere, as sacred—wherever we meet him he is God's child and our brother, and if we can help him we will. So far as our means allow, we open wide our hands.

Pittsburg is laid waste by a desolating fire. The Lodges send on their offerings, with all the humane who can, till more is received than has been lost, and a portion of the offering is sent back to the Odd Fellows of New-York—it is soon required for another afflicted city!

Panama is crowded with thousands waiting to embark for the glittering coast, and pestilence is filling every house with the dead. That mass of dying adventurers are strangers in a strange land; but there are sure to be Odd Fellows there. A magical signal brings them together. A Lodge is organized; the work of helping one another begins on system. The needy are aided, the sick healed, the dying comforted, and the dead buried. No distinctions are made; man is suffering, and man is sacred! A secure and beautiful burial ground, overlooking the ocean, is purchased, and before the caravan goes on its way an appeal is sent back to the Lodges, which is at once responded to; and while I am speaking the iron fence^o is on its way for the enclosure of the Strangers' Cemetery, founded by the Odd Fellows at Panama! Heaven send that our treasure may one day be as large as the hearts of the founders of our Order!

A thousand facts in my possession would justify me in words of exalted eulogy: but it is far better the eulogy be breathed as it has been, silently, into the ear of Heaven, with the last prayer of the dying; by the widow over the bier of her husband; by the young orphan over the grave of his father.

And, throughout these thirty Herculean Republics, by concentrated efforts, this good work is going ceaselessly on. It follows the sun in his circuit, and, every twenty-four hours it has made the good-Samaritan journey of the globe.

Association is the chief instrument of power in modern times. In fact, men have ceased acting alone: they now move to the achievement of everything in masses—whether it be to bridge the Atlantic with steamers, or uproot the dynasty of the Bourbons—to make a railway to the Pacific, or reconstruct the Republic of Rome.

In Odd Fellowship we blend the energies of a vast multitude of men. We converge the rays of hazy twilight and flame them forth in local light. We bind the starry spangle into a central sun.

Why should the advantages of concentration be monopolized by Government and Commerce? When this Government strikes, the strength of twenty-three millions is in the blow. When she conforms a treaty, it is sealed with the faith of twenty-three million men. The power, the wisdom, the wealth of these millions, are in every negotiation the Government conducts—in every effort she puts forth. These forces are in all her acts; they ride with her navies; they march in her bannered ranks; they attend on her legislation; they enforce her decrees.

The East India Company is an Association of merchants. Her navy has five thousand vessels; her clerks are sons of noblemen; she draws tribute from one hundred and fifty millions in the East Indies alone; her body-guard is an hundred thousand men!

For different purposes we have seized on this great secret of success. To accomplish good objects, we combine the strength, the wisdom, the affluence, the arms and the hearts of a million men!

We lift these numerous shields over the widow's unprotected head; we place these myriad arms under the unsupported orphan; we have so many night-watchers; so many day visits for the sick; so many to swell the funeral trains of departed brothers to their place of rest! We act together! and when Odd Fellowship utters its voice, like the morning drum of England it beats round the world!

Another circumstance fits us peculiarly for the great work of benefiting our fellow-men—I mean the absolute simplicity of our object—unfettered and unbarricaded by any connexion with the ecclesiastical, political, or philosophical distinctions which obtain among men.

In looking over the earth we find the world divided into hostile encampments in philosophy, politics, or religion. We assail none of these encampments. Let them keep their banners flying over their respective hosts—all of us belong to one or more of these party divisions—for Odd Fellowship interferes with none of our other engagements or obligations—it impairs in no degree our personal independence. One conviction fills our hearts; one purpose nerves our arms. Man is suffering, and man is sacred. We can better his condition; we can elevate his character; we can inspire him with noble aspirations; and we can direct his eye to the better life to come—we will!

To accomplish these objects our Order was founded. Man, poor, feeble, benighted, lost, needed something more done for him; priesthoods had invented a thousand religions, with mystic emblems, and solemn rituals; philosophy had thought, and learning had studied for ages. The arts of taste had grown to perfection; heroes had won crowns of victory—empires, republics, arts and religions had risen and gone to decay—but man was the same suffering, misguided, unhelped being still. Could nothing effectually be done to illumine and elevate so noble a creature, susceptible of such exalted sentiments—struggling, longing, thirsting, panting, dying for bread, light, hope, progress, immortality? Must he grope on, ever on, along the shore of that vast ocean which rolls round the world, famishing for the bread of life, sighing for some new bark to bear him to climes he never trod and an Elysium he had not yet found?

Odd Fellowship heard the signal, and sent back its response: "No! Generous, hoping, sighing, suffering, sacred brother, help and light are coming! The day of thy redemption is breaking. I see the herald beams flaming on the eastern sky!"

Such were the wants, such the exigencies, that brought up our institution. It has grown with incredible progress. It is because the world needed it—because it has answered the demands of the age.

It must continue to do so if it would live, and the age is changing every hour. The life of a single generation is a longer period now than was once the life of an empire. Time is no longer to be measured by the successive vibrations of the pendulum, but by succession of ideas; not by hours, but by events; not by moments even, but by revolutions. Time is no more marked by the sun-dial or the hour-glass, but by strokes of the engine, and flashes of the telegraph!

Less than a century ago France required fifteen years to dethrone a monarch: now she does it in a day! The morning dream of Louis Philippe, in the gilded chamber of Louis Quatorze, is broken by the march of a Revolution. He rises and orders out his body-guard to shoot down the mob. You know the rest. The shadows of the same evening closed around his aged head, rocking in a fisherman's boat on the bleak bosom of the Atlantic, and the mounting sunbeams of the next morning shone on Lamartine's Republic.

Odd-Fellowship now finds itself in an electric age—and it must become an electric institution. An institution to be perpetual, must meet the varying exigencies, and answer the varying demands of the successive ages through which it travels. In its incipient stages our Order was chiefly occupied in ministering to the physical wants of man—tending the couch of languishment—visiting the prisoner in his cell, the widow in her tears, and the fatherless in their orphanage; and these noble objects must continue to engage its attention; not one of these duties must ever be forgotten.

But Odd Fellowship is lifting its eye over a wider field. It begins to ask—what is its business with the minds of men? While it cares for the body, it begins to feel that it must minister to the wants, the woes, the aspirations and the progress of the soul; that the spirit is not for a day, nor, like the verse of Shakespeare, for all time. It spreads its wing over the battlements of the invisible world. It leaps the life to come! It begins to feel that the body of man is sacred, and instead of leaving the form that will one day put on immortality, to rot in a foul vault or in a crowded city church-yard, where the dead touch one another, in a few days to be torn up by some vandal hand—rural cemeteries are being everywhere founded in the still country, where the loved and the lost are laid to rest amid the flowers which shed their perfume, and the birds who pour out their requiem anthem over the sleeper's pillow. Thank heaven, that foul charnal houses are giving place to green gardens for the dead. Odd Fellowship begins to feel it is a more sacred, a more imperious duty to cheapen science than to cheapen bread; for there is a sadder spectacle than a man dying from hunger: it is a soul famishing for the bread of life. Hence, in every part of the land, Atheneums, Libraries, and Reading-Rooms are being founded, where six hours' work gives the laboring man intellectual food—aliment for the soul for 300 days.

It has always been one of our prescribed duties to educate the orphan, and the duty has been done.—But it must be done more effectually. Orphan schools ought to be founded by every Lodge; and till it is done, even Odd Fellows themselves cannot measure the agency their Order can wield in the destiny of men. The school-master has left the University, and gone abroad through the world. He is in Labrador, in Oregon, in Patagonia and in the distant Islands of the South Sea. He has sailed up the Golden Horn—he has passed the Pyramids.

Brothers, we must widen the sphere of our beneficence. We are in an intellectual, a thinking age; and we must hereafter do for the minds of men, what, in our feebleness, was once did only for their bodies. Every sign in the political and moral firmament, betokens progress, and inspires hope. The whole world is in motion, and the whole world is bidding us God speed. A new and a better day for mankind is everywhere breaking.

Religion, which in all its forms seems destined to prove the blessing or the blight of man, has begun to interest itself with the life of the world—with our hearts—our homes—our everyday occupations. The monk is leaving the cloister, and the nun her convent, to mingle with the warm life and earnest struggles of Man; and as they turn their backs on the tall cypresses, which for centuries held their steady moan over those gray sepulchres of the buried alive, they feel the undulations of the new age.

The age of Scholastic Theology, of mystic rights, of monkish rituals, of besotting and enslaving priestcraft has gone by—and it will return no more?

And who would roll our car of progress back again into the misty shadows of those gloomy ages?—Would you rebuild the pyramids? The schoolmaster has been in Egypt, and the sovereign who now rules the Nile puts an hundred thousand men to building railways and canals across the Isthmus, and the shrill whistle of the engine is echoing around the tops of the sky-reaching pyramids.

Would you again launch five million crusaders on the plains of Asia? Men have done looking for hope to the East.

"Westward the Star of Empire takes its way."

Would you send a powerful German Emperor, once more, bare-footed to the gates of the Vatican, to be pardoned by a Pope? There is no longer a Pope in the Vatican to pardon him, nor a German Emperor to send there!

Would you redig the dungeons of the Inquisition or chain again God's glorious revelation to the altar, or light once more the martyr fires of Smithfield? Ah! "Go be a dog, and bay the moon." but bring us no more things like these. It cannot be done!

Four centuries ago the Monk's pen produced one Illuminated Bible during a life time. Then the Priest thought for the people. When that blessed book is thrown off by the Titan arm of Steam, men will do their own thinking and make their own creeds.

One hospital is now worth more than a hundred convents—one Bible more than all the creeds—one deed of humanity more than a thousand sectarian dogmas!

When men can think free they begin to act free.—Europe has woke up to achieve her freedom, and for twelve months every steamer has brought with it signals of distress from expiring despotism. Old Hungary has lifted her valiant arm, and the invincible legions of the already immortal Kossuth are on their march to Vienna!

The tide of battle in Europe, between Liberty and Despotism—between the Old and the New age—between the Past and the Future, may ebb and flow—but it is a struggle for principle, and a struggle for principle is a stronger and steadier one than the struggle for bread. There is no danger like that of trying to scourge the newly emancipated spirit back to its prison house. It is the frenzy of madness for Governments, with the wrong all on their side, to attempt by cannon and troops of the line to arrest the avalanche rush of millions towards their rights. Over such frail barriers the tread of the multitude is like the march of the storm.

It is not always that nine-tenths of mankind are to die of starvation that the remaining fraction may die of surfeit. Equality among all classes is the goal for which the world is marching, and it will reach it.—What tumults and chaos, and blood lie between them and it, no man can tell. But if needs be through these it must be reached, through them it will pass—and armed with the Almighty's decree, press enslaved mankind to freedom. How fast or how slow is to be its march, none but the God of Nations can tell. We only hear the mighty tread of the advancing multitude. We only know that it is a part of the Almighty's plan to bring the world back to competence and happiness; and every Government and Institution that does not wheel into the movement must be overthrown.

Vainer than a dream is the expectation of arresting this onward movement of the race. The world shall not be dragged back to its former darkness and slavery. The power to do it, has passed forever from the hands of despots. War, anarchy and madness, may drench the earth in blood; but civilized man is no longer to sit tamely down under oppression. Its silent deadly tooth is no longer to sink unresisted into his bruised and bleeding flesh.

The world has heard the shout of freedom and is straining on its fetters. It is saying to its oppressors, the cup of trembling ye have so long pressed to our lips we will drain no more forever! We are Men!

Such is the Electric Age in which Odd Fellowship finds itself encamped, and it must move on with Humanity.

At the close, the following Ode, written by Bro. F. J. OTTERSON, was sung by Messrs. Phillips and assistants:

The restless wing of Time hath brought
The parting moment near,
And soon an evening, pleasure-fraught,
Will be with those that were;
The bell that tolls the midnight chime
Will knell a glorious day—
The memory of whose pleasant time
Shall never fade away.

Farewell, warm hearts, and eyes of light!
We part; but memory yet
Will turn with ever new delight,
To bless the hour we met;
When Friendship gave the grip so true,
And Truth, from Heaven above,
O'er all the vast assembly threw
The gorgeous light of Love.

Farewell, ye Brothers true and bold!
This day to you shall be,
O'er Prejudice and Slander old,
The day of Victory;
And they who bared our infant way

Shall cheer our mighty youth,
And own the noble power, to-day,
Of Friendship, Love and Truth.

Farewell! yon Temple long shall tell,
In ages crowding on,
Our still increasing sons, who well
Their fathers' work was done.
Farewell, ye fair, whose presence here
Hath made our festal bright!
To Brother, Mother, Maiden dear,
Good night—a sweet good night!

After these services, the floor was cleared for a dance, which, under the capable direction of Professor Lewis, was kept up, merrily, until a late hour.

And so ended the grand ceremonies of the dedication of our beautiful Hall.

ERROR.—Many brothers from the country inform us that our subscribers are waiting for agents to visit them to collect their indebtedness. We would again urge our readers not to wait for agents, but to send the money direct, if they would oblige us. Post Masters are ready to frank the remittance. We shall in future send agents to make collections only when the bills are past hope. The present volume will soon close, and we hope for substantial remembrance from all whose accounts are due, and a large accession of new subscribers.

CELEBRATION AT HOPE.—Spartan Lodge No. 24, I. O. of O. F., will celebrate the birth-day of our National Independence on the 4th of July next, at Hope, N. J., by a procession, in appropriate regalia. An Oration will be delivered by A. C. L. Arnold, of New-York, and other ceremonies usual on such occasions. A good brass band will be in attendance. Members of the Order in general are respectfully solicited to attend.

MAINE.—A new Lodge, called the Oconostata Lodge No. 18, was instituted at Sullivan, Me., on the 8th of March last, and the following officers duly chosen and installed: B. G. Ingles, N. G.; E. H. Dyer, V. G.; H. S. Dyer, Sec.; and J. B. Monnell, Treas. This Lodge has commenced under flattering auspices.

FROM EUROPE.

By the arrival of the Niagara at this port, our advices are brought down to the 19th of May from Liverpool.

In England there appears to be little of interest. In the House of Commons notice has been given of a motion to expel Wm. Smith O'Brien, and an election for the vacancy was ordered. His friends had some intention of asking the Queen for his pardon, but abandoned the idea.

IRELAND.—The details of destitution continue to be most grievous—details from the perusal of which men shrink. We cannot specify any novelty in them; the same sad story, destitution and death, death and destitution, the parent dead and the children destitute, or the children dead and the parents destitute. Parliament takes time, death does not.—[Douglass Jerrold, May 19.]

The cholera has increased considerably during the past four days.

By the arrival of the Hermann steamship, we have English advices down to the 20th of May.

On the 19th an attempt was made to assassinate the Queen of England, by an Irishman, named John Hamilton. While the Queen and Prince Albert were passing from Hyde Park, down Constitution street, to Buckingham Palace, a laboring man, wearing a white flannel jacket, and bearing all the appearances of a mechanic, leveled a pistol at the Queen from within the railings of the Green Park, while the carriage was passing the curve of the hill, close to the triumphal arch. The assassin was arrested at once, and is a perfectly sane man. This attack on the Queen caused the greatest excitement in London.

OHIO.—Wm. H. FAIRCHILD, our duly authorized Agent, is now in Ohio, and will call on our subscribers there. We trust he will meet with the success which his character and deportment—always influenced with the spirit of genuine Odd Fellowship—entitle him to.

Varieties.

THE FLY.

The fly about the candle gay,
Dances with thoughtless hum;
But short, alas! his giddy play—
His pleasure proves his doom.
The child, in such simplicity,
About the beehive clings;
And with one drop of honey he Receives a thousand stings.

EVERY fiftieth person in the kingdom is a drunkard: one in every two hundred and eighty is a prisoner; and one in every seven hundred inhabits a lunatic asylum. Of the two latter classes the majority become so through drink.—[Eng. Paper.]

MR. SHEPHERD, of Frome, lecturing lately on "Forest Trees," quoted Loudon to the effect that the wood of the gray poplar if seasoned, is far more valuable than is commonly supposed; and that the old distich, said to have been inscribed on a poplar plank, is quite correct, viz:

"Though heart of oak be'er so stout,
Keep me dry, and I'll see him out."

BENEFIT OF READING SCRIPTURE.—A man in one of the New England States, who was hopefully converted, and united with an Evangelical church, in the course of his examination related his experience. In speaking of his past life, he said he had never stolen. "I did one night," said he, "go to a neighboring smoke-house, and I thought I would take a ham and carry home to my family; but just as I raised my hand to take it, that passage of scripture came to my mind,

The dog will bite
The thief at night, and I went off and left the ham."

In the list of the prosperous there are very few indeed who owe their advancement to talent and sagacity alone. The majority must attribute their rise to a continuation of industry, prudence, and good fortune; and there are many who are still more indebted to the lucky accidents of life than to their own character or conduct.

WHO KNOWS WHAT HE EATS?—The Literary Gazette states that preserved ginger is made in London of lettuce stalks, compressed into shape by steel moulds, and sweetened and flavored; while orange marked marmalade is often made of the pulp of oranges and turnips, the skins of the oranges being used to make candied orange peel.

GOLD.—Humboldt states, that in the three centuries ending with 1800, the gold imported from America was estimated in value at $75,000,000 sterling, and the silver at 1,280,000,000.

A SWEET COMMAND.—"Now put that right back where you took it from," as the girl said when her lover snatched a kiss.

THEODORE PARKER aptly compares some men who grow rich by trade to cabbages growing in a violet bed. They smother the violets, but are, after all, nothing but cabbages.

LIVE virtuously, my lord, and you cannot die too soon, nor live too long.—[Lady Rachel Russell.]

DIED.

At Canandaigua, on the 20th day of May, 1849, JULIA MARIA, wife of Brother Parahall, of Ontario Lodge No. 116, aged 23 years, and 9 months.

The Lodge met and passed appropriate resolutions, and the funeral was attended by a large portion of the members.

DIED.—At Lafargeville, Jefferson county, N. Y., May 29th, W. E. PARSONS, aged 25 years and 8 months; a member of Irondequoit Lodge, I. O. of O. F., Brownville, formerly of Delphi Lodge, Indiana. He served in the Mexican war as Adjutant of the 1st Regiment of Indiana Volunteers. While in the service, he was attacked by Chronic Diarrhoea, which after more than two years' suffering, terminated his earthly career. He was an energetic young man, beloved and esteemed by all who knew him.

At a special meeting of Irondequoit Lodge No. 392, Brownville, N. Y., held at their Lodge room, Wednesday evening, May 30, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Whereas, It has pleased Almighty God to remove by death our worthy Brother, W. E. PARSONS, "to that bourne from whence no traveler returns," and whereas we hold in the highest respect and esteem the character of the deceased—therefore Resolved, That in this afflictive dispensation we recognize the hand of an Allwise Providence, and that we tender our warmest sympathy to the family and friends of our deceased brother.

Resolved, That the brothers of this Lodge wear the usual badge of mourning, and that the Charter and Emblems be clothed in mourning during the remainder of the term.

Resolved, That copies of the above be forwarded to the family of our beloved brother, and to the Golden Rule, New York, for publication. HENRY LORD, N. G. N. C. KANE, Secretary.

CATARACT LODGE, I. O. O. F.,
Lockport, May 19, 1849.

At a special meeting held this evening, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Whereas, It has pleased God in his providence, to remove from the earth by death, our much esteemed brother, WM. M. CUNNINGHAM, P. O. of Kneeland Lodge No. 5, at Milwaukee, and P. S. W. of Wisconsin Encampment No. 1, and although our brother has had his home at a distance from us in another State, from whence driven by declining health, he had returned, to spend his last fleeting hours amid the scenes of his early youth; yet it is proper that we, the brothers of his Order, his friends and companions in times past, manifest our regard for our departed brother in the usual manner. Therefore

Resolved, That in the death of our brother Cunningham, the Order has lost a faithful, efficient, and valued member, his family a kind indulgent head, his relatives a true and faithful friend, and the community in which he resided, a citizen of high character and exemplary conduct in all the business and social relations of life.

Resolved, That not only as a brother of a fraternal Order, but as a member of that family of which God is the father, we sympathize with the relations and friends of the deceased in this their heavy bereavement, and that as a testimony of respect for the memory of our departed brother, we will attend his funeral in a body, wearing the ordinary badge of mourning.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, signed by the officers of this Lodge be forwarded by the Secretary under seal, to the relations of the deceased, to Wisconsin Encampment No. 1, at Milwaukee, Kneeland Lodge No. 5, at Milwaukee, and the Grand Lodge of the State of Wisconsin.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished to the newspapers of this village for publication, and to the Gazette of the Union and Golden Rule, New York.

M. W. EVANS, Secretary.

MONDAY MORNING, June 4th 1849.

At a meeting of GREENWICH Lodge No. 40, I. O. O. F. this morning for the purpose of joining in the 26th anniversary of the I. O. O. F. of the S. of N. Y., on the meeting being called to order, the sad intelligence of the death of our V. G., CHARLES D. ALLAIRE, was announced to the brothers then assembled, when the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That in consequence of the death of our worthy brother, V. G. Allaire, and as a testimony of our respect, this Lodge will not participate in the celebration of this day.

At the regular meeting of Greenwich Lodge on the same evening, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas, Almighty God has, in his Divine Providence, removed from our midst, by death, our beloved brother, Charles Duncan Allaire, Vice Grand of Greenwich Lodge No. 40, I. O. O. F.

Resolved, That in the death of V. G. Charles D. Allaire, this Lodge has lost an exemplary member and an efficient officer, whose warm heart and generous feelings had endeared him to all his associates.

Resolved, That Greenwich Lodge deeply and sincerely sympathizes with the bereaved family of our late beloved brother, who in him have lost an affectionate husband, and a kind father.

Resolved, That our Charter frame be dressed in mourning for the space of three months.

Resolved, That a copy of the above resolution, properly authenticated, be transmitted to the family of our deceased officer and brother.

Resolved, That the above proceedings and resolutions be published in the Tribune, Sun and Golden Rule.

Office of the Grand Secretary Grand Lodge State of N. Y.
ODD-FELLOW'S HALL, CITY OF NEW-YORK,
March 13, 1849.

To District Deputy Grand Masters, Officers of Lodges, and Brethren:

In consequence of the many complaints made to this Office of the failure of Deputies, Officers of Lodges and Members to receive communications which have been issued from this Office, and of the failure to receive many communications which have been intended to reach this Office, for several months last past, and which have been transmitted by Deputies, Lodges and individuals, you are therefore notified and requested to address all communications intended for the Grand Lodge, Grand Master, or Grand Secretary, to BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Box No. 838, Post Office, New-York, and in all cases to be particular that Letters and Documents are properly mailed, in order that a failure of papers intended for this, or sent from this Office, to reach their destination, may be traced to the proper cause.

Fraternally yours,

BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Grand Secretary.

GOURAUD'S LIBRARY OF ROMANCE.

JULIA WRIGHT—CANTO XIV.

Then, with a soldier's warmth, he seized her hand—
Imprinting as he press'd, a burning kiss
Upon the fingers; loosing all command
Over himself, exclaiming in his bliss,
"At cannon's mouth I'd willing take my stand,
And court its blaze—for rapture like this!
Accept me, and I'll marry you to-morrow
Reject me and you plunge me deep in sorrow!"

WHAT Julia's response to the Coronet's offer was, remains to be seen. It is probable that her thoughts were occupied with the uncouth appearance of her dark skin, red hair, pimpled face and hairy upper lip. If so, we would have informed her that GOURAUD'S ITALIAN MEDICATED SOAP, was all-sufficient to remove Pimples, Tan, Freckles, Sallow-ness or Roughness—in fact, to make the darkest skin white, clear and beautiful; GOURAUD'S GRECIAN HAIR DYE will color the reddest hair a beautiful brown or black. GOURAUD'S POUDES SUBTILES, are almost magical for extirpating superfluous hair.

The renowned preparations of Dr. FELIX GOURAUD can ONLY be procured genuine at his original depot, 67 Walker-st., 1st store from, (not in) Broadway.

DIRECTIONS.—We have received a small supply of this valuable work, and are now ready to fill orders, which may be accompanied by a remittance. Price 37¢ each.

CHARLES H. HARRISON, who has been acting as our Agent, having made no returns to us, and being, as we are informed, unworthy of such trust, we deem it necessary to caution all against paying him any subscriptions on account of the Gazette and Golden Rule. His former character having been good, we forbear further remarks at this time.

SOMETHING NEW.

From the Boston Daily Star, of Feb. 10, 1848.

No small excitement has existed among the nice young men, and the bald-pated old men lately, in consequence of the advent of a new hair liquid—Bogle's Hyperion—which is said to be voted, by the knowing ones, the ne plus ultra of all hair improving inventions. We have received from Mr. Bogle a sample of this novelty, and feel very much disposed, even on so short an acquaintance, to fall into the tide of praise which is setting towards it. We have given our pate a soak, and after due repetition, shall be able to speak more definitely of this important matter. We believe it is first rate,—but you can decide for yourself, by calling on Mr. Bogle, and trying it.

For Sale, Wholesale and Retail, by A. B. & D. Sands, 100 Fulton-st.; Rushton, Clark & Co., 110 and 273 Broadway, N. Y. To be obtained of the Proprietor and Manufacturer, Wm Bogle, 277 Washington-st., Boston, and of the principal Druggists and Perfumers in the United States and Canada.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK FOR JULY.

A TRIUMPHANT NUMBER.—84 PAGES.—30 EXTRA.

ANOTHER instance that the Lady's Book does not recede, but advances. Not like its contemporaries who gave 80 and 84 pages in January and February and now reduced to 60 and 64. They also promised colored Fashion Plates, and substitute wood engravings.

THE GREATEST NUMBER YET ISSUED!

MORE PAGES OF READING THAN JANUARY, AND MORE ILLUSTRATIONS.

SOMETHING NEW!

An Entirely New Cover.—A Line Engraving.

Some idea may be formed of the beauty of this number, from the following notice of its embellishments.

A steel engraving on the cover—Lady, Horse and Servant, engraved by Neagle.
The First Parting—a beautiful mezzotint, by Walters.
Returned from his Travels—do. do. by Welch.
A beautiful colored Summer Fashion Plate, by Pease.
Archery—an engraving on wood, by Kelly.
A Cottage Plate—printed in two colors, by Wagner & McGuinn.

Musical—two pages—original, and composed for the Book, by Cramer.

Greatest Hall at Mount Vernon, engraved by Frost.

The Pic Nic Party, by Croomie.

Front elevation of W. H. Gatzmer's Cottage, by Frost.

Ground Plan of do. do. by Frost.

Each of the above occupy one full page, making 11 in all.

Entirely New Set of Wood Engravings.

The Cage Birds of America—two beautiful designs, showing the perfection to which the art of wood engraving has been brought.

The Monthly Bouquet for July.

Patterns for Braiding, prepared expressly for the Lady's Book.

RECAPITULATION.

The July number contains 15 engravings, 11 of these occupying one page each—two of them Mezzotints, two Line Engravings and two Colored Engravings.

The July number contains 84 pages—36 of which are extra.

The July number contains 38 distinct articles by able authors.

In short, it may in every respect be termed

A DOUBLE NUMBER.

And the whole volume will be continued in a style of excellence never before equalled, with some improvements which we dare not even hint at. It will be

ONE BLAZE OF BEAUTY THROUGHOUT.

The publisher of the Lady's Book pledges his well earned reputation of twenty years, that his work shall surpass both in the number of pages published, and the number, beauty, and variety of his engravings, any other work published in

THIS OR ANY OTHER COUNTRY.

Besides giving more matter in every number than any other publication, he gives in addition to those who pay three dollars, the Lady's Dollar Newspaper, of large size, published twice a month. The paper alone contains more reading than any monthly except the Lady's Book. Thus $3 subscribers get three publications each month, fully equal to two magazines. This is a better premium than the miserable engravings offered by others.

PROF. BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS, OR MEDICATED COMPOUND,

FOR RESTORING, PRESERVING AND BEAUTIFYING HAIR, ERADICATING SCURF AND DANDRUFF, AND CURING DISEASES OF THE SKIN, GLANDS, AND MUSCLES, CUTS, STINGS, BRUISES, SPRAINS, &c. &c.

IN order to convince the public of the efficacy of any curative preparation, in this thinking and reflective age, it is necessary to explain the philosophy of its operation. The process by which Professor Barry's Tricopherous produces such extraordinary results, cannot be understood without a brief notice of the structure and uses of the delicate substances to which it is applied, and in the condition of which it accomplishes the most salutary changes. The connexion between the hair and the skin is so close, that the one may be almost deemed a continuation of the other, and hence whatever renovates, restores, and nourishes the hair, must of necessity have a healthful influence upon the sensitive membrane in which its roots are fixed.

The skin, that wonderful envelop in which the sense of touch resides, consists of three layers; the EPIDERMIS or cuticle, a semi-opaque, or almost insensible film; the RETICULUM, which is a spongy membrane reticulated with nerves and blood-vessels, and forms a sort of shield to the exquisitely delicate TRUE SKIN; and the true skin itself, which constitutes the third layer of the triple envelop. In this tough, flexible and elastic integument, are located the nerves, blood-vessels, &c., which supply sustenance to the hair, and in the derangement of which diseases of the skin originate. The vessels of the true skin supply the sacs containing the roots of the hair with the moisture which sustains the fibres, and the same causes which affect the health of the hair, also affect the health of the skin. This is self-evident to the casual observer, as well as susceptible of demonstration by the anatomist and physiologist; for in all cutaneous diseases, the hair becomes dry and harsh, and falls out in such quantities as sometimes to render the patient partially or entirely bald. Wounds, burns, &c., on the skin of the head, also produce baldness on the portions of the scalp where the injury has been inflicted, thus proving the close affinity and sympathy between the organism of the skin and the hair.

The wonderful restorative and remedial properties of Professor Barry's Tricopherous, are based upon this hypothesis, or rather this fact. It acts through the skin upon the hair, stimulating the inert vessels, opening the pores, imparting activity to the circulation, awakening from their lethargy all the vegetative functions which give life, vigor, and beauty to the fibres, extirpating every particle of scurf and dandruff, and soon clothing even the bald or half denuded head with a thick, glossy, silky, and elastic covering.

But this is only ONE of the uses of Professor Barry's Tricopherous. The same properties which restore vital and vegetative power the skin of the head are equally beneficial in all cutaneous diseases, or superficial injuries. For cuts, burns, bites of insects, sprains, erysipelas, blotches, pimples, scabies, ring-worm, rashes, scrofula, prickly heat, chilblains, chapped hands, rheumatism, burns, scalds, bruises, redness of the skin, and in short all the troublesome and painful external diseases and injuries which are so common in families, and which NOTHING BUT EXTERNAL REMEDIES CAN REMOVE, the Tricopherous will be found a speedy, safe, and unfailing cure. By virtue of its double claim as a renovator and beautifier of nature's choicest ornament, and a potent and invaluable remedial agent, it is entitled to a place on every toilet, and in every medicine chest.

Sold in large bottles, price 25 cents, at the principal office, 139 Broadway, and by druggists and perfumers generally throughout the United States and Canada. 256

THE PROPRIETORS having spent much time

in bringing this preparation of Sarsaparilla to its present state of perfection; and the experience of fourteen years has furnished them the most ample opportunity to study, in their various forms, the diseases for which it is recommended, and to adapt it exactly to their relief and cure. Patients who wish a really good Medicine are invited to give it a trial, and satisfy themselves of its superiority, and the invaluable property it possesses of arresting and curing disease. The bottle has been enlarged to hold one Quart, and in its present improved form may safely claim to be the best and cheapest medicine of the age. Its progress to the fame it has attained may be traced by a long line of facts and cures, that stand as landmarks and beacons for the invalid, pointing the way to the haven of health; and what it has already done for the thousands still suffering and struggling with disease. It purifies, cleanses, and strengthens the fountain springs of life, and infuses new vigor throughout the whole animal frame.

DYSPEPSY CURED.

The following testimonial, from a gentleman so well known as Mr. Cox, requires no comment, and recommends itself to all similarly afflicted: NEW-ORLEANS, Dec. 18, 1848.

Messrs. A. B. & D. SANDS—Gentlemen: Having experienced the most beneficial effects from the use of your Sarsaparilla, it gives me pleasure to add my testimony to the numerous spontaneous effusions of grateful hearts which you continually are receiving.

My case was dyspeptic, or rather I may term it a weakness of the digestive organs. For more than a year, I was troubled with wind upon my stomach and its frequent eructation, together with producing a spasmodic contraction of the heart, often gave me much annoyance. After trying various remedies without avail, I commenced with your Sarsaparilla. Before I had used half a bottle, almost every symptom of this disagreeable complaint had vanished, and in a few weeks its continued use effected a complete cure. I therefore confidently recommend it to all persons affected in the same manner, and have reason to believe that many who are suffering under a supposed disease of the heart, if they would take your Sarsaparilla, in a few weeks would find themselves restored to health in both mind and body. I remain yours, very truly, JOHN W. COX, 93 Lexington Avenue.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA IN PRUSSIA.

The Proprietors of this valuable Medicine have just received an order from our esteemed friend and correspondent, Theodore S. Fay, Secretary of Legation to the Court of Prussia, for the use of a member of the Royal Family—a copy of which we herewith lay before our readers.—[Home Journal. "U. S. LEGATION, BERLIN, Nov. 30, 1848.—Gentlemen: I wish you to send two dozen bottles of your Sarsaparilla, for the use of his Royal Highness Prince Waldimir of Prussia, to this Legation, as soon as possible. It is necessary that he should receive it immediately; therefore, please send it by first steamer. The bill can be made out in the name of the Prince, and sent with it: Your obedient servant, THEO. S. FAY."

SCROFULOUS AFFECTION OF THE EYES.

SOUTH KINGSTON, (R. I.) Oct. 11, 1847.—Messrs. SANDS—Gentlemen: My little daughter, when one year old, was attacked with a scrofulous humor on her face, which soon after extended into her eyes, causing almost total blindness in one of them, and disfiguring her whole face. I employed two physicians to attend her, who exhausted their utmost skill to give her relief, but it all proved useless, and finally one of them remarked to me that he had known of some striking cures effected by Sands' Sarsaparilla, and advised me to try it. I obtained one bottle, which she commenced using, and before it was all used up it had effected an entire cure. It is now over four years since she was cured, and there has been no reappearance of the disease, and we are satisfied that it is a perfect cure. It gives me great pleasure to add that I can recommend it to any sufferer from a similar complaint. Respectfully yours, GEORGE ROBINSON.

OLD Jacob Townsend, THE ORIGINAL OF THE TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA DOCTOR DISCOVERER GENUINE

Old Dr. Townsend is now about 70 years of age, and has long been known as the AUTHOR and DISCOVERER of the GENUINE ORIGINAL "TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA." Being poor, he was compelled to sell his manufacture, but he kept out of market, and the sales procured to those only who had proved its worth and known its value. It had reached the ears of many, nevertheless, as those persons who had been healed of sore diseases, and saved from death, proclaimed its excellence and wonderful HEALING POWER. This is manufactured on the largest scale, and is called for throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Unlike young S. F. Townsend's, it improves with age, and never changes, but for the better; because it is prepared on scientific principles by a scientific man. The highest knowledge of Chemistry, and the latest discoveries of the Art, have all been brought into requisition in the manufacture of the OLD DR.'S SARSAPARILLA. The Sarsaparilla root, it is well known to medical men, contains medicinal properties, and some properties which are inert or useless; and others, which, if retained in preparing it for use, produce fermentation and acid, which is injurious to the system. Some of the properties of Sarsaparilla are so volatile, that they entirely evaporate and are lost in the preparation, if they are not preserved by a scientific process, known only to those experienced in its manufacture. Moreover, these volatile principles, which fly off in vapor, or as an exhalation, under heat, are the very essential medicinal properties of the root, which give to it all its value. The

GENUINE Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's Sarsaparilla is so prepared, that all the inert properties of the Sarsaparilla root are removed, every thing capable of becoming acid, or of fermentation, is extracted and rejected; then every particle of medicinal virtue is secured in a pure and concentrated form; and thus it is rendered incapable of losing any of its valuable and healing properties. Prepared in this way, it is made the most powerful agent in the

Cure of Innumerable Diseases.
 Hence the reason why we hear commendations on every side in its favor by men, women, and children. We find it doing wonders in the cure of CONSUMPTION, DYSPPEPSIA, and LIVER COMPLAINT, and in RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA and PILES, COSTIVENESS, all CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, and all affections arising from

Impurity of the Blood.
 It possesses a marvellous efficacy in all complaints arising from indigestion, from Acidity of the Stomach; from unclean circulation, determination of blood to the head, palpitation of the heart, cold feet and cold hands, cold soles and hot flashes over the body. It has not had its equal in coughs and colds; and promotes easy expectoration, and gentle perspiration, relaxing strictures of the lungs, throat, and every other part. But in nothing is its excellence more manifestly seen and acknowledged than in all kinds and stages of

Female Complaints.
 It works wonders in cases of fluor albus or whites, Falling of the Womb, Obstructed, Suppressed, or Painful Menstrues, Irregularity of the menstrual periods, and the like; and is effectual in curing all forms of the Kidney Disease.

By removing obstructions, and regulating the general system, it gives tone and strength to the whole body, and cures all forms of Nervous Diseases and Debility, and thus prevents or relieves a great variety of other diseases, as Spinal Irritation, Neuralgia, St. Vitus Dance, Swooning, Epileptic Fits, Convulsions, &c.

It is not possible for this medicine to fail to do good; it has nothing in it which can ever harm; it can never sour or spoil, and therefore, can never lose its curative properties. It cleanses the blood, excites the liver to healthy action, purifies the system, and gives good digestion, relieves the bowels of torpor and constipation, allays inflammation, purifies the skin, equalizes the circulation of the blood, producing gentle warmth equally all over the body, and the insensible perspiration; relaxes all strictures and tightness, removes all obstructions, and invigorates the entire nervous system. Is not this, then, the

The Medicine you Pre-eminently Need?
 But can any of these things be said of S. F. Townsend's inferior article? This young man's liquid is not to be

Compared with the Old Dr.'s, because of one GRAND FACT, that the one is INCAPABLE of DETE-RIORATION and

Never Spoils,
 while the other DOES; it sours, ferments, and blows the bottles containing it into fragments; the sour, acid liquid exploding, and damaging other goods; must not this be a terrible composition to the system?

What put acid into a system already diseased with acid? What causes Dyspepsia but acid? Do we not all know, that when food enters our stomachs, what mischief it produces—distention, heartburn, palpitation of the heart, liver complaint, diarrhoea, dysentery, colic, and corruption of the blood? What Scrofula but an acid question, relieves the bowels of torpor and constipation, allays inflammation, purifies the skin, equalizes the circulation of the blood, producing gentle warmth equally all over the body, and the insensible perspiration; relaxes all strictures and tightness, removes all obstructions, and invigorates the entire nervous system. Is not this, then, the

 OF S. F. TOWNSEND!

and yet he would fain have it understood that Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's GENUINE ORIGINAL SARSAPARILLA, is an IMITATION of his inferior preparation!

Heaven forbid that we should deal in an article which would bear the most distant resemblance to S. F. Townsend's article! and which would bring down upon the Old Dr. such a mountain load of complaints and comminations from Agents who have sold and purchasers who have used S. F. Townsend's FERMENTING PREPARATION!

We wish it understood, because it is the absolute truth, that S. F. Townsend's article and Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's Sarsaparilla are heaven-wide apart, and infinitely dissimilar; that they are unlike in every particular, having not one single thing in common.

As S. F. Townsend is no doctor, and never was, is no chemist, no pharmacist—knows no more of medicine or disease than any other common, unscientific, unprofessional man, what guarantee can the public have that they are receiving a genuine scientific medicine, containing all the virtues of the articles used in preparing it, and which are incapable of change when might render them the AGENTS of DISEASE instead of health?

It is to arrest frauds upon the unfortunate, to pour balm into wounded humanity, to kindle hope in the despairing bosom, to restore health and bloom and vigor into the crushed and broken, and to banish infirmity—OLD DR. JACOB TOWNSEND HAS SOUGHT and FOUND the opportunity and means to bring his

Grand Universal Concentrated Remedy, within the reach, and to the knowledge of all who need it, that they may learn and know, by joyful experience, its

Transcendent Power to Heal!
 and thus to have the unsurpassable satisfaction of having raised thousands and millions from a bed of sickness and dependency to hope, health, and a long life of vigorous and cheerful activity, and to themselves and friends.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE QUADROON'S FATE.

A dram of poison. Such soon-speeding gives
As will disperse itself throughout the veins.
ROMEO AND JULIET.

"DRINK, Filippa—drink of the wine, to our lasting friendship. Does Alice sleep?"

"Yes," murmured the quadroon, as if talking to herself. "She sleeps sweetly in yonder room. Ah, how happy will she be when on waking she hears her father's voice, and knows that she will soon behold his face. Sleep on, dear Alice! Would that Filippa could sleep like thee!"

"You are free, now, Filippa! Banish all fear and sorrow!"

Thus spoke Matthew Orrall, as he sat with the quadroon in a small apartment of the dwelling which he occupied since his arrival in Paris. For the first hour for many years, the man felt something in his dark soul like happiness. He had thus far triumphed over Atree; he had gained the pious wish of his heart, sight for his blind child; she was now beneath his roof sweetly slumbering; and lastly, a strangely fascinating woman sat beside him, and pledged him in the bright red wine.

"You are free, Filippa! Banish all sorrow!" "Yet have I betrayed my master," answered the quadroon—"and Gotta, my mother, has cursed me."

"But you have saved the life of both," cried the bravo fiercely. "I had sworn the death of Robert Atree."

"But you will free him now!—you will keep your word with Filippa?"

"Ay! He shall go! what seek I of the worm?" exclaimed the bravo. "Drink to our love, Filippa."

"I cannot be happy—I cannot love—till my master be safe!" answered the girl.

"You are a strange girl—but listen! If you doubt my word, you shall yourself behold him at liberty—" The bravo rose, as he spoke, and took from his pocket a key.

"Ah! is he here?" murmured the quadroon.

"He is! he has been here since early day," answered Orrall. "Come yourself and I will show you where he is secured."

The girl followed the bravo from the apartment, and together they descended to the basement of the building. Traversing a portion of the cellar, they reached a door strongly barred and locked. "Your master is within that apartment," said Orrall, "but I dare not liberate him till the night-falls. And then he must not leave the house by its front entrance, but by a passage leading through yonder door." He pointed to another door at the extremity of the cellar.

"And that leads," he continued, "to a street at some distance from this, which they call the Morgue. Now, shall I show you your master?"

"Ah, will you promise me he shall be free to-night!" cried the quadroon.

"To-night, you yourself shall liberate him."

"Now, I will love you!" cried the girl impulsively. "Now, we will drink the bright wine together!"

Matthew Orrall sat once more at the table, and pledged his beautiful companion in a brimming glass. "I drink to our love!" he cried. "Will you not love me, and remain with me while I live?" asked he, passionately.

The quadroon turned her large eyes upon him, and smiled with brilliant joy.

"While you live, I will be with you," she answered.

The bravo drank the goblet of red wine!

"Ha, ha!" he cried—"the draught fires my veins with the blood of youth! I am alive once more: By heaven! my pulses leap as they did some twenty years ago!"

"Drink again,—the wine is gladdening to the heart," cried the quadroon. Her eyes now flamed with fearful light.

"Give me the goblet, Filippa! Ha, ha! We will away together—Alice, and you, and I. I have store of jewels worth a million pounds! all shall be for Alice and Filippa. Ha, ha! We will lead a brave life together!"

The bravo drained another goblet.

"Is not the wine good?" asked the dark-eyed quadroon.

"Ha! what is this?" cried Matthew Orrall, leaping to his feet. "I feel a flame in my heart. A terrible roar is in my brain! Filippa! Filippa! the wine will make us mad. Let us drink no more!"

"Drink again! 'twill make thee happy!" answered the girl—and her red lip curled with a smile like the sneer of Orrall himself. She filled another goblet as she spoke.

"Ha! by the fiend! there is foul work here!" cried the bravo, suddenly catching the basilisk glance which glittered over him those large black eyes, Filippa! "May the devil — Hah!"

Mat Orrall staggered toward the quadroon. She rose and confronted him, drawing the bright stiletto from her bosom. A fiery agony burned in the man's veins, and his eyes were straining from their sockets.

"I betrayed not my master—but thee!" murmured the girl. "The wine is —"

"Poisoned!" yelled Orrall, and clutched at the girl's throat. She sprang back, and raised her stiletto. Her eyes gleamed fearfully.

But what was peril to the maddened bravo? He dashed forward upon the quadroon, and with his huge strength bore her to the floor. Twice the stiletto rose, and twice it sank to the hilt in the man's bosom.

Then Matthew Orrall knelt with his knees, upon the breast of the brave quadroon, while still her flashing eyes were fixed upon his countenance. He wrested the dagger from her grasp, as it was aimed for a third blow, and then clasp- ing his fingers around her polished throat, forced the white teeth apart with the dagger's point.

Filippa struggled, but the bravo's strength was that of madness. He seized the yet untouched goblet which the quadroon had last filled, and raising it from the table, poured its poisoned contents down the maiden's throat.

It was the last deed of Matthew Orrall. He held the glass till the last red drop had left it. Then, with a fierce laugh, he hurled it from him, and sprang to his feet. His chest collapsed—he drew a gasping breath—and then fell heavily upon the floor—a corpse.

Slowly, and painfully, the quadroon Filippa raised her feeble frame, and glanced wildly around. Then she drew near to the bravo, and gazed upon his blackened features. "I murdered him," she murmured—"but—but—it was to save my master!"

She rose to her feet, while the fever of poison began to work in her veins. O, beautiful looked that maiden, as she stood for a moment, erect, her glorious eyes raised above, and her breast heaving and throbbing with fiery agony.

She stooped over the body of the murdered bravo, and drew from his vest a bunch of keys. "I am dying," she said, in a low voice—"but I will save Robert—I will save him before I die!"

Then with faltering footsteps, she left the apartment, while, mingled with the red wine, the blood of Orrall flowed slowly from his lifeless body over the floor.

"Awake, my master—arise!"

Thus whispered the quadroon to the slumbering Robert Atree in the room below. He started from his sleep, and beheld the form of Filippa bending over him. Her garments were stained with blood—her face white as that of the dead.

"Come with me! You are saved!" cried the quadroon, and the man followed her footsteps till they stood together in the chamber where lay the dead bravo.

"Behold!"

"Matthew Orrall! dead!" cried Atree.
 "Thus have I saved your life, my master!" murmured the quadroon.
 "You! is it by your hand, Filippa? But, hah—what ails you, my girl—why do you tremble, Filippa?"
 "I am dying!"

"No! say not so, Filippa! Lean on me! what ails you, child?"

The quadroon shrank from her master. "I am dying," she said. "But in yonder room is Alice—"

"Alice! here!"

"Thus only could I save my master's life," murmured the quadroon. "I have bought thy life with mine!"

"Foolish child! you know not what you are saying! The wine has made you—"

The girl gathered herself up and fixed her dark eyes upon her master. "Thrice have I saved thee!" she sighed, and then sunk upon the floor.

"Hah! what means this? Is she indeed dying?" Robert Atree stooped beside the girl. "Filippa," he cried—"Forgive me—speak to me!"

"I die for thee—"

"Nay, nay!—you will live, my child?"

"One—one favor—dear master—one—"

"What is it, Filippa?"

"I am dying! kiss me!"

Robert Atree bent his lips upon those of his slave. Her mouth clung to them convulsively, while a tremor shook her whole frame. One sigh escaped her—one murmuring word—it was "Robert."

Then the quadroon slave-girl was dead. She had never revealed her love; but she had perished for her lover.

CHAPTER XXIII.

PULASKI.

"The brave—
 Who found on freedom's soil a grave
 His own denied."

JULIAN.

THREE years have passed since the events transpired with which our story opens; three years of comparative peace to the southern colonies. The gallant repulse of the British at Fort Sullivan had rolled back the tide of war upon the northern and middle sections of our country, where Washington himself, with various fortunes, withstood the foes of freedom.

During this period, many of the hardest battles of our first campaign had been lost and won. Trenton, Princeton, Germantown, Brandywine, and the magnificent engagement of Monmouth, had inspired the British commanders with different feelings from those with which, at the commencement of the war, they had looked for the speedy reduction of "his majesty's rebellious subjects." And the living martyrdom of "Valley Forge," borne with uncomplaining patience by the patriot army, had convinced their enemies that such a people, though defeated, could never be subdued.

But now a dark cloud seemed to be hanging over the hopes of the patriots. The storm which had been delayed so long was now gathering its force against the south, and threatening to break upon her hitherto quiet valleys.

Charleston was again besieged. Around the city lay the investing army of the British General Prevost, and within the small forces of the Americans were commanded by the immortal Pulaski.

Pulaski, the devoted young Polander, was now in his thirty-second year. Outlawed by the tyrannical destroyer of his country's liberties, and despairing of achieving her salvation, he had torn himself away from the land he loved so well, and now upon the soil of America, again raised his arm against the enemies of freedom. Dispatched by Washington to the relief of the Carolinas, which at this juncture were threatened with invasion by the vengeful Britons, he had reached Charleston, with his legion, just in time to anticipate the approach of Prevost, and prepare for a strenuous defense.

The force of Pulaski consisted of his own "legion," and the hastily raised assistance of a few hundred patriots of Charleston and the surrounding country; and with these he determined, if possible, to hold possession of the city until the arrival of the American succors, under command of General Lincoln.

But the inhabitants, fearful of the consequences, should they, by a protracted resistance, provoke the rage of the English commander, and hopeless of being enabled to withstand the enemy until the arrival of General Lincoln, were, as a general thing, anxious to capitulate; and, while yet they could, to make favorable terms with Prevost. But this the fearless Polander opposed with determined resolution.

"Better," said he, "capitulate with arms in your hands, and with defying front. Better capitulate in the enemy's camp, and with the language of your cannon. Then the terms will be for us to decide, and for the Britons to submit to."

But unhappily, such noble sentiments as these were unshared by the majority of the citizens, and it required all the eloquence and sagacity of Pulaski to prevent their throwing themselves into negotiation with Prevost.

It was evening once more in Charleston—one of those delightful, mellow evenings, which make May beautiful in southern regions. The sun had not yet sank beneath the horizon, and his beams yet slanted across the roofs of the city, and tinged the tree-tops with golden luster. They fell upon the white tents of the British encampment, and upon the royal banners, fluttering above them.

And those departing day-beams stole through the open casement of a dwelling, in the upper part of Charleston, and trembled around the head of a young girl, who knelt beside a couch. It was one of those quiet old chambers which we sometimes meet with, even now, in a few old-time mansions of the south, paneled with carved wainscoting, and hung with ancient family portraits, that seemed like strange sentinels upon the wall, watching the living generations pass away beneath them.

The figure of the girl who knelt upon the floor was slight and elegant. Her long black ringlets hung disordered over her white shoulders, and as she bent, with her face buried in the coverlid of the couch, it was evident that she was suffering the deepest mental anguish. Heavy sobs at times burst from her breast, and her whole form seemed shaken with grief.

Upon the bed itself lay an old man, his shrunken forehead sprinkled with gray hairs. His eyes were closed at this moment, but he slumbered not, for his fingers nervously clutched the covering, and his features ever and anon were convulsed as if with pain. The old man was dying, and it was his daughter who knelt beside him.

That young girl, sobbing in agony at her father's dying bed, was Louise Rivers, the bride of one short day.

Three years had passed, and oh, the suffering of those dreadful years! Louise, stricken down, by the terrible announcement of her husband's fate, had been lifted from the ground, bereft of reason. Her brain, overpowered by the awful weight which so suddenly fell upon it, had in mercy been permitted to reel and wander; and thus her young existence had been saved.

For two years she had been a maniac—not wild nor violent, but with that settled, hopeless melancholy, which draws tears from every pitying beholder. She never wept; but there was such a sorrow in her every look, so much despairing grief, in the perpetual sad smile which dwelt upon her pallid lip, that it wrung the heart of every friend to look upon her.

Her father, Mr. Arnoult, was nearly broken-hearted, too, at the double loss of his cherished son-in-law and his gentle daughter's reason; but he bowed himself, with the humility of a Christian, to the fearful stroke, and, when the first shock of his bereavement was over, devoted himself incessantly to his stricken child.

His business, materially damaged by the sacrifices of property which he had made for his country, and from the capture of many of his vessels by British privateers, was now almost entirely neglected by the old merchant. One by one pecuniary losses came upon him, and step by step he became reduced in fortune. But the father heeded not the approach of ruin. He was wrapped up in his maniac child, and the whole world of his future life seemed centered in her person. For days and nights, and months and weeks, Mr. Arnoult never left her side, and the pale mourner seemed to cling only to him, and was never contented without him. He would lead her out over the green fields, and by the river's banks, and kneel beside her to pluck the daisies and cowslips, which with childish earnestness she would weave into garlands to deck her glossy hair. He would pillow her cheek for hours upon his bosom, and watch her slumbers. And that broken down old man would moan with agony, as he kissed the white brow of his child, and marked her faded features. Often and often the maniac girl awoke with her pale face wet with her parent's sorrowing tears. Ah, what a fearful three years mourning was this of the old man Arnoult.

Louise, we have said, never wept. Her tears were shed from her heart, daily, hourly, wasting her young life. At times, she would shrink to her father's side, and throwing her arms convulsively around his neck, gaze with harrowing intensity into his eyes, and murmur:

"Where is he? where is Ernest? Father—where is Ernest?"

And then Arnoult, stooping down to kiss her white brow, would answer softly—

"He will come, my Louise!"

Then Louise would raise her eyes to heaven, and with a sad smile parting her lips, seem to thank her father for the comfort which he gave her.

But now, in the golden light of that southern sunset, the crazed head of his victim rested upon her dying father's bedside. Still the old man's eyes were closed and his fingers strayed over the coverlid, grasping its folds. And still his deep sobs shook the mad girl's breast.

And now another figure stood suddenly within the chamber, intercepting the sun's rays. It was that of a martial-looking man, with a dark, but melancholy countenance, and eyes singularly soft, as they rested now upon the objects before him. He was clad in the uniform of a cavalry officer, and a heavy, horseman's saber hung at his thigh. He held in his hand a chapeau, from which depended a long white plume; and, as he stood surveying the sad spectacle within the apartment, it was impossible to conceive of a more striking figure.

Suddenly the kneeling girl raised her head, and turned her eyes toward the visitor, for her ears had caught the clanking of his sword against his iron-bound boot.

Ah, what a countenance was that now lifted up to the gaze of the soldier. So lovely, and yet so despairing—so sweet, yet so fearfully sorrowful! Beautiful indeed was Louise even now, but it was the strange beauty of inward grief, made holy. The light was no more in her young eyes, as when we first beheld her clinging proudly to her husband's arm. The glow was no more on her cheek, nor the freshness upon her lip.

But beautiful—still beautiful—was the mad Louise Rivers.

The soldier stretched out his arms before him, and the young girl arose, and came to him, and kissed his hands. Then the visitor bent down, and pressed his lips upon her pure forehead. O the loveliness of that unspoken sympathy! It was the silent interchange of unsullied natures.

That soldier was Casimir Pulaski!

His soft eyes were moist, as he gazed from the face of the maiden to that of her dying sire. He raised his glance to heaven.

And at that moment, the curtains of the window, were thrust suddenly aside, and the figure of a man sprang through the casement, and stood before Pulaski and the girl whose hands he clasped.

TO BE CONCLUDED.

A MOTHER'S LOVE.

If there be one thing pure,
 Where all beside is sullied;
 That can endure,

When all else pass away;
 If there be ought
 Surpassing human deed, or word or thought,
 It is a mother's love.

Experience of a Barrister.

THE MOTHER AND SON.

DINNER had been over about half an hour one Sunday afternoon—the only day on which for years I had been able to enjoy a dinner—and I was leisurely sipping a glass of wine, when a carriage drove rapidly up to the door, a loud rat-tat followed, and my friend Dr. Curteis, to my great surprise, was announced.

"I have called," said the doctor as we shook hands, "to ask you to accompany me to Mount Place. I have just received a hurried note from Miss Armitage, stating that her mother, after a very brief illness, is rapidly sinking, and requesting my attendance, as well as that of a legal gentleman, immediately."

"Mrs. Armitage?" I exclaimed, inexpressibly shocked. "Why, it is scarcely more than a fortnight ago that I met her at the Rochfords in brilliant health and spirits."

"Even so. But will you accompany me? I don't know where to find any one else for the moment, and time presses."

"It is an attorney, probably, rather than a barrister, that is needed; but under the circumstances, and knowing her as I do, I cannot hesitate."

We were soon bowling along at a rapid pace, and in little more than an hour reached the dying lady's residence, situated in the county of Essex, and distant about ten miles from London. We entered together; and Dr. Curteis, leaving me in the library, proceeded at once to the sick chamber. About ten minutes afterwards the housekeeper, a tall, foreign-looking, and rather handsome woman, came into the room, and announced that the doctor wished to see me. She was deadly pale, and, I observed, trembled like an aspen. I motioned her to precede me; and she, with unsteady steps, immediately led the way. So great was her agitation, that twice, in ascending the stairs, she only saved herself from falling by grasping the banister-rail. The preface I drew from the exhibition of such overpowering emotion, by a person whom I knew to have been long not only in the service, but in the confidence of Mrs. Armitage, was soon confirmed by Dr. Curteis, whom we met coming out of the chamber of the expiring patient.

"Step this way," said he, addressing me, and leading to an adjoining apartment. "We do not require your attendance, Mrs. Bourdon," said he, as soon as we reached it, to the housekeeper, who had swiftly followed us, and now stood staring with eager eyes in the doctor's face, as if life and death hung on his lips. "Have the goodness to leave us," he added tartly, perceiving she did not stir, but continued her fearful, scrutinising glance. She started at his altered tone, flushed crimson, then paled to a chalky whiteness, and muttering, left the apartment.

"The danger of her mistress has bewildered her," I remarked.

"Perhaps so," remarked Dr. Curteis. "Be that as it may, Mrs. Armitage is beyond all human help. In another hour she will be, as we say, no more."

"I feared so. What is the nature of her disorder?"

"A rapid wasting away, as I am informed. The appearances presented are those of a person expiring of atrophy, or extreme emaciation."

"Indeed. And so sudden too?"

"Yes. I am glad you are come, although your professional services will not, it seems, be required—a neighboring attorney having performed the necessary duty—something, I believe, relative to the will of the dying lady. We will speak further together by and by. In the meantime," continued Dr. Curteis, with a perceptible tremor in his voice, "it will do neither of us any harm to witness the closing scene of the life of Mary Rawdon, whom you and I twenty years ago worshiped as one of the gentlest and most beautiful of beings with which the Creator ever graced his universe. It will be a peaceful parting. Come."

Just as, with noiseless footsteps, we entered the silent death-chamber, the last rays of the setting sun were falling upon the figure of Ellen Armitage—who knelt in speechless agony by the bedside of her expiring parent—and faintly lighting up the pale, emaciated, sunken features of the so lately brilliant, courted Mrs. Armitage! But for the ineffaceable splendor of her deep-blue eyes, I should scarcely have recognised her. Standing in the shadow, as thrown by the heavy bed-drapery, we gazed and listened unperceived.

"Ellen," murmured the dying lady, "come nearer to me. It is growing dark, and I cannot see you plainly. Now, then, read to me, beginning at the verse you finished with as good Dr. Curteis entered. Ay," she faintly whispered, "it is thus, Ellen, with thy hand clasped in mine, and with the words of the holy book sounding from thy dear lips, that I would pass away!"

Ellen, interrupted only by her blinding tears, making sad stops, complied. Twilight stole on, and threw its shadow over the solemn scene, deepening its holiness of sorrow. Night came with all her train; and the silver radiance kissed into ethereal beauty the pale face of the weeping girl, still pursuing her sad and sacred task. We hesitated to disturb, by the slightest movement, the repose of a death-bed over which belief and hope, those only potent ministers, shed light and calm! At length Dr. Curteis advanced gently toward the bed, and taking the daughter's hand, said in a low voice, "Had you not better retire, my dear young lady, for a few moments?" She understood him, and raising from her knees threw herself in an ecstasy of grief upon the corpse, from which the spirit had just passed away. Assistance was summoned, and the sobbing girl was borne to the chamber.

I descended, full of emotion, to the library, where Dr. Curteis promised shortly to join me. Noiselessly entering the room, I came suddenly upon the housekeeper and a tall young man, standing with their backs toward me in the recesses of one of the windows, and partly shrouded by the heavy cloth curtains. They were evidently in earnest conference, and several words, the significance of which did not at the moment strike me, reached my ears before they perceived my approach. The instant they did so, they turned hastily round, and eyed me with an expression of flurried alarm, which at the time surprised me not a little. "All is over, Mrs. Bourdon," said I, finding she did not speak; "and your presence is probably needed by Miss Armitage." A flash of intelligence, as I spoke, passed between the pair; but whether indicative of grief or joy, so momentary was the glance, I should have been puzzled to determine. The housekeeper immediately left the room, keeping her eyes, as she passed, fixed upon me with the same nervous apprehensive look which had before irritated Dr. Curteis. The young man followed more slowly. He was a tall and rather handsome youth, apparently about one or two-and-twenty years of age. His hair was black as jet, and his dark eyes were of singular brilliancy; but the expression, I thought, was scarcely a refined or highly-intellectual one. His resemblance to Mrs. Bourdon, whose son indeed he was, was very striking. He bowed slightly, but courteously, as to an equal, as he closed the door, and I was left to the undisturbed enjoyment of my own reflections, which, ill-defined and indistinct as they were, were anything but pleasant company. My reverie was at length interrupted by the entrance of the doctor, with the announcement that the carriage was in waiting to re-convey us to town.

We had journeyed several miles on our return before a word had been spoken by either of us. My companion was apparently even more painfully preoccupied than myself. He was, however, the first to break the silence.

"The emaciated corpse we have just left little resembles the gay and beautiful girl, for whose smiles you and I were once disposed to shoot each other."

The doctor's voice trembled with emotion, and his face, I perceived, was pale as marble.

"Mary Rawdon," I remarked, "lives again in her daughter."

"Yes, her very image. Do you know," continued he, speaking with rapid energy, "I suspect Mary Rawdon—Mrs. Armitage, I would say—has been foully, treacherously dealt with!"

I started with amazement; and yet the announcement but embodied and gave form and color to my own ill-defined and shadowy suspicions.

"Good heavens! How? By whom?"

"Unless I am greatly mistaken, she has been poisoned by an adept in the use of such destructive agents."

"Mrs. Bourdon?"

"No; by her son. At least my suspicions point that way. She is probably cognisant of the crime. But in order that you should understand the grounds upon which my conjectures are principally founded, I must enter into a short explanation. Mrs. Bourdon, a woman of Spanish extraction, and who formerly occupied a much higher position than she does now, lived with Mrs. Armitage from the period of her husband's death, now about sixteen years ago. Mrs. Bourdon has a son; a tall, good-looking fellow enough, whom you may have seen."

"He was with his mother in the library as I entered it after leaving you."

"Ah! Well, hem! This boy, in his mother's opinion—but that perhaps is somewhat excusable—exhibited early indications of having been born a 'genius.' Mrs. Armitage, who had been first struck by the beauty of the child, gradually acquired the same notion; and the result was, that he was little by little invested—with at least her approval—with the privileges supposed to be the lawful inheritance of such gifted spirits; namely, the right to be as idle as he pleased—geniuses, you know, can, according to the popular notion, attain any conceivable amount of knowledge per saltum at a bound—and to exalt himself in the stilts of his own conceit above the useful and honorable pursuits suited to the station in life in which Providence had cast his lot. The fruit of such training soon showed itself. Young Bourdon grew up a conceited and essentially ignorant puppy, capable of nothing but bad verses, and thoroughly impressed with but one important fact, which was, that he, Alfred Bourdon, was the most gifted and the most ill-used of all God's creatures. To genius, in any intelligible sense of the term, he has in truth no pretensions. He is endowed, however, with a kind of reflective talent, which is often mistaken by fools for creative power. The morbid fancies and melancholy scorn of Byron, for instance, such gentry reflect back from their foggy imaginations, in exaggerated and distorted feebleness of whining versicles, and so on with other lights, celestial or infernal. This, however, by the way. The only rational pursuit he ever followed, and that only by fits and starts, and to gratify his faculty of "wonder," I fancy, was chemistry. A small laboratory was fitted up for him in the little summer-house you may have observed at the further corner of the lawn. This study of his, if study such desultory snatches at science may be called, led him, in his examination of vegetable bodies, to a smattering acquaintance with botany, a science of which Ellen Armitage is an enthusiastic student. They were foolishly permitted to botanise together, and the result was, that Alfred Bourdon, acting upon the principle of that genius—whether sham or real—levels all merely mundane distinctions, had the impudence to aspire to the hand of Miss Armitage. His passion, sincere or simulated, has never been, I have reason to know, in the slightest degree reciprocated by its object; but so blind is vanity, that when, about six weeks ago, an éclaircissement took place, and the fellow's dream was somewhat rudely dissipated, the untoward rejection of his prosperous suit was, there is every reason to believe, attributed, by both mother and son, to the repugnance of Mrs. Armitage alone; and to this idiotic hallucination she has, I fear, fallen a sacrifice. Judging from the emaciated appearance of the body, and other phenomena communicated to me by her ordinary medical attendant—a blundering ignoramus, who ought to have called in assistance long before—she has been poisoned with iodine; which, administered in certain quantities, would produce precisely the same symptoms. Happily, there is no mode of destroying human life which so surely leads to the detection of the murderer as the use of such agents; and of this truth, the post-mortem examination, which takes place to-morrow morning, will, if I am not grossly mistaken, supply another vivid illustration. . . . Legal assistance will no doubt be necessary, and I am sure that I do not err in expecting that you will aid me in bringing to justice the murderer of Mary Rawdon."

The pressure of his hand was my only answer.

"I shall call for you at ten o'clock," said he, as he put me down at my own door. I bowed, and the carriage drove off.

"Well?" said I, as Dr. Curteis and Mr. —, the eminent surgeon, entered the library at Mount Place, the following morning, after a long absence.

"As I anticipated," replied the doctor, with a choking voice—"she has been poisoned."

I started to my feet.

"And the murderer?"

"Our suspicions still point to young Bourdon; but the persons of both mother and son have been secured."

"Apart?"

"Yes; and I have dispatched a servant to request the presence of a neighbor—a country magistrate. I expect him momentarily."

After a brief consultation we directed our steps to the summer-house, which contained young Bourdon's laboratory. In the room itself, nothing of importance was discovered; but in an enclosed recess, which we broke open, we found a curiously-fashioned glass bottle, half full of iodine.

"This is it!" said Mr. —; "and in a powdered state, too—and just ready to mix with brandy, or any other available dissolvent."

The powder had somewhat the appearance of fine black-lead. Nothing further of any consequence being observed, we returned to the house, where the magistrate had already arrived.

Alfred Bourdon was first brought in; and he having been duly cautioned that he was not obliged to answer any question, and that what he did say would be taken down, and, if necessary, used against him, I proposed the following questions:

"Have you the key of your laboratory?"
 "No—the door is always open."
 "Well, then, of any door or cupboard in the room?"

At this question his face flushed purple, and he stammered: "There is no—" and abruptly paused.
 "Do I understand you to say there is no cupboard or place of concealment in the room?"

"No—here is the key."
 "Has any one had access to the cupboard or recess of which this is the key, except yourself?"

The young man shook as if smitten with ague—his lips chattered, but no articulate sound escaped them.

"You need not answer the question," said the magistrate, "unless you choose to do so. I again warn you, that all you say will, if necessary, be used against you."

"No one," he at length gasped, mastering his hesitation by a strong exertion of the will—"no one can have access to the place but myself. I have never parted with the key."

Mrs. Bourdon was now called in. After interchanging a glance of intense agony, and, as it seemed to me, of affectionate intelligence with her son, she calmly answered the questions put to her. They were unimportant, except the last, and that acted upon her like a galvanic shock. I was this:

"Did you ever struggle with your son, on the landing leading to the bedroom of the deceased, for the possession of this bottle?" and I held up that which we had found in the recess.

A slight scream escaped her lips; and then she stood rigid, erect, motionless, glaring alternately at me and at the fatal bottle, with eyes that seemed starting from their sockets. I glanced toward the son; he was also affected in a terrible manner. His knees smote each other, and a clammy perspiration burst forth, and settled upon his pallid forehead.

"Again I caution you," iterated the magistrate, "that you are not bound to answer any of these questions."

The woman's lips moved. "No—never!" she almost inaudibly gasped, and fell senseless on the floor.

As soon as she was removed, Jane Withers was called. She deposed that, three days previously, as she was, just before dark, arranging some linen in a room some yards distant from the bedroom of her late mistress, she was surprised at hearing a noise just outside the door, as of persons struggling, and speaking in low but earnest tones. She drew aside a corner of the muslin curtain of the window, which looked upon the passage or corridor, and there saw Mrs. Bourdon striving to wrest something from her son's hand. She heard Mrs. Bourdon say: "You shall not do it, or you shall not have it"—she could not be sure which. A noise of some sort seemed to alarm them; they ceased struggling, and listened attentively for a few moments; then Alfred Bourdon stole off on tip-toe, leaving the object in pursuit, which witness could not see distinctly, in his mother's hand. Mrs. Bourdon continued to listen, and presently Miss Armitage, opening the door of her mother's chamber, called her by name. She immediately placed what was in her hand on the marble top of a side-table, standing in the corridor, and hastened to Miss Armitage. Witness left the room she had been in, a few minutes afterwards; and curious to know what Mrs. Bourdon and her son had been struggling for, went to the table to look at it. It was an oddly-shaped glass bottle, containing a good deal of blackish-gray powder, which, as she held it up to the light, looked like black-lead."

"Would you be able to swear to the bottle if you saw it?"

"Certainly I should."

"By what mark or token?"

"The name of Valpy or Vulpy was cast into it—that is the name that was in the glass itself."

"Is this it?"

"It is—I swear most positively."

A letter was also read which had been taken from Bourdon's pocket. It was much creased, and proved to be in the handwriting of Mrs. Armitage. It consisted of a severe rebuke at the young man's presumption in seeking to address himself to her daughter; which insolent ingratitude, the writer said, she would never, while she lived, either forget or forgive. The last sentence was strongly underlined, in a different ink from that used by the writer of the letter.

The surgeon deposed to the cause of death. It had been brought on by the action of iodine, which, administered in certain quantities, produced symptoms as of rapid atrophy, such as had appeared in Mrs. Armitage. The glass bottle, found in the recess, contained iodine in a pulverised state.

I deposed that, on entering the library on the previous evening, I overheard young Mr. Bourdon, addressing his mother, say: "Now that it is done past recall, I will not shrink from any consequences, be they what they may!"

This was the substance of the evidence adduced; and the magistrate at once committed Alfred Bourdon to Clemsford jail, to take his trial at the next assize, for "wilful murder." A coroner's inquisition, a few days after, also returned a verdict of "wilful murder" against him on the same evidence.

About an hour after his committal, and just previous to the arrival of the vehicle which was to convey him to the county jail, Alfred Bourdon requested an interview with me. I very reluctantly consented; but steered as I was against him, I could not help feeling dreadfully shocked at the change which so brief an interval had wrought upon him. It had done the work of years. Despair—black, utter despair, was written in every lineament of his expressive countenance.

"I have requested to see you," said the unhappy culprit, "rather than Dr. Curteis, because he, I know, is bitterly prejudiced against me. But you will not refuse, I think, the solemn request of a dying man—for a dying man I feel myself to be—however long or short the interval which stands between me and the scaffold. It is not with a childish hope that any assertion of mine can avail before the tribunal of the law against the evidence adduced this day, that I, with all the solemnity befitting a man whose days are numbered, declare to you that I am wholly ignorant of the crime laid to my charge. I have no such expectation; I seek only that you, in pity of my youth and untimely fate, should convey to her whom I have madly presumed to worship, this message: 'Alfred Bourdon was mad, but not blood-guilty; and of the crime laid to his charge he is as innocent as an unborn child!'"

"The pure and holy passion, young man," said I, somewhat startled by his impressive manner, "however presumptuous, as far as social considerations are concerned, it might be, by which you affect to be inspired, is utterly inconsistent with the cruel, dastardly crime of which such damning evidence has an hour since been given—"

"Say no more, sir," interrupted Bourdon, sinking back in his seat and burying his face in his hands: "it were a bootless errand, she could not, in the face of that evidence, believe my unsupported assertion! It were as well, perhaps, she did not. And yet, sir, it is hard to be trampled into a felon's grave, loaded with the maledictions of those whom you would coin your heart to serve and bless! Ah, sir," he continued, while tears of agony streamed through his half closed fingers, "you cannot conceive the unutterable bitterness of the pang which rends the heart of him who feels that he is not only despised, but loathed, hated, execrated, by her whom his soul idolizes! Mine was no boyish transient passion, it has grown with my growth and strengthened with my strength. My life has been but one long dream of her. All that my soul had drunk in of beauty in the visible earth and heavens—the light of setting suns—the radiance of the silver stars—the breath of summer flowers, together with all which we imagine of celestial purity and grace, seemed to me in her incarnated, concentrated and combined! And now lost—lost—for ever lost!" The violence of his emotions choked his utterance; and deeply and painfully affected, I hastened from his presence.

Time sped as ever onwards, surely and silently; and justice, with her feet of lead, but hands of iron, closed gradually upon her quarry. Alfred Bourdon was arraigned before a jury of his countrymen, to answer finally to the accusation of wilful murder preferred against him.

The evidence, as given before the committing magistrate, and the coroner's inquisition, was repeated with some addition of passionate expressions used by the prisoner indicative of a desire to be avenged on the deceased. The cross-examination by the counsel for the defense was able, but failed to shake the case for the prosecution. His own admission that no one but himself had access to the recess where the poison was found, told fatally against him. When called upon to address the jury, he delivered himself of a speech rather than a defense; of an oratorical effusion, instead of a vigorous, and, if possible, damaging commentary on the evidence arrayed against him. It was a labored, and in part eloquent, exposition of the necessary fallibility of human judgment, illustrated by numerous examples of erroneous verdicts. His peroration I jotted down at the time: "Thus, my lord and gentlemen of the jury, it is abundantly manifest, not only by these examples, but by the testimony which every man bears in his own breast that God could not have willed, could not have commanded his creatures to perform a pretended duty, which he vouchsafed them no power to perform righteously. Oh, be sure that if he had intended, if he had commanded you to pronounce irreversible decrees upon your fellow-man, quenching that life which is his highest gift, he would have endowed you with gifts to perform that duty rightly.

Has he done so? Ask not alone the pages dripping with innocent blood which I have quoted, but your own hearts! Are you, according to the promise of the serpent-tempter, 'Gods, knowing good from evil?' of such clear omniscience that you can hurl an unprepared soul before the tribunal of his Maker in the full assurance that you have rightly loosed the silver cord which he had measured, have justly broken the golden bowl which he had fashioned! Oh, my lord," he concluded, his dark eye flashing with excitement, "it is possible that the first announcement of my innocence, may be proclaimed from the awful tribunal of him who alone cannot err! How if he, whose eye is even now upon us, should then proclaim, 'I, too, sat that day in judgment when you presumed to doom your fellow worm; and I saw that the murderer was not in the dock, but on the bench!' Oh, my lord, think well of what you do—pause ere you incur such fearful hazard; for be assured, for all these things God will also bring you to judgment!"

He ceased, and sank back exhausted. His fervid declamation produced a considerable impression upon the auditory; but it soon disappeared before the calm, impressive charge of the judge, who reassured the startled jury by reminding them that their duty was to honestly execute the law, not to dispute about its justice. For himself he said, sustained by a pure conscience, he was quite willing to incur the hazard hinted at by the prisoner. After a careful and luminous summing up, the jury, with very slight deliberation, returned a verdict of "GUILTY!"

As the word passed the lips of the foreman of the jury, a piercing shriek ran through the court. It proceeded from a tall figure in black, who, with closely drawn veil, had sat motionless during the trial, just before the dock. It was the prisoner's mother. The next instant she rose, and throwing back her veil, wildly exclaimed, "He is innocent—innocent, I tell ye! I alone—"

"Mother! mother! for the love of Heaven be silent!" shouted the prisoner with frantic vehemence, and stretching himself over the front of the dock as if to grasp and restrain her.

"Innocent, I tell you!" continued the woman. "I—I alone am the guilty person! It was I alone that perpetrated the deed! He knew it not, suspected it not, till it was too late. Here," she added, drawing a sheet of paper from her bosom—"here is my confession, with each circumstance detailed!"

As she waved it over her head, it was snatched by her son, and, swift as lightning, torn in shreds. "She is mad! Heed her not—believe her not!" He at the same time shouted at the top of his powerful voice, "She is distracted—mad! Now, my lord, your sentence! Come!"

The tumult and excitement in the court no language which I can employ would convey an adequate impression of. As soon as calm was partially restored, Mrs. Bourdon was taken into custody; the prisoner was removed; and the court adjourned, of course, without passing sentence.

It was even as his mother said! Subsequent investigation, aided by her confessions, amply proved that the fearful crime was conceived and perpetrated by her alone; in the frantic hope of securing for her idolized son the hand and fortune of Miss Armitage. She had often been present with him in his laboratory, and thus become acquainted with the uses to which certain agents could be put. She had purloined the key of the recess, and he, unfortunately too late to prevent the perpetration of the crime, had, by mere accident, discovered the abstraction of the poison. His subsequent declarations had been made for the determined purpose of saving his mother's life by the sacrifice of his own!

The wretched woman was not reserved to fall before the justice of her country. The hand of God smote her ere the scaffold was prepared for her. She was smitten with frenzy, and died raving in the Metropolitan Lunatic Asylum. Alfred Bourdon, after a lengthened imprisonment, was liberated. He called on me, by appointment, a few days previous to leaving this country for ever; and I placed in his hands a small pocket Bible, on the fly leaf of which was written one word—"Ellen!" His dim eye lighted up with something of its old fire as he glanced at the characters; he then closed the book, placed it in his bosom, and waving me a mute farewell—I saw he durst not trust himself to speak—hastily departed. I never saw him more!

Hunting Adventure.

A DAY'S STALKING IN INDIA.

DAY was just dawning as we rode off towards the tents. The night's rain had calmed the fiery gale, and cleared away the dust and sand that hitherto had loaded the air and dimmed the light, and as the sun rose, all nature sparkled in his beams, and seemed to smile with gladness at the change. The withered grass was already turning green, and the parched trees looked refreshed, and sent forth their fragrance as if in incense for the boon. The lapwing hovered about screaming his rejoicings, and the lark sang merrily as he soared high on the buoyant air, and our hearts were gay as his as we cantered freely along over the trackless waste, the horses bounding joyously forward as they trod the elastic turf. But as the sun advanced, the happy delusion vanished like a dream—the heat and glare became intense, and soon all traces of the joyous change were gone.

It was almost noon when we reached our camp, which we were glad to find pitched under the shade of a fine mango grove, offering a deliciously cool retreat from the fire that raged outside.

The Shikaries had good news for us, but it was too late for the heavy jungle, which was yet a long way off, so we indulged in a siesta till the cool of the evening, when we went out after the small game which were calling in every direction around the camp; peacocks, partridge, jungle-fowl, quail, and many others of the feathered tribe, seemed bent upon summoning us to their destruction, and having committed some havoc among them, we returned home with a full bag.

The first crowing of the jungle cock roused us next morning, and we were soon on the way to the great forest.

There were numerous tracks of game, but our party was too large, and the noise we made in scrambling through the thick cover drove all before us, and for a long time we saw nothing; I, therefore, struck off in a different direction, taking only Khungle with me to carry a spare rifle.

We soon came on the fresh trail of a large herd of sambar, which led us a chase till evening, and I began to despair of finding them, and was thinking of giving it up, when about a hundred yards ahead I observed a tree shake violently, as if some large animal rubbed itself against it; concluding it to be the sambar, we crept up as near as possible till we could distinctly hear every movement or sound they made, but the underwood and long grass quite concealed them from view. It seemed that they were just rising from their noonday siesta, some were already on foot, and we could hear others now and then rise and begin to graze or crop the leaves, while the tree was still shaken by a stag that rubbed his young antlers against it.

Long and eagerly I watched my opportunity, and had just got a glimpse of a fine stag, when suddenly the deep roar of a tiger came booming on the still air, and the startled herd rushed wildly past us; reserving my shot for nobler game, I let them go unharmed, and when all was again quiet we crept cautiously forward to reconnoiter.

The sun had set to us, and the shades of evening were fast spreading over the scene. There was a solemn stillness and deep silence abroad, which combined with the gloom of evening, made the solitude of the mighty forest doubly impressive; not a leaf stirred on the tall trees, and the dew-drop gathered upon them, and stood glistening without a breath to shake it down; no living thing was to be seen, and not a sound to be heard, except the distant crowing of the jungle fowl, or the peacock's call.

I was listening intently with my ear to the ground for some indication of the enemy, when all at once his unearthly roar again burst upon the silence, and rumbled grandly on through the hollow echoes of forest and hill. We went on in the direction from which it came, and found the mangled remains of a human body. There was little of it left besides the bones, but it was evident the deed had not long been done, for the blood was scarcely dry, the marks of the death struggle were still fresh upon the ground, and the ghastly skull seemed even yet to gape with horror and dismay.

I guessed that the destroyer was not far off, and while casting round for his track, a low hollow growl, that seemed to come from the very ground under our feet, warned us to look to ourselves. For a moment I thought he was upon us; my heart felt too large for me, and I could scarcely breathe for agitation, while even poor Khungle's swarthy visage became less darker than usual; but he came not, and the next moment we heard him going off through the thick cover, where it was impossible to get even a glimpse of his tawny hide. We soon found the trail, and were following it up as well as the growing darkness would allow, when a low whistle from Khungle, who was a little behind, caught my ear. It was his never-failing signal of game in sight, so I went back to where he stood beckoning to me, and gazing intently at some object which I could not see from my position. "Bhalook, bhalook," (bears, bears,) he whispered as I approached, and to my great joy I saw three of them together in the middle of a large open glade. Two were fighting fiercely, while the third seemed endeavoring to separate them, and at last succeeded in restoring peace for awhile, but their savage anger was not to be restrained, and again they rushed upon each other with redoubled fury. It was a grand sight to see the ungainly brutes clash together; the force with which they met bringing both to the ground, when, locked in each other's iron gripe, they rolled and tumbled about, while they sustained the deadly fight with teeth and hind claws.

As they seemed well matched, and likely to keep it up for some time, I thought it a favorable opportunity to approach, so leaving Khungle where he was, with directions to run up with the second rifle as soon as I fired, I started off while the fight was at its highest—there was not a bush between them and the jungle, and I could see nothing to cover my advance except a few scattered tufts of grass; but, by means of crawling along, serpent like, from tuft to tuft, I had got over half the distance, when, to my great relief, I came to a narrow ravine, which, winding along in the direction of my quarry, promised ample cover for the rest of the way.

I now breathed freely and had leisure to examine the lie of the land. The fight was over for the present, and the combatants stood eyeing each other with no friendly aspect, while their peace-making companion kept between them, as if to prevent a renewal of hostilities. They were an awkward looking trio—but one of them, more especially, was as diabolical looking an old savage as I ever had to deal with. He was far above the ordinary size, and being nearly bald from age, or fighting, his mis-shapen form was the more remarkable, while the little hair that was left, instead of concealing deformities, as it usually does for the race, hung in matted lumps from his long gaunt body and distorted limbs, or bristled fiercely out whenever it could; as the hideous monster stood grinning and glaring upon his rival, he looked every inch a fiend.

As I had anticipated, the ravine covered my advance well, and after following its course for some distance, I caught a passing glimpse of them through a narrow fissure in the bank. They disappeared in a moment, but I saw they had taken the alarm, and with heads erect, as they snuffed the tainted air, were shuffling toward me.

With a beating heart I waited for their approach and as I heard them coming nearer and nearer, I began most devoutly to wish myself safely out of it. The suspense was short, though it seemed an age to me, and I felt a sort of relief when the huge brutes appeared on the top of the bank looming large as they stood between me and the clear blue sky.

Aiming at the center of the white ring in the chest, I fired at the nearest—a grim-looking old savage, whose bright eye twinkled mischievously when she first caught sight of me, and she fell with a fierce roar and gurgling growl, that I fondly hoped was her last, but it soon proved otherwise, and had nearly cost me dear; for, thinking her account settled, I fired my second barrel at one of the others as they were walking off, seemingly inclined to depart in peace. It hit him, and he turned sharply round and came back, his eyes flashing fire as he glared upon me with a look of fierce defiance and dire vengeance; and then, roaring with mingled agony and rage, charged headlong down the bank, followed closely by his wounded mate, who by this time had recovered herself.

Helpless now, and almost hopeless, I fled the storm, and though I ran with all the energy of despair, the enraged brutes were closing on me fast. I felt their very breath upon my head, and I thought my hour was come, but doubling short, I managed to elude their grasp, and before they could follow the sudden turn, I had gained upon them considerably. At the same moment I caught sight of my trusty Khungle coming full speed to the rescue, and I felt relieved. Though the bears were again closing up, the gallant fellow came on in the face of danger, and I had scarcely time to snatch the rifle from his hand as we met, before they were upon us. There was not a moment for aim, but a lucky shot from the hip rolled the foremost of them over as he was making his final rush to grapple. He turned a somersault past me as I sprang aside to avoid him, and then I doubled up into a ball quite motionless. Fortune favored me with the second barrel also, and the other fell to the shot; but again she struggled hard with death, biting her wound and tearing the earth in her impotent rage, while making a desperate effort to rise. At last she recovered herself, and stood looking at me as it about to renew the charge. It was an anxious moment, as I was again defenseless; but happily she seemed to have enough of it. Her heart failed, and she went off growling to the jungle, leaving me master of the field.

Though it was somewhat dark, I found little difficulty in following up the blood-stained track, and having reloaded both rifles, I soon traced her home. It was a dark dell, where the jungle was so thick and tangled that not a ray of light could penetrate. As I reached it there was a crash through the thicket, and an angry roar issued from its deepest gloom—but I could see nothing except two glaring orbs, that seemed to float towards me on thin air, growing larger and brighter as they approached. It was evident that the brute was charging, and all I had for it was a snap shot at the flashing eyes. It proved a good one, and when the rifle's echo died away in the distance all was again hushed and still. After listening awhile I groped my way on and found her quite dead, the ball having entered the forehead between the eyes.

Night was closing in, and the evening vapors obscured what little light remained, but my work was not finished yet; for on returning to look after the other bear, I found that he had rallied and was making his way to the jungle. The old fiend was more bent on mischief than ever, and as soon as he saw me, down he came, tooth and nail, to the charge.

Both barrels, at a distance of twenty paces, had little effect but to increase his fury, as he received their contents; and by the time I was ready with the other rifle, he was up with me. I gave him right and left with the muzzle between his fore paws, and it sent him reeling back, but his fierce nature seemed sustained by rage, for he soon recovered the shock, and came on again, furious as ever, though much crippled.

I was obliged to run for it again, but having the speed of him now soon got out of his way, and then I managed to reload while retreating. Another right and left brought him to, but he did not fall, and still presented a determined front, rushing at me whenever I went near him. I loaded with my last ball, and anxious to make the most of it, waited till he was quite still, and then taking a steady shot at his head, finished his career, and terminated the day's adventure. The gallant old brute sank quietly to the earth and never moved again.

The field was won at last, and joyfully I turned my steps homeward, reflecting, as I went, on my debt of gratitude to Providence for the issue. It was a long and lonesome walk through the dark forest, and I sorely felt the want of ammunition as we occasionally heard the hungry cry of some prowler of the night, but we reached camp in safety, and met my friend De M. coming out with all the followers he could muster, to seek for us. He had heard the firing from a distance, and from my long absence, began to fear that all was not right.

Next morning I sent Khungle with a party to bring home my quarry, while De M. and I proceeded in quest of fresh adventures.

JENNY LIND AGAIN.—We hear, says the London Chronicle, that Mademoiselle Lind remains in Paris for the present, and that her marriage is broken off. This intelligence has been a source of congratulation to her private friends, as well as to the public generally, since the condition of this union was her retiring from the stage. The great anxiety regarding the movements of Mademoiselle Lind has not merely partaken of that reckless curiosity with which idlers endeavor to pry into the privacy of remarkable persons. Mademoiselle Lind, through the admiration with which her genius and her generous spirit have invested her, may truly be said to have become the adopted child of the English public, whose interest in her welfare will accompany her wherever she goes, and with whom she will always find a home.

A new original mind is rarely understood until it has been reflected from some half dozen congenial with it, so averse are men to admitting the truth in an unusual form; while any novelty, however fantastic, however false, is greedily swallowed. Nor is this to be wondered at; for all truth demands a response, and few people care to think, yet they must have something to supply the place of thought. Every mind would appear original if every man had the power of projecting his own into the mind of others.

I NE'ER FORGET THOSE DAYS, MARY.

BY AUGUSTUS C. L. ARNOLD.

I NE'ER forget those days, Mary,
When round us danced the golden hours;
And every voice of bird and bee,
And every grace of stars and flowers,
Was but the echo of thy song—
The reflex of thy conquering smiles,
Which bound me with enchantments strong,
And made me dream of fairy isles.

Oh! then, like two bright dew-drops, Mary,
Which join in fond embrace at morn,
Our lovely souls rushed forth too meet,
And burned to blend them both in one;
Then every soft and fragrant breeze
Bore all my tenderest thoughts to thee,
And all of Nature's harmonies
Revealed thy matchless charms to me.

But now those days are passed, Mary,
They vanished like a baseless dream,
And all those sweet and tender hopes
Have faded like a meteor gleam;
But in a brighter world, afar,
We'll meet again, when both are free;
And in some glorious, distant star,
Our souls shall blend eternally.

MARY HOWITT.

THE Boston Olive Branch furnishes us with the following description of this gifted lady:

Perhaps there is no author who is loved by a greater number of persons than Mary Howitt. She has the happy faculty of throwing her own simple, earnest, beautiful heart, into every thing that she writes. If she discourses upon flowers—either in poetry or prose—immediately an odor of daffodils, roses, and early violets, surround the reader, and he sees, with a mental vision, waving cornfields, “clover nooks,” and gentle pastures. Her faith in man is actually grand; her daily life—as seen through her writings—is simple, sweet and chaste. Of William Howitt it cannot be said that he is so gentle as his wife; he is more rugged and terse, and is often times epigrammatic. His love of nature—like hers—is strong; but his indignation at wrongdoing is more impetuous and fiery. For instance, see his letters in the People's Journal, upon the game-laws, and his “Aristocracy of England.” Having an invitation to tea with them at “The Elms,” one evening, I gladly accepted it, and mounted an omnibus at the “Flower Pot,” in Bishopgate street, that would drop me at “The Elms,” in Clapton, a pleasant suburb of London. I was told that I should know the spot at once, by the tall and wide-spreading elms that stood in its foreground, and I was not disappointed. The mansion is a large, well-proportioned brick building, painted white, and looking the very picture of an English suburban country seat. The omnibus stopped a moment for me; a few steps brought me to the entrance-gate, and nervously jerking the bell-knob, I stood, with a strange mixture of feelings, awaiting the moment when I should stand face to face with the authoress who had so often ministered to my pleasures away in America. My card went up, and I followed it shortly after. The drawing room was small, but exceedingly recherche, and decorated with choice paintings, books and furniture. As I entered, I noticed a woman sitting upon a small rosewood sofa, at the farther extremity of the room—it was MARY HOWITT. She rose, and with a graceful kindness received me, and introduced me to her husband and children. She was not beautiful, in the common sense of that word, and yet came very near being so. She was better looking than that term alone would imply. She was tall and stately, without the least stiffness; had dark, beautiful hair, and eyes, the color of which it is difficult to describe, yet radiating smiles of sweetness, like evening stars. She had a slight defect in the teeth, as they protrude so much as to mar the otherwise very charming appearance of her face. She was dignified, and yet complaisant, and looked very little like an authoress, being so robust and full of life. I saw the recut of her healthy writings—she is herself well when she writes, and her exuberance of spirits and gentle goodness, overflow upon the page before her. She was richly dressed, with no allusions to her quondam association with the Quakers, and acted like a perfect lady. I use the word in its true, not its hackneyed sense. I spoke to her of the general admiration Americans feel for her translations of Fredrika Bremer's stories, and might have said the same, with truth, of her own writings, prose and poetry, had I not detested all approaches to flattery.

Alluding to Miss Bremer's tales, she said: “It is one of the strongest wishes of her heart to visit your wonderful country; and, as for William and me, we have promised each other to go as soon as we can leave things here.”

I understood from her, that when they come, they intend writing a work upon us, our institutions, manners, scenery, &c., and it will be the first just work upon America, written by an English man or woman. It cannot fail of being fair and candid, for the Howitts are at heart republicans, and admire America. Mary Howitt has for several years had a sister living in Cincinnati, but she died the winter before last, to the great sorrow of her English friends. Mrs. Howitt's last work—“A Tale of Ohio”—is the history of that sister's children for a year, and the main incidents were written in Cincinnati by her, and sent over to England, to be retouched by Mary Howitt's inimitable pen.

After tea, we went into the garden to view the pleasant, setting sun, and wander among flowers. It was a delightful spot, and worthy of the genius of Mary Howitt. I could see from the lawn the gentle slopes of Midlesex in the distance, as beautiful as the scenery of a fairy tale. Naturally, the conversation turned upon the scenery in America, and if my tongue was voluble with praises of our mammoth lakes, everlasting rivers, and gigantic mountains, the fault lay in America, not in me. When we had returned into the house, I was agreeably surprised with the presence of some fellow-countrymen and women. Catlin, the artist of Indian life, was there in a glow of the spirits peculiar to him. Anna Cora Mowatt, the talented authoress and actress, added the beauty of her countenance to the scene, and a young Bostonian, just from Greece, with myrtles from Parnassus, and reliques from the Tuileries, was overflowing with republican ardor. It was like being transported suddenly into an American drawing room, and when some one proposed to test, by vote, the political complexion of the party, the proposition was received with laughter and acclamation, and Republicanism won the day.

LAYS FROM SHAKSPERE.

CORDELIA.

CORDELIA.—“Oh look upon me, sir; and hold your hands in benediction o'er me.”
“No, sir—you must not kneel.”—King Lear, Act 4th, Scene 7th.

Oh, may this kiss, mine honored sire,
Repay the cruel past;
My duteous hope doth but aspire
To serve thee at the last.
Oh sisters! sisters! nature's shame
Were ye, that could deny
This head the veriest wretch's claim:
A shelter but to die.

Oh! had he not your father been
A stranger, and no more;
Who that these reverend hairs had seen,
Had turn'd them from the door?
The very cur of savage bite,
My dearest foe that own'd,
My hearth had shared that bitter night,
And human shelter found.

Do you not know me, sir?—it is your child
Who makes this sad appeal;
That once your best beloved you styled.*
No, sir—“you must not kneel!”
But raise your gracious hand I pray,
Like Heaven's protecting wing
O'er one whose joy it is to obey
Her father—and her king!

* LEAR.—“I loved her most, and thought to set my rest on her kind nursery.”—Act 1st, Scene 1st.

CHEERFUL TEMPER.

Who would not have an eye
To see the sun where others see a cloud;
A frame so vernal, as in spite of snow,
To think it genial summer all year round?
I do not know the fool would not be such A man! [Sheridan Knowles.]

By bestowing blessings upon others we entail them on ourselves.

Biographical Sketches.

SIR DAVID BREWSTER.

THIS celebrated man was born at Jelburgh, in Roxburghshire, on the 11th of December, 1751. His father was rector of the grammar school of that place, and was educated for the church of Scotland, to which profession he brought up the subject of the present memoir. With this view, young Brewster entered the university of Edinburgh at an early age, and after going through the usual course of study, became a licentiate of the church of Scotland. In the year 1800, he received the honorary degree of M. A. from the university.

To about the same period may be traced the commencement of that course of experiment by which he has since done so much to illustrate and extend the beautiful domain of the science of optics. This grand branch of physics was just then rising into deserved popularity, and the study of it had received an impulse from the fine discovery of the phenomena of interference by Dr. Young. Mr. Brewster, imbued with a just admiration of the great father of modern philosophy—an admiration which he has closely retained ever since—commenced his optical career in 1799 and 1800, by a repetition of Newton's experiments on the inflection of light. He determined the fact that the phenomena of inflection are independent of the nature of the body by which they are caused.

During some subsequent years, his views and prospects underwent a great change. Forced by bad health to abandon the clerical profession, to which he was much attached, his occupations were for some time of a desultory nature, and often interrupted by the same cause.

In 1808, he undertook the editorship of the “Edinburgh Encyclopædia,” a work of extent and labor, which was finished only in 1830. In this he contributed many original articles, among which may be enumerated those on the following instruments,—the achromatic telescope, the kaleidoscope, the microscope, the micrometer, the anemometer, and on burning instruments; on the following sciences,—mechanics, optics, astronomy, hydrodynamics, electricity, and expansion. He also wrote the lives of many men of science,—Galileo, Halley, Euler, Copernicus, Tycho Brahe, Condamine, Condorcet, Boscovich, Bradley, Buffon, Bailly, D'Alembert, Almon, and the three Bernouillis, in these Gregories, &c., &c., &c.

In 1807 he received the honorary degree of L.L.D. from the university of Aberdeen: and in 1808 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, of which, some years later, he became secretary.

In 1810 he married the eldest daughter of James Macpherson, Esq., of Bellville, in the county of Inverness, and by this lady he has had several children.

During these important years of his life he had not been inactive in the pursuit of science. The construction of micrometers, telescopes, and other optical instruments, and the investigation of the optical properties of many natural bodies, engaged his attention between the years 1801 and 1812, and the results of these were published in 1813, in a “Treatise on New Philosophical Instruments.” This work, which was dedicated to Professor Playfair, and of which we cannot attempt here to give any popular account, contained not merely a description of several highly ingenious pieces of apparatus, but many original experiments made with their aid, such as the determination of the refractive and dispersive powers of a variety of substances, and likewise others, bearing on very important parts of optical science, and especially on the then almost untrodden field of polarisation, which showed that Dr. Brewster was keeping pace with the French philosophers of the day. In 1811, when drawing up the article “Burning Instruments,” for the Edinburgh Cyclopædia, he was led—from the proposal of Buffon for constructing a lens of great diameter out of a single piece of glass, by cutting out the central parts in successive ridges, like the steps of a stair—a proposal, he justly observes practically impossible—he was led, we say, to suggest the construction of lens out of zones of glass, each of which might be built up of several circular segments, and thus form an apparatus for the illumination of lighthouses of unequal power. This beautiful invention was afterward more fully developed by him in the “Edinburgh Transactions.” Continuing to labor in the path to which the experiments in his work on “Philosophical Instruments” had led him, he advanced, keeping pace with the French philosophers, in the fine series of discoveries to which the phenomena of light paved the way. The train of investigation which succeeded forms one of the finest examples that can be quoted of the extent to which united efforts may attain in the elucidation of some of the most delicate and infinitely varied phenomena of nature. The amazing insight which the last twenty years have afforded to the philosopher into the nature, properties, and modifications of the agency of light, is certainly one of the most surprising truths which can be presented to us; and the combined labors of Laplace, Malus, Brewster, Biot, Arago, Herschel, Fresnel, and Airy, exhibit—to borrow the words of one of these eminent philosophers, Herschel—"a picture of emulous and successful research, than which nothing prouder has adorned the annals of physical science, since the development of the true system of the universe." It would be out of place to attempt to state even the titles of the memoirs to which the researches of Brewster gave rise. Suffice it to say, that they were chiefly presented to the Royal Society of London, and printed in the "Philosophical Transactions." For one of these, containing the discovery of the law of polarisation of light by reflection, that body, in 1815, adjudged to him their Copley medal, and the same year admitted him a fellow.

In 1814, Brewster visited France and Switzerland, and enjoyed, more especially, the company and interchange of the sentiment of the illustrious men who then adorned the literary circles of Paris. On his return he undertook, in 1851, to deliver lectures on natural philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, during Professor Playfair's absence on the continent, but ill-health prevented his discharging the duties of the chair.

The following year he had the gratification of receiving from the Institute of France half of the physical prize of 3000 francs, which was adjudged to him and the late Dr. Seebeck of Berlin, for the most important discoveries made in Europe in any branch of science during the two preceding years. Three years later, in 1819, the Royal Society of London awarded him the Rumford gold and silver medals, for his discoveries on polarisation of light.

In 1816, he invented the kaleidoscope, a beautiful little instrument, well known, no doubt, to all our readers, which soon became the toy of every drawing room in Great Britain, and which from the infinite variety of figures which it exhibits, has been applied with success to the invention of patterns for carpet-manufactories, and to other branches of the ornamental arts.

In 1819, he established the "Edinburgh Philosophical Journal," in conjunction with Professor Jamieson; and subsequently carried on the "Edinburgh Journal of Science." The same year, on Playfair's death, he was elected General Secretary of the Royal Society of Edinburgh; and not inattentive to the interests of other bodies having science for their object, was successively Secretary and Vice-President of the Astronomical Institution of Edinburgh, and likewise established the Society of Arts for Scotland, on the general plan of the corresponding institution in London.

The duties attendant upon the support of these societies, the editorship of the "Encyclopædia" and the cultivation of many beautiful departments of the science of light, especially in connection with polarisation and the classification of minerals by their optical characters, filled up at this period, a good many years of his life. The results of his inquiries were published chiefly in the "Philosophical Transactions" and in those of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, the Cambridge Philosophical Society, and the Geological Society of London.

In 1826, the Institute of France conferred upon him the marked distinction of electing him a corresponding member of their body and he received the same honor from the Royal Academies of Russia, Prussia, Sweden, and Denmark as well as from most of the other scientific bodies in Europe and America.

For some time past the science of meteorology had engaged a considerable share of his attention; and he was enabled, through the influence of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, to procure the establishment of many registers in different parts of Scotland, which has afforded many results most important to science.

Up to 1826 his constant residence had been at or near Edinburgh. In that year he retired to a small property which he had purchased on the banks of the Tweed, near Melrose, an agreeable retreat where he has ever since prosecuted his inquiries.

In 1828 the Royal Society of Edinburgh awarded him their Keith medal for the discovery of two new fluids in the cavities of topaz, the properties of which he had investigated with singular address, and an account of which was published in their Transactions. Two years after the Royal Society of London adjudged to him one of the royal medals, being the only one in their gift which he had not yet received. This was given for some very elaborate paper on polarisation, published in the "Philosophical Transactions" for 1830. In 1831, he published, in the "Family Library," a life of Sir Isaac Newton, naturally the most widely circulated and most popular of his writings; and, in the same year, he proposed the scientific meeting at York, in imitation of those which have been established in Germany with such good effect. He was elected, in the same year, vice-president of the Royal Society of Edinburgh; and about the same time he received, along with other distinguished scientific men, the decoration of the Hanoverian Guelphic Order. On visiting London in March, 1832, this was followed up by his receiving the honor of knighthood from the king. At present he fills the principal's chair in the united college of St. Salvador and St. Leonard.

Besides his original works, Sir David Brewster has more than once acted as the editor of those of others. One of his early productions was a new edition of Ferguson's "Astronomy and Lectures." He afterwards edited Robinson's collected works, in four volumes, and Euler's "Letters to a German Princess." He published, also, a treatise on the "Kaliroscope," and a translation of Legendre's "Geometry and Trigonometry." He has written, besides, an original treatise on "Optics," for Dr. Lardner's "Cyclopædia," and a volume of "Letters on Natural Magic," for the "Family Library." His last public labor we believe, was the publication, in 1841, of another pleasant contribution to our scientific biography "The Martyrs of Science; or, the Heirs of Galileo, Tycho Brahe and Kepler."

Punchiana.

THAT great repository of British wit, Punch, does not lose in raciness with its increasing years. In the last number we find many pleasant hits at men and things, from which we select the following.

AN M. D. IN A GOWN.

The Medical Times of the 21st ult. contains a full, true, and particular account of the admission of a young lady, Miss ELIZABETH BLACKWELL, by the Geneva Medical College, in the State of New York, to a physician's degree. Miss Blackwell had duly attended lectures at the College, and received a formal diploma, under the title of "Domina," which was the only feminine that the Senate could find for Doctor. Punch really thinks this is a case for a copy of verses, which he accordingly subjoins, in honor of the fair M. D.

Nor always is the warrior male,
Nor masculine the sailor;
We all know ZARAGOSSA's tale,
We've all heard Billy Taylor;
But far a nobler heroine, she
Who won the palm of knowledge,
And took a Medical Degree,
By study at her College.

They talk about the gentler sex
Mankind in sickness tending,
And o'er the patient's couch their necks
Solicitously bending;
But what avails solicitude
In fever or in phthisic,
If lovely woman's not imbued
With one idea of physic?

Young ladies all, of every clime,
Especially of Britain,
Who wholly occupy your time
In novels or in knitting,
Whose highest skill is but to play,
Sing, dance, or French to clack well,
Reflect on the example, pray,
Of excellent Miss BLACKWELL!

Think, if you had a brother ill,
A husband, or a lover,
And could prescribe the draught or pill
Whereby he might recover;
How much more useful this would be,
Oh, sister, wife, or daughter!
Than merely handing him beef-tea,
Gruel, or toast-and-water.

Ye bachelors about to wed
In youth's unthinking hey-day,
Who look upon a furnish'd head
As horrid for a lady,
Who'd call a female doctor "blue;"
You'd spare your sneers, I rather Think, my young fellows, if you knew
What physic costs a father!

How much more blest were married life
To men of small condition,
If every one could have his wife
For family physician;
His nursery kept from ailments free,
By proper regulation,
And for advice his only fee,
A thankful salutation.

For DOCTRIN BLACKWELL—that's the way
To dub in rightful gender—
In her profession, ever may Prosperity attend her!
Punch, a gold-handled parasol,
Suggests for presentation,
To one so well deserving all
Esteem and admiration.

A GROWING EVIL.—We are quite astonished at the number of moustaches there are about town. The face of the metropolis is quite overrun with moustaches. You meet with one at every turn. This continental appendage is threatening to invade the English physiognomy, and the British upper lip will soon lose its distinctive cleanliness. Where all the moustaches have suddenly sprung from, we cannot tell, as we are not particular amateurs in hair skins, but it is very clear that the course at Epsom was covered, this Derby, with four times its usual average. We begin to suspect that the cheap excursions to France have done it all, for it is very strange that an Englishman cannot go to Boulogne without being immediately seized with a violent moustache. We propose that government barbers be appointed at Folkestone, and that they be invested with peremptory orders to take everybody by the nose who lands, and give the batch all round an easy shave for a penny. If some such Order in Council be not immediately issued to meet this growing evil, England will be so much put upon by France, that she will soon have not a feature left that she will be able to call her own. These cheap excursions must be stopped, or else there must be a by-law instantly passed that any one who comes back with a moustache, forfeits his return ticket.

RECREATIONS IN SPAIN.—Just glancing over the Morning Post we saw a rather pleasing picture of the innocent enjoyments of the people of Spain, in the shape of a paragraph, the best part of which we subjoin, piecemeal, stringing Spanish waggeries together like Spanish onions.

"The long talked-of match between the Bengal tiger and the bull, which has occupied so much attention, even of royalty, has just come off, and ended in the defeat and death of the Eastern savage."

Now the idea of calling the Bengal tiger a savage in comparison with such a public and a Court as the Spanish, is droll indeed.

"A vast multitude assembled to witness the extraordinary spectacle, at which the King and Queen were present."

Fine sport for their Majesties; finer for their Majesties' subjects. Some idea may be formed of the intensity of the fun, by imagining our Gracious QUEEN and PRINCE honoring the "canine" arena with their presence.

"On being released from its cage, the tiger made a few steps, and then crouched down as if about to spring."

A pretty little piece of pantomime by the Spanish clown in the ring—the buffoon in stripes instead of motley. But, as usual elsewhere, the clown was the butt of the jest.

"The bull advanced boldly toward him, paused for a moment, and then rushed at him. The tiger made a spring at the bull, but the latter plunged his horn into his adversary's head, and laid him sprawling on the ground completely defeated."

Having made this facetious hit at the tiger, "The bull then walked round the circus, regarding the public triumphantly."

The bull fancying, in his presumption, that he was a greater brute than his beholders, which was a most ludicrous mistake on the part of the animal. But the best joke, in the Spanish sense of the word, is yet to come.

"The tiger was dispatched with dogs, and the public, rushing into the circus, divided its remains among themselves."

And probably ate them; tiger eating tiger, like true cannibals. In the meanwhile, Spanish royalty looks on delighted, never thinking, of course, of the encouragement it has been giving to that spirit of cruelty which has earned for the land of the auto-da-fe, of murders, and military executions, the character of being the most bloodthirsty nation in Europe.

AN ATTIC TRUTH.—"The highest flight of philosophy is too frequently a garret."—[Stairs' Celebrated Decisions.]

Choice Miscellany.

MORNING.

Dew glistens on the greensward—dew sparkles on the flowers—
 From many a zephyr-shaken tree it falls in crystal showers—
 It hovers in the silver clouds around yon mountain's brow,
 Whose sky, a moment past so pale, is fused with blushes now:
 Like young blood, streaming hot and fast, through gay transparent veins:
 Redder yet, and redder, grow those firmamental stains,
 Till round and bright—a blaze of light—a blinding fiery ball—
 Bursts on the world—the sun himself—of light, the all in all.
 As he rides sublimely upward, like a bold but baffled foe,
 Whose might is spent, and phalanx rent, back, back the shadows go;
 But step by step, and steadily—as loth to fly the fight—
 What contest ever equaled yet, the war of Day with Night?
 The sun at length hath triumphed, and unfurled o'er the sky
 His banner blue, whose pearly hue makes envious ocean sigh;
 And his light is potent on the hills, and flashes on the wold,
 And quivers in the foliage, now commingled green and gold;
 He plays upon the lofty spires—he dances in the stream—
 He revels 'mid the torrent's spray, in many a rainbow beam—
 Through cot and palace, wood and wild, he shoots his cheering ray,
 Till darkness, cheated of himself, becomes a shade of day.
 Up, up, ye birds, and greet him with your bravest gush of song;
 Forth to the laden flowers, ye bees, they've languished for you long;
 Wake from your slumbers, sons of toil, and gather while you may,
 The gains that industry can win, from dawn to set of day.
 Oh, mighty emperor of worlds, how worshiped power would be
 Could human majesty diffuse the joy dispensed by thee!
 Thy coming glads not man alone, but every living thing,
 From the slender garden insect to the bird upon the wing;
 It was so at creation's dawn, and, till the world decay,
 As prized by all will be thy light, as prized it is to-day!

A TRUE STORY.

MANY years ago I happened to be one of the referees in a case that excited unusual interest in our courts, from the singular nature of the claim, and the strange story which it disclosed. The plaintiff, who was captain of a ship which traded principally with the West Indies, had married quite early with every prospect of happiness. His wife was said to have been extremely beautiful, and no less lovely in her character.

After living with her in the most uninterrupted harmony for five years, during which time two daughters were added to the family, he suddenly resolved to resume his occupation, which he had relinquished on his marriage, and when his youngest child was but three weeks old, sailed once more for the West Indies. His wife, who was devotedly attached to him, sorrowed deeply at his absence, and found her only comfort in the society of the children and the hopes of his return. But month after month passed away and he came not, nor did any letters, those insufficient but welcome substitutes, arrive to cheer her solitude. Months lengthened into years, yet no tidings were received from the absent husband; and after hoping against hope, the unhappy wife was compelled to believe that he had found a grave beneath the weltering ocean.

Her sorrow was deep and heartfelt, but the evils of poverty were now added to her afflictions, and the widow found herself obliged to resort to some employment in order to support her children. Her needle was the only resource, and for ten years she labored early and late for the miserable pittance which is ever grudgingly bestowed on a humble seamstress.

A merchant in New-York, in moderate but prosperous circumstances, accidentally became acquainted with her, and pleased with her gentle manners no less than her extreme beauty, he endeavored to improve their acquaintance with friendship.

After some months he offered his hand and was accepted. As the wife of a successful merchant, she soon found herself in the enjoyment of comforts and luxuries such as she had never possessed. Her children became his children, and received from him, every advantage, which wealth and affection could procure.

Fifteen years passed away; the daughters married, and by their step-father were furnished with every comfort requisite for house-keepers. But they had hardly quitted his roof when their mother was taken ill. She died after a few days, and from that time until the period of which I speak, the widow resided with the youngest daughter.

Now comes the strangest part of the story. After an absence of over thirty years, during which time no tidings, had arrived from him the first husband returned as suddenly as he had departed.

He had changed his ship, adopted another name, and spent the whole of that long period on the ocean, with other transient visits on shore, while taking in or discharging cargoes, having been careful never to come nearer home than New Orleans. Why he had acted in this unpardonable manner toward his family, no one could tell, and he obstinately refused all explanation.

There were strange rumors of slave trading and piracy afloat, but they were only whispers of conjecture rather than truth. Whatever might have been his motives for his conduct, he certainly was anything but indifferent to his family concerns when he returned. He raved like a madman when informed of his wife's second marriage, and subsequent death, vowing vengeance upon his successor, and terrifying his daughters by the most awful threats, in case they refused to acknowledge his claims. He returned wealthy, and one of the mean reptiles of the law, who are always to be found crawling about the halls of justice, advised him to bring a suit against the second husband; assuring him he could recover damages. The absurdity of instituting a claim for a wife whom death had released from the jurisdiction of earthly laws was so manifest, that it was at length agreed to by all parties to leave the matter to be adjudged by five referees.

It was upon a bright and beautiful afternoon in Spring, when we met to hear this singular case. The sunlight streamed through the dusty windows of the court room, and shed a halo around the long gray locks and broad forehead of the defendant—while the plaintiff's harsh features were thrown into still bolder relief, by the same beam which softened the placid countenance of the adversary.

The plaintiff's lawyer made a most eloquent appeal for his client, and had we not been informed about the matter, our hearts would have been melted by his touching description of the return of the desolate husband, and the agony with which he now beheld his household goods removed to consecrate a stranger's hearth. The celebrated Aaron Burr was counsel for the defendant, and we anticipated from him a splendid display of oratory.

Contrary to our expectations, however, Burr made no attempt to confute his opponent's oratory. He merely opened a book of statutes, and pointing with his thin finger to one of the pages, desired the referees to read it, while he retired for a moment, for the principal witness.

We had scarcely finished the section, which fully decided the matter in our minds, when Burr re-entered with a tall and elegant female leaning on his arm. She was attired in a simple white dress, with a wreath of ivy leaves encircling her large bonnet, and a lace veil completely concealing her countenance. Burr whispered a few words, apparently encouraging her to advance, and then gracefully raising her veil, discovered to us a face of proud, surpassing beauty. I recollect as well as if it happened yesterday. How simultaneously the murmur of admiration burst from the lips of all present. Turning to the plaintiff, Mr. Burr asked, in a cold, quiet tone:

"Do you know this lady?"

ANS.—"I do."

BURR.—"Will you swear to that?"

ANS.—"I will, to the best of my knowledge, and belief she is my daughter."

BURR.—"Can you swear to her identity?"

ANS.—"I can."

BURR.—"What is her age?"

ANS.—"She was thirty years old on the 20th day of April."

BURR.—"When did you last see her?"

ANS.—"At her own house, about a fortnight since."

BURR.—"When did you see her previous to that meeting?"

The plaintiff hesitated—a long pause ensued—the question was repeated, and the answer at length was,

"On the 14th day of May, 17—."

"When she was just three weeks old," added Burr. "Gentlemen," continued he, turning to us, "I have brought this lady here as an important witness, and such, I think, she is. The plaintiff's counsel has pleaded eloquently in behalf of the bereaved husband, who escaped the perils of the sea and returned only to find his home desolate. But who will picture to you the lonely wife bending over her daily toil, devoting her best years to the drudgery of sordid poverty, supported only by the hope of her husband's return? Who will paint the slow progress of heart-sickening, the wasting anguish of hope deferred? and finally, the overwhelming agony which came upon her when her last hope was extinguished, and she was compelled to believe herself indeed a widow? Who can depict all this without awaking in your hearts the warmest sympathy for the deserted wife and the uttermost scorn for the mean pitiful wretch, who could thus trample on the heart of her whom he had sworn to love and cherish? We need not inquire into his motives for acting so base a part. Whether it was love of gain or licentiousness, or selfish indifference, it matters not; he is too vile a thing to be judged by such laws as govern men. Let us ask the witness—she who now stands before us with the frank, fearless brow of a true hearted woman—let us ask which of these two has been to her a father."

Turning to the lady in a tone whose sweetness was in strange contrast with the scornful accent which had just characterized his words, he besought her to relate briefly the recollections of her early life. A slight flush passed over her proud and beautiful face as she replied:

"My first recollections are of a small, ill-furnished apartment, which my sister and myself shared with my mother. She used to carry out every Saturday evening the work which had occupied her during the week, and bring back employment for the following one. Saving that wearisome visit to her employers and her regular attendance at church, she never left the house. She often spoke of my father, and of the anticipated return, but at length she ceased to mention him, though I observed she used to weep more frequently than ever. I then thought she wept because we were poor, for it sometimes happened that our support was only a bit of dry bread; and she was accustomed to see by the light of the chips which she kindled to warm her famishing children, because she could not purchase a candle without depriving us of our morning meal. Such was our poverty when my mother contracted a second marriage, and the change to us was like a sudden entrance into Paradise. We found a home and a father." She paused.

"Would you excite my own child against me?"—cried the plaintiff as he impatiently waved his hand for her to be silent.

The eyes of the witness flashed fire as he spoke.

"You are not my father," exclaimed she vehemently, "What, call you my father,—you who basely left your wife to toil and your children to beggary? Never! never! never! Behold, there is my father," pointing to the agitated defendant, "there is the man who watched over my infancy—who was the sharer of my childish sports and the guardian of my inexperienced youth. There is the man who claims my affection and shares my home; there is my father. For yonder selfish wretch, I know him not. The best year of his life have been spent in lawless freedom from social ties; let him seek elsewhere for the companion of his decrepitude, nor dare insult the ashes of my mother by claiming the duties of kindred from her deserted children."

She drew her veil hastily around her as she spoke, and moved as if to withdraw.

"Gentlemen," said Burr, "I have no more to say. The words of the law are expressed in the book before you; the words of truth you have heard from woman's pure lips; it is for you to decide according to the requisition of nature and the decrees of justice."

I need not say that our decision was in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff went forth followed by the contempt of every honorable person who was present at the trial.—[N. Y. Sun.

SUPPING FULL OF HORRORS.—We see a gentleman has been publishing a book called "A Dream of Europe." His slumbers must have been one rapid series of disturbances. If we knew his address, we would send to inquire after his "Constitution." "A Dream of Europe!" We beg he will keep his dream to himself; the reality, at present, is quite bad enough.

GAZETTE AND RULE.

Friendship, Love and Truth.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 23, 1849.

I. O. O. F.

THE R. W. Grand Lodge of the State of New York, will hold an adjourned session at the Grand Lodge Room, National Hall, Canal-st., on Friday evening, June 23d, at 8 o'clock isely. By order. BENJ. J. PENTZ, Grand Sec'y.

OFFICE OF THE GRAND SECRETARY,
GRAND LODGE STATE OF NEW YORK,
City of New York, June 18, 1849.

TO OFFICERS OF LODGES AND DISTRICT DEPUTY GRAND MASTERS.

On Monday, the 25th June, I shall transmit to the District Deputy Grand Masters and Officers of Lodges in this jurisdiction all the necessary blanks for the use of Lodges for the ensuing term, together with such instructions as may be deemed necessary; and if there should be any failure on the part of Lodges or Deputies to receive such documents, they are earnestly requested to communicate the same to this office by Telegraph, (when possible) in order that the matter may be immediately attended to. Secretaries will be particular and see that returns are ready to be transmitted to this office, in accordance with 3d Section of Article 4, of Constitution of Subordinates, &c. Fraternally, &c.

WHAT IS A SECRET SOCIETY?

PROPERLY speaking, a secret society is one which carefully conceals all its purposes and chief objects from the uninitiated. But as no such society is now known to exist, at least in this country, the term is applied to all societies which are based upon the secret principle—that is to say, which have a secret initiation, passwords and signs. The Free Masons, Odd-Fellows, Sons of Temperance, Rechabites, &c., &c., are societies of this description. All their objects, purposes and designs, are known to the world. They publish their rules, principles, and regulations, and some of them, as the Masons, go so far as to promulgate their charges, lectures, and initiatory prayers, and to have their installations in public; and yet, all of them are founded on the secret principle, and find it a most efficient means of accomplishing their beneficent designs, and of promoting their charitable objects. Temperance, for example, never accomplished so much, nor advanced so vigorously, as it has since it has enshrined itself in two secret societies—the Sons of Temperance and the Rechabites.

As according to the existing use of the term secret society, all are such which work in secret, have passwords, &c., so all the societies which we have mentioned above, belong to the same family, and consequently should cherish a family feeling. We can conceive of no greater inconsistency, than for one to be a Mason, and at same time an Anti-Odd-Fellow, or to be an Odd-Fellow and also an Anti-Mason; or for one to be a Son of Temperance and an opposer to both Masons and Odd-Fellows. The fact is, all these societies are alike. One may have more secrets than the other; but all have them, and are secret societies—the Sons of Temperance as well as the Odd-Fellows, and the Odd-Fellows as well as the Masons.

We counsel, therefore, these secret societies to discard all unfraternal feeling and join hands cordially, and march forth together to do battle in the cause of humanity. There are evils enough to be overcome, and all our united energies are needed in the strife. Selfishness, discord, intemperance, and vice, in its infinitely varied aspects, rear their black and hideous forms around us, and poor Humanity groans and bleeds under their sway. A mighty voice of distress rolls up from the very depths of society, demanding assistance, sympathy and love. Odd-Fellows, Sons of Temperance, Rechabites—members of whatever secret Orders—arouse ye from your slumbers, and march forth to the rescue! Relieve the distressed of the poor and needy, help the widow and protect the orphan. Then the eyes which see, and the ears which hear, will bless you, and Heaven itself will reward you with approving smiles!

PROFESSOR NICHOLS AND THE DESTINY OF THE SOLAR SYSTEM.

THE following language, the concluding portion of a lecture delivered by Prof. Nichols, before the Whittington Club, London, has been going the round of our journals, exciting unusual attention, and eliciting numerous remarks. Here is the professor's language:

"The planets are retained in their orbits, because two opposite forces exactly balance each other. But modern astronomy has proved that there is a power at work destroying their balance. From the observations made on the retarded return of Encke's comet, and its gradual approximation to the sun, we learn the existence of a fluid, an ether, which, however subtle, tends to diminish the centrifugal force and add to the attraction of the sun. However slowly it may approach, we may yet contemplate the day when this present system shall pass away; not, however, into a vast ruin, but in its own beautiful and majestic order, just like a flower, which having adorned the earth, lets drop its leaves when its work is done, and falls back obediently upon its mother's bosom."

The following considerations show plainly that this great catastrophe is not only possible but probable. It is possible; facts have transpired that prove it so. Changes are constantly taking place in the Solar System and through the realm of stars that indicate the calamity of destruction! Several stars which once illuminated our heavens have been plunged, by some mighty accident, into everlasting night. In the far north, in the Constellation of Cassiopeia, three hundred years ago, shone a bright and beautiful star. Year after year and night after night it glimmered there, bidding as fair to shine as long as any other star in the firmament. But it shines there no more! What has happened to one of the celestial bodies may happen at any moment to any other one. It is just as reasonable that what we call an accident should happen to a star or to our globe, and destroy it, as to a tree, or to the smallest atom. So far as God is concerned there is no difference between a great or small accident. That which happens on earth every day, by which thousands of lives are destroyed in a moment—that which has happened to several stars, which have gone out in darkness, may happen, in course of ages, to our world! Its destruction is therefore possible.

It is also probable. According to Newton, the planets move round the sun spirally; so each revolution brings them nearer to the center. This advance, it is true, is slow, but it is certain. The result, therefore, must be that, in the course of ages, all the planets will reach that fatal point, where the balance of forces will be destroyed, and all will rush with dire confusion toward the sun. This is a logical deduction from the received theory of the Solar System, which we are not disposed to question. When that force, which keeps these worlds in their course, shall expire—the binding force of the sun remaining ever the same—what can prevent their falling into his burning bosom, a tremendous ruin? The teachings of science, therefore, seems to confirm the popular belief that a great and awful catastrophe will, in the end, befall the Universe.

All the old poets were full of the idea, and the ancient sages and philosophers declared it; and our old Teutonic ancestors, in the times of their paganism, chaunted the fearful theme in their songs:

"The sun turns pale,
The spacious earth
The sea engulfs;
From heaven fall
The lucid stars;
At the end of time
The vapors rise,
And playful flames
Involve the skies."

Such appears to have been the universal thought. But, whatever may be the destiny of our earth, we may rest assured that all its revolutions and convulsions will conduce to the general harmony—to the renewal and wider extension of beauty, and the establishment of a higher order. Let us be consoled, for through destruction and death is the mysterious way of life.

THE NEW YORK CASE.

OUR views and our course, with regard to the New York controversy, as it is called, are well known to the public. While we have ever spoken with charity of those who are unfortunately in rebellion to the legal authorities, we have, with a firm hand, sustained the authority of the R. W. Grand Lodge of the United States; recognizing it to be, as its own constitution asserts, the foundation of all true and legitimate authority in Odd-Fellowship; having exclusive power to make, alter or regulate, the work and language of the Order; to pass general laws for the government of the Fraternity, in all its branches—to create Grand and Subordinate Lodges and Encampments, to annul or recall any Charter, issued by its authority. (See Dig. 1, Article I, Sec. 2, 3, 4, 5.) Such being our views of the powers and prerogatives of the Grand Lodge U. S., and knowing that after a full and fair investigation of the whole question, it decided adversely to the New Constitution, and wishing, above all, to preserve the unity of the Order, by maintaining, unimpaired, the central authority, we have advocated, fairly and unflinchingly, the rights of the legitimate Grand Lodge of New York. Such has been our course, and such will it continue to be. The question turns simply upon the point of legality, and it seems to us to be sufficiently plain for every one to understand.

We are surprised, therefore, and deeply pained, to notice the attempts that are made, in some quarters, by restless and disobedient spirits, to mystify this question—misrepresent facts—and thus spread the spirit of disunion and insubordination beyond our own borders, through all the States of the Union to the manifest peril of the entire fabric of Odd-Fellowship. Under the high pretense of reform, and the seducing cry of liberty, the most disastrous doctrines are promulgated among us; which, if carried out, will strike at the root of our Fraternity, and lay it low in the dust. What can these men desire? Has not Odd-Fellowship, as it is now organized, more than realized our expectations? Has not our growth been unparalleled? Has not the Order efficiently redeemed all its promises and pledges, to its sick members, its widows, and its orphans? Who can doubt it? Why, then, this anxiety for change? Why not "let well enough alone?" Why introduce new forms of government, which not only cannot add anything to the efficiency of the Order, in the accomplishment of great objects, but, on the contrary, must weaken its energy, and destroy its unity, and terminate in anarchy?

We earnestly call on all good Odd-Fellows, throughout the Union, to consider this subject well, and to sustain the authority of the Grand Lodge of the United States, as the sheet anchor of our institution. Our highest Tribunal once invaded, its supreme prerogatives and powers questioned or disregarded, the sentiment of individualism, and its consequent anarchy will overshadow the sentiment of Fraternity and Unity—the spirit of Love and Charity will vanish from our broken altars, and the Order will be shivered in a thousand fragments.

We hope that, even in the State of New York, better counsels will prevail, among the members of the suspended Lodges, and that they will at length acquiesce in the decision of the Grand Lodge of the United States, and thus restore that unity which has been so fearfully jeopardized. Let all remember the sacred aphorism: "A house divided against itself cannot stand, and a kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation." Our motto, like that of the Church, is: "In the necessary, unity; in the not necessary, liberty; and in ALL, charity."

WESTERN ARTISTS.

THE West has furnished rich materials for romancers and novelists. Life there, especially in the backwoods and prairies, is wild and full of incident. The scenes from which Cooper drew the garnishment of his tales of pioneer life, are daily re-enacted, on new stages, farther toward the Occident, and by actors as wild and untutored as the Path-finders, Deer-slayers, and Leather-stockings of the Connecticut and Mohawk Valleys ever were. The hunters and trappers have already furnished many thrilling narratives of adventure to such writers as Solitaire and Thorpe; and the wilderness of the far west will always be the field of many a story of wild, incredible truth. The painter, too, tired of nature tamed by its intimacy with civilization, and seeking out striking subjects for the canvas, will find in the West, where the Natural has lost least of its purity by contact with the Artificial, materials worthy of the highest genius and the choicest taste.

At the rooms of the American Art Union is a picture which, for originality of design and felicity of execution, cannot but be admired. The painting represents a scene in the every-day life of every deer-hunter in the West. The group consists of a hunter, with nut-brown visage, topped with ocon-skin cap, buckskin coat and leggins, who stands in the edge of the beech woods, with the prairie rolling in the distance—a noble buck which he has just shot, bled, and half elevated by a staddle, bent over in hunter-style against a beech tree, preparatory to swinging him up out of danger—and his dog, who rests upon the ground. 'Tis November—the leaves of the trees are crisped brown by the frosts—the little pools of water in the forest are glazed with crackling ice—it is "running time" with the deer, and the hunter stands in the attitude of listening for the cracking bush or rustling leaf, which has just betrayed to his practiced ear—as sensitive as his eye in detecting "deer-signs"—the proximity of more game on the path. One hand is on his rifle—his half-executed work is suspended—and the other is half raised with an admonitory gesture to his dog, to keep silent while he harks.

This spirited design has been executed with the happiest effect. The color of the deer betrays to the knowing eye the season of the year; while the accuracy of the shot in the shoulder, and the appliances of gambrel and crotch for hanging the game, evinces the thorough bred backwoods hunter. You will observe its truthfulness to nature in every detail. The hickory and beech you will easily detect—the old flint-lock rifle, clung to with such pertinacity by the old hunters—the costume of foreign manufacture, and the hue of the hunter's face, tanned by the weather and the camp-fire's smoke, garnished with beard and mustache of the true burnt-prairie cut, are all notable.

For its faithfulness to the character and habits of that peculiar race of men in the West—the hunters and trappers—it certainly deserves admiration. The life of these men, in the forests and prairies, furnishes many a wild and romantic scene for illustration; but no man who has not been familiar with the hunters could conceive and execute so happily one so spirited and faithful as this, by Allan Smith, of Cleveland, Ohio, an artist who has won golden opinions by his works, and who has struck into a new field, with a boldness and originality deserving of the highest success.

American artists may perhaps do well to go to that cradle of the arts, Italy, to study the works of Canova, Michael Angelo, and Correggio, to school their taste and hands in the imitation of the acknowledged masters of painting and sculpture; but let them find in their own country—so richly endowed by the Great Architect with all that is magnificent and impressive, in mountain, river, and forest, and all that is striking and novel, in the scenes enacted on its great stage—subjects worthy of perpetuation, by the mysteries of art, for future generations.

THE GROWTH OF OUR COUNTRY.

ONE of the most remarkable spectacles ever witnessed on earth, is the growth of the United States. It appears to be but yesterday that the May Flower landed at Plymouth its little freight of pilgrims, and to-day the sons of those pilgrims fill a country larger than any other on the globe, excepting Russia and China, and number more than twenty millions. The wilderness has disappeared before the indomitable energy of our hardy race, and the whole land is clothed with villages, towns, and cities, and crossed by innumerable canals and railroads. Our cities in commerce, surpass all others, save London; and New-York bids fair soon to outstrip even London. Our civilization is still rolling westward and southward like a wave of living light, and if the past is any indication of the future, in a third of a century more the United States will stand first among the nations of the earth.

In connection with the rapid growth of our country, there is another fact worthy of being noticed. It is the unity of character exhibited by our citizens. Notwithstanding the various sources whence our population is derived, all show the same common type, as if they came from the same stock.

Travel through France, Germany, Russia, and England, and one will find greater variety of language, and social habits, and wider differences in life, than are seen here. This fact shows that our institutions, contrary to the assertions of monarchists, have a solidifying influence, tend to unity and order, rather to division and disorder.

Scarcely do emigrants touch our shores than they seem to inspire a new spirit of life, and to receive a new social impress; so that throughout the whole extent of our country, notwithstanding the diverse origin of our citizens, they are but our people.

Our institutions are positive—have within them real elements of life—embody a living and vivifying thought, and consequently impose the same national type on all who come under their influence. Here is the source of our strength, and the secret of our rapid growth.

PEDESTRIAN MISERIES IN NEW YORK.

Whoever has visited this city a few times, knows very well what these miseries are. If not, let him imagine himself in one of the following predicaments, which are very far from being interesting, though to the looker on they may be somewhat amusing.

Misery 1.—You wish to be at the P. O. at precisely 3 o'clock, and leave the City Hall just fifteen minutes before that hour; you have consequently no time to lose. You thread your way through our dirty and narrow Nassau, and you reach, with tolerable ease, Ann-street, which you no sooner cross than you are stopped by that famous barrier known to all pedestrians through Nassau-street, namely, the old book-shop, and a depot for the sale of colored prints. Besides the usual three rows of gapers, you find an assembly of apple women, news boys and the like; the whole group of dutiful admirers of the arts and ancient literature, staring in amazement at some new print of some new scene or riot; at every attempt you make to double this promontory, the pole of a coach, ready to bob you under the chin, corrects your impatience, and keeps you in the sphere of the fine arts, and at length, out of breath and spirits, you arrive at the Post Office just fifteen minutes after the mail has closed! and then your letters must remain one day longer.

Misery 2.—In the early dusk of a rainy day, you come to a crossing occupied by a long train of carriages, the pole of one close to the hind wheels of another. With your very best mimicry of patience, you wait a quarter of an hour. At length you see a vacancy between an empty wagon and the fore horses of a cart, and run to avail yourself of it, but there is no vacancy: it is not a wagon, but a timber-drag on the return, with an unseen beam behind, half as long as itself, against which you rush with such force as to scarcely leave you breath to regain your old station on the pavement.

Misery 3.—When you are going out of the city by railroad or steamboat, and have taken a coach for the sake of speed, to find yourself locked in between the stand of coaches and the pavement, following a wagon at the rate of one mile per hour, as long as you are fortunate enough not to be stopped by a column of carts crossing your way from one of the lanes; and then to arrive thirty minutes after the boat has left or the cars have started.

Misery 4.—Passing up Broadway in a dry windy day, when the dust is swept up in heaps to be carried away in carts, which is always done at midday, to find yourself destined to save the horses part of their burthen by carrying away as much as your nose, mouth, ears, eyes, hat, pockets and coat will hold!

Misery 5, and last—To be overthrown by a hog when entering the Park from Center-street.

THE ORDER IN MISSOURI.

THE abstract of the reports of the Subordinate Lodges, made to the Grand Lodge, at its session of April 19, shows the number of contributing members to be 1802, with an income of $10,608. The amount paid for the relief of brothers, for the six months preceeding, was, $1,122 97; for the relief of widowed families, $529 50; educating the orphan, $60; and for burying the dead, $100. Making in all one dollar each, as the contribution of each member, during the six months, for these truly noble and christian charities. The number of initiations for the same period was 291, and 106 admissions by card. The Order is indeed flourishing in the south-west.

St. Louis, June 8th, 1849.

I BEG to call your attention to the report of the Committee on the State of the Order, on page 192, on the circular from the Grand Lodge of Kentucky, in reference to the power of the G. L. U. S., and of the Grand Sire. I regard this report as a well written and comprehensive document, and think it well worthy of being transferred to your columns. The G. Lodge of Missouri has ever been consistent in its warm advocacy and support of the supremacy of the Grand Lodge of the United States, and without reference to any particular question or party, she will, at all hazards, maintain the authority of the G. L. U. S., and of the Grand Sire. In occupying this ground, the G. L. of Missouri must not be understood as taking sides with any party, on the unfortunate questions which have so long divided the Order in the State of New York. The action of the Grand Lodge, at its late session, and at the annual session of 1848, was purely an expression of the firm attachment to the institution, as at present constituted; recognising the G. L. U. S. as the highest authority in the Order, and regarding implicit obedience to its mandates as the solemn duty of the Order.

There are some other subjects in the proceedings which may strike you as important, and to which allusion may be made; and among them is one on page 196, being a resolution offered by Rep. Leary, on the subject of a Q. P. W. instead of an S. A. P. W. It is very evident that a Q. P. W. is productive of much benefit in facilitating the collection of dues of members in our Lodges, by requiring the dues to be paid quarterly, on default of which the Q. P. W. should be withheld. It is not incompatible with the arrangement of the six month term, and does not affect it in any sense.

The Order in the State is doing well—a growing interest is manifested every where in its favor. The nine Lodges in the city of St. Louis are all in a most excellent condition—prosperous and peaceful. They have, however, been called on, during the prevalence of the epidemic, (which to some extent still lingers among us) to follow to the tomb several of its members; the number has been, however, thus far, comparatively small. Our Lodges manifest great zeal in their fraternal attention and care to the sick; and they possess ample means to render the usual pecuniary relief to all.

The proceedings of the Grand Encampment, which held its annual session just after the close of the session of the G. Lodge, are not yet printed. As soon as this is done, I will send you a copy.

The G. Officers, for the present year, are as follows:

ISAIAH FORBES, M. W. Grand Patriarch.
E. K. WOODWARD, M. E. Grand High Priest.
V. J. PEER, R. W. Grand Senior Warden.
ALEX. PATERSON, JR., R. W. Grand Scribe.
W. H. REMINGTON, R. W. Grand Treasurer.
MAHLON OSBORN, R. W. Grand Junior Warden.
BENJAMIN F. CRANE, Grand Sentinel.
G. B. ALLEN & W. LOY, R. W. G. Representatives.

We have eight Encampments in this State, all working harmoniously and satisfactorily.

I should like to see a list of all the Lodges working under the old G. Lodge. We have a great deal of trouble here with many from your State, holding cards from Lodges under the New Constitution, in refusing them admittance into our Lodges. Many have joined the Order with a view of traveling, and knowing no difference have unfortunately connected themselves with Lodges that we do not recognize; and the consequence is, that they have become highly indignant on being refused admission, because they were assured that there would be no difficulty in visiting any Lodge in the United States.

I am cordially, fraternally, etc., I. M. V.

Those parts of the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of Missouri, to which our valued correspondent refers, we have already spread before our readers, and with much satisfaction. We hope to hear often from the friend who has now favored us, knowing that his communications will ever be as welcome to our readers as ourselves.

THE ORDER IN NORTH-CAROLINA.

A correspondent writing from Wilton, North Carolina, says:

"As your numerous readers are interested in everything which relates to the good of our Order, I have the pleasure of informing you that a new Lodge was instituted at Colerain, Bertie county, N. C., on the 25th May last, by D. G. M. Worthington, (assisted by Brothers from Washington Lodge No. 8.) and called 'Oriental Lodge' No. 24, I. O. O. F. The following officers were duly installed for the first quarter: Brothers I. H. Etheridge, N. G.; S. A. Bernard, V. G.; Thomas Brown, Secretary; Lemuel Evans, Treasurer. On the first meeting they had six initiations, and all of the right sort. They have, in Colerain and Vincientz, good materials for a flourishing Lodge, and I have no doubt that 'Oriental Lodge' No. 24, will add much to the dissemination of our beloved principles of 'Friendship, Love and Truth.' So you see our Order is still on its onward march in the old North State.

"Yours, in F. L. and T., W. L. D."

The Order in no State presents a more flattering appearance than in North Carolina, and we welcome the new brethren to our ranks with much pleasure.

NEWS FROM THE ORDER.—Our columns this week are well stored with news from the Order, for which we owe our friends many thanks. We hope every brother will feel himself our correspondent when any news of interest comes into his possession. All letters are most welcome.

THE Odd-Fellows of Covington, Ky., following the pattern of their New York brethren, have resolved to establish a library for the use and benefit of the Order.

I. O. O. F. IN THE WEST INDIES.—The Somers Pride of India Lodge of Odd-Fellows, No. 899, of Hamilton, Bermuda, celebrated their first anniversary at that place, on the 23d ult. There was a grand procession and dinner.

THE ORDER IN ALABAMA.

The brethren of Ezel Lodge, of Livingston, Ala. had a public procession, address and dinner, on the 26th of May, which is spoken of in the most glowing terms by the Sumter County Whig. The editor says:

"This is the first time that there has been any public celebration of the Odd-Fellows in Livingston. The members of the nearest Lodges were invited to join in the exercises, and partake of the repast. At about 11 o'clock the procession moved from the Lodge-room, and, under the direction of Gen. James T. Hill, Marshal of the day, repaired to the Methodist church, where an address was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Bestor.

"Mr. B. excels in extemporaneous speaking; and his subject being familiar to him, there was a charm in his language that I have rarely known to be equalled in any address of the kind.

"It is believed that this day's celebration will prove an advantage to the Order in this town. After the address the members returned to the Lodge room, and were there dismissed. From thence they repaired to the very excellent dinner, and, after having partaken heartily of the very good cheer, adjourned. Every thing passed off agreeably and harmoniously."

EXTRACT FROM AN ADDRESS

Delivered before Monette Lodge No. 8, Raleigh, N. C.

BY WM. H. WASHINGTON.

We have read this address with great pleasure. It is elegant and eloquent, earnest and rational. The concluding remarks, which we give below, are eminently beautiful.

Finally, my brethren, it is important for us to remember, that one of the most characteristic emblems of our Order is the "Bee Hive." Ours is emphatically a working Order, and the duties imposed by our sacred obligations, will be but feebly performed, if we are not strictly diligent in our respective callings. And while we spurn from our ranks the unprincipled and the vicious, we can find no place for the drones and the idlers. But the dealings of our particular trade or profession is but a mere drop of water in the comprehensive ocean of our business. Mankind is our business—the common welfare is our business—charity, mercy, forbearance, benevolence, are all our business.

We have a race to run, a warfare of no ordinary character to wage. Our race is to last us through life, and our contest is for no less than complete mastery over ourselves; and great and priceless is the reward which awaits the untiring and the faithful. In preparing for so important and arduous an undertaking, our Order commands us in the language of St. Paul—"Be temperate in all things"—and points to the words of Divine Wisdom to guide our wandering footsteps. Let us heed her precious counsels; let us treasure them in our hearts, to be our guide through our daily avocations, and our consolation in the still watches of the night. "Be not weary in well doing." Remember the solemnity of our vows, and the greatness of our responsibilities. "Ours is no careless pledge, false and unmeaning, kept to the outward ear—broken to the soul:

Firm to our duty, when sorrow is wringing

The heart of a mortal, we freely condole;

Not with mere promises,

Pharisee hollowness,

But in fulfillment of precepts divine,

Kindness administer

Visit the prisoner,

Pour on the wounded the oil and the wine."

Remember that the all-seeing eye of Heaven rests ever upon us!

An important emblem of our Order—the "Hour Glass"—reminds us how fast the sands of life are passing away. Remember that we profess friendship and love for all mankind—that we profess to wear truth for ever stamped upon our foreheads. Friendship, wherever we find a creature in the image of his Maker—from the luxurious Nabob to the poorest Lazarus that languishes at his gate. We profess that love which, descending from Heaven, bathes the Universe with its gentle dews, and returns undiminished to the bosom of its God:

"That truth divine, exhibited on Earth,
Gives Charity its being and its birth."

Brothers, ours is indeed a noble calling—worthy, thrice worthy of all our ardent labors and all our devoted care. Let our hearts, then, never be turned aside from their purpose—let our hands never be idle—and let our hopes be for ever bright.

Rev. Alonzo Wilton, will please make a report to this office at his earliest possible convenience.

THE PENNSYLVANIA DELEGATION.—In our notice of the Festival of the 4th of June, the delegation from our sister city was passed over with a briefer notice than was agreeable to us. Though we did not make special note of their fine appearance, others were more careful. A cotemporary, speaking of Pennsylvania Odd-Fellows, says:

"The Pennsylvania delegation next made its appearance, and also filed into College Place. This was a fine body of men, numbering about 1,000. There were a considerable number of Lodges represented by members, who fell into the ranks of those Lodges who were present in full force. We observed the Fredonia, No. 148, with its beautiful banner, and the Grand Lodge of the State of Pennsylvania, with its banner carried by negroes. The devices were Justice with scales and sword, a female figure (Charity) with one child in her arms and two standing at her knee. There were also two female figures with hands joined in amity, and the bundle of sticks between them, intended to indicate unity. Commerce and agriculture were represented by a shield having a ship and plow supported by two horses rampant. The motto was—In God we trust: Friendship, Love, and Truth. The color of the insignia worn by the members of the Grand Lodge was scarlet—that worn by the Grand Encampment was purple."

The Key-Stone State is now "the banner State" of the Order, so far as numbers are concerned, but we hope and are confident, that a few months will reverse the order of things, and place New-York in the van. We are sure our brethren of Pennsylvania will be equally gratified with us, to witness the restoration of unity, in the ranks of Odd-Fellowship in the Empire State.

FETE OF THE ORIENTALS.—I cannot leave your city without expressing my thanks for the manner in which Oriental Lodge, No. 68, of New York, acquitted herself on the occasion of the festival on Monday.

The members of all the various Oriental Lodges in the United States had been invited to become the guests of No. 68, on that occasion; and after the fatiguing march of Monday, we repaired to the "Oriental Head Quarters," where, after some preliminary refreshments, bathing, &c., a party, numbering two hundred, were ushered into the large saloon of the Apollo Building. The chair was taken, at five o'clock, by Grand Representative James W. Hale, of the New York Orientals, who welcomed the visitors in a happy manner.

The regular toasts were exceedingly well arranged, and call responses from P. G. M. Parmenter, of Mass.; G. Reps. Hillard and Frost, from the same State; P. Gs. Downing and Wyler, of Phila.; the N. G. of the Oriental Lodge, of New Jersey; Rev. Bro. Evans, Chaplain of the Lodge; and many others, whose names I cannot recall. For four hours the happy company toasted, sang, and shouted for joy, and few roofs covered a more contented set of mortals.

On the morning of Tuesday, such of the visitors as were in the city, were invited to a collation at the same place, and had the pleasure of meeting Grand Sire Kneass, G. Rep. Read, of New Jersey, and many other friends. The good cheer was unbounded; and those who enjoyed the hospitalities of Oriental Lodge of New Jersey, will not soon forget the delicate attention of Bros. Hale, Fell, Peck, the Smiths, Wakeman, Bell, and indeed the whole membership of 68. There was a feeling of universal satisfaction, and this is not the opinion merely of ONE OF THE GUESTS.—[Sunday News.

CONCORDE LODGE No. 43 has purchased a beautiful spot for the Order in Greenwood Cemetery. The dedicatory services were very appropriate, and were attended by a large body of spectators. The ceremonies were performed by Rev. Dr. Verrier, of the Church "Du SAINT ESPRIT." In our next we shall give our readers a translation of the exercises, together with the Address.

THE LATE PROCESSION OF THE I. O. O. F.—Nagel and Weingartner, 74 Fulton-st., have published a beautiful lithograph of the great procession of the 4th of June, which we commend to the attention of the brotherhood. Copies can be had at this office—price, 25 cents.

LETTER FROM PANAMA.

PANAMA, NEW GRENADA, May 24, 1849.

I HAVE thought the following plain statement of facts, might be interesting to your readers. Landing at Chagres the first object is to obtain conveyance to Cruces (previous to May to Gorgona.) Select the steamer as far as she goes, contracting with the captain to send you on by Canoe to Cruces, for which his charge will be eight dollars, or engage a canoe or boat to take you the whole route, which will cost you about six dollars, including about a hundred and fifty lbs. baggage. For extra baggage you will have to pay about two dollars per hundred lbs. The trip will take one and a half to two days, according to the quantity of baggage, and the kind of boat you employ. A skiff (flat bottomed) is always much preferable to a canoe.

From Cruces, your mule or horse for riding will cost ten dollars, baggage five to six dollars per hundred lbs. If you start at six in the morning you can go through in a day, but the natives are so tardy they often delay till nine or ten o'clock, and then, if with baggage, are two days going through. The usual charges at Chagres, Cruces, and Gorgona, is fifty cents per meal, and fifty cents for lodging, and we were even charged these rates by the black Alcade at Cruces, although compelled to sleep upon the floor, with only a cowhide under us. The usual charge, however, made by the natives for that kind of bedding, or for sleeping on a mat is a rial (ten cents) per night. Goods can be safely transmitted from New-York to Panama through any responsible forwarding house, but at rates about twenty-five per cent. higher than you could have them transported for, if you contracted personally. At Panama a good sized room for four persons to live in can be hired for fifty cents per day, and you can either board yourselves, or get meals at a refectory. By either mode your living will not vary much from eighty-seven and a half cents per day, exclusive of your room. It is not unpleasant for those who like a mountain ramble, to walk from Cruces to Panama, but they should do it leisurely, and devote two days to the tour. The Chagres is a beautiful river, with a considerable current, the scenery and splendid trees and shrubbery, highly interesting, and but for the showers which during the rainy season occur four or five times a day, there would be nothing to mar the great interest of the trip.

Even this difficulty may be modified by having the covering of the boat made of fresh Palmetto leaves, which the boatman will do at two hours notice, and by having it sufficiently lofty to allow room for the head when seated. It is well to lay in some provisions at Chagres, which can be cooked at the Indian and negro huts, which comprise the only stopping places on the river, and which are woefully deficient of the commonest articles. As respects health, if you will keep yourself dry, not expose yourself to the damp penetrating night airs, refrain from ardent spirits and exciting wines, and from noonday exposure, I believe you need not fear a trip across the Isthmus, at any time between the 1st of Nov. and the 1st of May.

On the 1st of May there were, I presume, 2400 persons at Panama, waiting for passage to California, and about 100 have arrived since, making in all 2500. The Panama steamer and numerous sailing vessels have since departed with great numbers of passengers; and when the Oregon steamer shall have sailed—by which I depart this day—there will not remain 300 Americans in the town, and they will all leave within a week. At present there are vessels sufficient to take several hundred passengers more than are here, and none are now arriving in consequence of the lateness of the season. Myself and a party of friends left New York on the 19th of April in the Falcon, and reached Chagres the 2d day of May, after spending two days at Havana. The steamers Panama and Oregon arrived here May 4th and 5th, and by the latter we shall reach San Francisco about June 11th, making our trip through in about 50 days. I had intended visiting Europe the present summer, but finally concluded to take a trip to California, and see what the people are about there, and see whether the genuine Hesperian fruit is actually growing there in a mature state for plucking, so as to transfer some specimens to Long Island. I consequently sent one confidential man in advance who has been there for some time, and I have now brought with me two able bodied men who have hitherto served me most faithfully, and after placing them in position, I propose returning in the autumn.

Chagres contains 104 huts, all negroes, Indians and mixtures, but two, and about 700 inhabitants; Cruces 200 huts, all negroes but the Pader, and 1200 inhabitants; Gorgona 100 huts, 700 inhabitants, nearly all negroes and mixed breeds.

On our route from Chagres to Gorgona, we did not meet with one person who could tell us the distance from the respective places. The California steamer and British steamer arrived here yesterday the 23d. Yours very respectfully, W. R. P.

CURRENCY OF NEW GRENADA AND IMPOSITION ON AMERICANS.—The Government of New Grenada has coined dollars of the British standard value, for the purpose of paying off the interest of her debt to England; but the coinage for home circulation has been alloyed and reduced twenty per cent., which causes them to be worth but eighty cents, and the parts in the same ratio. The New York bank-note lists quote it at seventy-five cents. The American dollar is worth twenty-five cents more than the New Grenada dollar. Instead of Mr. Nelson, the American Consul here, doing his duty as soon as American coin commenced circulating here, by an official announcement that the actual value of the American dollar, and all parts of it, were worth twenty-five per cent. more than the New Grenada currency, he has totally refrained from imparting them the requisite information, and up to the present date the mass are entirely ignorant of the fact. The result has been that, debts contracted here, in a currency worth eighty cents, have been paid in a currency worth one hundred cents, and the amount thus paid by Americans, during the past year, has exceeded a million of dollars, which has afforded the Consul an opportunity of speculating to great profit, a circumstance that report says he has fully profited by—being a foreigner and a notorious speculator in ship passages to California. Is he the proper man for an American Consul?

PANAMA, May 24, 1849.

FROM EUROPE.

THE Steamer America arrived at Boston on Wednesday, with advices from Liverpool to the 9th of June. The political news, by this arrival, is wholly unimportant. The whole of Northern and Central Europe is quiet; and though great events are announced as "close at hand," every thing is singularly dull. The French army has made no progress toward subduing Rome, and the policy of France, in that quarter, remains doubtful.

In Liverpool, cotton has improved 1-4d., and a good feeling prevailed in the manufacturing districts, a state of things much to the benefit of our commerce. Breadstuffs were dull, and the reports from the crops so favorable as to check any immediate advance. There are rumors of a disease in the potato, but it is too soon to give any opinion upon the subject.

Financial affairs, in England, are very favorable; and a low rate of interest, with ample supplies of money, still the order of the day.

THE CHOLERA.—This epidemic continues about the same, varying from twenty to forty cases each day, of which nearly one half prove fatal. We do not apprehend any increase. Our city is generally healthy, and a extraordinary clean.

THE ORDER IN DELAWARE.

WE are indebted to one of the earliest and truest friends of the Order in Delaware, for the following information in relation to the annual election, held on the 18th inst.:

ELECTIVE OFFICERS OF THE GRAND LODGE OF DELAWARE, 1849.

G. M., H. F. ASKEW, of Mechanics' Lodge No. 4.
D. G. M., S. P. GODWIN, of Crystal Fount, No. 10.
G. W., LEVI RUSSELL, of Washington Lodge No. 6.
G. S., EDWARD MCINTIRE, Mechanics' Lodge No. 4.
G. T., WM. H. PIERCE, " "
G. Rep. JOHN F. SMITH, " "
G. Mar., JACOB BARR, of Fairfax Lodge No. 8.
Yours, respectfully, J. F. S.

ODD-FELLOWS' HALL ASSOCIATION.—The official statement we published last week, is worthy a careful reading. The new Board of Managers are all known as practical business men, and under their administration we look with unshaken confidence to see our noble temple completed upon its original liberal plan, and what is more, become the source of large profit to the funds of those who have so cordially taken hold of the work. The managers desire the fullest support of every brother, and we have no doubt that they will receive it cheerfully, and to an extent that will enable them to overcome the small obstacles which now present themselves.

ODD-FELLOWS' LIBRARY.—By a vote of the Trustees the subscription books to this valuable institution are to be placed in the Lodge-rooms of all the Subordinates in the city. We hope the movement will result in the accession of a large number of subscribers and liberal donations. The Order is capable of establishing a library which will do honor to themselves and to the city.

THE WORK OF THE ORDER.—The regular meeting of the Grand Lodge of the State will be held on the 22d, and a large attendance is to be desired. The elections of the Subordinate Lodges commence next week, and we hope in our next issue to present a long list of the new officers. Will the officers of the Lodges remember us, and send us early returns? Not only the city Lodges, but our friends in the interior.

DEATH OF EX-PRESIDENT POLK.—The Ex-President died of chronic-diarrhoea, at Nashville, on the 15th inst.; much regretted by a large circle of friends, who had just welcomed him home from the toils of office, with an enthusiasm which knew no bounds. Mr. Polk was not a very brilliant man, but his administration will form a most important page in the history of our country.

FROM CALIFORNIA.—The Steamer Crescent City has arrived at New Orleans, from Chagres, and has on board California gold to the amount of five hundred thousand dollars. She left Chagres on the 5th of June, and had on board one hundred and twenty-six passengers, who had come from the "diggins" to Panama; among them were Capt. Forbes, late of the California, and Lt. Gov. Mason. The Panama, Capt. Porter, had arrived at Panama, and with the Oregon had left for California, taking all the passengers on the Isthmus. The California was to leave on the 15th of June. The dates from San Francisco are down the 1st of May, and in future frequent news may be looked for, as the steamers will run regularly. The stories told of the value of the gold regions are more startling than before, and in all probability another large emigration will take place.

FATHER MATTHEW.—The Common Council of New York, and the various Temperance Societies, are making active preparations for the reception of this great Apostle of Temperance.

THE Rt. Rev. Mr. Tyler, a distinguished Catholic Bishop, died at Providence, on the 19th.

Literary Notices.

93—"USE AND ABUSE OF AIR." By Dr. Griscom. J. S. Redfield & Co., Clinton Hall. This is one of the most valuable little works that has made its appearance in a long time. It treats of a subject on which there is an almost universal indifference; while, at the same time, the evil it seeks to remove is one of the most serious that can be inflicted upon us. The question of ventilation, as connected with the public health, is handled by a master of the subject, and no one should omit to possess himself of the valuable hints offered to him.

93—"BLACKWOOD FOR JUNE." Leonard, Scott & Co., Fulton-st., areas usual prompt with their issue of this "best of magazines." The present number closes a volume, and the proper time for new subscribers to commence has arrived.

93—"PETERSON'S LADIES' NATIONAL MAGAZINE, FOR JULY." This popular monthly, under the editorial supervision of Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, continues to support its previous reputation. The July number is embellished with two fine engravings. Dewitt & Davenport, agents.

93—"SARTAIN'S UNION MAGAZINE, FOR JULY." As usual, an excellent number is presented, not only so far the letter press is concerned, but in the ornamental part. The "Nightmare," alone, is worth the price of the number, to say nothing of the "Cantatrice." Dewitt & Davenport, agents.

93—"THE NARRATIVE OF THE UNITED STATES EXPEDITION TO THE RIVER JORDAN AND THE DEAD SEA." By Lieut. W. S. Lynch, U. S. N. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard.

The publication of this work has been looked for with so much interest, that we expect to gratify many readers by giving it an extended notice. Indeed, the intrinsic merits of the work claim for it more than ordinary attention and examination. The scene of exploration is hallowed by historic associations, and possesses other and peculiar features of interest. The River Jordan and the Dead Sea—the one made sacred by the presence of Deity incarnate, and the other terrible by the manifestations of Divine wrath—must be regarded with deep emotion wherever those wonderful events are read and accredited; and it is quite natural that every intelligent christian and philanthropist should await with eager curiosity a narrative of personal observation of the present appearance of those interesting localities. Such a one will be glad of the assurance that in Lieut. Lynch's book he will find a succinct, direct, and pleasing account of those scenes which, under shelter of our national flag, he successfully explored.

The volume is a handsome octavo of five hundred pages, embellished with about thirty engravings, and two outline or sketch maps; one of the course of the Jordan, and the other of the Dead Sea. The drawings for all of the engravings were made upon the spot, by two members of the expedition, Lieut. Dale, and Passed-Midshipman Aulick, the former of whom did not live to see the full fruit and proud result of the expedition. He died near Beirut, prostrated by sickness and the exhaustion consequent upon the toils of the journey, when the party were passing from the ruins of the Baalbec to the sea coast.

The expedition, it is generally known, sailed from New York, in the storeship Supply, Lieut. Lynch commanding, in November, 1847; reached the Mediterranean in the following month, arrived in Smyrna in February, and almost immediately embarked in an Austrian steamer for Constantinople, the slave market and other peculiarities of which city the author very fully and pleasantly describes. Lieut. Lynch's style is altogether agreeable. It has an imaginative glow and a high poetic tinge, without verbiage or exaggeration—faults which too commonly accompany those qualities. Some of the descriptions of scenes and incidents at sea are exceedingly beautiful, and minister to a healthy mental excitement. From Constantinople they passed to the coast of Syria, and disembarked the expedition at Haifa, not far from St. Jean d'Acre; thence they conveyed their boats overland, having them drawn by the camels to Tiberias, on the Sea of Galilee, whence they again embarked, descending the Jordan to the Dead Sea.

The narrative of their entrance upon this part of the expedition commences at the eighth chapter of the book, and from this point, the reader, to speak nautically, may take a fresh "departure." Hitherto the scenes through which the expedition's party passed were not strictly new; though incidents occurred with sufficient frequency to give novelty and freshness to the narration. Now, the enterprising travelers approach the main design of the expedition. They begin to meet with wandering Arabs, and have other indications of the perils and toils of the journey. Now, too, the reader begins to find in Lieut. Lynch's journal reference to localities, and rivers, and scenes, mentioned in Sacred Writ—the hills of Gilead, the river Jabok, the land of the Ammonites, the spot where Jacob wrestled with the angel—and a thousand interesting associations and memories crowd upon the mind. Finally, the author having encountered difficulties in the navigation of the Jordan which he did not anticipate, and which were only overcome by the most vigorous and persevering exertions, he reached the borders of the Dead Sea. We shall now let the adventurous traveler speak for himself. Under date of April 18, 1848, after describing the bathing of the pilgrims in the Jordan, he says:

"At 8 25, passed by the extreme western point, where the river is 180 yards wide and three feet deep, and entered upon the Dead Sea; the water a nauseous compound of bitters and salts.

"The river, where it enters the sea, is inclined toward the eastern shore, very much as is represented on the map of Messrs. Robinson and Smith, which is the most exact of any we have seen. There is a considerable bay between the river and the mountains of Belka, in Ammon, on the eastern shore of the sea.

"A fresh north-west wind was blowing as we rounded the point. We endeavored to steer a little north of west, to make a true west course, and threw the patent log overboard to measure the distance; but the wind rose so rapidly that the boats could not keep head to wind, and we were obliged to haul the log in. The sea continued to rise with the increasing wind, which gradually freshened to a gale, and presented an agitated surface of foaming brine; the spray, evaporating as it fell, left incrustations of salt upon our clothes, our hands, and faces; and while it conveyed a prickling sensation wherever it touched the skin, was, above all, exceedingly painful to the eyes. The boats, heavily laden, struggled sluggishly at first; but when the wind freshened in its fierceness, from the density of the water it seemed as if their bows were encountering the sledge-hammers of the Titans, instead of the opposing waves of an angry sea.

"At 8 30, passed a piece of drift wood, and soon after saw three swallows and a gull. At 4 55, the wind blew so fiercely that the boats could make no headway; not even the Fanny Skinner, which was nearer to the weather shore, and we drifted rapidly to leeward; threw over some of the fresh water to lighten the Fanny Mason, which labored very much, and I began to fear that both boats would founder.

"At 5 40, finding that we were losing every moment, and that with the lapse of each succeeding one the danger increased, kept away for the northern shore, in the hope of being yet able to reach it; our arms, our clothes and skins coated with a greasy salt; and our eyes, lips and nostrils smarting excessively. How different was the scene before the submerging of the plain, which was 'even as the garden of the Lord.'

"At times it seemed as if the Dread Almighty frowned upon our efforts to navigate a sea, the creation of his wrath. There is a tradition among the Arabs that no one can venture upon this sea and live. Repeatedly the fates of Costigan and Molyneux have been cited to deter us. The first one spent a few days, the last one about twenty hours, and returned to the place from whence he had embarked, without landing upon its shores. One was found dying upon the shore, the other expired in November last, immediately after his return, of fever contracted upon its waters.

"But, although the sea had assumed a threatening aspect, and the fretted mountains, sharp and incinerated, loomed terrific on either side, and salt and ashes mingled with its sands, and foetid sulphurous springs trickled down its ravines, we did not despair; awe struck, but not terrified; fearing the worst, yet hoping for the best, we prepared to spend a dreary night upon the dreariest waste we had ever seen.

"At 5 58, the wind suddenly abated, and with it the sea as rapidly fell; the water, from its ponderous quality, settling as soon as the agitating cause had ceased. Within twenty minutes from the time we bore away from a sea which threatened to engulf us, we were pulling away, at a rapid rate, over a placid sheet of water, that scarcely rippled beneath us; and a rain cloud, which had enveloped the sterile mountains of the Arabian shore, lifted up, and left their rugged outlines basking in the setting sun. At 6 10 a flock of gulls flew over, while we were passing a small island of mud, a pistol shot distant from the northern shore, and half a mile west of the river's mouth. At 6 20, a light wind sprang up from the S. E., and huge clouds drifted over, their western edges gorgeous with light, while the great masses were dark and threatening. The sun went down, leaving beautiful islands of rose colored clouds over the coast of Judaea; but above the yet more sterile mountains of Moab all was gloomy and obscure.

"The northern shore is an extensive mud flat, with a sandy plain beyond, and is the very type of desolation; branches and trunks of trees lay scattered in every direction; some charred and blackened as by fire; others white with an incrustation of salt. These were collected at high water mark, designating the line which the water had reached prior to our arrival. On the deep sands of this shore were laid the scene of the combat between the Knight of Leopard and Ilderim the Saracen. The north-western shore is an unmingled bed of gravel, coming in a gradual slope from the mountains to the sea. The eastern coast is a rugged line of mountains, bare of all vegetation—a continuation of the Hauran range, coming from the north, and extending south beyond the scope of vision, throwing out three marked and seemingly equidistant promontories from its south-eastern extremity.

"At 6 25, passed a gravelly point, with many large stones upon it. It is a peninsula, connected with the main by a low, marshy isthmus. When the latter is overflowed, the peninsula must present the appearance of an island, and is doubtless the one to which Stephens, Warburton and Dr. Wilson allude.

"We were, for some time, apprehensive of missing the place of rendezvous; for the Sheikh of Huteim, never having been afloat before, had scarce recovered from his fright during the gale, was bewildered in his mind, and perfectly useless as a guide. The moon had not risen, and in the starlight, obscured by the shadows of the mountains, we pulled along the shore in some anxiety. At one moment we saw the gleam of a fire upon the beach, to the southward; and firing a gun, made to it with all expedition. In a short time it disappeared; and while resting on the oars, waiting for some signal to direct us, there were the flashes and reports of guns and sound of voices upon the cliffs, followed by other flashes and reports far back upon the shore which we had passed. Divided between apprehensions of an attack upon our friends and a stratagem for ourselves, we were uncertain where to land. Determined, however, to ascertain, we closed in with the shore, and pulled along the beach, sounding as we proceeded.

"A little before 8 P. M., we came up with our friends, who had stopped at Ain el Feshka, fountain of the stride.

"The shouts and signals we had heard had been from the scouts and caravan, which had separated from each other, making mutual signals of recognition. They had likewise responded to ours, which, coming from two points, some distance apart, for a time disconcerted us. It was a wild scene upon an unknown and desolate coast—the mysterious sea, the shadowy mountains, the human voices among the cliffs, the vivid flashes, and the loud reports reverberating along the shore.

"Unable to land near the fountain, we were compelled to haul the boats upon the beach, about a mile below; and, placing some Arabs to guard them, took the men to the camp, pitched in a cane-brake beside a brackish spring, where, from necessity, we made a frugal supper, and then, wet and weary, threw ourselves upon a bed of dust, beside a foetid marsh—the dark, fretted mountains behind, the sea, like a huge cauldron, before us, its surface shrouded in a lead-colored mist.

"Toward midnight, while the moon was rising above the eastern mountains, and the shadows of the clouds were reflected wild and fantastical upon the surface of the somber sea; and every thing, the mountains, the sea, the clouds, seemed specter-like and unnatural, the sound of the convent bell of Mar Saba struck gratefully upon the ear; for it was the Christian call to prayer, and told of human wants and human sympathies to the wayfarers on the borders of the Sea of Death."

On his return, Lieut. Lynch "went up to Jerusalem," crossed the country to Baalbec, and embarked at Beirut. The work concludes with an account of the death of Lieut. Dale, already referred to, and a brief mention of the places touched at on the homeward passage. Early in December of 1848, the toil-worn, but successful party, "were greeted with the heart-cheering sight of their native land," their commander having conducted them through novel dangers and toils. The record he has given of the scenes through which they passed will be eagerly perused by his countrymen, and will be a lasting memorial of a great national enterprise, skillfully consummated.—[Commercial Advertiser.]

DR. FRANKLIN'S EPITAPH.

A CORRESPONDENT requests us to insert Dr. Franklin's epitaph on itself; this we do, but must observe that it is less original than it has generally been considered:

The body of
Benjamin Franklin, Printer,
Like the cover of an old book,
Its contents worn out,
And strip of its lettering and gilding,
Lies here, food for the worms.
Yet the work itself shall not be lost,
For it shall, as he believes, appear once more,
In a new
And more beautiful edition,
Corrected and amended
By the Author.

The following, which appears in an old book, published at least a century and a half before Franklin, may be considered as having suggested the idea of his own epitaph:

THE WORLD.

The world's a book, writ by th' eternal art
Of the great Author; printed in man's heart;
'Tis falsely printed, though divinely penned,
And all the errata will appear at th' end.

ON THE SAME.

The world's a printing-house, our words are thoughts,
Our deeds are characters of several sizes;
Each soul's a compositor, of whose faults
The Levites are correctors and heaven revisers;
Each is the common press, from which being driven,
We're gathered, sheet by sheet, and bound for heaven.

H. LONG & BROTHER have reprinted "Mabel Carrington, or Love and Pride," and state on the title page that it is "by Mrs. GREY, author of the Gambler's Wife." This is not so, nor is it so stated in the English edition. It is a fair novel—has some interest, though very common place in its plot. But putting Mrs. Grey's name upon it as author is an imposition.

GLORY.—Millions of bushels of human bones have been transported from the continent to Hull, for agricultural purposes. These, which were collected on the plains of Leipsic, Austerlitz, and Waterloo, were the bones of the bold, the brave, and chivalrous, who fell fighting their country's battles. With them were mixed the bones of the horses, and both were conveyed to Yorkshire, where they were ground to dust, sent to Doncaster, and sold for manure.

PRaise cannot be made a gift; so neither, when not his due, can man receive it. He may think he does, but he receives only words; for desert being the essential condition of praise, there can be no reality in the one without the other.

Now Julia was, as we have elsewhere shown,
A girl of good sound sense and ready wit;
The envious hair which had her brow o'ergrown
Dull'd not her intellect a single bit.
The javelin, when by a skillful hand 'tis thrown,
Is not more sure its destined mark to hit,
Than was our Julia's wit to penetrate
One's thoughts, and sift the little from the great.

It is evidence of good sense in a lady, to try and make herself as attractive as possible. If her skin is dark, pimpled, tanned, freckled, fallow or rough, GOURAUD'S ITALIAN MEDICATED SOAP will give it a whiteness, smoothness and softness and brilliance surpassing anything ever before seen. Should her brow be overgrown, or her upper lip be defaced with hair, it is only necessary to use GOURAUD'S POU-DRE SUBTILES to totally eradicate the nuisance.

CHOLERA.

FIFTY-FOUR CASES OF CHOLERA CURED WITH BRANDRETH'S PILLS.—Important to the public, and satisfactory to myself. It is with much pleasure that I place in possession of an intelligent public the subjoined statement of Captain John Doyleson, of the steamboat Iroquois, of Pittsburgh. It relates to the unprecedented successful treatment of fifty-four cases of cholera with Brandreth's Pills as the medicine, and weak gruel as the diet. They all recovered. But unfortunately there was one gentleman on board, having with him his family and nurse, who had not much confidence in the efficacy of the pills. He had probably read the celebrated report of a New York Medical Council, and may have noticed the comments of some of the editors of New York papers, on the advice I gave the public regarding the use of laudanum in cholera. At all events, he preferred the laudanum treatment for himself, child and nurse. They all died. Fifty-four persons had the cholera, took my pills, and lived. Three took laudanum, refused the pills, and died! This is a plain statement of the result of the two methods of treating the cholera—one as advised by the medical council of the Board of Health of this city, and the other recommended by me! I need say no more upon this subject as the letter speaks for itself.

But, as I scarcely ever take the trouble to refute the sayings of editors when they write maliciously on subjects they do not understand, it may not be improper, and will not materially infringe upon a rule I have adopted, to preface this letter with a few remarks, applicable to editors of the above stamp, and some of importance to the public.

When I came out in opposition to the use of laudanum as advised by the medical council, and urged the importance of purgation with Brandreth's Pills, in cholera, as well as in all cases of disease, I had no interest to benefit but that of humanity—the public good. My Pills are well known in all civilized countries. Their virtues have been published in almost every language spoken by man. I did not desire to give them a more extended reputation; neither could my object have been to accumulate more dollars. I expended over five hundred dollars in publishing my refutation of the advice of the medical council respecting the use of laudanum. No sane man supposes that I can realize that number of dollars from giving that advice. But there is one consolation that I derive from the expenditure—I feel that I performed my duty to a generous public. I know that laudanum is a dangerous remedy in cholera. I do not particularly blame the medical council. Their advice was the natural result of a false system of medical education. All examinations after death from cholera, show that the liver and all internal organs are filled with thick, dark colored blood; laudanum checks all the secretions and excretions, and shuts up all the foul humors in the system. I know that Brandreth's Pills force all these from the system and renew, or re-supply the living principle of the blood. These facts I shall hereafter elucidate so plainly that even malicious editors will understand them. No one feels more deeply humiliated than I do at the charlatanism there is in the profession of medicine. But few men living of my years have labored so earnestly to arrive at truth. Show me the truth on any subject connected with the healing art, and I embrace it with that ardor which no sophistry or prejudice can abate. I pitied the ignorance of the medical council, and also of those few editors who thought proper to come to their aid by speaking harshly of the advice I gave to the public. It is a dangerous practice for mere newspaper writers to discuss medical subjects. If my pills are really what I say they are, all the newspapers in the country cannot prevent them from becoming known. Those who have taken them are the judges. If they have not the qualities which I say they have, they never could have retained their reputation for so many years—a reputation which is constantly increasing.

Every cholera patient who has used Brandreth's Pills in the early stage of the disease has recovered; and it is my opinion that were they used in cholera hospitals, not over one per cent would die. But when I refer to a case of cure, the doctors at once say, "Oh, that was only a case of bowel complaint." I will give a whole newspaper side of such cases cured, in a few days, by the use alone of Brandreth's Pills.

B. BRANDRETH, 241 Broadway.
New York, June 12, 1849.

PITTSBURGH, June 8, 1849.

DR. B. BRANDRETH:

Sir—Having made two trips from this to New Orleans and back, as captain of the steamboat Iroquois, and on my return each time, having a large number of passengers, the cholera broke out, and there being on board a box, (as I supposed of merchandise) but which I was told contained Brandreth's pills, I immediately caused the box to be broken open, and administered to the first person taken, six pills, and in an hour thereafter, five more pills, when two more passengers were taken and I administered the same number to each, and then to a hand taken with vomiting, and soon had no less than thirteen cases, and under treatment with your pills and weak gruel, and between the first case on board and my reaching Louisville, there were no less than fifty-seven cases on board, not one of whom died. I paid the owner of the box ten dollars, and gave him his passage for the pills. On my second trip, I had procured one dozen boxes of your pills, and on the first appearance of the cholera, I gave the pills as before, with the same happy results. But there was one person who refused to take the pills, preferring his own prescription for himself and family, consisting of a wife, nurse and two children. His remedy was brandy and laudanum. He died, the nurse and the child; and they were the only ones who died on my second trip up. One of the passengers will take this to New York, and on his return he has promised to bring me a supply of your pills.

Yours respectfully,

JOHN DOYLESON.

ADVICE TO THE PUBLIC—THE TREATMENT IN CASES OF CHOLERA.

Reader, you may be well in the morning and a corpse at night! Instances occur daily where persons apparently in health, are ready for the grave in a few hours after. Now, I would offer a few suggestions to my fellow citizens. They will be plain and simple. In almost every instance where cholera produces death, diarrhea precedes it for some hours, and often for some days. Now, I advise all persons, when the bowels are in a relaxed condition, to check it—not by taking astringents, which lock up in the system the morbid humors that induce the disease, but by taking a dose of the Vegetable Universal Pills, prepared by Dr. Brandreth, and repeat it until a healthy condition of the bowels is produced. So strong is my confidence in the purgative system in cases of cholera, and other diseases, that I feel warranted in assuring the public that no deaths will ensue where the pills are administered, and they operate through the premonitory stage of the disease. Not a single death will occur if they are taken in doses sufficient to evacuate the bowels. There need be no fear respecting the quantity. Let the bowels be thoroughly evacuated, and all will be safe.

The purgative system of treating cholera is the only rational system that can be devised. The time to use purgatives is during what is called the premonitory stages of the disease. All persons have in their systems the elements of the disease, while it is epidemic. Perhaps not ten persons in a thousand, in this city, will be exempt from diarrhoea during the prevalence of a cholera atmosphere. To all then, I would advise that you evacuate the bowels thoroughly, and I promise to all such a complete exemption from an attack.

If you check the diarrhoea with opium, you retain in the system all the morbid humors that produce the disease. You may postpone the attack for a short period, but when the disease manifests itself, as it assuredly will, the result will be death.

In addition to purgation by the Vegetable Universal Pills, and in order to produce action to the surface, I would advise a free use of diffusible stimulants—say a mixture of equal parts of spirits of camphor and tincture of capsicum, given in a little water. From ten to twenty drops every ten minutes, will answer for an adult; children should take quantities in proportion to age. External applications with a view to restore action to the surface, are proper auxiliaries. But the great and essential preventative is a complete and thorough evacuation of the system in the incipient stage of the disease. If this advice is followed there will be no danger from cholera. Let me, then, impress this great truth upon the minds of the public. I do it with a perfect confidence that no case of cholera will terminate fatally where there is a thorough evacuation by the pills previous to the violence of the attack. I am so confident of the success of this mode of treatment that I would risk my reputation so far as to assert that no case of cholera will terminate fatally where purgation by the pills prepared by me have thoroughly operated on the system.

There may be cases of impaired constitutions, beyond the reach of the most scientific medical treatment, in which the patient will sink under any remedy. But the cases are rare indeed in which the Vegetable Universal Pills will not restore health.

I would remark that there is not a single person living within the region of country where cholera prevails, but is predisposed to an attack. His system has acquired a predisposition to the disease. No matter what may be the state of health he enjoys, the seeds of disease are lurking in the system. This is what medical men call a predisposition to disease—that is, a state or condition of the system in which, if any irregularity in diet or habit occurs, the disease might manifest itself in all its violence. Where the system is predisposed to an attack of the cholera, it only wants an exciting cause in order that the disease may show itself. This exciting cause may be overloading the stomach, exposure to cold or to a sudden change of temperature, irregularity of any kind. Excessive exercise, fear, and many other causes may bring on the disease where the system is predisposed to an attack.

The following synopsis of cases is given; the patients can be referred to by application at 241 Broadway.

Mr. W. was taken with pain in his bowels and diarrhoea, accompanied with violent headache, chills and great prostration. He at once took six Brandreth's pills, put his feet in hot water, and was covered with blankets; drinking, during the time his feet were in the water, some very hot boneset tea. He got, by these means, into a good sweat, went to bed, took three more pills, and in three days was quite well.

This gentleman's wife was taken with the same symptoms, only to them was added violent vomiting. She followed the same course and was cured.

Mr. T. was also taken with sudden diarrhoea, cramps, and great debility. He took eight pills, went to bed, drank during the night cold boneset tea; next morning took four more Brandreth's Pills, and was quite well the third day from the attack.

Mr. B. was taken suddenly with sickness of the stomach; took ten pills in brandy and water, and he assures me he was entirely cured the next day.

Mr. B.; this gentleman's sickness commenced with looseness of the bowels, and a constant desire to evacuate, while the discharges were small but of a yeast like color and odor peculiar to cholera. Great reduction of strength in a very short time; countenance showed great anxiety; took four Brandreth's Pills; drank a cup of hot boneset tea about four hours afterward while in bed; took three more Brandreth's Pills, and was entirely recovered the next day.

Any number of these cases could be given; but let it suffice to say that when the pills are taken when the first symptoms are coming on, all will be well. I have appended the following from my bill of directions.

CHOLERA.

YELLOW, SHIP, TYPHUS AND ALL FEVERS, DYSENTERY AND DIARRHOEA.

In the commencement it is of absolute importance, in view of a speedy cure, that a full dose of pills be taken at once, because the humors which produce diseases of this class, are always of a most malignant, poisonous quality, and no safety to life exists while any portion remains in the bowels or blood. Should the first dose not cure, be not alarmed, but reiterate the dose. Should the evacuations be very putrid, of bad odor, unnatural color, &c., besides using four or six pills twice a day, take also a teaspoonful of powdered charcoal in water every day while these symptoms continue. Let your diet be light and of easy digestion, as arrowroot, rice pudding, Indian meal gruel; also sheep's head broth with rice and a piece of cinnamon boiled in it, or calf's head broth. Sheep's head makes the best diet if it be boiled until the bones are clean. As a rule, the first dose of pills cures when timely used. Sometimes three or four may be necessary. There are cases in which it takes weeks to cure; but they not occur once in a thousand times. In any event, no medicine or plan of treatment is better than the above recommended, or will sooner cure. So soon as the irritable matters are removed, so soon you will be well and not before. Anodynes and astringents have a deleterious effect, because they occasion the retention of that death-principle which alone causes dysentery, cholera, diarrhoea and other diseases, according to its excess over the principle of life. But Brandreth's Pills are opposed to this as water is to fire, or as heat is to cold; and when they enter a man they go to work boldly to drive this death principle from the body; and all they can do they do; but if there be work for fifty doses, one dose must not be expected to do the work of fifty. And this truth should always be kept in mind.

IN THE WORST STAGES.

When the cramps continue, and the coldness of the extremity does not become warm by the ordinary applications, apply hot vinegar, strongly mixed with Cayenne pepper; let the patient be rubbed well all over the stomach, the arms and legs, with this, and remember it should be as hot as he can bear it. Then apply a flannel well wet with this, over his stomach—and let the same be wound round his arms, hands and feet. If, however, the pills are used in the first stages of the disease these applications will not be required.

PROF. BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS, OR MEDICATED COMPOUND,

FOR RESTORING, PRESERVING AND BEAUTIFYING HAIR, ERADICATING SCURF AND DANDRUFF, AND CURING DISEASES OF THE SKIN, GLANDS, AND MUSCLES, CUTS, STINGS, BRUISES, SPRAINS, &c. &c.

In order to convince the public of the efficacy of any curative preparation, in this thinking and reflective age, it is necessary to explain the philosophy of its operation. The process by which Professor Barry's Tricopherous produces such extraordinary results, cannot be understood without a brief notice of the structure and uses of the delicate substances to which it is applied, and in the condition of which it accomplishes the most salutary changes. The connexion between the hair and the skin is so close, that the one may be almost deemed a continuation of the other, and hence whatever renovates, restores, and nourishes the hair, must necessarily have a healthful influence upon the sensitive membrane in which its roots are fixed.

The skin, that wonderful envelop in which the sense of touch resides, consists of three layers; the EPIDERMIS or cuticle, a semi-opaque, or almost insensible film; the RETICULUM, which is a spongy membrane reticulated with nerves and blood-vessels, and forms a sort of shield to the exquisitely delicate TRUE SKIN; and the true skin itself, which constitutes the third layer of the triple envelop. In this tough, flexible and elastic integument, are located the nerves, blood-vessels, &c., which supply sustenance to the hair, and in the derangement of which diseases of the skin originate. The vessels of the true skin supply the sacs containing the roots of the hair with the moisture which sustains the fibres, and the same causes which affect the health of the hair, also affect the health of the skin. This is self-evident to the casual observer, as well as susceptible of demonstration by the anatomist and physiologist; for in all cutaneous diseases, the hair becomes dry and harsh, and falls out in such quantities as sometimes to render the patient partially or entirely bald. Wounds, burns, &c., on the skin of the head, also produce baldness on the portions of the scalp where the injury has been inflicted, thus proving the close affinity and sympathy between the organism of the skin and the hair.

The wonderful restorative and remedial properties of Professor Barry's Tricopherous, are based upon this hypothesis, or rather this fact. It acts through the skin upon the hair, stimulating the inert vessels, opening the pores, imparting activity to the circulation, awakening from their lethargy all the vegetative functions which give life, vigor, and beauty to the fibres, extirpating every particle of scurf and dandruff, and soon clothing even the bald or half denuded head with a thick, glossy, silky, and elastic covering.

But this is only ONE of the uses of Professor Barry's Tricopherous. The same properties which restore vital and vegetative power the skin of the head are equally beneficial in all cutaneous diseases, or superficial injuries. For cuts, burns, bites of insects, sprains, erysipelas, blotches, pimples, scabies, ring-worm, rashes, scrofula, prickly heat, chilblains, chapped hands, rheumatism, burns, scalds, bruises, redness of the skin, and in short all the troublesome and painful external diseases and injuries which are so common in families, and which NOTHING BUT EXTERNAL REMEDIES CAN REMOVE, the Tricopherous will be found a speedy, safe, and unfailing cure. By virtue of its double claim as a renovator and beautifier of nature's choicest ornament, and a potent and invaluable remedial agent, it is entitled to a place on every toilet, and in every medicine chest.

THE PROPRIETORS having spent much time

in bringing this preparation of Sarsaparilla to its present state of perfection; and the experience of fourteen years has furnished them the most ample opportunity to study, in their various forms, the diseases for which it is recommended, and to adapt it exactly to their relief and cure. Patients who wish a really good Medicine are invited to give it a trial, and satisfy themselves of its superiority, and the invaluable property it possesses of arresting and curing disease. The bottle has been enlarged to hold one Quart, and in its present improved form may safely claim to be the best and cheapest medicine of the age. Its progress to the fame it has attained may be traced by a long line of facts and cures, that stand as landmarks and beacons for the invalid, pointing the way to the haven of health; and what it has already done for the thousands who have used it, it is capable of doing for the millions still suffering and struggling with disease. It purifies, cleanses, and strengthens the fountain springs of life, and infuses new vigor throughout the whole animal frame.

DYSPEPSY CURED.

The following testimonial, from a gentleman so well known as Mr. Cox, requires no comment, and recommends it to all similarly afflicted: NEW-ORLEANS, Dec. 18, 1848.

Messrs. A. B. & D. SANDS—Gentlemen: Having experienced the most beneficial effects from the use of your Sarsaparilla, it gives me pleasure to add my testimony to the numerous spontaneous effusions of grateful hearts which you continually are receiving.

My case was dyspeptic, or rather I may term it a weakness of the digestive organs. For more than a year, I was troubled with wind upon my stomach and its frequent eructation, together with producing a spasmodic contraction of the heart, often gave me much annoyance. After trying various remedies without avail, I commenced with your Sarsaparilla. Before I had used half a bottle, almost every symptom of this disagreeable complaint had vanished, and in a few weeks its continued use effected a complete cure. I therefore confidently recommend it to all persons affected in the same manner, and have reason to believe that many who are suffering under a supposed disease of the heart, if they would take your Sarsaparilla, in a few weeks would find themselves restored to health in both mind and body. I remain yours, very truly, JOHN V. COX, 93 Lexington Avenue.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA IN PRUSSIA.

The Proprietors of this valuable Medicine have just received an order from our esteemed friend and correspondent, Theodore S. Fay, Secretary of Legation to the Court of Prussia, for the use of a member of the Royal Family—a copy of which we herewith lay before our readers.—[Home Journal.

"U. S. LEGATION, BERLIN, Nov. 30, 1848.—Gentlemen: I wish you to send two dozen bottles of your Sarsaparilla, for the use of His Royal Highness Prince Waldimir of Prussia, to this Legation, as soon as possible. It is necessary that he should receive it immediately; therefore, please send it by first steamer. The bill can be made out in the name of the Prince, and sent with it: Your obedient servant, "THEO. S. FAY."

SCROFULOUS AFFECTION OF THE EYES.

SOUTH KINGSTON, (R. I.) Oct. 11, 1847.—Messrs. SANDS—Gentlemen: My little daughter, when one year old, was attacked with a scrofulous humor on her face, which soon after extended into her eyes, causing almost total blindness in one of them, and disfiguring her whole face. I employed two physicians to attend her, who exhausted their utmost skill to give her relief, but it all proved useless, and finally one of them remarked to me that he had known of some striking cures effected by Sands' Sarsaparilla, and advised me to try it. I obtained one bottle, which she commenced using, and before it was all used up it had effected an entire cure. It is now over four years since she was cured, and there has been no reappearance of the disease, and we are satisfied that it is a perfect cure. It gives me great pleasure to add that I can recommend it to any sufferer from a similar complaint. Respectfully yours, GEORGE ROBINSON.

DR. S. P. TOWNSEND'S
COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA.

The Most Extraordinary Medicine in the World!!

This Extract is put up in Quart Bottles; it is six times cheaper, purgative, and warranted superior to any sold. It cures without vomiting, purging, or debilitating the Patient.

THE great beauty and superiority of this Sarsaparilla over all other medicines is, that while it eradicates the disease, it invigorates the body. It is one of the very best ever known: it not only purifies the whole system and strengthens the person, but it creates rich, new and pure blood, a power possessed by no other medicine. And in this lies the grand secret of its wonderful success. It has performed, within the last two years, more than 100,000 cures of severe cases of disease; at least 15,000 were considered incurable. It has saved the lives of more than 10,000 children the past two seasons in the city of New-York alone.

SPRING AND SUMMER MEDICINES

10,000 Cases of General Debility and want of Nervous Energy.

Dr. S. P. Townsend's Sarsaparilla invigorates the whole system permanently. To those who have lost their muscular energy by the effects of medicine or indiscretion committed in youth, or the excessive indulgence of the passions, and brought on by physical prostration of the nervous system, lassitude, want of ambition, fainting sensations, premature decay and decline, hastening toward that fatal disease Consumption, can be entirely restored by this pleasant remedy. This Sarsaparilla is far superior to any

Invigorating Cordial,
as it renews and invigorates the system, gives activity to the limbs, and strength to the muscular system, in a most extraordinary degree.

Consumption Cured.
Cleanse and Strengthen. Consumption can be Cured. Bronchitis, Consumption, Liver Complaint, Colds, Catarrh, Coughs, Asthma, Spitting Blood, Soreness in the Chest, Haemic Flux, Night Sweats, Difficult or Profuse Expectoration, Pain in the Side, &c. have been and can be Cured.

Spitting Blood.
New-York, April 28, 1847.—Dr. S. P. Townsend: I verily believe your Sarsaparilla has been the means, through Providence, of saving my life. I have for several years had a bad Cough. It became worse and worse. At last I raised large quantities of blood, had night sweats, was greatly debilitated and reduced, and did not expect to live. I have only used your Sarsaparilla a short time, and there has been a wonderful change wrought in me. I am now able to walk all over the city. I raise no blood, and my cough has left me. You can well imagine that I am thankful for these results. Your obedient servant,
WM. RUSSELL, 65 Catharine st.

Dyspepsia.
No fluid or medicine has ever been discovered which so nearly resembles the gastric juice or saliva, in decomposing food, and strengthening the organs of digestion, as this preparation of Sarsaparilla.

BANK DEPARTMENT, ALBANY, May 10, 1845.—Dr. Townsend—Sir: I have been afflicted for several years with the Dyspepsia in its worst forms, attended with sourness of stomach, loss of appetite, extreme heartburn, and a great aversion to all kinds of food, and for weeks (what I could eat) I have been unable to retain but a small portion on my stomach. I tried the usual remedies, but they had little or no effect in removing the complaint. I was induced, about two months since, to try your Extract of Sarsaparilla, and I must say with little confidence; but after using nearly two bottles, I found my appetite restored, and the heartburn entirely removed; and I would earnestly recommend the use of it to those who have been afflicted as I have been.
Yours, &c. W. W. VAN ZANDT.

Great Blessing to Mothers and Children.
It is the safest and most effectual medicine for purifying the system, and relieving the sufferings attendant upon childbirth, ever discovered. It strengthens both the mother and child, prevents pain and disease, increases and enriches the food; those who have used it think it is indispensable. It is highly useful both before and after confinement, as it prevents diseases attendant upon childbirth. In Costiveness, Piles, Cramps, Swelling of the Feet, Despondency, Heartburn, Vomiting, Pain in the Back and Loins, False Pains, Hemorrhage, and in regulating the Secretions, and equalizing the Circulation, it has no equal. The great beauty of this medicine is, it is always safe, and the most delicate use it most successfully.

Scrofula Cured.
This Certificate conclusively proves that this Sarsaparilla has perfect control over the most obstinate diseases of the Blood. Three persons cured in one house is unprecedented.

Three Children.
Dr. S. P. Townsend—Dear Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that three of my children have been cured of the Scrofula by the use of your excellent medicine. They were afflicted very severely with bad sores; have taken four bottles; it took them away, for which I feel myself under great obligation. Yours, respectfully,
ISAAC W. CRAIN, 106 Wooster st.

Opinions of Physicians.
Dr. S. P. Townsend is almost daily receiving orders from Physicians in different parts of the Union.

This is to certify, that we, the undersigned, Physicians of the city of Albany, have, in numerous cases, prescribed Dr. Townsend's Sarsaparilla, and believe it to be one of the most valuable preparations in the market.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE PRIVATEER.

"The time has been
When that the brains were out the man would die,
And there an end on't." SHAKESPEARE.

We will now return to Robert Atree and his schemes.

On the deck of a large brig, shielded from the rays of the sun by a fringed awning, which canopied her couch, lay a young girl of scarce sixteen years. The vessel was gliding over the smooth waters before a steady breeze, and the murmur of the waves parted by her keel, sounded monotonously to the ears of the maiden—fashioning a strange, solemn melody in her mind. Beside her stood an old negro woman, and at a little distance, two men.

This young girl was Alice, the daughter of Matthew Orrall. The negress Gottan attended her, and the two men near the companion-way were Robert Atree and Captain Wilson, the commander of the letter-of-marque, in which they had embarked for America, from an English port.

Robert Atree left the fatal chamber in which he had witnessed the death of his devoted slave, with the proud consciousness of having triumphed over every obstacle in his path. Carefully removing Alice to his own hotel, he had placed her in charge of his faithful Gottan, who had been liberated the night previous by the police, and to whom he also committed the sad duty of the quadroon's funeral, after having narrated the case at the office of the commissaire de police.

Gottan wept her child's fate; but she had learned the self-sacrificing heroism of Filippa; and the weight of her loss was lightened by the thought that she had ever been true to her master. The old negress beheld her daughter's beautiful form consigned to the tomb in a foreign land; and then, with renewed care, the faithful servant devoted herself to the performance of her master's injunctions.

Thus, in the sight of Atree, the martyrdom of the quadroon, the murder of Orrall, and the unknown doom of Ernest Rivers, were but as stepping-stones to his ambition. His selfish spirit weighed not the blood he shed, nor the heroism which had sacrificed life for him, against the objects for which he now beheld the crowning success of the future. He stood once more in his cabinet, with his recovered casket beside him, while Alice was slumbering in an adjacent apartment, under the watchful eye of the nurse Gottan. He stood there with a smile upon his lip, and muttered:

"All works into my hands. Now I have nothing to fear. There is no one who can cross my path to harm me!"

Robert Atree forgot that there was a power higher than man!

He stood, with the English Captain Wilson, upon the deck of the armed brig "Levant," bound for the shores of his native land, to which he had long been a traitor. All his plans, in regard to obtaining the peerage and estates of Warmount, were upon the very eve of complete success. One thing alone was wanting, and for this he now crossed the Atlantic—to return once more, as was his thought, with Alice for his bride.

That one thing was the marriage certificate of the mother of the young girl, on which were the names of the witnesses to the espousal. Atree had hoped, when he beheld Orrall dead before him, to have found the important document among the bravo's papers. This, however, was not the case; but he had gained from other memoranda the knowledge of the secret cave and hidden treasure, and had learned also that in the iron chest that was there concealed, were all the corroborative testimony necessary in order to prove the bravo's child the rightful heiress of the Lord Warmount.

With such a goal before him—unbounded wealth, title and power, it is little wonder that Robert Atree watched, with untiring vigilance, the beautiful child, who could alone open to him the gate of success; it is little wonder that he devoted all the energies of his mind to the furtherance of his schemes to the completest extent.

But of late, the young tory had become fearfully anxious concerning the health of Alice. Since the recovery of her sight it seemed as if her awakening mind fed continually upon the life of her fragile body. She had grown weaker day by day, yet not ill nor in pain. It appeared as if her frame was gradually dissolving into ethereality.

Robert Atree's ambitious soul valued not the holy nature of this pure child. He looked upon her merely as the amulet which was to insure to him the objects that he desired, and he trembled to think that death might snatch her from him ere he could make her his wife, and thus possess a claim to the heritage of Warmount. And this the scheming man well knew could only result from a union with the heiress, and the birth of a son, to whom the title might descend.

It was then, with feelings of the most intense and conflicting kind, that Robert Atree watched, from day to day, the slow decline of the youthful invalid.

"Where are we now, Captain Wilson?"

"We are rapidly nearing your native shores, sir, and ere three days I hope we shall land you and yonder fading flower, upon the shore of Carolina."

"But do you fear no cruisers so near the rebel ports? It is said the American privateers swarm around these waters."

"We have six good mouth-pieces to speak for us, at any rate," answered the British captain, pointing to the brig's armament. "We shall give a good account of ourselves."

"I would rather give the worth of ship and cargo," cried Atree, "than risk a meeting with the smallest fighting vessel of the enemy. The life of that young girl hangs by a slender thread, Captain Wilson."

"I know—I know, sir," returned the Briton, grasping warmly the young man's hand. "I appreciate your affection, and trust me, no effort shall be spared on my part to avoid a hostile meeting while you are on board."

As the captain concluded, the look-out at the mast head, shouted—"sail-ho!"

"Where away?" cried the startled captain.

"On the weather bow," was the prompt answer, and Wilson, springing into the rigging of the main-mast, gazed through his spy glass in the direction indicated.

"There is indeed a small vessel on the edge of the horizon," said he. "Pray heaven, it may not be as I fear—a privateer of the enemy."

"We have yet time, captain, to escape a rencontre," said Atree hurriedly. "By crowding on all sail, perhaps—"

"All shall be done that can be," answered the captain, and proceeded immediately to issue his orders to the crew. The young Alice, startled from her dreamy state, by the loud voice of the look-out, was quickly conveyed to the vessel's cabin, attended by the faithful negress, and Atree, fearful of everything which might involve the safety of his charge, and thus defeat his own darling projects, took up his station on the quarter-deck, and watched the progress of events.

It soon became evident that the strange sail, whatever she might be, had discovered the position of the letter-of-marque, and seemed likewise to be aware of her object to avoid a meeting. Captain Wilson soon perceived that the stranger was crowding on her canvas for pursuit, and would soon, as she manifestly sailed better, overhaul the brig.

"We shall be unable to escape, unless we can manage to run before the wind under cover of night, which will soon come on us dark enough," said the captain to Robert Atree.

"Can you make out our pursuer?"

"She is undoubtedly a privateer, of British build, but with the stripes at her mast head," returned Wilson. "I fear, sir, we must fight."

"Then, if we must, let us board and carry her," cried Atree, with a malediction rising to his lips. "The roar of a dozen cannon will deprive her of life at once."

"I do not think that, sir," said Wilson. "Nevertheless, if she ranges yard-arm with us, we can haul, and make fast. We shall thus escape a raking, at least."

The stranger was now within such a distance as to be readily distinguished by the naked eye, and presently, over the waters, boomed the sullen sound of a lee-gun, a summons to lay to. The English captain began to give his orders to clear the decks for action, and his seamen sprang to their stations with prompt obedience. In a few moments the privateer and the letter-of-marque ranged broad-side and the respective flags of England and America, flaunted defiance at each other in the beams of the descending sun.

English sailors are like their own bull-dogs in battle, and the American tars are no whit behind them. As the first broadsides of the two vessels crashed from their pieces, the wild cheer of the Britons, and the wilder Yankee hurra, rose together from the smoke and flame. In three minutes more, the hulls of the two vessels met, and the lashings were made fast for boarding.

And now took place a hand to hand conflict, such as was usual in the bloody encounters of privateers in those days. Grappling each other's throats, discharging pistols, and dealing blows with the quickness of thought, those mingled combatants fought upon the slippery decks.

The Americans, unprepared for the sudden boarding attack of the letter of marque's crew, struggled, nevertheless, gallantly against the fury of the first onset. Twice the Britons were repulsed, and hurled back upon their own decks, and once more they returned raging to the battle.

Captain Wilson's voice was heard loudly rallying his crew—"Away, boarders, away!"

"Men of Paul Jones! remember your old commander!" cried a voice from the privateer. "Forward, to repel boarders!"

At that name, "Paul Jones," many brave men upon the British decks hesitated a moment ere they rushed to the bulwarks. The Scotchman's name was even a terror to England. But the Captain's shout was heard again—

"Sweep the Yankees from their decks!"

"Come on!" replied a clear ringing voice from the privateer.

The British sailors renewed their attempt to board, and once more swarmed upon the decks of the privateer, which now, it appeared, was but weakly manned, and had evidently underrated the force of the letter of marque.

But though few, the privateer's crew were gallant men. The British were met as fiercely as before. Day had now declined, and the dusky twilight was shrouding the sea, but the foemen grappled and fought, and shouted with the excitement of fight. Robert Atree and Captain Wilson fought side by side, and the young tory seemed to take a strange delight in every blow that he struck against the men of his native land.

But suddenly he started back, as if struck by a cannon shot. His eyes glared, and started from their sockets. He gasped, but could not speak.

There, before him, with his sword upraised, stood one whom he believed long since dead, and buried fathoms deep beneath the waters of the sea.

He beheld Ernest Rivers.

A moment the young tory gazed. There, like an avenging spirit, stood the form of Rivers, his arms stained with blood, which dripped from the sword he wielded. Robert Atree, daring as he was, feared to wrestle with the strange fear that now unmanned him. He sank upon the privateer's deck, at the feet of his foe.

And now, suddenly, an united rush of the Americans beat back the Britons once more to their own decks. At the same instant, the grapnels which secured the two vessels, were cast off, and they separated immediately. The night was closing in, and neither privateer nor letter of marque cared to renew the conflict. In a few moments the American vessel, with one last broadside, sheered off from her enemy, and left her to pursue her course.

Robert Atree still lay, unwounded, but like one dead, upon the deck of the privateer, whilst the letter of marque, which contained all that he had risked life and soul for so often, was falling rapidly away from the American vessel.

In the brig all was confusion; for it was not until they were some miles astern of the enemy, that Captain Wilson discovered the absence of his passenger, Robert Atree. The call to muster was immediately sounded, and the crew interrogated as to the unhappy event. But one man could give any clue to Atree's fate. He had seen the young man battling on the privateer's deck, and, struck as he imagined, by a shot, fall forward among the foemen. Nothing more could be learned, and Captain Wilson, at last, ordered the brig to be put immediately for the coast of Carolina, where he was aware the British fleet was then stationed; and, with a heavy heart, himself descended to impart the tidings of her master's loss to the aged negress Gotta, whom he knew to be her confidant of his hapless passenger. We will leave the letter of marque, and return to the American vessel.

When Robert Atree awoke from the deadly swoon into which he had fallen upon the deck of the American privateer, he found himself in the cabin of that vessel, extended upon a couch, and attended by a man in the dress of a republican sailor. The tory's brain was yet bewildered with the recollection of the noise of the engagement, and the indistinct consciousness of some strange event having occurred; and it was long before he could recall his scattered intellects. The sailor watched him intently, until he at length gained utterance, and murmured—"Where am I?"

"On board the American privateer Paul Jones," briefly responded the seaman.

"And the English vessel—is she captured?"

"No, we concluded to let her off this time," answered the Yankee, with a smile. "She's some nine knots to windward now, and there's no chance for a visit to-night."

Atree remained for a few moments wrapped in reflection, endeavoring to bring clearly to his mind the events of the last day. "Does Paul Jones command the privateer?" he asked at length.

"Commodore Paul Jones commands a fleet, sir, and one of the biggest vessels of that fleet is the Serapis, taken from you infernal Britishers (excuse me if I'm not polite) off Scarborough Head. If Paul Jones had been here, your brig would have been blowed sky high, let me tell you, Mr. Robert Atree."

"Hah!" cried the young man, starting up—"You know me then?"

"Precisely," said the American. "I know you to my sorrow, and your rascally spy, Pappett—I know ye both."

Atree glared wildly at the man. "Are the dead all come to life?" he muttered. "Speak, man! who are you?"

"My name is Tom Evans, at your service—one as used to be as good a ranger as ever Marion had in his troop, and now something of a Jack tar—but never a d—d tory spy."

While the honest Tom Evans, whom the reader has doubtless recognized, was thus giving vent to his somewhat indignant remark, Robert Atree was wandering in a maze of doubts and fears. At last he ventured to speak—

"It was you who attempted to capture me at Smith's Creek, in Charleston—was it not?"

"Precisely—and come near being shot and drowned together. Howsomdever, Providence takes care of all good friends of America, and upsets all her enemies. There's Captain Ernest Rivers—he's an example of—"

A hand was suddenly laid upon the loquacious Tom's shoulder, and Atree glancing up, encountered the eyes of Ernest Rivers fixed upon his own. A tremor agitated his frame, and he groaned audibly—"Alive!"

"Alive, Robert," answered the young captain, presenting his hand to the shuddering man. "I know you are not of our side, but we were old schoolmates together, Atree, and cannot be bitter enemies."

"He suspects me not," thought the tory, taking the hand which Rivers extended. A throng of recollections rushed over his mind, but he mastered his emotion, and said, "I am your prisoner, Rivers."

"But we are not enemies. You are from Charleston, are you not, Robert?—How is—how is—"

Rivers would have said "my wife," but his voice faltered. Atree trembled again. It seemed as if the tory's nerves were completely shattered.

"I have been in Europe," answered he to the American's half-murmured question. "It was supposed by all before I left Charleston—that you were—dead."

"But—is she alive?"

"She was—at least, when I left America."

"But when was that?" gasped Rivers.

"Nearly two years ago."

The young American turned away to hide his agitation. Tom Evans, the ranger, regarded him with moist eyes. "Keep up your courage, Captain," said the brave fellow, "we've been through many hard battles, and, please God, we'll yet reach home, you to your wife, Captain, and Tom to his old mother, bless her heart."

The man's rude sympathy recalled Rivers to himself, and he again entered into conversation with Atree. But the tory had in a measure recovered his self-possession, and replied cautiously to the American's questions. He avowed his principles to be adverse to the cause of freedom, and declared that his visit to England had been purely to escape the violent antipathies of the ultra whigs. He could answer nothing to the renewed inquiries of Rivers, as to the fate of his bride, Louise, or his father-in-law, Arnould, save that the former had received the intelligence of her husband's loss extremely hard, and that her life had been for a long time despaired of.

The result of the conversation was a request on the part of Atree, which was acceded to on that of Ernest Rivers, that the former should be liberated at the first American port in which the vessel might arrive. The privateer was not under the command of the young American, but the captain had been wounded during their brief engagement with the letter of marque, and consequently authority had devolved for the present upon Rivers as first lieutenant. The vessel, in fact, was a prize privateer that had been taken by Paul Jones on the British coast, and sent with despatches to America; and Rivers had embraced the opportunity of returning to his native land as one of her officers, from a long and perilous cruise with the valiant Scotch commodore.

We need not go back to relate the particulars of that daring cruise of Paul Jones, which ended in the capture of the Serapis, and struck terror to the inhabitants of all the British coast. Suffice it to say, that Rivers was with the Scottish commodore in all his engagements, up to the sinking of the Bon Homme Richard. Then, when his commodore had resolved to retire with his victorious fleet to the Texel, the young American, with the amphibious Tom Evans, embarked for home in the privateer, leaving the Englishman, Nevers, still with Paul Jones, with whom his bravery had made him an especial favorite.

And now, with many hopes and fears, Rivers was nearing his home, trembling with the thought at times, that his wife might never bless his eyes; whilst Robert Atree, the author of all his misfortunes, was laying new schemes for the furtherance of his wild ambition.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE RETURNED VOLUNTEER.

The wanderer was returned—I saw him stand
Beside a loving bride.—BACON.

Count Casimir Pulaski, beholding the rude entry of a strange form into the chamber of the dying Arnould, drew back a pace, and laid his hand upon his sword hilt.

But suddenly he saw the melancholy eyes of Louise light up with singular brilliancy. The stranger had thrown off the cap which shaded his forehead, and revealed the face of a young man, of noble and energetic look, but bronzed as if from exposure to the elements. He was clad in the undress of an American naval officer.

Louise drew back from the Palouder, and stood with her white hands crossed upon her bosom, that rose and fell with strange emotion. Her eyes were fixed upon the stranger's face—her countenance grew flushed and pale by turns—the veins in her neck and forehead were swollen to intensity.

Suddenly she clasped her brow, and pressed it, as if she would awake some slumbering recollections. Then, with a wild shriek, she flung her arms aloft, and sprang towards the stranger, who opened his arms to receive her.

She sank upon his bosom,—she clung around him with a straining embrace, whilst at once tears and sobs gushed from her eyes and bosom.

"Ernest! Ernest!" she wildly exclaimed, "He is come! he is come!"

That cry awoke the dying Arnould from the fitful slumber into which he had fallen. The old man sprang up from his pillow, and gazed around. Pulaski came to the bedside and pointed to the maiden, who still clung to the stranger's neck.

Then old Arnould uttered a cry of joy—"My son—my Ernest," he murmured. And at that voice, the young stranger bearing Louise in his arms, approached the bed.

Arnould looked in his daughter's eyes. They were gushing with tears, but the madness was no longer within them. The strong memory of love had burst the bonds which had so long enchained the reason of the widowed bride.

Ernest Rivers and his wife knelt together beside the bed, whilst the aged Arnould raised his dying hands above them. They heard his blessing falling into their loving hearts.

And as Pulaski supported the old man's head, a pure spirit arose from earth, and wended its silent way towards the abodes of eternal happiness.

At this very hour, in the mansion of Laurelwood the old nurse Gotta stood beside another death-bed. It was that of the young Alice, who had been brought from the ship, to die among the flowers which she so much resembled. The negress held the transparent fingers of the maiden within her own, and hot tears gushed from the poor slave's eyes as she felt the pulse growing fainter and fainter beneath her clasp.

"Do not weep, good, kind Gotta," said Alice.

"O, my sweet child—you must leave us."

"I shall go to heaven to see my mother," murmured the girl. "Father will come there, perhaps, and Felippa, and—you."

As she said this Alice fell asleep forever.

Gotta threw herself upon the couch and moaned in bitter grief. She scarcely noticed a form that had entered the room, with garments soiled by travel, and features haggard and wan. But when the hand of her master shook her roughly, she started up—

"My master! my master!" she shrieked, and threw herself on her knees before him.

"Silence! is she dead?" gasped Robert Atree.

"She has just breathed her last."

"Curse! curse light on ye all forever!" yelled the tory,—and shaking off the terrified negress, he fled from the chamber of death.

All that he had staked his soul to win was lost to him forever. The heiress was dead!

CHAPTER XXVI.

CONCLUSION.

There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
Rough-hew them as we will.—SHAKESPEARE.

We need not tell the reader of Pulaski's brave defence of Charleston, nor of the daring sorties which, at the head of his gallant "Legion" he directed day after day against the enemy's camp. At last he beheld the tents of Gen. Prevost silently struck, and marked the long line of foemen retreating from their intrenchments.

All know with what skill and vigor the bold Polander pursued Prevost, harassing his rear, cutting off his baggage and stores, and accomplishing that brilliant series of achievements which were so fatally terminated by the disastrous attack on Savanna, where, fighting like a paladin of old, he fell mortally wounded, at the same moment that the gallant Sargent Jasper yielded his life, grasping to the last, the colors which he had defended in many a bloody battle.

But when the last detachment of the British army had retired from Charleston, and was hurrying away before the advanced guard of Pulaski, there remained lurking about the deserted encampment one of the minor characters of our story.

This was Pappett the Spy.

Never, since the brief glance he had caught of the concealed casket of Matthew Orrall had the thought of that treasure been absent from this man's mind. Sleeping or waking, his memory pictured the glittering jewels that were worth a prince's ransom, and many a project had he formed to return and possess himself of the tempting prize. But the constitutional cowardice of Pappett had for three years prevented him from hazarding a return to Charleston, where he was well known as a spy and tory, and would undoubtedly be immediately made an example of by the zealous whigs.

But the investment of the town by Prevost's army had opened to him an opportunity of carrying out his long-cherished scheme of seeking the hidden treasure. He had connected himself as a camp-follower with the British, and thus was in a fair way to accomplish his purpose when the sudden raising of the siege disappointed his hopes of entering Charleston with the troops. However, Pappett, finding himself so near the object of his desires, and knowing well that the American soldiers were in full pursuit of the returning army, resolved to make a desperate effort to reach the corner of the bravo's house.

For this purpose, at the fall of night, upon the day of Prevost's retreat, the spy proceeded in a small skiff cautiously and with fearful heart to cross the river. The night was favorable for his purpose; for a storm was brewing in the east, and the sky was hung with threatening clouds, that darkened completely the face of the river. Pappett succeeded in reaching the bank beneath which was the secret cave.

The Spy's heart sank within him as he bent down and listened at the entrance of the concealed subterranean passage. He remembered how three years before he had borne away from her peaceful bed, a blind and helpless child; and he fancied that every surge of the stirred river, and every moaning rush of the rising wind, were threatening him with vengeance for his many crimes.

But the spirit of avarice in the man's heart was stronger even than fear. He hurriedly prepared some matches and tinder which he had brought with him, and then, descending into the damp and slimy passage, groped his way towards the cave.

Where was Matthew Orrall now to guard the treasure which he had gained by blood and crime? Where were the unclean spirits that are said to brood over ill-gotten gold?

Pappett crept on, pausing every second, and holding his breath to listen for some sound. But he heard nothing save the moaning winds and waves without.

He reached at last the cave itself, and with fearful hesitation again bent his ear to listen. But all was silent as the grave. Then Pappett struck a light, and searched around the clayey walls of the cavern.

The spy's pulses leaped with joy. He felt the casket beneath his grasp, and saw the rusty iron lid which hid such rich spoils from his eyes. The coward felt brave for a moment, as he raised the heavy chest from its hidden nook, and hugged it to his breast.

But, suddenly a grating noise sounded above—then the tread of cautious feet; and then a glimmering light appeared in the passage leading from the cavern to the house. Pappett felt a chill terror curdle his blood, and with a half-muttered cry, he turned, and dropping the dim taper which he carried, groped toward the outlet. But still he clutched fast the iron casket.

The Spy reached the passage and crawled terror-stricken along the damp clay. But swift steps rounded behind him, and a loud curse echoed through the cavern. Pappett redoubled his efforts to escape, dragging his trembling frame through the narrow outlet, and still gripping with a vice-like grasp the heavy iron copper.

He reached once more the air, and heard the solemn waves, and saw the black clouds whirling across the heavens. He gulped at the damp night air.

But his pursuer was behind him. The spy felt a heavy hand upon his shoulder. Desperation made the coward bold, and still hugging the casket, he drew a knife from his belt and struck furiously a backward blow.

A low groan answered him, and the hand that had gripped his shoulder slackened at once. But it was but for a moment. Pappett felt himself grasped powerfully by the arms of his pursuer, and the spy's heart sunk lead-like in his breast.

But the instinct of desperation and avarice combined, once more emboldened him. He closed with his pursuer, and with a fierce struggle, half turned and looked upon his features, which in the grey darkness of the night were ghastly as those of a corpse. The spy beheld the hand of his antagonist, grasping a dagger, raised above his head. The next instant it descended upon Pappett's breast, and at the same time the wretch recognized the countenance of Robert Atree.

Ay! Robert Atree, failed in all his other schemes, had come at last, to possess himself of Orrall's treasure.

Pappett the Spy felt the steel penetrating his bosom, and shrieked in terrible accents. But, he left not his hold of the treasure, though he felt himself sinking backward.

Robert Atree tried to shake off the desperate clutch of the dying spy. But Pappett clung with one hand to the iron casket, and with the other grasped the garments of his murderer. For a moment after that wild shriek he staggered like a drunken man;—then he fell, dragging the doomed Atree after him.

The leaves and brush that covered the steep bank croaked under that fall. Another shriek rose upon the breeze, and then the two men splashed heavily into the deep river. Pappett still clutched the treasure and his foeman's garments, and all sunk beneath the turbid waters. The winds and waves moaned solemnly as the victims of avarice disappeared forever.

And thus ended the ambition of Robert Atree the Tory.

Gottan, the negress, never heard again of her master, and she soon followed the young Alice to the grave. The mansion of Laurelwood, and the small remnant of the tory's fortune, went into other and worthier hands, and the memory of Robert Atree passed from the minds of men.

But Ernest Rivers, the patriot, lived, with his recovered wife, to hail the enfranchisement of his country; to behold her invaders swept from his native state, and to join in the glad thanksgiving of rescued millions of freemen.

And more than all besides of life's blessings, did the young whig learn to prize the loving woman whom Heaven had preserved for him, shielding her young heart with the mantle of three years' oblivion of intellect. The long period of his absence had passed unconsciously over the soul of Louise, and left scarce a trace of suffering when she awoke to reason in her husband's arms.

And often in after years, a happy circle gathered around the board of Ernest Rivers upon the anniversary of Fort Moultrie's battle. And blooming children, with eyes like those of Louise, climbed upon the lap of a weather-beaten man who was always a welcome guest, who rejoiced in the cognomen of Tom, the ranger—and who answered "Precisely," whenever Rivers spoke of their sufferings and escapes from battle, storm, and famine.

THE END.

However trifling a research may appear into the locality of primroses, the migration of snails, or the wanderings of elephants, these yet may be among the things by which we may obtain a glimpse of man's real position here; and the naturalist will do well to bear in mind, that what it was worth God's while to do, is certainly worth man's while to study.—[Professor Forbes.]

"I THINK," said an old toper, commenting upon the habits of a young man who was fast making a beast of himself, "when a man reaches a certain pint in drinkin' he ort to stop."

"Well, I think," said old Beeswax, dryly, "he ought to stop before he reaches a pint."

The English Periodicals.

THE RED, GREEN, AND WHITE.

The Italian and Hungarian Tri-Color, though used with some different arrangement.

Who will not now a nosegay wear,
When earth her freshest hues puts on?
The skies are bright, the fields are fair,
Let me my summer gear, too, don!

What shall I place right on my heart?
What wilt thou give me, girl of mine—
When for my daily toil I part—
As emblem of my thoughts and thine?

Let there be white, the symbol pure
Of truth and trust; some leaves of green,
To image things that most endure
Through scorching suns and winters keen.

And red? blood red? Ay, wherefore not?
The freeman's sad but earnest sign—
A death in blood is oft the lot
In which man proves he is divine.

Lo! what thou giv'st—the red, green, white—
The colors of poor Italy,
Yet such as flash in triumph bright
O'er the Hungarian bravely free.

Rome! I will wear them for thy sake,
Like them thou art not doom'd to die!
Kossuth! in pride thy badge I take,
Thou scourge of hateful tyranny.

Ye brave, who may not join the strife,
Bear yet the colors of the cause;
Nor timid maid, nor gentle wife,
To wear the hallow'd emblems pause.

For men! your brothers, die to keep
The rights these emblems symbolize;
Women, in gore your sisters weep
The tyrant's spoil of all they prize.

Oh! cherish then each flower and leaf,
Though it be but the humblest weed,
That pleads for woman's deepest grief,
And pictures manhood's noblest deed.

THE MISER'S FATE.

A TALE OF THE FERRY AT SOUTHWARK.

At the date of the following narrative, the noble river that bisects our metropolis, like the surrounding objects and localities, presented a vastly different picture from that now reflected upon his gleaming bosom. Old Father Thames, the fluvial deity, so propitious towards the commercial enterprise of the busy dwellers on his banks, may well complain of the treatment he has experienced in return for ages of unwearied services. Just consider the present condition of the unhappy river. His course, once free as the breeze that ruffled the waves, is now impeded by a continuous series of obstacles in the shape of wharves, steamboat piers, lighters, and other cumbrous and unsightly objects. His stream naturally clear as the crystal fountain of the forest, is now made to imbibe the foetid outpourings of a thousand sewers, whose yawning mouths unceasingly vomit their filth-charged contents upon his unresisting waves, poisoning the finny subjects of his hidden realms, and involving their once transparent caves in stygian darkness; while huge bridges have coolly planted their feet upon his back—and to crown the list of wrongs, a certain daring mortal, hight Brunel, has treacherously undermined his bed, disdaining to cope with him in the light of day, or to take the slightest notice of his watery weapons. True, he more than once protested against this unscrupulous proceeding by dropping, unannounced upon the intruder and his myrmidons; but this only stimulated their hostile zeal, and poor Father Thames, vanquished above and below, was fain to decline the contest, and confess himself literally bored to death.

At the time we refer to, however, the Thames enjoyed an almost primitive state of freedom. Science had not, as yet, controlled its movements, nor bridge of stone or iron curbed the current of its glittering waters. The mode of transit from bank to bank for the citizens was by ferry, and it is with the Charon, who plied between Southwark and the opposite shore, that we have now to deal. The man's name was John Overs, he had a grant of the ferry from the corporation of London (then, as now, exercising an exclusive jurisdiction over the river,) at an annual rent, which grant he enjoyed for many years. The ferryman kept many servants and apprentices to assist him in his business, and the traffic from shore to shore being incessant, their time was fully occupied, and the gain of Overs very considerable. But though daily adding to his wealth, he was of a most sordid disposition, and even when overtaken by age, refused to spare his enfeebled body the labor it was hardly able any longer to sustain, which his accumulated wealth rendered wholly unnecessary. He possessed great worldly shrewdness, and had, for many years, been in the habit of seeking for the most profitable investments for his capital, not scrupling to engage in the most usurious transactions; until at the time we speak of, his wealth equaled that of the highest nobles in the land; and this while he walked about in patched and worthless apparel, and his furniture and household expenses indicated a condition but little removed from abject poverty.

John Overs had an only child—a daughter—and she was beautiful. In the struggle between love and avarice which agitated the gripping heart of the old ferryman, the former feeling had at length prevailed, and he spared no expenses in procuring his daughter the best education which in those days wealth could command. Mary Overs—for so she was named—availed herself eagerly of these opportunities, and to great personal attractions ere long added the more solid endowment of an accomplished and pious mind. But with characteristic selfishness, her father resolved that these gifts, mental and bodily, should be reserved for his exclusive appreciation; for though his daughter was now blooming into womanhood, she was entirely without society of any kind, Overs being at great pains to repel the intrusion of all visitors, and especially those of the other sex.

It happened however, that one Walter Hastings, a clothier's apprentice, had occasion frequently to pass the Ferryman's abode on his master's business, and being a comely and modest looking youth, attracted the attention of Mary Overs, as she sat at her window working. Walter, on his side, had long noticed the Ferryman's daughter, but had hitherto contented himself with a stealthy glance of admiration, and pursued his way. On one occasion, however, their eyes met, and pleasure beaming from both, their acquaintance began with a mutual nod of recognition, apparently so satisfactory to either, that Walter forthwith resolved on commencing his suit. Accordingly, shortly afterwards, while Overs was diligently picking up his penny fares, the youth sought the abode of his new mistress, and entering stealthily, rushed into her presence, and falling on his knees, passionately declared himself a victim to her charms, and begged permission to seek a return of his devotion. Mary received his protestations in blushing silence, and fearing her father's return, pressed him to depart without delay. Walter, however, re-appeared the next day, when his reception was even more favorable than before. Thinking therefore, that a third interview could not fail of bringing matters to a crisis, he once more repaired to the ferryman's abode, when he and his mistress, the latter after some moments of maiden coyness, mutually pledged their troth.

In the mean time, the miserly ferryman, unconscious of what was passing at home, pursued his calling with unwearied diligence. His penury, however, increased with his age; and as a proof of the mastery avarice had obtained over him, it was reported that to save the expense of fuel, he was accustomed to deposit in his bosom a certain quantity of black puddings, which becoming warmed by his exertions in rowing, were then apportioned between his servants and himself, who had no alternative but to submit to this repulsive mode of cookery or to go without their dinner. A yard of such pudding was then sold for a penny, and as Overs gave them their portions, he used piteously to remark, "There, you dogs, you will undo me with eating." He would hardly allow a neighbor the privilege of lighting his candle, observing that he thereby deprived him of some part of the light. In the dead of the night he would rise from his bed, and stealthily quitting his house, he would scrape over the contents of the neighboring dung-hills, and should a few dry bones reward his search, he would carry them home in his cap, and have them stewed for pottage. For the sake of getting it cheaper, he bought his bread in a stale and moldy state, and when brought home would cut it into slices and lay it in the sun in order to render it harder to be eaten. Butcher's meat he altogether repudiated, unless it were tainted, and therefore would go farther in his household, and when his very dog turned away from it in disgust, he remarked that he was a dainty cur, better fed than taught, and then devoured it himself. The very rats, even, deserted his abode, as there was not a vestige of anything that would serve them for food.

Overs was now so utterly enslaved by his darling vice that he conceived a scheme for its gratification more extraordinary in its nature than any to be found in the annals of avarice. It was this: in order to save the consumption of a single day's provisions, he resolved to counterfeit death, judging that his servants could not fail to observe one day's fast on so mournful an occasion, and intending to revive on the following day, when this important piece of economy should have been achieved. He acquainted his daughter with this strange resolution, and she, sorely against her will, was obliged to aid him in his whimsical design. He was therefore laid out on a table in his chamber, wrapped in an old sheet—he rejected the idea of a coffin, on the ground of expense—with one candle burning at his head and another at his feet, after the custom of that period; his death was then formally announced to the household. The poor half-starved apprentices no sooner heard the tidings, than they came rushing up stairs into the room to view his body; and believing him really dead, began to dance and sing with joy round the corpse. A general sally was then made for the kitchen, and one breaking open the well-locked cupboard, produced a loaf, another brought out such scraps of meat as could be found, together with the cheese, while a third descended to the cellar and drew a flagon of beer. They all then sat down to the repast in the miser's chamber, with appetites rendered keen by long endured privations, and spirits elevated by the hope of future good cheer, and deliverance from the hard service to which they had hitherto groaned under. The meat, though none of the most savory, speedily vanished, together with whole mountains of bread and cheese, while the beer flagon was in constant motion round the table, and the noise and merriment of the guests rose higher each moment. Overs, all this time lay wrapped in the winding sheet, and the anguish of his gripping soul at the waste and profusion exhibited before him, and which he failed not to observe from beneath his covering, was such that he burst into a profuse sweat in his chafing and suppressed indignation. At length, the beer-flagon having been thrice replenished, he could endure it no longer, and thinking that unless the career of the revelers was arrested, he should be utterly undone, struggled to his feet with his sheet around him, and taking a candle in either hand, stalked forth like a ghost to the table, where he began to upbraid them with robbing him, and wasting his substance in riot and debauchery. His already long fast had imparted a more ghastly air to features at no time prepossessing, and his supernatural habiliments aiding the allusion, the awe-stricken apprentices, thus suddenly checked in their carousal, began to think it was their master's specter that thus intruded on them, or perhaps the devil in his shape, so that the oldest among them, wild with amazement, and rendered pot valiant by the large quantity of beer he had imbibed, raised the but end of a broken oar that lay in the room, and at one blow struck out his master's brains. Thus the miserable wretch, who, for a purpose so pitiful was led to trifle with the gloomy tyrant to whom all must succumb, was really caught within his iron clutch, and that solely by his own foolish contrivance. The apprentice was absolved by the law from all guilty intent, it being proved that the deceased miser was the prime cause of the catastrophe.

At the time of the above occurrence, Walter Hastings was absent in the country, and on being acquainted with the ferryman's death, could not suppress his satisfaction that there was now no obstacle to his immediate union with Mary Overs. He instantly mounted his horse, and started for London, at a speed proportioned to the eagerness of his long and deeply rooted passion. But so great and incautious was his hurry that just as he was entering the town, his jaded and overtaken horse stumbled, pitching his rider over his head with violence to the ground, from which he was taken up with his neck broken, and quite dead. Poor Mary, who was anxiously awaiting his arrival, was so shocked by this last misfortune, added to the late melancholy death of her parent, that her mind gave way under such a weight of grief, and she was, for some time, bereft of her senses.

The ferryman, for his usury, extortion and sordid habits, had incurred the anger of the church to such extent, that he had been for some time formally excommunicated, and his body was consequently refused Christian burial; whereupon his daughter proceeded with tearful eyes to the Abbey at Bermondsey, prevailed on the friars there by dint of money, the abbot being absent, to procure for the corpse a hallowed resting place. The abbot arriving soon after, and perceiving the newly formed grave, inquired who had been buried there in his absence, and being truly informed immediately caused the corpse to be disinterred and placed on the back of his own ass; then uttering a brief prayer, he guided the beast with his burthen from the abbey gates, desiring of God that he might be borne to some place where he best deserved to be buried. The ass went at a solemn pace without any guide through Kent-street, till he came to St. Thomas, a watering, then the common place of execution, and shook off the dead man at the very foot of the gallows, where a grave being instantly prepared, the body was cast in and the grave filled up without any ceremony.

Poor Mary Overs, overwhelmed with grief at such a succession of disasters, and harassed by the importunities of numerous suitors, attracted more by the reports of the great wealth she had inherited than by love for her person, resolved to pass the remainder of her days in a convent, and to devote her large inheritance to the honor and glory of her Creator, and the furtherance of his worship. Near to the place of her birth, she therefore caused to be laid the foundation of a church, which was completed at her charge, and dedicated by herself to the blessed Virgin Mary. To perpetuate the memory of this pious act and its author, the people added her own name to that assigned by her to the church, and called it St. Mary Overs, which title it bears, with a trifling variation, to the present day. To the public spirit of the priests of St. Mary Overy, London Bridge owed its origin, and old Father Thames his first oppressor. These worthy men not only built the bridge, but also kept it in repair out of the funds which had been bequeathed to their college. This first bridge was constructed of timber, and was probably a rude structure, built of materials collected on the spot, and put together with little order or symmetry, and in every respect a perfect contrast to the simple and stately structure that now occupies its place.—[London Mirror.

THE BONAPARTES.—The position of present and the prospect of future events, remarks the Athenaeum, lends a striking interest to all that pertains to the Bonapartes; and it may be worth while here to devote a few lines to them and their relationships. It is of course known to every one that Napoleon Bonaparte was the second son of Charles Marie Bonaparte; that he married—first, Josephine, by whom he had no issue—second, Marie Louise of Austria, whose only child, the Duc de Reichstadt, died on 1832 at Vienna, when the right line of the Imperial family became extinct. Napoleon had four brothers—Joseph, his elder, Lucien, Louis, and Jerome; and three sisters—Eliza, Pauline, and Caroline. Joseph, King of Spain, left two daughters—Zenaide and Charlotte; but no sons. Lucien, Prince of Canino, had no less than eleven children, five sons and six daughters; of whom there are still living, Charles Napoleon, Prince of Canino, who married his cousin Zenaide, daughter and heiress of Joseph, by whom he had ten children. Louis Lucien, Pierre, Napoleon, Antoine, Charlotte, (married to Prince Gabrielli,) Christine, (married to Lord Dudley Stuart,) Letitia, (married to Mr. Thomas Wyse,) Alexandrine, (married to Count Valentini,) Constance, (now a nun,) and Jeanne, (married to the Marquis Honorati.) Louis, King of Holland, who married Queen Hortense, had three sons—Napoleon, Napoleon Louis, and Louis Napoleon, the only survivor, and now President of the French Republic. Jerome, King of Westphalia, had two sons—Jerome Napoleon, and Napoleon—and one daughter—Mathilde, now Princess Demidoff. Of the sisters of Napoleon, Eliza married Prince Felix Bacchiocchi, and left one daughter, (now married to Count Camerata,) Pauline left no children; Caroline married Murat, King of Naples, and became the mother of the present Lucien Chas. Murat; of Letitia, (married to Count Pepoli,) and of Louise, (married to Count Rasponi.)

This is the entire Bonaparte family. Of the brothers and sisters of the Emperor, only Jerome now remains. Of the second generation—his nephews and nieces—there are fourteen; and of the third generation there is a still more considerable number.

As will be seen by the foregoing programme, Louis Napoleon is not the head of his family by order of nature. By right of primogeniture, all of the descendants of Lucien would take precedence of the heirs of Louis; but, as is well known, Lucien was in disgrace when his imperious brother had the order of succession to the empire fixed, and he and his descendants were excluded. How far this law, founded on a whim, is binding in such a new state of things as the present, is a question which the partisans of the family are beginning to ask themselves. Louis Napoleon is the only remaining male member of the families entitled by the laws of the Empire (28 Floral, an. xii and 5 Brumaire, an. xiii.) to the succession. The Prince of Canino, the real head of the house, has declared his intention of returning to France and entering the Chamber. The other princes of the family who are at present prominently before the public, are Pierre, brother to Canino, Napoleon, son of Jerome, late Ambassador to Madrid, and Lucien Murat.

FAME—THE POET AND MISSIONARY.

WHEN complimented upon his political fame, Campbell generally met the speaker with some ludicrous deduction; some mortifying drawback from the ready money reputation for which his friends gave him credit: "Yes, it was very humiliating. Calling at an office in Holborn for some information I was in want of, the mistress of the house, a sensible, well-informed woman, invited me to take a seat in the parlor; "her husband would be at home instantly, but if I was in a hurry, she would try to give me the information required." Well, I was in a hurry, as usual, thanked her much, received the information, and was just wishing her good morning, when she hesitatingly asked, if I would kindly put my name to a charity subscription list.

"By all means," and putting on my glasses, I wrote "T. Campbell," and returned it with the air of a man who has done something handsome. "Bless me," said she in a whisper, looking at the name, "this must be the great Mr. Campbell! excuse me, sir: but may I just be so bold as to ask if you be the celebrated gentleman of that name?"

"Why, really, ma'am, no,"—"yes," said my vanity—"my name is, just as you see, T. Campbell," making her at the same time a handsome bow.

"Mr. Campbell!" she said advancing a step, "very proud and happy to be honored with this unexpected call. My husband is only gone to change, and will be so happy to thank you for the great pleasure we have had in reading your most interesting work—pray take a chair."

"This is a most sensible woman," thought I, "and I dare say her husband is a man of great taste and penetration."

"Madam," said I, "I am much flattered by so fair a compliment,"—laying the emphasis on "fair." "I will wait with pleasure; but in the meantime, I think I forgot to pay my subscription." She tendered me the book, and I put down just double what I intended. When had I ever so fair an excuse for liberality? "Indeed," resumed the lady, smiling; "I consider this a most gratifying incident; but here comes my husband."

"John, dear, this is the celebrated Mr. Campbell!" "Indeed!" I repeated my bow, and in two or three minutes we were as intimate as any three people could be. "Mr. Campbell," said the worthy husband, "I feel greatly honored by this visit, accidental though it be!"

"Why, I am often walking this way," said I, "and will drop in now and then, just to say how d'ye do." "Delighted, Mr. Campbell, delighted! your work is such a favorite with my wife there, only last night we sat up till one o'clock, reading it."

"Very kind indeed; very. Have you the new edition?" "No, Mr. Campbell, ours is the first!" What! thinks I to myself, forty years ago; this is gratifying, quite an heirloom in the family.

"Oh, Mr. Campbell," said the lady, "what dangers—what—what—you must have suffered! Do you think you will ever make christians of them horrid Cannibals!"

"No doubt of that, my dear," said the husband triumphantly, "only look what Mr. Campbell has done already." I now felt a strange ringing in my ears, but recollecting my "Letters from Algiers," I said, "Oh yes; there is some hope of them Arabs yet."

"We shall certainly go to hear you next Sunday, and I am sure your sermon will raise a handsome collection." By this time I had taken my hat and walked hastily to the threshold. "Mr. Campbell! are you ill?" inquired my two admirers. "No, not quite, only thinking of them horrid Cannibals!"

"Ah, no wonder; I wish I had said nothing about them!" "I wish so too; but, my good lady, I am not the celebrated Mr. Campbell." "What, not the great missionary?"

"No," and so saying, I returned to my chamber, minus a guinea, and a head shorter than when I left.—[Life of Campbell.]

NEWSPAPER TRADE IN ENGLAND.—The sale of newspapers and periodicals at the different railway stations is becoming a most lucrative calling; so much so that the companies in many instances now exact a rent from the vendors for the privilege. It is said that the sale of papers and periodicals at the London Bridge station turns in a profit to the tune of 10 guineas a week, and that the directors are said to have put the privilege up to competition at a high figure. The rent at the Euston station payable for the privilege, is at the rate of 60*l.* per annum, though until lately the privilege was accorded free of payment.

FORTUNE may often defeat the purposes of Virtue; yet Virtue, in bearing affliction, can never lose her prerogative.—[Plutarch.]

THE INVITATION.

FROM THE GERMAN OF GLEIM.

I have a cottage by the hill;
It stands upon a meadow green;
Behind it flows a murmuring rill,
Cool-rooted moss and flowers between.

Beside the cottage stands a tree,
That flings its shadow o'er the eaves;
And scarce the sunshine visits me,
Save when a light wind riffs the leaves.

A nightingale sings on a spray
Through the sweet summer time night-long,
And evening travelers on their way,
Linger to hear her plaintive song.

Thou maiden with the yellow hair,
The winds of life are sharp and chill;
Wilt thou not seek a shelter there,
In yon lone cottage by the hill?

MARRIAGE.

If there is a tie on earth deemed sacred and holy in a brighter land, 'tis that which binds man to his kindred spirit to become one in unity and love; and yet it rarely happens that he properly appreciates the kindness and sincerity of the female heart, by setting a right value on a gem so productive of happiness to the possessor. There is nothing in life so pure and devoted as the unquenchable love of woman—more priceless than the gems of Golconda, and more devout than the idolatry of Mecca, is the unsealed and gushing tenderness which flows from the fount of the female heart.

It may here with propriety be asked, what so often enhances the sorrow of the female heart, causing many anxious days and sleepless nights? Is it not the inconstancy of man? For whose sake does she bid adieu to the home of her childhood? For whom does she leave the loved father and the doting mother, and the sweet sister who played with her in infancy? To whom does she cling with a fond embrace, when all but her have forsaken him?

It is said that when the mother of Washington was asked how she had formed the character of her son, she replied that she had endeavored early to teach him three things—obedience, diligence and truth. No better advice can be given by any parent.

Teach your children to obey. Let it be the first lesson. It requires constant care to keep up the habit of obedience, and especially to do it in such a way as not to break down the strength of a child's character.

Teach your child to be diligent. The habit of being always employed is a safeguard through life, as well as essential to the culture of almost every virtue. Nothing can be more foolish than an idea which parents have that it is not respectable to set their children to work. Play is a good thing, innocent recreation is an employment, and a child may learn to be diligent in that as in other things. But let them learn early to be useful.

As to truth, it is the one essential thing. Let everything else be sacrificed rather than that. Without it, what dependence can you place in your child? And be sure to do nothing yourself which may countenance any species of prevarication or falsehood. Yet how many parents do teach their children the first lesson of deception.

PERVERSY OF TEMPER.—Perversity is sometimes confounded with obstinacy; but they are two very distinct qualities, although they frequently exist together. An obstinate person continues fixed in a certain purpose or idea, for no other reason than that he has once adopted it. He is not the less disposed to persevere in it when he finds other people are of his way of thinking. A perverse person, on the contrary, continues fixed in a purpose or opinion as long as you oppose him. If you see reason for agreeing with him, and say perhaps his opinion is right, that moment he begins to see that he was wrong. And thus it may be, without any positive desire to annoy or contradict you, but simply that, from the cross-grained nature of his mind, he can find no pleasure in agreement. It is naturally difficult for him to assent; he will agree to nothing readily, not even to differ from you; he would rather differ about the difference. Such a person may be called thoroughly perverse, and is very difficult to cure, because he is not likely to have intellectual capacity enough to understand his own case, if it be ever so well explained to him.

Such people remain unconscious of their vice of character; and, when they suffer from it, are prone to believe that the fault is in others. Perversity is the characteristic of weak minds, and is very seldom seen in those who are strong.

GOOD MANNERS.—We know a young man, slow, sullen, heavy-browed and ungracious, who, whenever you speak to him, answers as if it were an effort to be even decently civil; and who, moreover, seems to be quite content, and even proud, of his civility. And we lean to the charitable side so far as to think this is nothing more than a bad habit of his, which has inescapably fastened upon him, and that he goes through the world—a world of mutual dependence—little aware of the fact that so small a thing as his manners is constantly producing impressions, and fast forming a reputation, such as ten years hence he may regret as the great blunder of his life.

Would it not be well for every young man to remember the truthful anecdote of the rich Quaker banker, when asked the secret of his success in life, answered, "Civility, friend—civility!" How much does it cost a man, either old or young, to be truly civil in his intercourse with society? Rather how much does it cost a young man to form this habit, which if formed, will sit upon him easily, gracefully and profitably, so long as he lives? Far more often depends on this little often despised, civility to the world, than any other single adventitious circumstance by which men rise and fall. We may look around us, at any time, and see men high in place and power, who have not attained that elevation by force of individual character or great knowledge, but simply from the fact that the trifling graces of life have not been despised. It was not a dancing master's grace that is now referred to, but that benevolence of manner that recognizes in little things the rights of others. The thousand ways in which this little courtesy does good, need hardly be mentioned. It may be said, however, that a courteous manner has a reflective influence on the benevolent feelings. It is a source of gratification to the man who practices. Wear a hinge on your neck, young man, and keep it well oiled.

PITY AND CHARITY INCULCATED.—The very pirate, that dyes the ocean wave with the blood of his fellow beings, that meets with his defenceless victim in some lonely sea where no cry for help can be heard, and plunges his dagger to the heart that is pleading for life—which is calling upon him by all names of kindred, of children, and home, to spare—yes, the very pirate is such a man, as you or I might have seen. Orphanage in childhood, an unfriended youth, an evil companion, a resort to sinful pleasure, familiarity with vice, a scorned and blighted name, seared and crushed affections, desperate fortunes—these are steps which might have led any one among us to unfurl upon the high seas the bloody flag of universal defiance—to have waged war with our kind, to have put on the terrific attributes, to have done the dreadful deeds, and to have died the awful death of the ocean robber. How many affecting relationships of humanity plead with us to pity him? That head, that is doomed to pay the price of blood, once rested upon a mother's bosom. The hand that did that accursed work, and shall soon be stretched, cold and nerveless, in the felon's grave, was once taken and cherished by a father's hand, and led in the ways of sportive childhood and innocent pleasure. The dreaded monster of crime has once been the object of sisterly love and all domestic endearment. Pity him, then. Pity his blighted hope and his crushed heart. It is wholesome sensibility. It is reasonable; it is meet for frail and sinning creatures like us to cherish. It foregoes no moral discrimination. It feels no crime; but feels it as a weak, tempted, and rescued creature should. It imitates the great Maker; and looks with indignation upon the offender, and yet is grieved for him. —[Rev. Orville Dewey.]

FEMALE COURTSHIP IN ROME.—The women of Rome know nothing of those restraints which delicacy, modesty and virtue impose upon the sex in northern Europe. A Roman lady who takes a liking to a foreigner, does not cast her eyes down when he looks at her, but fixes them upon him long and with evident pleasure; nay, she gazes at him alone whenever she meets him in company, at church, at the theater, or in her walks. She will say, without ceremony, to a friend of the young man, "Tell that gentleman I like him." If the man of her choice feels the like sentiment, and asks, "Are you fond of me?" she replies with the utmost frankness, "Yes, my dear." The happy medium between American and Roman courtship appears to us the best. We hate excessive coyness, but do not like too much familiarity.

Choice Miscellany.

ANECDOTES OF WASHINGTON.

THERE lately died, in the city of Boston, a very respectable negro, named PRIMUS HALL. He lived to an advanced age, and was the possessor of considerable property. Throughout the Revolutionary war he was the body servant of the late Col. Pickering, of Massachusetts. He was free and communicative, and delighted to sit down with an interested listener and pour out those stories of absorbing and exciting anecdotes with which his memory was stored.

It is well known that there was no officer in the whole American army whose friendship was dearer to Washington, and whose counsel was more esteemed by him, than that of the honest and patriotic Col. Pickering. He was on intimate terms with him, and unbosomed himself to him with as little reserve as, perhaps, to any confidant in the army. Whenever he was stationed within such distance as to admit of it, he passed many hours with the colonel, consulting him upon anticipated measures, and delighting in his reciprocated friendship.

Washington was, therefore, often brought into contact with the servant of Col. Pickering, the departed Primus. An opportunity was afforded to the negro to note him, under circumstances very different from those in which he is usually brought before the public, and which possess, therefore, a striking charm. I remember two of these anecdotes from the mouth of Primus. One of them is very slight indeed, yet so peculiar as to be replete with interest. The other conveys a high and holy moral, and deserves to be recorded among the public and remarkable acts of our country's saviour, as a brilliant illustration that disinterestedness and true humility were guiding principles of his character. The authenticity of both may be fully relied upon.

Washington once came to Col. Pickering's quarters, and found him absent.

"It is no matter," said he to Primus. "I am greatly in need of exercise. You must help me to get some before your master returns."

Under Washington's directions, the negro busied himself in some simple preparations. A stake was driven into the ground about breast high, a rope was tied to it, and then Primus was desired to stand at some distance and hold it horizontally extended. The boys, the country over, are familiar with this plan of getting sport. With true boyish zest, Washington ran forward and backward for some time, jumping over the rope as he came and went until he expressed himself satisfied with the exercise.

Repeatedly afterward, when a favorable opportunity offered, he would say—"Come, Primus, I am in need of exercise;" whereat the negro would drive down the stake, and Washington would jump over the rope until he had exerted himself to his content.

On the second occasion, the great general was engaged in earnest consultation with Col. Pickering in his tent until after the night had fairly set in. Head-quarters were at a considerable distance, and Washington signified his preference to staying with the colonel over night, provided he had a spare blanket and straw.

"Oh, yes," said Primus, who was appealed to; "plenty of straw and blankets—plenty."

Upon this assurance, Washington continued his conference with the colonel until it was time to retire to rest. Two humble beds were spread, side by side, in the tent, and the officers laid themselves down, while Primus seemed to be busy with duties that required his attention before he himself could sleep. He worked, or appeared to work, until the breathing of the two gentlemen satisfied him that they were sleeping; and then, seating himself on a box or stool, he leaned his head on his hands to obtain such repose as so inconvenient a position would allow. In the middle of the night Washington awoke. He looked about, and descried the negro as he sat. He gazed at him awhile and then spoke.

"Primus!" said he calling; "Primus!"

Primus started up and rubbed his eyes,

"What, General?" said he.

Washington rose up in his bed. "Primus," said he, "what did you mean by saying that you had straw and blankets enough? Here you have given up your blanket and straw to me, that I may sleep comfortably while you are obliged to sit through the night."

"It's nothing, General," said Primus. "It's nothing. I'm well enough. Don't trouble yourself about me. I sleep very good."

"But it is matter—it is matter," said Washington, earnestly. "I cannot do it, Primus. If either is to sit up, I will. But I think there is no need of either sitting up. The blanket is wide enough for two. Come lie down here with me."

"Oh, no, general!" said Primus, starting, and protesting against the proposition. "No; let me sit here. I'll do very well on the stool."

"I say, come and lie down here!" said Washington, authoritatively. "There is room for both, and I insist upon it!"

He threw open the blanket as he spoke, and moved to one side of the straw. Primus professed to have been exceedingly shocked at the idea of lying under the same covering with the commander-in-chief, but his tone was so resolute and determined that he could not resist. He prepared himself, therefore, and laid himself down by Washington; and on the same straw, and under the same blanket, the general and the negro servant slept still morning.

I say that this last incident conveys a high and holy moral. It affords additional evidence, and that of the clearest nature, that the reverential admiration of the American people for their Washington is not misplaced. He acted from that pure and deep-seated principle, that true nobility of character and self-respect, which enabled him to bear himself with lofty dignity in the presence of the proudest, and at the same time, impelled him to respect the rights and sympathise with the sufferings of the humblest.

PRIVATE PUDDING.

OR HOW THE HOOSIER CAME IT.

Many years ago a Hoosier, who had just struck New Orleans for the first time, after his flatboat was made snug and fast, went up to see the sights of the city. Passing St. Charles he stopped immediately in front of the St. Charles Hotel, and looking up, seemed to scrutinize the building with the eye of an architectural connoisseur.

After satisfying his gaze he asked a passer-by what building it was; on being told it was a hotel, he inquired for the entrance, and being shown, he ascended the steep steps. Approaching the office he inquired for the landlord, of whom he inquired if he could get "a bite" to eat. Mr. E. R. Mudge, who was the host at that time, and who is a host at all times, humoring the fellow, told him he could do so by paying a dollar. After considering for some time on this item and gravely looking his host in the face, he said, "Well I'll go it, that's my dollar, what's your dinner?" "Well," said the other, with a smile, "it is not ready yet, but take a seat at the table, and you can amuse yourself with the papers for half an hour, when you will hear the gong, which will inform you that the dinner is ready." "The gong, what's that?" asked the Hoosier. "Oh you will find out when you hear it," replied Mudge. Satisfied with this answer, the Hoosier, after looking around him, sat down and rummaged over the papers. Time sped on at its customary rate, when suddenly the gong sounded, and as usual the crowd moved for the dining room.

Recovering from his astonishment at the noise of the gong, and scenting the delicious fumes of the dinner, the Hoosier made a rush through the crowd for a seat, but being met by the host he was conducted to his allotted chair. The gentlemen seated on each side of him, as well as the gentleman opposite him, had their wine before them.

After finishing his soup, and having his plate well filled, the Hoosier observed the gentlemen helping themselves freely to wine, and so, seizing the bottle of his right hand neighbor, he attempted to help himself, when he was modestly informed that the wine was "private." The Hoosier did not seem to comprehend, and with a blank sort of look, resumed his knife and fork. On laying them down again, and having apparently come to the conclusion that it could not all be "private" wine, he seized hold of his left-hand friend's bottle. "Stop, if you please sir," said the offended individual, with a fierce look, this is private wine, sir."

The Hoosier looked still more astonished, and it being a hard case, thought he would make another trial anyhow. So reaching across the table he seized the bottle opposite to him, and was just in the act of filling his glass, when his vis-à-vis recoiled "private wine, sir, if you please," and withdrew the bottle from the fearful leakage it was about to undergo.

The "green un," becoming enraged at being foiled on every side, and observing that there was a general simpering and titting among the waiters, turned on the servant who stood at the back of his chair, and who had taken away his plate for the fifth or sixth time, and cried out to him with an oath to bring back his plate, and that if he took it away again, "he'd be dod rod if he didn't draw his picker on him," and suiting the action to the word, put his hand into his bosom, showing the handle of a huge bowie knife.

After this, things went on quietly, till the desert was put on the table, when a large Charlotte Russe pudding was set right before the Hoosier. This he immediately drew near his plate, and looking right and left at his neighbors he helped himself to a large portion of it. Keeping his eyes fixed on the dish, while eating, he perceived his right-hand neighbor attempting to withdraw the dish from him. "No you don't, Mister," said the Hoosier to him, "that thar puddin' is private pudding." The left-hand gentleman, not observing what had passed, then said, "Allow me to take this pudding sir?" "No you can't take that thar pudding," said the Hoosier, with a scowl, "that's private pudding." And he rehelped himself.

Shortly after the gentleman opposite was in the act of drawing the dish over to him. "Hold on, Mister," said the Hoosier, with a look of triumph. "I'd have you to know that that pudding is private pudding," while at the same time he put his thumb to his nose and made sundry gyrations with his fingers. "You can't come it over me," he continued, feeling that a joke had been practiced upon him. "Private wine, eh!"

The attention of the table being attracted during the latter scene, the gentlemen around burst into a roar of laughter, and soon the whole story was whispered from one to another. The thing took so well that every gentleman was induced to send his bottle to the Hoosier with his compliments; and our "green un" soon became as merry as a lord. Hiccoughing, as he left the table, he turned around to the gentlemen and said: "Well old (hiccough) fellows, you couldn't (hiccough) come it over (hiccough) me with your (hiccough) private wine." The glasses fairly danced upon the table with the uproar and laughter which this last remark created, and the Hoosier, staggering out of the room, made the best of his way to his boat. —[New Orleans Delta.

THE EARLIEST AND BEST EDUCATION.—"What is wanting," said Napoleon one day, to Madame Campan, "in order that the youth of France be well educated?" "Good mothers," was the reply. The Emperor was most forcibly struck with this answer. "Here," said he, "is a system in one word." Let the mind of this parent be imbued with knowledge, and her children will imbibe from her the love of learning; let her heart be filled with the affection of good, and her children will receive from her the love of virtue and of noble deeds. How often has she planted germs which, in subsequent years, expanded and produced the fairest fruits of science and wisdom! But great as is her power over the intellect of her children, a far higher work is to be accomplished; for if the mind alone be educated, if science and literature be all she impart to them, if their love of knowledge be not quickened and controlled by a spiritual love, it will be a vain possession. The culture of the religious affections, the development of the sense of duty and of the moral nature—this is the great business of life. And to whom has God intrusted the commencement of this solemn work? On whom does it devolve to call forth the infant man? Where is the influence that shall keep the young heart from fatal wanderings and errors? It is the mother to whom we look for the discharge of these momentous offices. If she neglects to do it, there remains no substitute—none to whom we can turn to excite, purify, and foster its immortal faculties. Who is that mother who thinks lightly of her influence on the minds of her children? Let her know that on her it may now be depending, whether a son is to pass through life ignorant of the world, of his duties as a man, a citizen, and a Christian, or be so educated as to be a blessing to his country, an honor to his race, and heir to a glorious immortality.

THE wealth of a country may be described in one word—it is Labor. The sinews of a nation are the sinews of men, and man's fortune is his industry. A man, in return for his labor, requires a certain amount of food, of clothes, of coals, &c. It matters not to him whether you give him 14s. a week to purchase these with, or twice 14s., if the latter sum will only obtain for him the supply of these necessities. If Whittington's dream had been realised, and he had found London paved with gold, he would have felt the pavement as hard to sleep upon. His industry was his wealth; and the industry of a population always will be the best security for the riches of a country.

Friendship, Love and Truth.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 30, 1849.

OFFICE OF THE GRAND SECRETARY,
GRAND LODGE STATE OF NEW YORK,
City of New York, June 18, 1849.
TO OFFICERS OF LODGES AND DISTRICT DEPUTY GRAND MASTERS.

On Monday, the 25th June, I shall transmit to the District Deputy Grand Masters and Officers of Lodges in this jurisdiction all the necessary blanks for the use of Lodges for the ensuing term, together with such instructions as may be deemed necessary; and if there should be any failure on the part of Lodges or Deputies to receive such documents, they are earnestly requested to communicate the same to this office by Telegraph, (when possible) in order that the matter may be immediately attended to. Secretaries will be particular and see that returns are ready to be transmitted to this office, in accordance with 3d Section of Article 4, of Constitution of Subordinates, &c. Fraternally, &c.
259-2 BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Grand Sec'y.

A SECRET SOCIETY DANGEROUS.

A WORD TO PERSONS OUT OF THE ORDER.

This objection betrays such a want of confidence, of faith in the virtue and honesty of men, that we have little patience when dealing with it. We have heard it asserted by persons who claim to be intelligent men and gentlemen, that the reason why secrecy is enjoined, is because the secret working and objects of our Order are impure. Yet they see that the very best men in the community belong to it. Why not believe the testimony of creditable witnesses? You object to Odd-Fellowship on account of its secrecy, and because you believe that in that secrecy lies some destructive and demoralizing principle.

Now, here are twelve men whom you know. They are men of honor and truth—their word you would be willing to receive on all occasions, and in all matters, however important. You know these men can have no desire to deceive you; and, being your friends, no wish to do you harm. Well, these men are Odd-Fellows, and express the most unqualified approbation of the Order. Now, why not listen to this testimony, and be convinced by it?—You would abide by their evidence in all other matters, with the most implicit faith—why not also in this?

The fact of secrecy, so far from being an objection to our Order, is, in our opinion, one of its chief merits. We need, society needs, an institution that will discipline men into habits of silence and secrecy. There is altogether too much talking in the world—too much gossiping—and not enough of earnest and silent acting. We honor the man or the woman who can keep a secret. Secrecy is a great virtue. "For faithful silence," says an ancient poet, "there is a great reward."

But this sensitiveness, with regard to the secrecy of the institution, appears supremely absurd, when the nature of this secrecy is considered. We do not look upon our secrets as things of intrinsic value—as having in themselves any worth—but rather as means, as instrumentalities of good. They are entirely harmless, cannot by any possibility be perverted to evil use, or become the instruments of evil. They are only a few signs, a few ceremonies, simple affairs, which, as secrets, are useful, but made known to the public, have no value. Suppose we should say that the principal secret of Odd-Fellowship is one little sign—the sign of the cross for example—the principal object of which is to enable brethren to recognize each other though otherwise strangers. You would see at once that this secret is perfectly harmless; and cannot, in any event, become injurious. Although this is not the secret of the Order, it will show you how very innocent our secrets are. They cannot overturn religion, morality, or government, or produce the least injury to any person, any more than that sacred sign of the cross. If we should reveal all of these secrets to you, you would not be more satisfied than at present. You would be no wiser, no better, no richer. But why employ secrets at all, it is asked. Because, mystery has a power to unite and bind together, which cannot be found anywhere else. The common possession of a secret, by a considerable number of people, produces a family feeling. No society can be strong, and extend itself very widely, and maintain its ascendancy, unless it appeals to this mysterious principle. There is something profoundly mystical, no doubt, in this, but it is nevertheless a fact. Let us illustrate: Suppose two men, strangers, traveling in a distant country, should, by some accident, be brought together for a few brief moments, during which they were the involuntary and only witnesses of some terrible deed. This deed must remain a secret between them for ever. In all the wide world, only those two men, and they strangers to each other, know of the matter. They separate and go to distant parts of the earth. Continents and oceans, and many eventful years divided them; but they cannot forget each other; the secret that lies between them binds them together as an iron chain. In that they are for ever one! Neither time nor distance can weaken the mighty iron bond. And should they again meet, after the lapse of thirty years, many years they had been intimately associated.

Now, it is for this reason that Odd-Fellowship appeals to this principle of secrecy. It produces a family feeling, and insures unity. The charm of mystery, and poetry, is thrown around the Order, and makes its labors easy, and its obligations pleasant.

ODD-FELLOWS' LIBRARY.—The exertions of the managers of this institution, after a period of considerable doubt, are about to be crowned, we learn, with a success equal to the hopes of the warmest friends of the enterprise. The subject has been laid before the Subordinate Lodges, in detail, and they have entered into the work with a spirit that makes success certain and speedy. So flattering are the prospects that candidates for the offices have already made their appearance, in full force. Every thing depends upon the selections made for the places of trust, and we hope the utmost caution will be observed. The Order in this State is able to have, for a librarian, a gentleman of superior education, and who can also bring to his new post business habits. It will be idle to select for this responsible post any one who is known to the public as unsuccessful in his past life, in connection with his professional duties, whether as a merchant, tradesman, lawyer, physician, or a divine. We do not want the refuse of any old schemes, but a gentleman, who can by his acknowledged reputation, command for our new enterprise the cordial co-operation of brethren, without which success cannot be obtained. In the selection of a financial agent, even more care must be taken; for this, after all, is the vital point of such institutions. The name of the recipient of dues and donations must be associated with strict honor in all monetary affairs, and be above even the breath of suspicion. The managers, thus far, have been above reproach, and have given the Order every reason to expect fidelity to the trusts reposed in them, in future. The subject is one in which we have a deep interest, and once more we urge the utmost circumspection in choosing the officers of the new library, who are to come most prominently before the public, and by whose acts the Order will be judged, and its respectability measured.

SOME of our cotemporaries, when displeased at the course of the Gazette and Rule, have a very happy faculty of indicating the name of the author of the offensive articles. To save the Mirror of the Times any farther exhibition of its "sagacity," the publishers would say that their assumption, in relation to the authorship of various articles, in our later numbers, is wholly without foundation.

THE ORDER IN ALABAMA.

We have been favored with a copy of the proceedings of the R. W. Grand Lodge of Alabama, at its session held on the 16th of April, 1849. The business of the Lodge exhibits a very favorable state of affairs, and harmony reigns supreme. As some of the Subordinate Lodges have felt weekly meetings to be too frequent, a resolution was adopted, allowing any Lodge to hold monthly or semi-monthly meetings; on condition that the officers serve the full term of twenty-six regular meetings; and upon their notifying the Grand Lodge, through the Grand Secretary, of their intention to avail themselves of this permission. The preamble and resolutions from the Kentucky Grand Lodge were received, read and ordered to be filed.

At the election of officers of the Grand Lodge, held on the 16th, the following was the result:

D. SALOMON, M. W. G. Master.
JOHN A. ENGLISH, R. W. D. G. Master.
A. D. HALL, R. W. G. Warden.
E. B. LYMAN, R. W. G. Secretary.
AARON GAGE, R. W. G. Chaplain.
R. O. SHAW, R. W. G. Rep. G. L. (2 years.)

MADISON LODGE No. 25, OF THE I. O. O. F., AT HUNTSVILLE, ALA.—This Lodge was opened in the year 1848, at Huntsville, Madison co., Ala. The Lodge is in a most flourishing condition, and numbers about forty members. The Order is now building a splendid hall, forty feet long and thirty-five feet wide, which will be finished by the 1st of August. The officers for the current term are:

P. G., Joseph A. S. Acklen; N. G., T. Smith; V. G., N. B. Robertson; Treas., A. G. Scott; Sec., J. H. Ulare.

Bro. Joseph A. S. Acklen has been commissioned D. D. G. Master for the northern part of Ala. Our Lodge will soon number sixty members. A.

THE ORDER IN MAINE.

PORTLAND, June 30, 1849.

THE members of the Order have just had a holiday, of which the details cannot fail to interest your readers, being nothing less than the dedication of Maine Lodge Hall. The new Hall is in Congress-street, and has long been known as Beethoven Hall. It has been modernized, and we have now one of the most elegant rooms in the State. As usual with us, the presence of a numerous assembly of ladies graced our ceremonies, (and no State has fairer daughters than Maine, or any city than Portland) giving additional interest to a scene, itself the most beautiful, to every brother.

The services commenced by a prayer, from Bro. Cyrus Cummings, of Westbrook, Grand Chaplain, followed by an original hymn, from Bro. C. P. Halsey, one of Portland's most agreeable writers, and sang by a choir of brothers and ladies with fine effect. The ceremony of dedication was then performed by the officers of the Grand Lodge; but after the beautiful description given by you of a similar scene at Wilmington and New York, I need not enlarge. The dedicatory prayer was made by the Chaplain, Rev. James Pratt of St. Stephen's Church, and one of the oldest brothers in the State. The services closed with an original ode, by Bro. Halsey, and music from the Casco Brass Band. Maine Lodge, as well as the others in our city, are in a highly flourishing condition, and the Order rapidly adding to its high reputation with our citizens. The dedicatory address, by Bro. Jno. H. Williams, was appropriate and elegantly written, and was listened to, throughout, with the most marked attention. DRINGO.

CARABASSET LODGE.—This is the title of a highly flourishing lodge at Bloomfield, Me. The Lodge is engaged in building a new hall, which they intend to have completed so as to be dedicated about the 4th of July.

SOUTHERN CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW ORLEANS, JUNE 11, 1849.

Your excellent and well conducted paper continues to visit us regularly, and serves to keep us well posted up in regard to the movements of the Order in your city, as well as throughout the country at large. Its advent is, therefore, periodically hailed, and its pages well scanned by all those who feel an interest in the great cause which it is employed to advocate. By the last number, under date of the 2d inst., I perceive that you are anticipating a glorious convocation of brothers on the occasion of dedicating the new Hall, with a view of which we were favored in a preceding number. That your expectations may be fully realized in every respect, is the sincere wish of the brethren here, who are likewise in a similar enterprise; and would that I might be permitted to speak of them as being near its fruition as yourselves. Nevertheless, although our Hall is not yet in existence, it is bound to be so, and that soon; and when finished, will, I trust, be inferior to none, for the great objects to which it will be devoted. Although much has occurred here in the way of local disaster, to interfere with that pecuniary prosperity which is essential to the success of such an undertaking, yet I am happy to state that the right spirit prevails in regard to it, and where the hearty good will exists the means are scarcely ever found wanting. It is hoped that the successful results of similar enterprises in your city, as well as in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Wilmington, and other places, will serve to animate the brethren of this city to perseverance and energy; which, if judiciously directed, are certain to overcome obstacles, however formidable, and insure success.

I am happy in being able to report to you, and through you to the rest of the Order at the North, who may feel a fraternal solicitude for our welfare, under the severe affliction with which our city is at present suffering, that the worst dangers have passed; and although the unpleasant effects of the inundation yet remain, we hope that from this date the waters will begin to recede, and change the appearance of our city from its present amphibious aspect to one more consonant with its hitherto opposite character. Notwithstanding the many inconveniences which must necessarily accompany such a visitation as the present flood, and particularly in domestic comfort, it is remarkable to observe with how much ease man can accustom himself to any condition of life, when such accommodation becomes necessary. Many persons, and particularly ladies, who would heretofore have shrunk with instinctive dread from venturing beyond terra firma, may now be seen embarking from dwellings, surrounded by a depth of several feet of water, and swiftly gliding along, on errands of shopping or visiting, with as much complacency as though they were threading the mazes of the Grand Canal itself, under the safe guidance of some experienced gondolier. True, we need many accessories to carry out the idea and complete the picture; but we may congratulate ourselves that, if the Bridge of Sighs be wanting, we are not pained with the sight of "A palace and a prison on each hand."

But I must bring my lucubrations to a close, or else you will accuse me of the "cacothetis scribendi," in earnest. Yours, in F., L. & T., J. H. B.

SAMARIA ENCAMPMENT, No. 41.—The following brothers have been elected to fill the Offices in this Encampment, for the term commencing July 1: Officers, Wm. O. Groser, C. P.; Wm. P. Gregory, H. P.; P. N. Horsley, S. W.; J. McEwan, Scribe; J. Weaver, J. W.

INDEPENDENCE CELEBRATION.—The Odd-Fellows of Jamestown and vicinity will celebrate the National Birthday by a parade, in full regalia. An address is to be delivered by C. P. Washburn, of Elliotville, after which a sumptuous dinner is to be eaten in a beautiful bower.

DEATH OF CHILDREN.

THE following letter is so full of beauty, and touching simplicity, that we cannot resist the temptation to make it public, although it was not intended for the public eye. It suits the case of all who have lost children—those sweet flowers, which have been removed to the gardens of heaven.

WARSAW, VIRGINIA, May 15, 1849.

WAS it the evening zephyr's sigh
That softly stole upon my ear?
Or is my Anna's spirit nigh,
To soothe me in my sadness here?

But short was my loved angel's stay,
A little while to mortals given;
He called, whom we must all obey—
She visits earth—her home is Heaven.

Hark! 'tis his whisper—"Brief the pain
That now disturbs my parent's breast:
Soon shall we meet and love again,
In groves of bliss—in bowers of rest."

You say, my bereaved friend, that you begin to believe that death cannot, and does not dissolve one tie of sympathy or love; in other words, that "the grave exalts, not separates, the ties which hold us in affection to our kind." Ay! never forget, but cherish this precious doctrine.

"It is a beautiful, a bless'd belief,
That the beloved dead, grown angels, watch
The dear ones left behind."

If according to that sweet belief, the departed yet watch the beloved on earth, how would you loved one wish to soothe an unavailing regret!

"I will look down from yonder pitying sky
Watching and waiting those I loved on earth,
Anxious in heaven until they too are there.
I will attend your guardian angel's side,
And weep away your faults with holy tears:
And when at length, death brings you to my home,
Mine the first welcome heard in Paradise."

A stranger, I would not disturb the sanctity of domestic grief—I would not (in my own language, at least) attempt consolation. You may not need it. Besides, if you do, you know full well where to look—no doubt when you laid your darling to rest, the rising tear and sigh were checked by the reflection that God had in mercy, taken her, from much evil to come, to himself—

"Ere sin threw a blight o'er her spirits young bloom
On earth had profaned what was born for the skies."

Doubtless—"for the divine purpose runs through every aim of our being"—the trial and the disappointment are but sent to raise those hopes above, which else might cling too fondly to their function below. As messengers from the spirit land, they come with the injunction: "Cling not to earth's fading joys!" You know—you feel this. You have looked upward and received that which the world yields not? then are you comforted! But it is said that no one can feel the death of a child as a Mother feels it, for the reason, that hers has been the office of constant ministration. Man has cares and toils that draw away his thoughts, and employ them: she sits in loneliness, and thick coming memories and associations crowd upon her. How can she bear all this? How can she give it up? Oh! how can she consign it to the chamber of the grave? Mother! thy treasures but removed—

"A bright bird parted for a clearer day—Thine still in Heaven!"

May such reflection, O! mother, have brought with it the healing thy spirit needs, and enable thee to say: "Thy will, not mine be done!"

Did you bury Anna in "Cypress Hills,"—fitting place for the dead? not gloomy, is it?—but one of calm, serious beauty, taking away the idea of death! I sometimes long to lay me beneath the green sod, the birds singing over me and the gush of free air waking the flowers on my breast planted by the hand of affection.

"All these light afflictions which last but for a moment, work out for us, a far more exceeding, and eternal weight of glory." Adieu!

Sincerely your friend. E. F. L. R.—

Yes, little Anna lies in "Cypress Hills,"—beneath the shade of a broad spreading tree,—among the flowers.

THE ORDER IN INDIANA.

WABASH, Ind., June 8th, 1849.

THE Order is flourishing in this section finely, and all looks well. A new Lodge was instituted last week, at a town six miles east of this place, called Ringgold Lodge No. 60. It commences under the most favorable auspices, and promises to be an ornament to the Order in our State.

THE ORDER IN MISSOURI.—A letter to the "Ark," dated St. Joseph, Mo., says:

"I have not, however, forgot to attend the meetings of the Lodge; and for the information of our brethren at home, I will give you a brief history of the Order in St. Joseph.

"King Hill Lodge No. 19, was instituted at St. Joseph on the 15th of October, 1846, with six members; and notwithstanding the situation of the place, on the frontier, where there is a constant changing of residence, it numbers at present twenty-nine members, and is in a flourishing condition. Whole number of members, from its organization to the present time, seventy. The following are the present elective officers: J. H. Crane, N. G.; S. J. Morrow, V. G.; E. Livermore, Sec.; S. Kercheval, Treas. Lodge-meets every Monday evening.

"There is also an Encampment at this place, called Hesperian Encampment No. 8, instituted March 12, 1849. There have been initiated and admitted by card ten members. The officers are: E. Livermore, C. P.; J. H. Crane, H. P.; S. Kercheval, S. W.; E. Barmenien, J. W.; A. J. Morrow, Scribe; S. Knudson, Treas.

"The room in which the meetings are held is small, yet sufficiently large for the place, and is fitted up very tastefully."

To POSTMASTERS.—In returning papers, you will confer a favor by writing the name of your office in full, as well as the name of the person returning the paper. The new officers, with commendable promptness, have rendered us very valuable assistance, in correcting the abuse of allowing papers to remain in their offices, and we hope will continue their good work.

ODD-FELLOWS HALL ST. LOUIS, MO.—The exterior of the elegant structure erected by our brethren in Missouri, for the purposes of the Order, is finished, and is commended in the warmest terms. We shall with as little delay as possible present an engraving, of it to the readers of the Gazette and Rule.

A NEW Lodge of Odd-Fellows is about to be established at Jefferson, Cass co., Texas, where there are now a large number of brothers.

LIFE INSURANCE CO.—The attention of brothers is called to the advertisement in another column. The benefits of Life Insurances are too well known to need recommendation at our hands, and all we wish to say is, that this company is one of the soundest in the United States, and managed by those whom our Order has delighted to honor. Some of the Lodges of Philadelphia have the lives of all the members insured there, a policy which promises to result to the great benefit of the funds. Examine their proposals even if you do not take out a policy with them.

EXPULSION.—The Winchester Va. Republican announces the expulsion by Madison Lodge No. 6, of Joseph S. Cummins, for conduct unbecoming an Odd-Fellow and the abandonment of his family.

CHOLERA—ITS CAUSES, SYMPTOMS AND TREATMENT CONSIDERED AND EXPLAINED. By J. P. Rastalder, M. D. Dewitt & Davenport, publishers.

OUR PACIFIC TERRITORY.

As the attention of all our citizens is now directed toward the West, by the glittering attractions of California, the following article, relating to the climate and atmosphere, and healthfulness of Oregon, will not be uninteresting to our readers. This vast Western Country, which now opens upon us as a new Land of Promise, is destined, at no distant day to be one of the most important parts of our Republican domain. Thousands and thousands are flocking thither every month. The boundless resources of those regions are developing with prodigious rapidity, and already the golden stream from the mountains of California has begun to pour in upon us:

CLIMATE AND HEALTHFULNESS OF OREGON.—In passing from the Missouri River to Oregon, the traveler cannot fail to observe the positive and increasing clearness and purity of the atmosphere. Objects seen at a distance are found to be of a remove nearly double their apparent distance; the spirit of the traveler becomes unusually buoyant and excitable, and he finds himself and animals possessed of far greater powers of endurance than he had supposed possible.

The same brilliantly clear atmosphere smiles benignantly all over Oregon. Objects may be seen with the unaided eye at the distance of two hundred miles, and the eye still reaches off beyond in search of a more distant object upon which to rest. Persons abroad may form some idea of the charming transparency of the atmosphere of Oregon from the fact that at Oregon (lat. 45 20) daylight and twilight, in the longest days of summer, continue 21 out of the 24 hours of day.

From location upon the Pacific, and from being traversed from north to south by mountain ranges, the climate of Oregon is necessarily diversified. That portion between the Rocky and Blue mountains possesses a remarkably salubrious climate, sufficiently warm and delightfully agreeable in summer, but cold and frequently snow-mantled in winter. That portion between the Blue and Cascade mountains, it is believed, possesses one of the most mildly temperate, even and invigorating climates on the face of the earth; snow, rain or hail seldom fall, except in the spring or autumn; yet excellent consecutive crops of corn, wheat, oats, peas, potatoes, and garden vegetables have been raised without irrigation, and almost the entire surface of the country is bountifully overspread with the richest of grasses. That portion between the Cascade mountains and the Pacific enjoys a climate eminently pure and healthy, and as mild at 48 degrees of north latitude as the opposite side of the continent does at 40.

Rains fall occasionally in June, July, and September, more frequently in October, February, March, April and May; and frequently, though far from incessantly, in November, December, and January. The prevailing winds of winter are from the south and south-west, and of summer from the north and north-west. South winds here are slightly less warm than in most parts of the United States, and they are less certainly and much less copiously attended with rains.

Oregon is now, at home, known to be, and ere long abroad, must become proverbial for its healthfulness. Its location upon the mother of oceans; its lofty mountain ranges; its soft, pure waters, unequalled for transparency and deliciousness; its clear and pure atmosphere; and its mild, even, and salubrious climate, all conspire to make Oregon a truly and peculiarly healthy country.

INSTANTANEOUS STOPPAGE—RAILWAY BREAK.

—We have had an opportunity of inspecting a new railway break and buffer of a very superior construction. A small model of a steam engine, to which the invention has been applied as an experiment, was exhibited, a short line of rail having been laid down to receive it. The break is so constructed that it checks the whole of the carriage wheels at once, without any of that dragging or straining which accompanies stoppage by the common mode. The buffer is placed in the center of the engine at the front; its action or power of resistance depending upon the alternate expansion and contraction of water and atmospheric air confined within a small cylinder. The engine was driven at a great speed against a large beam affixed to the wall, but the buffer acted so effectually that not the least shock was perceptible. It is said that a train of fifty tons, going at the rate of forty miles an hour, might, by means of the improved break, be stopped within a space of one hundred yards; while, by the ordinary mode, the stoppage could not be accomplished in less space than a mile.—[Liverpool Albion.]

MANNERS AND DOINGS IN CALIFORNIA.—"A Mr. Taylor," says the New Orleans Picayune, has returned from the land of Ophir, and brought with him many specimens of gold, and much valuable information in regard to the country. Mr. Taylor has a variety of samples of the metal, taken from different parts of the country. One was of bar gold, as it is termed, being in grains of various sizes, down to fine dust. Some grain gold from the river Stanislaus, intermixed with small lumps, were exceedingly beautiful. His largest mass of metal in a pure state is one of five ounces weight, and was picked up on the summit of a mountain at the head waters of the Sacramento. But the object of the greatest interest among his treasures, was a superb specimen of white quartz, thickly studded with gold, and veined throughout with the finest tracery in the same metal. It surpasses all we have ever seen in the way of gold in the rock, and would be invaluable to a museum. It weighs a pound and a half, and was found about two miles from the banks of the Stanislaus. Every part of the soil in the vicinity of the numerous rivers that intersect the country is mixed with gold deposits. The Juba, Feather, North, South and American forks, &c., equally afford rich treasures to the gold hunter. Between the rivers the land is called the dry diggings, but the richest spots are those in deep water, which are yet untouched, for want of machinery. The principal points at which the adventurers have congregated, are the old dry diggings, forty-five miles, and the Mormon Island, twenty five miles, from Sacramento city. A short time ago the diggers at Mormon Isle were getting a pound of gold a day.

In the opinion of Mr. Taylor, some astounding developments will ere long be made. It appears that the adventurers are continually shifting the scene of their operations, prospecting, as the term is, or going on the tramp in search of richer locations. These rarely miss finding fresh deposits in all their virgin purity and native abundance, when a new impetus to labor is experienced. It appears that parties are about to explore the head waters of the several rivers, in the hope of discovering original beds of the metal, which must exist somewhere in large extent, and it is very probable that success will crown their enterprise.

Mr. Taylor relates the most extraordinary tales of the reckless expenditure of money by the adventurers in California, and of the fabulous prices occasionally paid for the simplest articles of common need. Onions, $1 each; potatoes, $3 per pound; gun-powder, $61 per pound; revolvers, $100 to 250 each; pickles, 1 to 1-2 ounces of gold per bottle. These are prices that have been paid at the mines; but provisions are getting more plentiful, and consequently cheaper every week; as also clothing and merchandise, of every description. Lumber of all kinds is very scarce, $750 per thousand; shingles command their own price; marble counters can be purchased cheaper than to buy boards and have them made. This gentleman is of opinion that persons who contemplate going to California should go as little encumbered with goods as possible. Labor dictates its own reward, and may command all it needs; for it is, in fact, according to our informant's expressive language, the only aristocracy there. The prospects of the inhabitants, in the way of supplies, are highly favorable, as importations keep pouring into San Francisco, and will soon cause a glut of everything in the markets. We are sorry to learn that there has been considerable sickness at the placers, the scurvy having afflicted many, through the salt provisions on which they, for some time, exclusively fed. Another disease, indigenous, if not to the climate, at least to the occupation, had also visited the gold diggers, called the "lung fever," and which was produced by the habit of constantly stooping over their troughs, pans, or treasure "holes." The first symptom is a gnawing pain in the chest. One feature in the history of the numerous encampments on the placers is very pleasing. Crime, so much dwelt on in the States, is almost unknown there, and a principle of probity and uprightness is rigidly observed by one digger to another. They all, however, go armed with pistol and dagger. Gambling, we are sorry to learn, is practiced with the most frightful results, the blackleg preying with his wonted rapacity on the heedless. The population is multiplying daily, and Mr. Taylor believes that at this moment it amounts to fully 200,000 souls, the vast majority being males. The great exigency of the territory is female labor, a supply of which would be the greatest benefit that could be conferred on it. California, however, as an appendage to the republic, is yet in its infancy, and in a few years, by the wisdom of the general government, and the indomitable energies of our people, who will, no doubt, thickly settle it, every discrepancy of a moral, social, and political nature that now disfigures it, will have completely disappeared."

THE WESTBROOK PHENOMENON.—The Worcester Spy gives some account, from an eye-witness, of the late sinking of land at Westbrook, Maine, which took place between four and five o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, the 5th inst. The actual quantity of land is estimated at forty acres, and a brook has been formed, not so large but you may jump across it in many places. The Spy says:

There is missing some twenty acres of woodland, and about the same quantity of pasture land. Over this whole extent, the natural soil has entirely disappeared, and in its place is a firm plastic blue clay. The woodland was covered with a heavy growth of timber, the whole of which has sunk below its original level some thirty feet, leaving perpendicular walls on three sides, and gradually sloping on the other side. The trees on a portion of the land have disappeared entirely, and on another portion they are thrown about in great disorder—some sunk half or two thirds their length in the earth, yet remaining upright, some partly tipped over, some prostrate, and others reversed—the tops being under the surface, and the roots standing up in the air. One large and valuable elm tree, which had been sold by contract for timber, has entirely disappeared, not a vestige of it remaining. The clay is dry and firm on some parts, but in others is so moist that it yields readily to the foot, and a man standing upon it will, by the weight of his body, gradually sink into it. A ten foot pole has been run down its whole length into the clay, and it appears to be of the same consistency the whole depth. When jumped upon, it has a tremulous or shaking motion, as if it rested on water or a semi-fluid mass below. The present surface is nearly a level plain. The brook or "Stroudwater River," before mentioned, formerly passed over the earth which has thus sunk, but now passes by on the side which slopes into the cavity. This shows that the borders of the cavity were somewhat elevated by the sinking of the mass, and thus a new direction was given to the stream.

AMERICAN ANTIQUITIES.—Several specimens of American Antiquities have arrived in this city. They were discovered by an American traveler while exploring the country of the Sierra Madre, near San Luis Potosi, Mexico, and excavated from the ruins of an ancient city, the existence of which is wholly unknown to the present inhabitants, either by tradition or history. They comprise two idols and a sacrificial basin, hewn from solid blocks of concrete sandstone, and are now in the most perfect state of preservation. The removal of these heavy pieces of statuary from the mountains, was accomplished by means of wooden sleds, transported by canoes to the mouth of the Panuco, and thence shipped to this port. The largest of the idols was undoubtedly the God of Sacrifice, and one of the most important. It is of the life size, and the only complete specimen of the kind that has ever been discovered and brought away from the country—several attempts having been made by travelers, who were either thwarted by the natives, or encountered difficulties deemed impracticable to overcome. The anatomical proportions and beauty of this statue are not admired at the present day, but the elaborate work upon its entire surface attracts at once the attention and scrutiny of the beholder. It is principally ornamental, interspersed with symbols of mythology, and occasional hieroglyphics. It has two faces, representing Youth and Age; signifying that none are exempt from offering life as a sacrifice. The right hand forms an aperture, in which a light is burned during the time of sacrifice. The smaller idol is the God of Sorrow, to whom the worshippers came to offer up their devotions for the tears it had shed, and the relief afforded them in their griefs. The statue is diminutive, the carvings plain, and the whole simply devised. The Sacrificial Basin measures two feet in diameter, and displays much skill and truth in the workmanship. It is held by two serpents entwined, with their heads reversed—the symbol of eternity, which enters largely into the mythology of the ancient Egyptians. The Egyptian gallery of the British Museum contains several specimens of the work described.—[N. O. Picayune.]

ARMY CHANGES.—By the death of Gen. Gaines, Gen. Wool of this city, (says the Troy Budget,) stands next in rank to Gen. Scott. Previous to his death, the War Department had placed Gen. Gaines and Wool in the Eastern and Western Divisions, with their headquarters at Baltimore and Cincinnati. Gen. Gaines as senior, had the right of selection, and had, we believe, chosen the Eastern Division. By the decease of Gen. Gaines, the privilege of selection, vests in Gen. Wool, and it is presumed that, as his residence is in this city, there will be no objection on the part of the Department to his making Troy his headquarters.

GRAND LODGE OF NEW-YORK.

REGULAR Adjourned Session of the R. W. Grand Lodge of New-York. Friday evening June 22, 1849. Present George H. Andrews, G. M., Officers and a representation from a Quorum of Lodges. Minutes of the previous meeting were read and adopted.

The Grand Lodge Degree was conferred on several P. Gs. A petition was presented from Solon Peck and others, asking for a Charter for a Lodge, to be located at West Bloomfield, Ontario Co., and referred to Reps. Farr, Hobby and Whitlock, who reported favorable, and the Charter was granted under the name and title of Bloomfield Lodge, No. 882.

Petitions for the restoration of B. C. Paddock, and others, members of suspended and expelled Lodges, were referred to a Special Committee, who reported favorably, and Grand Lodge cards were granted them.

A petition from Thos. H. Farrington, and 23 others, members of Montauk Lodge No. 827, at the time of its expulsion, asking to be restored to Fellowship in the Order, and that the Charter of Montauk Lodge No. 827 be given to them, was referred to a Special Committee, who reported favorably, and the request was granted.

Petitions for celebrations from Lodges Nos. 78, 27, 155, 267, and 268, were referred to committees, who reported favorably, and the petitions were granted.

Appeal of John Loram against Croton Lodge No. 78, was referred to the committee on appeals.

By-Laws of Ark Lodge No. 28, and Corning Lodge No. —, were referred to the committee on laws.

Copy of Seals from various Lodges were received and ordered on file.

Rep. Dibblee, from committee appointed at a previous meeting, reported favorable to granting a charter to 50 brothers, who were formerly working as Randolph Lodge, and the recommendation of the committee was unanimously adopted.

Committee on Laws reported that they have received the laws of Nos. 288, 255, 857, 368.

The minutes of the meeting were read and approved, and the semi-annual session was closed.

BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Grand Secretary.

ONE of the most agreeable excursions, from New York, can be made to Hartford, in the Steamboat Hero, Capt. King. To any one in doubt as to how he can spend the 4th of July most agreeably, we say go to Hartford; for if the pleasant sail, the scenery of the Connecticut, and the beautiful city of Hartford, cannot content you, it is idle to seek another spot. Do not forget the Hero and Captain King.

Lieut. FRANCIS ALEXANDER, of Mississippi, died at sea, on board the U. S. frigate Raritan on the 11th of May.

EXPENSIVE TRIAL.—Mr. Walker, who was lately acquitted of the murder of his wife, expended $20,000 in defending himself; or, more correctly, his father did for him. He had a number of witnesses from St. Louis, to whom he paid $1000 each, and one of his lawyers cost him $200 a day. The county spent $12,000 in the prosecution.

LIGHTNING.—Peter Burt's house, in Taunton, was struck by lightning, and the fluid passed over his body while he was on his bed, and even singed his whiskers, without materially injuring him.

CAUSE OF CHOLERA.—A writer in Chamber's Edinburgh Journal maintains that electrical changes are the true cause of each migratory disease, as cholera, plague, and, indeed, of all epidemics. The true remedy, therefore, is the purification of the atmosphere, and the chief object to effect this is chlorine gas, which is an ingredient in common salt. Whole streets and towns can be fumigated with chlorine gas as easily as single dwellings.

"In 1832, the town of Dumfries, in Scotland, was affected with cholera from the 2d of September until the 23d of October. At that date, every street, lane and alley, was fumigated with chlorine gas. Within five days the pestilence was entirely annihilated. In Edinburgh the gas was used, but rather late, and in several other towns with like effect. It was ascertained beyond a shadow of doubt, (and to this fact we beg the earnest attention of our readers and the public at large) that every house in the affected districts in which chlorine gas was used as a disinfecting agent in the cholera of 1832, enjoyed an absolute immunity from the disease; and this fact is the great preservative against that frightful disease, and a positive proof that cholera owes its origin to electrical changes in the atmosphere."

A STRANGE disease has recently appeared at Baltimore. The Physicians of the Almshouse where most of the cases have occurred say: That this fever is a highly malignant Typhus, modified by climate, infectious in its character, but accompanied, in a large majority of cases, by intense jaundice, in this respect resembling Typhus Ictericus of systematic writers. It has come to us only in the past week, during which time forty-six cases have been admitted, and of these the very largest portion of twenty have proved fatal; the remainder are still under treatment. It has been brought alike from every section of the city, and as yet has only occurred among the free blacks. Thus far it has been much more grave among males than females, owing probably to differences of habits and occupation. The large majority of cases have been fatal between the third and seventh day, and in some instances they have died a few minutes after admission and three days from the date of seizure. This disease is by no means confined to the worthless and abandoned, as stated in several of the daily papers, but has, on the contrary, frequently happened in individuals of temperate and industrious habits, whose means were adequate to provide them with wholesome food and sufficient clothing. Two strong and healthy women, residents of the house, and employed as nurses, have taken the infection and died.

NEW INVENTION IN BAKING.—An invention has been made in Glasgow, which promises to be of great service in the process of baking. As it has not yet been patented, we are not at liberty to enter into details. Some idea of its effects may, however, be formed from the fact that a little model, a mere toy in appearance, standing upon a table less than a yard long, and only half as wide, is fully capable of doing the work of five or six bakers—a class of men whose labor is well known to be none of the lightest. The dough is both made and molded by the machine into loaves of the required size and shape; and, by an original and ingenious process of mixing and kneading, which can be done either with or without barm, the usual loss of weight, attributed to evaporation in "raising the sponge," is avoided; and a great saving in flour, as well as time and labor, is consequently effected. The bread manufactured by the model of the machine is of the most excellent quality.—[Glasgow Citizen.

A WASHINGTON letter in the Journal of Commerce quotes the following prediction, the original of which, in Latin, is copied from a book in the library of Augustinian Convent, at Rome, published in 1675:

"Before the middle of the XIX century, seditions will be excited everywhere in Europe; Republics will arise; Kings will be put to death, together with the nobility and ecclesiastics; and the religious will desert their convents. Famine, pestilence, and earthquakes will spread desolation over many cities. Rome will lose her scepter by the invasion of false philosophers. The Pope will be made a captive by his own people, and the Church of God will be placed under tribute, divested of its temporal possessions. In a short time there will be no Pope. A prince from the North will overrun Europe with a great army, destroy the republics, and exterminate all rebels. His sword, wielded by God, will vigorously defend the Church of Christ, uphold the orthodox faith, and subdue the Mahometan power. A new pastor, the final one, will come by a heavenly sign from the shore, in simplicity of heart and in the doctrine of Christ, and peace will be restored to the world."

* CAPT. E. W. SERREL arrived in this city on Tuesday, from the Isthmus of Panama, where he has acted in conjunction with Col. Hughes, in surveying a railroad route for Howland & Aspinwall. He was dispatched with intelligence to these gentlemen, to the effect that an excellent route had been discovered and that no impediments exist in the way of connecting the Atlantic and Pacific by a railroad, and that the undertaking can be successfully carried out in about two years. There is no need of tunneling, we are told, and the grade is favorable.

EFFECTS OF THE CHOLERA.—It cleans the streets, makes men temperate, reduces the price of strawberries, raises the price of beef, allows salad to go to seed, raises the price of lime and sulphur, thins the theaters, crowds the churches, shuts off the soda fountains, injures the hotels, benefits the doctors, gives oysters and lobsters a holiday—and furnishes editors with a topic to write about.

TO THE "GOLDEN RULE."
I am directed to forward the following to you, and request its publication:

"I. O. O. F.—At a regular meeting of Franklin Lodge No. 5, I. O. O. F., held at Port Gibson, Miss., June 5th, 1849, the following Preamble and Resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, Alfred Padon, who holds a Withdrawal Card from this Lodge, dated on or about the 30th May, 1848, has been charged with gross misconduct, particularly unbecoming an Odd-Fellow—and

Whereas, The said Padon has not appeared to answer said charges.

Resolved, That said Withdrawal Card and Certificate of Character, dated 19th September, 1848, be hereby revoked, and all Lodges and members of the Order are instructed to deny him any benefits or privileges of the Order. Also Resolved, That notice be sent to the Grand Lodge of the different States and the Subordinates of this State, and publication be made in the Golden Rule, New York, and Ark. Columbus Ohio.

MARRIED.

By the Rt. Rev. Dr. I. T. Edgar, in Nashville, Tennessee, on the evening of the 8th of May, COL. JOSEPH A. S. ACKLEN, of Huntsville, Alabama, United States District Attorney for the Northern and Middle Districts of Alabama, to Mrs. ADELICIA FRANKLIN, eldest daughter of the Rev. O. B. Hayes of that place.

WOLCOTTVILLE, CONN., June 12, 1849.

The following preamble and resolutions, offered by Bro. A. G. Bradford, on the death of Bro. Dr. Peter Beardslee, who died in this village June 3, 1848, aged 84 years, was ordered by vote of New Kaw Lodge No. 51, to be published in the Gazette and Rule.

ALSO, BRADFORD, Sec. Pro tem.
Whereas, An Allwise Being has removed, by death, from this village and community, a young man of unblemished character, and of great promise in the profession to which he was attached, and from our Lodge, in which he was a beloved and faithful member: Therefore,

Resolved, That we mourn with deepest sorrow this afflictive stroke of Providence, which has taken one from the midst of our community—young in years, and yet so perfect in the virtues which adorn mankind, with high order of talent, a noble soul and a generous heart, and from our Fraternity one who sustained the standard of Odd-Fellowship by unremitting toil, as Secretary of our Lodge, and as a working brother, who practiced the virtues of our Order as the rule of his life. Resolved, That the foregoing preamble and resolution be sent to the Gazette and Rule for publication.

PROSPECTUS.

GAZETTE OF THE UNION
AND GOLDEN RULE.

THE ORGAN OF THE ORDER,
Published under the auspices of the M. W. Grand Sire!

Vol. XI, commencing July 7, 1849.

It will contain, from week to week, the proceedings of the Grand Lodge of the State of New-York, and also of other States; accounts of Celebrations, Institutions of new Lodges, and occasionally, a complete Directory of all the Lodges in the Union.

JULIA WRIGHT—CANTO XVI.

Skillful in science which Lavater taught,
To study the heart's secrets by the look—
Our Julia, Sabretasche's meaning caught,
And read his wish as in an open book!
Indignant at the thought of being bought,
Her sylph-like frame with strong emotion shook;
The rich blood to her dark brow made a rush
And redder than her hair became the blush!"

How much the beauty of a sylph-like frame is enhanced by a clear, white brilliant complexion. GOURAUD'S ITALIAN MEDICATED SOAP is the only article which will produce this satisfactory result by the removal of Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Sallowness, Redness, Roughness, Salt Rheum, or other cutaneous disfigurements.

The renowned preparations of Dr. FELIX GOURAUD can ONLY be procured genuine at his original depot, 67 Walker-st., 1st store from, (not in) Broadway.

PROF. BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS, OR MEDICATED OOMPOUND,

FOR RESTORING, PRESERVING AND BEAUTIFYING HAIR, ERADICATING SCUFF AND DANDRUFF, AND CURING DISEASES OF THE SKIN, GLANDS, AND MUSCLES, CUTS, STINGS, BRUISES, SPRAINS, &c. &c.

IN order to convince the public of the efficacy of any curative preparation, in this thinking and reflective age, it is necessary to explain the philosophy of its operation. The process by which Professor Barry's Tricopherous produces such extraordinary results, cannot be understood without a brief notice of the structure and uses of the delicate substances to which it is applied, and in the condition of which it accomplishes the most salutary changes. The connection between the hair and the skin is so close, that the one may be almost deemed a continuation of the other, and hence whatever renovates, restores, and nourishes the hair, must of necessity have a healthful influence upon the sensitive membrane in which its roots are fixed.

The skin, that wonderful envelop in which the sense of touch resides, consists of three layers; the EPIDERMIS or cuticle, a semi-opaque, or almost insensible film; the KERATOCYSTUM, which is a spongy membrane reticulated with nerves and blood-vessels, and forms a sort of shield to the exquisitely delicate TRUE SKIN; and the true skin itself, which constitutes the third layer of the triple envelop. In this tough, flexible and elastic integument, are located the nerves, blood-vessels, &c., which supply sustenance to the hair, and in the derangement of which diseases of the skin originate. The vessels of the true skin supply the sacs containing the roots of the hair with the moisture which sustains the fibres, and the same causes which affect the health of the hair, also affect the health of the skin. This is self-evident to the casual observer, as well as susceptible of demonstration by the anatomist and physiologist; for in all cutaneous diseases, the hair becomes dry and harsh, and falls out in such quantities as sometimes to render the patient partially or entirely bald. Wounds, burns, &c., on the skin of the head, also produce baldness on the portions of the scalp where the injury has been inflicted, thus proving the close affinity and sympathy between the organism of the skin and the hair.

The wonderful restorative and remedial properties of Professor Barry's Tricopherous, are based upon this hypothesis, or rather this fact. It acts through the skin upon the hair, stimulating the inert vessels, opening the pores, imparting activity to the circulation, awakening from their lethargy all the vegetative functions which give life, vigor, and beauty to the fibres, extirpating every particle of scurf and dandruff, and soon clothing even the bald or half denuded head with a thick, glossy, silky, and elastic covering.

But this is only one of the uses of Professor Barry's Tricopherous. The same properties which restore vital and vegetative power the skin of the head are equally beneficial in all cutaneous diseases, or superficial injuries. For cuts, burns, bites of insects, sprains, erysipelas, blotches, pimples, scabies, ring-worms, rashes, scrofula, prickly heat, chilblains, chapped hands, rheumatism, burns, scalds, bruises, redness of the skin, and in short all the troublesome and painful external diseases and injuries which are so common in families, and which NOTHING BUT EXTERNAL REMEDIES CAN REMOVE, the Tricopherous will be found a speedy, safe, and unfailing cure. By virtue of its double claim as a restorative and beautifier of nature's choicest ornament, and a potent and invaluable remedial agent, it is entitled to a place on every toilet, and in every medicine chest.

Sold in large bottles, price 25 cents, at the principal office, 139 Broadway, and by druggists and perfumers generally throughout the United States and Canada. 256

THE PROPRIETORS having spent much time

In bringing this preparation of Sarsaparilla to its present state of perfection; and the experience of fourteen years has furnished them the most ample opportunity to study, in their various forms, the diseases for which it is recommended, and to adapt it exactly to their relief and cure. Patients who wish a really good Medicine are invited to give it a trial, and satisfy themselves of its superiority, and the invaluable property it possesses of arresting and curing disease. The bottle has been enlarged to hold one Quart, and in its present improved form may safely claim to be the best and cheapest medicine of the age. Its progress to the fame it has attained may be traced by a long line of facts and cures, that stand as landmarks and beacons for the invalid, pointing the way to the haven of health; and what it has already done for the thousands who have used it, it is capable of doing for the millions still suffering and struggling with disease. It purifies, cleanses, and strengthens the fountain springs of life, and infuses new vigor throughout the whole animal frame.

DYSPEPSY CURED.

The following testimonial, from a gentleman so well known as Mr. Cox, requires no comment, and recommends itself to all similarly afflicted:—NEW-ORLEANS, Dec. 18, 1848.
Messrs. A. B. & D. SANDS—Gentlemen: Having experienced the most beneficial effects from the use of your Sarsaparilla, it gives me pleasure to add my testimony to the numerous spontaneous effusions of grateful hearts which you continually are receiving.

My case was dyspeptic, or rather I may term it a weakness of the digestive organs. For more than a year, I was troubled with wind upon my stomach and its frequent eructation, together with producing a spasmodic contraction of the heart, often gave me much annoyance. After trying various remedies without avail, I commenced with your Sarsaparilla. Before I had used half a bottle, almost every symptom of this disagreeable complaint had vanished, and in a few weeks its continued use effected a complete cure. I therefore confidently recommend it to all persons affected in the same manner, and have reason to believe that many who are suffering under a supposed disease of the heart, if they would take your Sarsaparilla, in a few weeks would find themselves restored to health in both mind and body. I remain yours, very truly,
JOHN V. COX, 93 Lexington Avenue.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA IN PRUSSIA.

The Proprietors of this valuable Medicine have just received an order from our esteemed friend and correspondent, Theodore S. Fay, Secretary of Legation to the Court of Prussia, for the use of a member of the Royal Family—a copy of which we herewith lay before our readers.—[Home Journal.
"U. S. LEGATION, BERLIN, Nov. 30, 1848.—Gentlemen: I wish you to send two dozen bottles of your Sarsaparilla, for the use of his Royal Highness Prince Waldimir of Prussia, to this Legation, as soon as possible. It is necessary that he should receive it immediately; therefore, please send it by first steamer. The bill can be made out in the name of the Prince, and sent with it: Your obedient servant,
"THEO. S. FAY."

SCROFULOUS AFFECTION OF THE EYES.

SOUTH KINGSTON, (R. I.) Oct. 11, 1847.—Messrs. SANDS—Gentlemen: My little daughter, when one year old, was attacked with a scrofulous humor on her face, which soon after extended into her eyes, causing almost total blindness in one of them, and disfiguring her whole face. I employed two physicians to attend her, who exhausted their utmost skill to give her relief, but it all proved useless, and finally one of them remarked to me that he had known of some striking cures effected by Sands' Sarsaparilla, and advised me to try it. I obtained one bottle, which she commenced using, and before it was all used up it had effected an entire cure. It is now over four years since she was cured, and there has been no reappearance of the disease, and we are satisfied that it is a perfect cure. It gives me great pleasure to add that I can recommend it to any sufferer from a similar complaint.

Respectfully yours,
GEORGE ROBINSON.

OLD DOCTOR

Jacob Townsend, THE ORIGINAL DISCOVERER OF THE GENUINE

TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA

Old Dr. Townsend is now about 70 years of age, and has long been known as an AUTHENTIC and DISCOVERER of the GENUINE ORIGINAL "TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA." He was compelled to limit its manufacture, by which means it has been kept out of market, and the sales circumscribed to those only who had proved its worth and known its value. It had reached the ears of many, nevertheless, as those persons who had some disease or ailment, from death, proclaimed its excellence and wonderful HEALING POWER.

Grand and Unequalled Preparation

is manufactured on the largest scale, and is called for throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Unlike young S. P. Townsend's, it improves with age, and never changes, but for the better; because it is prepared on scientific principles by a scientific man. The highest knowledge of Chemistry, and the latest discoveries of the art, have all been brought into requisition in the manufacture of the OLD DR. TOWNSEND'S SARSAPARILLA. The Sarsaparilla root, it is well known to medical men, contains many medicinal properties, and some properties which are inert or useless; and others, which, if retained in preparing it for use, produce fermentation and acid, which is injurious to the system. Some of the properties of Sarsaparilla are so volatile, that they entirely evaporate and are lost in the preparation, if they are not preserved by a scientific process, known only to those experienced in its manufacture. Moreover, these volatile principles, which fly off in vapor, or as an exhalation, under heat, are the very essential medicinal properties of the root, which give to it all its value. The

GENUINE

Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's Sarsaparilla

is so prepared, that all the inert properties of the Sarsaparilla root are first removed, every thing capable of becoming acid or of fermentation, is extracted and rejected; then every particle of medicinal virtue is secured in a pure and concentrated form; and thus it is rendered incapable of losing any of its valuable and healing properties. Prepared in this way, it is made the most powerful agent in the

Cure of Innumerable Diseases.

Hence the reason why we hear commendations on every side in its favor by men, women, and children. We find it doing wonders in the cure of CONSUMPTION, GOUT, RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA, and LIVER COMPLAINT, and in RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA, and LIVER COMPLAINT, and in TUBERCULAR ERUPTIONS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, and all skin diseases arising from

Impurity of the Blood.

It possesses a marvellous efficacy in all complaints arising from indigestion, from Acidity of the Stomach; from unequal circulation, determination of blood to the head, palpitation of the heart, cold feet and cold hands, cold limbs, and the impurities of the blood. It has the power of not only curing colds; and promotes easy expectoration, and gentle perspiration, relaxing stricture of the lungs, throat, and every other part.

But in nothing is its excellence more manifestly seen and acknowledged than in all kinds and stages of

Female Complaints.

It works wonders in cases of fluor albus or whites, Falling of the Womb, Obstructed, Suppressed, or Painful Menstruation, Irregularity of the menstrual periods, and the like; and is effectual in curing all forms of the Melancholia Disease.

By removing obstructions, and regulating the general system, it gives tone and strength to the whole body, and cures all forms of

Nervous Diseases and Debility,

and thus prevents or relieves a great variety of other diseases, as Spinal Irritation, Neuralgia, St. Vitus Dance, Whooping Cough, Epileptic Fits, Convulsions, &c.

It is not possible for this medicine to fail to do good; it has nothing in it which can ever hurt or spoil, and therefore, can never lose its curative properties. It cleanses the blood, excites the liver to healthy action, tones the stomach, and gives good digestion, relieves the bowels of torpor and constipation, allays inflammation, purifies the skin, equalizes the circulation of the blood, produces gentle warmth equally all over the body, and the most perfect nutrition; relieves all skin diseases and eruptions, removes all obstructions, and invigorates the entire nervous system. Is not this, then, The Medicine you Pre-eminently Need?

But can any of these things be said of S. P. Townsend's inferior article? This young man's liquid is not to be

Compared with the Old Dr.'s,

because of one GRAND FACT, that the one is INCAPABLE of DETE-RIORATION and

Never Spoils,

while the other DOES; it sours, ferments, and flows the bottles containing it into fragments; the sour, acid liquid, clogging, and damaging other goods! Must not this horrible compound be poisonous to the system? What put acid into a system already diseased with acid? What causes Dyspepsia but acid? Do we not all know, that when food sours in our stomachs, what muscles it produces? Fatulence, heartburn, palpitation of the heart, liver complaint, diarrhoea, dysentery, colic, and convulsions of the blood! What is Scrofula but an acid humor in the body? What produces all the humors which bring on Eruptions of the Skin, Scald Head, Itch, Rheum, Erysipelas, White Swellings, Fever-Sore, and all ulcerations internal and external? It is nothing but the acid humor, and the acid humor, which sours, and thus spoils all the fluids of the body, more or less. What causes Rheumatism, but a sour acid fluid, which manifests itself by moving the joints and elsewhere, irritating and inflaming the tender and delicate tissues upon which it acts? So of nervous diseases, of impurity of the blood, of deranged circulation, and nearly all the ailments which afflict human nature.

Now, is it not horrible to make and sell, and infinitely worse to use this

Souring, Fermenting, Acid "Compound"

OF S. P. TOWNSEND!

and yet he would have it understood that Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's

GENUINE ORIGINAL SARSAPARILLA, is an IMITATION of the inferior preparation!!

Heaven forbid that we should deal in an article which would bear the same distant resemblance to S. P. Townsend's article! and which should bring down upon the Old Dr. a mountain of complaints and cruelties from Agents who have sold, and purchasers who have used S. P. Townsend's FERMMENTING COMPOUND.

We wish it understood, because it is the absolute truth, that S. P. Townsend's article and Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's Sarsaparilla are as different as night and day, and infinitely dissimilar; that they are unlike in every particular, having not one single thing in common.

As S. P. Townsend is no doctor, and never was, is no chemist, no pharmacist, knows no more of medicine or disease than any other common, unscientific, unprofessional man, what guarantee can the public have that they are receiving a genuine scientific medicine, containing all the virtues of the articles used in preparing it, and which are incapable of obnoxiousness which might render them the AGENTS of DISEASE instead of health?

It is to arrest frauds upon the unfortunate, to pour balm into wounded humanity, to kindle hope in the despairing bosom, to restore health and vigor into the crushed and broken, and to banish infirmity—OLD DR. JACOB TOWNSEND HAS SOUGHT and FOUND the opportunity and means to bring his

Grand Universal Concentrated Remedy, within the reach, and to the knowledge of all who need it, that they may learn and know, by joyful experience, its

and thus to have the unspeakable satisfaction of having raised thousands and millions from the bed of sickness and dependency to hope, health, and a long life of vigor and usefulness to themselves, their families and friends.
